A bright New England boy, whose ears were always open to the discussions going on at his father's dinner-table, inquired what "Crédit Mobilier" was. "It's our national game, my son," replied the father; "and you will be able to play it when you grow up and go to Congress."

An Englishman recently died and left half a million in bequests to various public charities. The will was contested by his sister on the ground of insanity, she alleging that the testator had always hated mankind.

More than sixteen hundred pupils, many of them very young children, were gathered in a public school-house in Twenty-sixth Street one day last week, when the building caught fire from—as usual—a defective chimney flue. As the smoke began to fill the rooms the pupils were greatly alarmed, and a terrible panic seemed inevitable. Fortunately the principal maintained a coolness and presence of mind deserving of all commendation. With perfect calmness she gave an order to prepare for dismissal, and directed the pianist to play a march, as was the usual custom. In seven minutes every scholar had marched safely out of the burning building, and the firemen commenced their work of extinguishing the flames. This is an example worthy of imitation.

A number of young women have united to form the "New York Business Women's Union," and are now occupying a large house, at No. 222 Madison Street. The design of the association is to secure good lodging accommodations for respectable women whose incomes are small. There are about eighty rooms in the house, which are to be let, furnished, at very low rates. The rooms, however, are not all furnished as yet, and friends of the Union desire such assistance as shall enable them to furnish the house completely, and also to establish a suitable restaurant for young women, where plain food may be obtained at prices within their means.

After a somewhat prolonged courtship of fifty years, John Griswold Rogers, aged seventy-eight, and Eliza Denison Griswold, aged seventy-nine, were recently married at Tunkapogue. So far as is known there never was any misunderstanding between the couple, nor any assignable cause for the long delay. They have always been considered as "engaged," and the gentleman has made his Sunday evening call on the lady every fortnight for the last fifty years!

Havana is said to be crowded with visitors from the Northern States. They are mostly persons of delicate health who can not endure the rigors of our increasingly severe winters. Such prolonged cold weather, and such a vast amount of snow as it has been our lot to endure, might well make invalids long for the balmy breezes of the South.

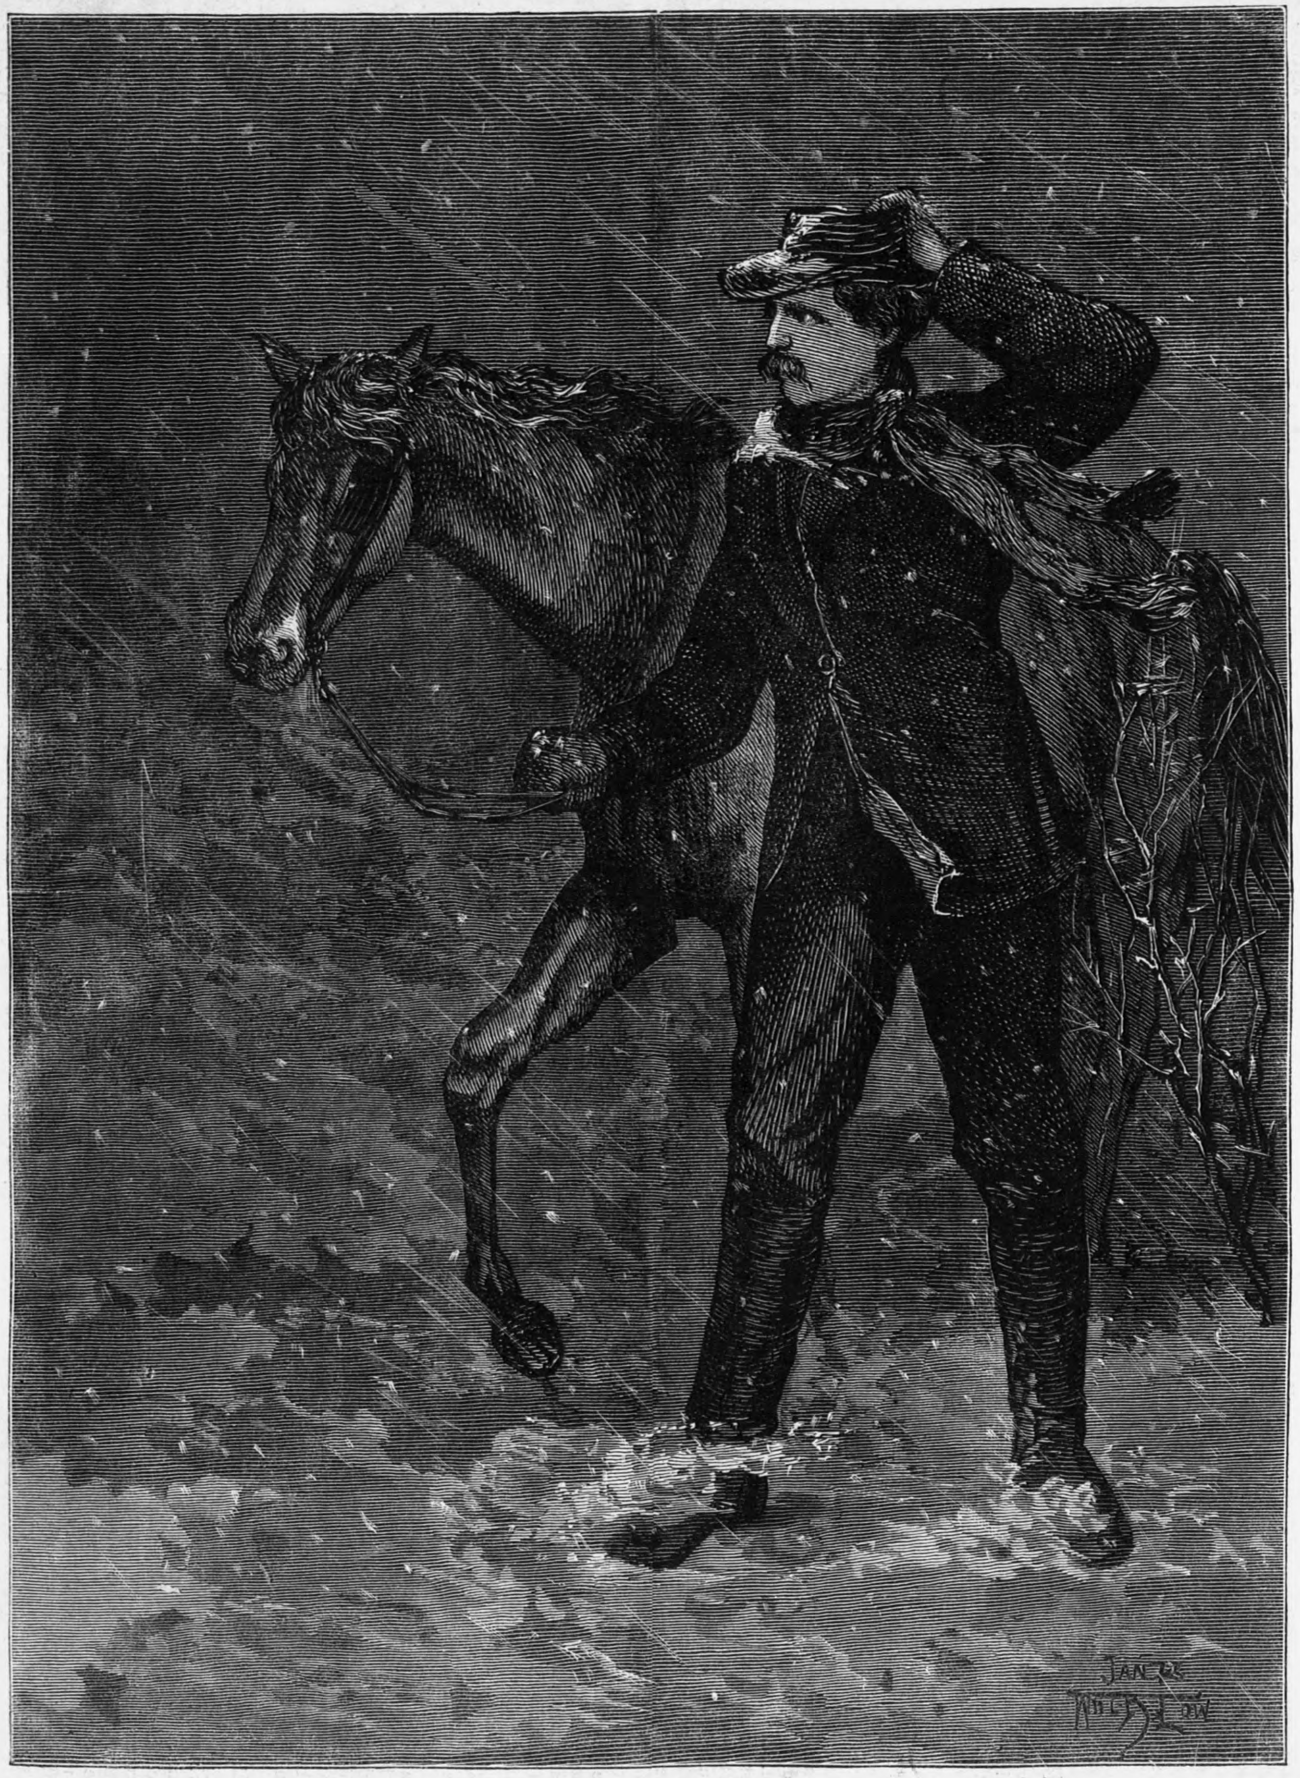
Two or three years ago the Academy of Sciences of Paris offered a prize of twenty thousand francs for some simple and positive test of death. A practical and conclusive one has been given, which is so simple that any non-professional person can apply it. It depends upon the fact that no matter how profound the syncope, or how death-like the person may appear, if the circulation continues, however feebly, the person is not dead. All that is necessary, therefore, is to tie a string firmly around the finger of the supposed corpse: if the blood circulates in the least, the whole finger from the string to the tip will swell and generally turn a bluish-red.

"Howard Glyndon," in the Christian Union, recommends that the study of art be more generally utilized by women, so that they may engage in pursuits congenial to their natures, and work be a delight rather than a hardship. She says:

"It is sad indeed—when one thinks of the thousand graceful pursuits, which are fairly remunerative and which require an adept hand, a ready eye, and loving attention rather than great mental effort, which women might make their own—to see them so firmly tied down to the idea that teaching, sewing, writing, lecturing, and doctoring are the only things they can do! I fully approve of women as teachers; but there are many who have not the stamina which it requires. Sewing for a living is slow death, as a rule. As for lecturing, the less said the better. Every body likes to hear himself talk, but it is an open question as to how much good is gained by either side when a woman of only average talents lectures. Every profession requiring a woman to be out at all hours, in all weathers, and on all days is open to unanswerable objections, and that covers the ground of doctoring. There are many artistic pursuits in which a woman may choose her own hours and days for work and relaxation; and every calling that favors this plan is specially adapted for women."

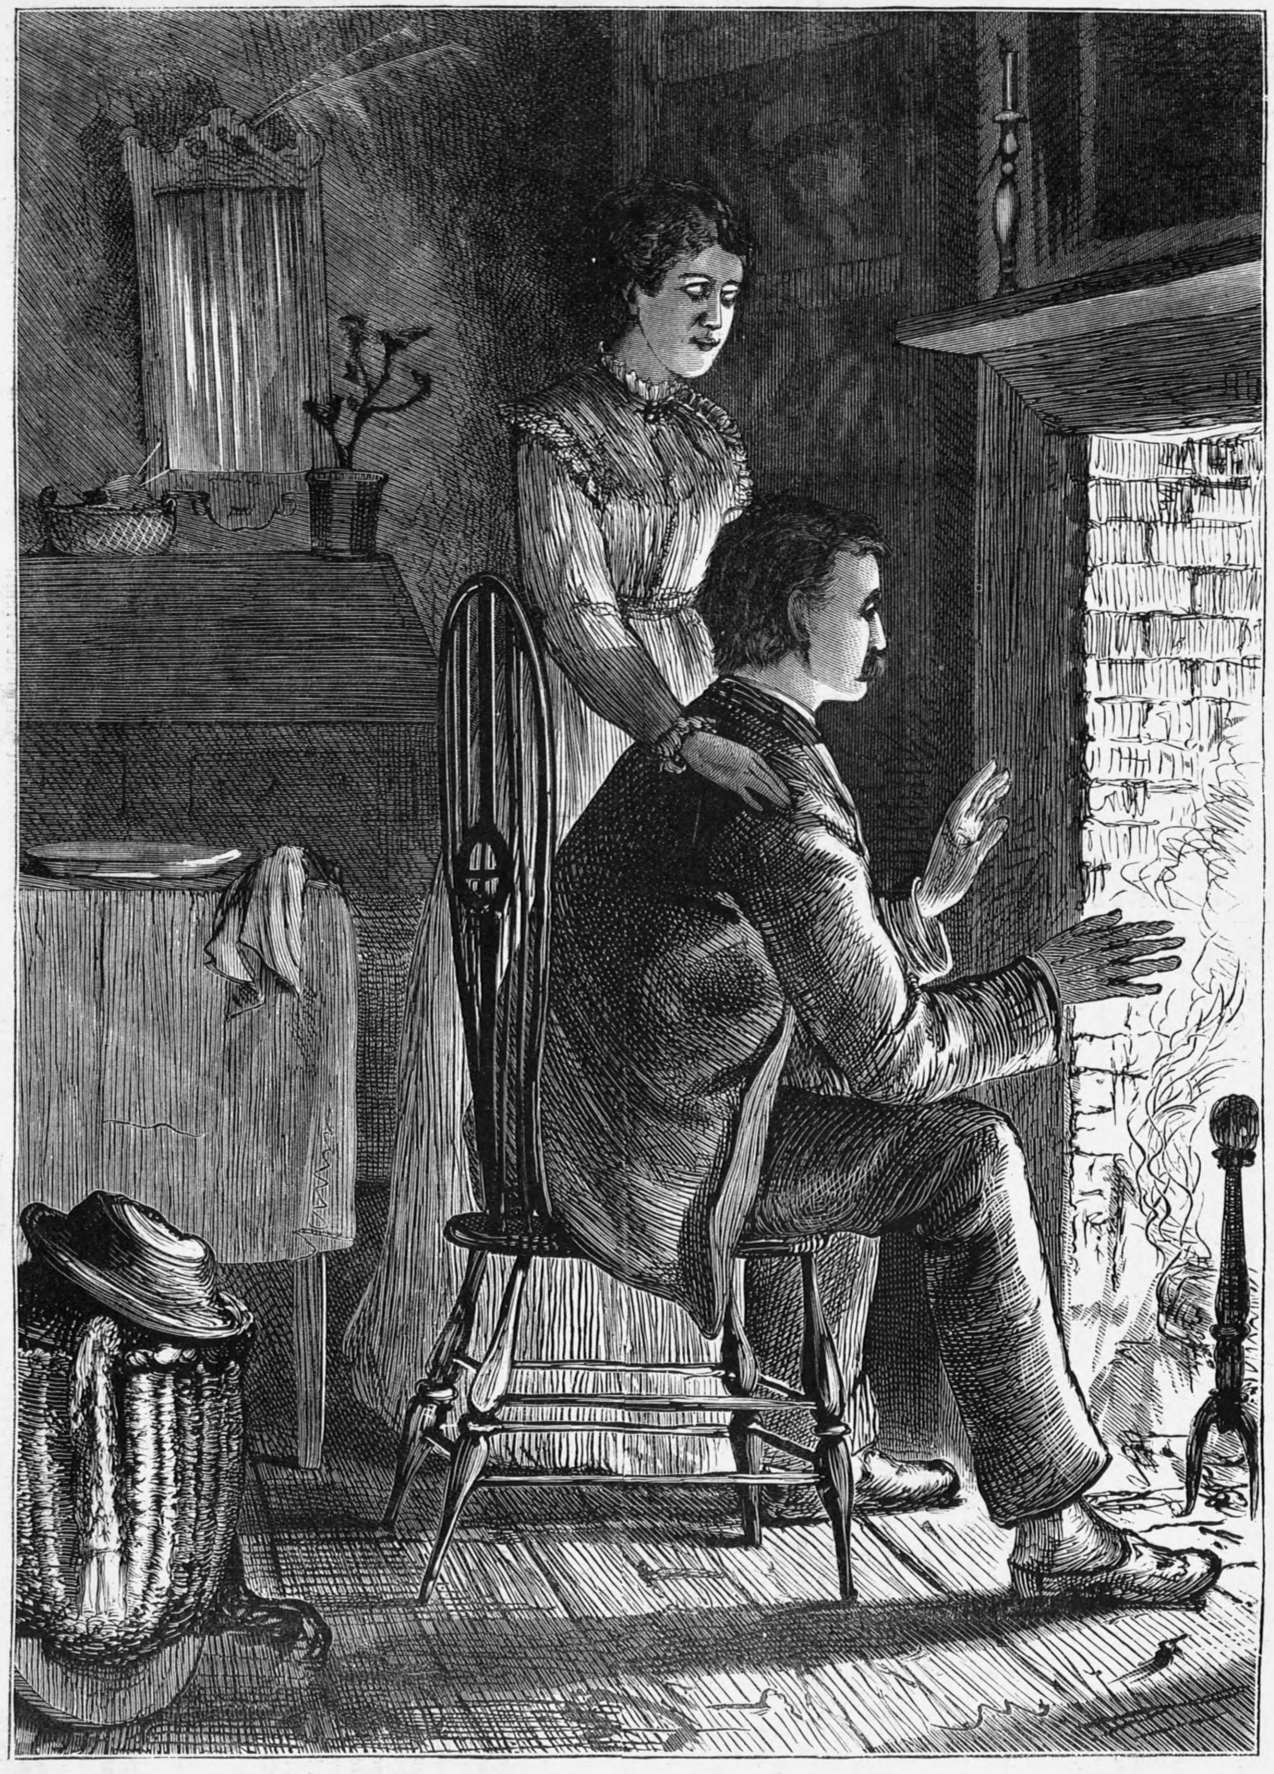
Designing, in its various branches, flower-painting, coloring photographs, and copying paintings are among the pursuits mentioned as ministering to the love of the beautiful which almost every woman possesses; and in all works of art requiring nicety of detail, delicacy of touch, and patience she, in general, would excel.

Hosted by Google



OUT IN THE SNOW.

A SEASONABLE CONTRAST.—[SEE PAGE 155.]



HOME AT LAST.

Hosted by Google

Knitted and Crochet Jacket with Hood for Girl from 8 to 10 Years old.

THIS jacket is knitted in an open-work design with white zephyr worsted. It is lined with blue cashmere, and trimmed with crochet edging of blue worsted and with bows of blue gros grain ribbon. To make the jacket cut of the lining two equal pieces each from Figs. 14 and 17, Supplement, and one piece each from Figs. 15 and 16; the back, hood, and sleeves are each cut in one piece. Then work the outside according to the patterns. First make one front, beginning on the front edge with a loose crochet chain stitch foundation, the length of which should correspond to the front edge of the pattern. After taking up the stitches knit with coarse wooden needles seven rounds, going back and forth, as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 p. (purled), t. t. o. (thread thrown over). 2d round.—Always alternately purl together the t. t. o. and st. (stitch) of the preceding round, t. t. o. 3d–7th rounds.—Like the second round. Now knit with medium-sized long steel needles, going back and forth, three rounds all plain. In the first of these three rounds k. together the t. t. o. and st. of the preceding round. These ten rounds form a puffed strip, and are repeated until this part has gained the requisite width. For the neck widen several st. according to the pattern, and for the armholes first narrow and widen also. In a similar manner make the rest of the jacket, according to the patterns. Each part is begun with a crochet chain stitch foundation; each sleeve at the edge marked "seam;" and the hood at the edge which comes on the neck. Having lined the finished parts and joined them, edge the jacket on the front and under edge (including the slits) with edging worked with blue split zephyr worsted in two rounds as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 sc. (single crochet) on the next edge st., 4 ch. (chain stitch), with these pass over a quarter of an inch of the edge. 2d round.—Always alternately on the next ch. scallop of the preceding round work 1 sc., on the following ch. scallop 3 double crochet, before and after the sc. always 2 ch. Trim the sleeves, hood, armholes, and neck with similar edging. Furnish the jacket with a belt of stiff linen, cashmere, and a knitted puffed strip, edged with crochet edging all around, and furnished with buttons and button-loops for closing, as shown by the illustration. Finally, pleat the hood in the middle of the back as indicated on the pattern, and trim the jacket, as shown by the illustration, with blue ribbon bows, and a worsted tassel on the point of the hood.

Fig. 1.—FIGURED TULLE AND LACE SCARF WORN AS FICHU. BACK.—[See Fig. 2; also Figs. 1 and 2 on First Page.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 24.

KNITTED AND CROCHET JACKET WITH HOOD FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 14–17.

Fig. 2.—FIGURED TULLE AND LACE SCARF WORN AS FICHU. FRONT.—[See Fig. 1; also Figs. 1 and 2 on First Page.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 24.

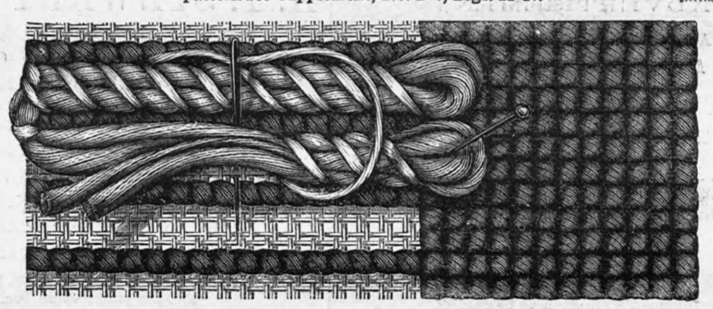


Fig. 4.—FRINGE BORDER FOR BRIOCHE.—[See Page 148.]

Figured Tulle and Lace Scarf, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS scarf is made of figured black tulle, and is trimmed with black lace two inches and a half and three inches and a quarter wide, a bow of black gros grain ribbon two inches wide, and tassels. The scarf may be worn either as a fichu or fanchon. To make the scarf cut of tulle one piece from Fig. 24, Supplement, sew up the seam from 44 to 45, fold the tulle on the outside along the dotted line, and join it with the ends from 46 to 47. The ends consist each of a straight piece of tulle thirty-six inches and seven-eighths long and five inches and three-quarters wide, which is sloped off on the sides from the under toward the upper edge to a width of two inches and a quarter, and pointed on the under edge as shown by the illustrations. Trim the ends with lace, pleat them, bringing × on ●, and set on the remaining trimming.

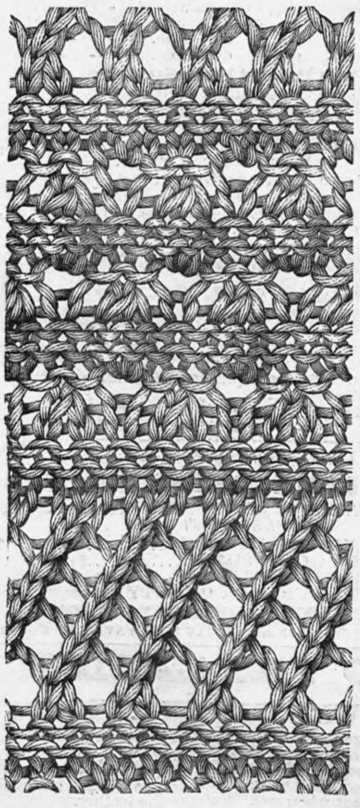

Fig. 2.—FOUNDATION FOR KNITTED SCARF.—FULL SIZE.—[See Page 148.]

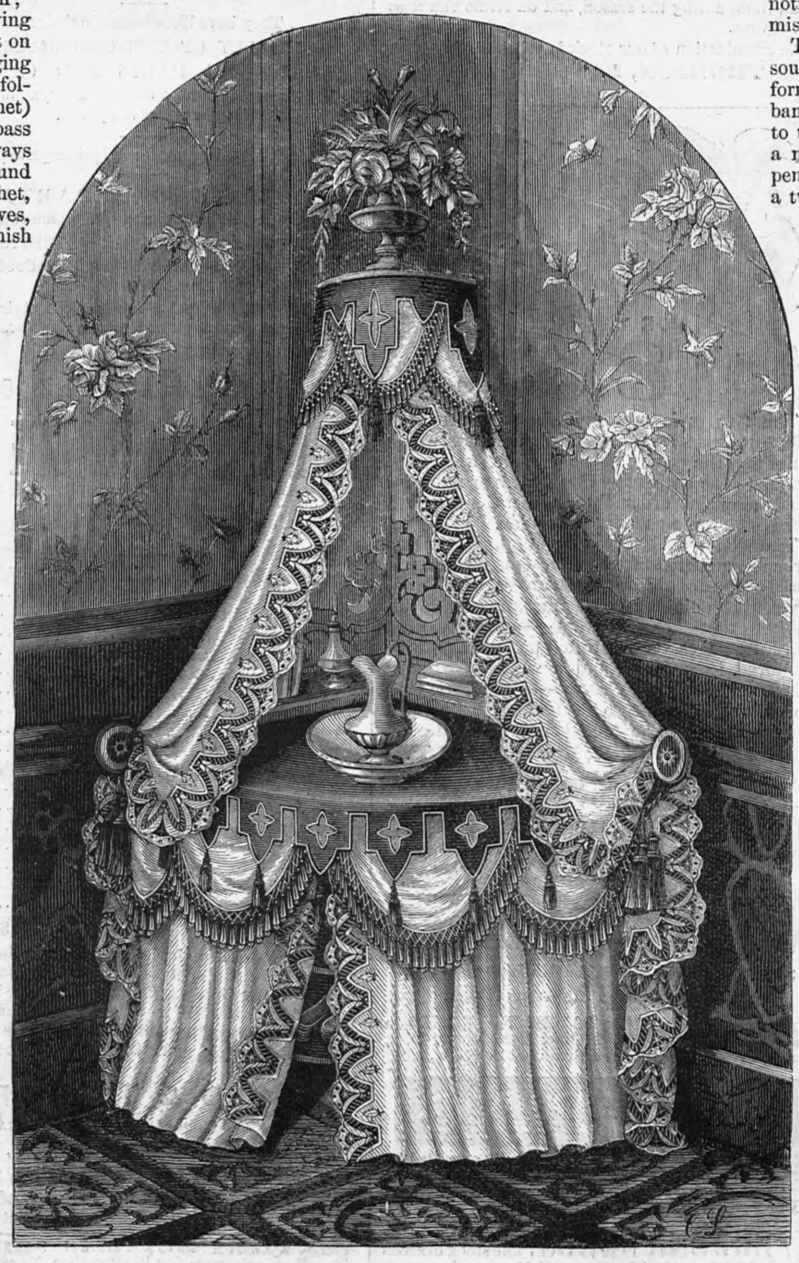

TOILETTE-TABLE WITH COVER AND EMBROIDERED CURTAINS.
For design see Supplement, No. XI., Fig. 35.

Toilette-Table with Cover and Embroidered Curtains.

THE stand of this toilette-table is of maple, with a carved top. The cover for the table is of dark brown enameled cloth, finished with lambrequin points in which a design figure has been cut out and underlaid with lighter enameled cloth, as shown by the illustration. The points are bound on the edges with light brown worsted braid, and are trimmed with tassels. The curtains are of Swiss muslin, trimmed with a border in English embroidery, for which Fig. 35, Supplement, gives the design. The lambrequin which finishes the curtains is made of brown enameled cloth, or cloth to match the cover, and is finished with braid and tassels.

CHINESE MEDICINE.

A LARGE proportion of Chinese medicine is really magic. There are deities who are supposed to preside over some diseases whose mercy is sought by offerings and incense. There are also malevolent spirits to whom sudden and mysterious maladies are attributed, and who are solemnly exorcised by Tauist priests, with bell, bowl, book, and candle. In some cases an instrument called an arrow, on which is written the word command, is borrowed from one of the temples of a powerful god. This is supposed to serve as a notice to quit to the demon who is at the bottom of the mischief.

They have an idea that in cases of extreme sickness the soul leaves the body, but hovers about the place where its former tabernacle is lying. In order to induce it to return, a bamboo stick, with fresh green leaves at its end, is procured, to this a white cock is fastened, and by means of a red cord a metallic mirror and one of the sick man's coats are suspended, the latter being kept in position by the insertion of a two-foot measure. This is carried outside by one of the relatives, while a Tauist priest exerts all his powers of persuasion to induce the wandering soul to re-enter its earthly home. Should the pole turn round in the hands of its holder, it is looked upon as a sign that the object has been accomplished.

The medicinal agents of the Chinese physicians are very varied. Salts and mercury and rhubarb have been in use for ages. One work contains a list of "1012 medicines, of which there are from metals and stone 132 kinds; grasses and vegetables (including roots, leaves, flowers, and seeds), 318 kinds; trees (whether the medicine be found in the root, trunk, bark, leaf, flower, fruit, or seed), 177; from the human body, 20 kinds; from animals, 91 kinds; from fowls and birds, 34 kinds; from bugs, flies, worms, snakes, shell-fish, turtles, etc., 99 kinds; fruits, 40 kinds; of the 'five grains,' 38 kinds; of the cabbage, turnip, and melon family, 62 kinds. The list of medicines from the human body are, hair cut fine and used in plasters, curly hair, woman's milk, dandruff, teeth filings, ears, exuviæ, parings of finger and toe nails of pregnant women (which nail-parings are reduced to ashes by burning), bone of the forehead reduced to ashes, beard of the upper lip, blood, the placenta, the gall, and other things which can not be written here. The list of medicines from the animals begins as follows: Dragon's bones; white dragon's bones—his teeth and horns; musk of the musk-deer; ox bezoar; bear's gall; ivory; glue made from a black mule's hide; cow's milk, cream, and curd; oil of milk; mare's milk, cream, and curd; hoof of a white horse, his thigh—also the same of a bay horse; bull's manure; ram's horns; sheep's gall, lungs, heart, kidneys, teeth, flesh, and horns; chamois's horns; deer's horns—the tip of the horn is regarded as especially valuable for restoring the blood; rhinoceros's horns; tiger's claws and eyes; dog's gall, heart, brain, teeth, skull, blood, and so on."

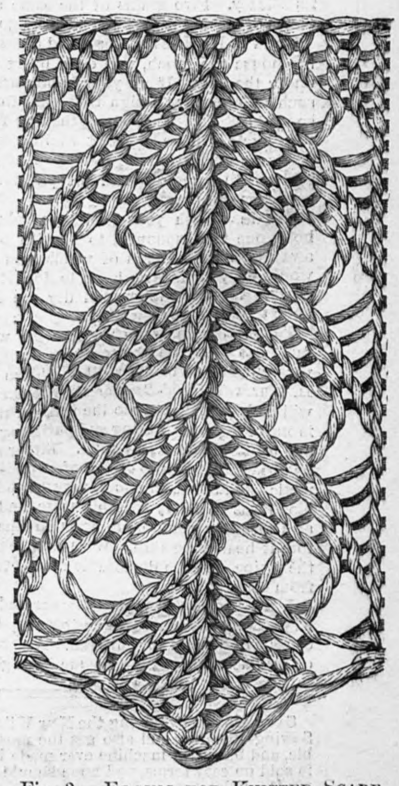

Fig. 3.—EDGING FOR KNITTED SCARF. FULL SIZE.—[See Page 148.]

Hosted by Google

While we may fairly laugh at the monstrous nature of these compounds, it is only fair to remember that the European pharmacopœia was at no very distant date disfigured by similar abominations. The historian of English medicine would have to chronicle the fact that in grave "scientific" works mummy powder, moss from the skull of a suicide, calves' hearts, and other unmentionable nastinesses were set down as valuable drugs.

It is without surprise, after going through this list, that we learn that John Chinaman, who is not without a sense of humor, has a colloquial phrase that "such a one has been cured dead." No wonder that he should often come to the conclusion that the "ordinary physic kills men," and take refuge in the primeval medicine of charms and invocations.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

LOUISE.—A cut paper pattern, to be given in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI., is the best model for your spring poplin. Get darker gray merino, and make suit by pattern of Double-breasted Redingote illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V. The skirt should be about three and a half yards wide. You will find the newest arrangement of the back of basques in the suit in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI., also a design for trimming. Do not use velvet on your striped silk; put bias bands of the same for heading flounces. It is too soon to advise you about making your Hernani.

B.—Olla podrida is a favorite Spanish ragout, composed of various kinds of meats and vegetables boiled together. In English it is used metaphorically to signify a medley or incongruous mixture.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—The lines beginning, "If the red slayer thinks he slays," are by Emerson, in Brahma, and can be found in the collection of his poems. We do not think it expedient to republish the poem in question.

MINING TOWN.—My Novel is published by Harper & Brothers; price, $1 50 in paper, or $3 50 in cloth. We do not know where you can procure the life of Baron Trenck. He was a notorious adventurer; and the romantic story told of him in the Muhlbach novels has no foundation in fact. Carlyle gives a truthful account of his career in his life of Frederick the Great, which we recommend to you. The adventure of Lord Bacon's of which you speak is unknown to us. There are several Bacons distinguished in English history. As they are often confounded, a sketch of them may not be amiss. First was Roger Bacon, a Franciscan friar, who was born in 1214 and died in 1292. He was one of the most learned men of his time, an able mathematician and astronomer, and is reputed to have been the inventor of gunpowder. Sir Nicholas Bacon, the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal for more than twenty years in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was born in 1510. He was a renowned jurist, but was chiefly remarkable for having been the father of the great Francis Bacon, Viscount St. Albans and Baron Verulam, the noblest Roman of them all. This great author was born 1561 and died 1626. He was extremely precocious, and was matriculated at Trinity College, Cambridge, at thirteen. He was one of the most eminent philosophers and statesmen of his day; but his political career was darkened by corruption in office, of which he was convicted on his own confession. Posterity has done justice to the philosopher, and forgiven the offender. There was also a John Bacon, esteemed the father of English sculpture, who was born in 1740 and died in 1799.

SUBSCRIBER W.—For your black silk use a cut paper pattern that will be illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI.

NETTIE LEE.—Sulphate of quinine mixed with lard is said to be successful in restoring lost eyebrows. Five grains of the sulphate to one ounce of lard is given as a recipe, but we have no means of knowing its efficacy. Five grains of the same sulphate to an ounce of alcohol is recommended by good authority.

EMMA P. D.—Loss of sleep, bad digestion, sitting in the house too much, will each bring deep wrinkles under the eyes. If all your habits are correct, then such wrinkles are a sign that vital force is not well supplied. You need strengthening food, sunshine, very likely a little pleasant excitement. The black of cloves burned at the candle, or of gum-mastic, is said not to come off with perspiration if applied to eyelashes and brows.

CARRIE.—Wash your face in a solution of hartshorn, one table-spoonful to a basin of water, to do away with the oiliness of which you complain. It would do your face no harm to dust it with prepared chalk. Weak camphor will dry the skin. Try carbolic toilette soaps a while.

THREE GRACES.—The recipe with which you find fault has been tried by too many hundreds of people for your failure to discredit it. Turn to Rev. W. H. H. Murray's Hand-Book of the Adirondacks, and you will find his testimony to the value of the mixture. It is one of the most healing and purifying things known, and is of old and high repute. Either some mischievous friend put a drop or two of croton-oil in your cosmetic—and the results look very much like it—or your blood was in a very irritable state, and the first office of a cosmetic would be to draw out the impurities before it healed the skin. With exactness in preparing the recipe, no such deplorable results can come to you from other causes.

J. L.—Ladies will wear Dolmans and double-breasted jackets of cashmere for spring wraps. Sacques and capes will be used for children. A yard and a quarter of cashmere will make a sacque for a girl of seven.

SAVE MONEY by buying the New Wilson Under-Feed Sewing-Machine, and also get the most perfect, durable, and beautiful machine ever made in America. It is sold on easy terms, and none should fail to call and see it. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the U. S. The Company want agents in country towns.

DIAMONDS.

THERE is a curious reminiscence for lovers of the Diamond, in the story which has come down to us from the last century, of the first discoverer of the Brazilian Diamond fields. This was one Bernardo Fonseca Lobo, a man of an old Portuguese family (the same name is borne by the present Portuguese Envoy at Washington), who lived in the Brazilian province of Minas Geraes. He had previously traveled in Portuguese India, where he had seen rough Diamonds, and learned to know them when he saw them. Lobo found the gold-seekers of Brazil using certain pebbles carelessly as counters in card-playing. He knew them at once to be rough Diamonds, and took them to Lisbon, where the discovery was confirmed. At once the European Diamond brokers and traders took the alarm. The new Diamonds would destroy the value, they exclaimed, of the old stock. So they put about a story that these Brazilian Diamonds were poor Diamonds from India, sent to Brazil, and from Brazil to Europe. In 1750 an Englishman wrote a treatise to prove this. The Brazilian Diamonds were thus at first shut out of the market. But Lobo was too clever for his foes. He took his Diamonds out to India, and at Goa sold them as Indian Diamonds. This may seem a little extraordinary to us now, when the difference between the Diamonds of Brazil and of India is so well known. If one goes into the establishment of Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, 22 John Street (up stairs), where the choicer varieties of the old Indian Diamond and the Brazilian may be seen in juxtaposition with the new African Diamonds, he will wonder as much at the notion of their being confounded with each other as at a man's mistaking Chambertin for Chateau Lafitte, or Persian silk for Chinese, or the Bartlett pear for the Duchesse. All Diamonds are valuable. Why all Diamonds are not equally valuable is a thing easily to be learned, and, for Diamond buyers, worth learning.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WE ARE NOW OPENING
A MOST ATTRACTIVE STOCK OF
Ladies' Costumes and Wrappings
FOR SPRING AND SUMMER WEAR,
CONSISTING ENTIRELY OF
IMPORTED GOODS.
The stock will be VERY EXTENSIVE, embracing a much larger variety than at any previous time, and will be made up from the
NEWEST & MOST FASHIONABLE MATERIALS.
Our arrangements are such as to exhibit
THE LATEST NOVELTIES
at all times during the season, and on terms THE MOST FAVORABLE.
An examination of our stock is solicited.
THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO.,
391 BROADWAY, N. Y.

The GUIDE is now published QUARTERLY. 25 cents pays for the year, four numbers, which is not half the cost. Those who afterward send money to the amount of One Dollar or more for Seeds may also order Twenty-five Cents' worth extra—the price paid for the Guide.

The January Number is beautiful, giving plans for making Rural Homes, Designs for Dining Table Decorations, Window Gardens, &c., and containing a mass of information invaluable to the lover of flowers.——One Hundred and Fifty pages, on fine tinted paper, some Five Hundred Engravings, and a superb Colored Plate and Chromo Cover.——The First Edition of TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND just printed in English and German, and ready to send out.

JAMES VICK, Rochester, N. Y.

THREE PAIR OF BEST TWO-BUTTON KID GLOVES for $2 75.
Sample pair sent, postpaid, for $1 00. Sash and Trimming Ribbons in all widths and colors; also, Laces and Dress Trimmings. Samples sent free on application.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR,
353 Eighth Avenue, New York.

Novelties in Laces.
SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

SHOPPING
Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

VERBENA SEEDS! We have another fine stock of seeds of this beautiful flower, saved from our large collection of more than 100 varieties; 25 cts per pkt., 5 pkts. $1. J. T. SMITH & SONS, Brentwood, N. H.

WORTHINGTON & SMITH,
IMPORTERS AND JOBBERS OF
MILLINERY & STRAW GOODS,
W. I. WORTHINGTON,
W. R. SMITH, JR.
507 BROADWAY, N. Y.,
Under St. Nicholas Hotel.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO'S
EXPOSITION OF
SPRING CARPETINGS.
We have now open an unusually large assortment, in NEW DESIGNS and COLORINGS, of
DUTCH AND SMYRNA CARPETS,
In a Great Variety of Sizes.
AUBUSSONS,
AXMINSTERS, &
MOQUETTES,
In Drawing-Room Sizes, and Colored to Match the New Upholstery Shadings.
ROYAL WILTONS,
Manufactured specially to order for Dining-Rooms, Libraries, Halls, and Stairs.
ENGLISH BODY BRUSSELS,
A splendid assortment in NEW PRIVATE PATTERNS.
VELVETS and TAPESTRY,
THREE-PLY and INGRAINS,
ENGLISH and AMERICAN OIL-CLOTHS,
And a full stock of
DRUGGETS, RUGS, MATS, &c., &c.,
ALL AT
LOWEST MARKET PRICES.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.
EARLY SPRING FABRICS AT RETAIL.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
Have made
AN EXTENSIVE OPENING OF PLAIN, BLACK, AND FANCY SILKS.
BLACK AND WHITE STRIPED SILKS, 75 cents per yard, worth $1.
RICH AND MEDIUM-PRICED DRESS GOODS.
NEW MAKES OF MOURNING GOODS.
FRENCH, ENGLISH, AND DOMESTIC PRINTS.
PLAIN AND FIGURED PERCALES.
NOVELTIES in WHITE GOODS.
GENUINE SCOTCH GINGHAMS, first quality, 25c. per yard: value, 30c.
LADIES' & GENTS' HOSIERY & UNDERWEAR.
They have likewise made their first
DISPLAY OF THE CELEBRALED
ALEXANDRE PARIS KID GLOVES,
In the newest and most delicate tints, at no advance upon recent low prices.
MAIL ORDERS for samples and prices promptly filled.
DRESSMAKING DEPARTMENT,
Under superior management, in which orders for MOURNING as well as BALL, RECEPTION, CARRIAGE, AND PROMENADE DRESSES
Are executed in
ONE TO THREE DAYS' NOTICE, in style and elegance equal if not superior to any foreign production.
CHARGES MODERATE.
BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

INFANT'S WARDROBE "A"
FOR $75.

2 Flannel Bands	@	$0 37½	$0 75
2 Barrow Coats	@	2 00	4 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	2 50	5 00
6 Linen Shirts	@	1 00	6 00
4 Night Dresses	@	2 25	9 00
4 Slips	@	2 50	10 00
1 Calico Wrapper			1 50
2 Day Dresses	@	4 00	8 00
1 Robe			7 00
1 Basket, Furnished			5 00
6 Pairs Socks	@	0 62½	3 75
2 Cambric Skirts	@	1 50	3 00
2 " " tucked	@	2 00	4 00
1 Eureka Diaper			1 00
Set of Linen Diapers			2 00
1 Rubber Bib			0 50
2 Quilted Bibs	@	0 50	1 00
1 Lace Cap			3 50
			$75 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Wardrobes "B," for $100, and "C," for $125, sent by mail if desired.
LORD & TAYLOR,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN
FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,
NEW YORK, Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

1873. NOTICE. 1873.
OUR CELEBRATED BUFFALO

AND OTTER

TRADE MARK PAT'D.
BRANDS
BLACK ALPACAS,
AND
BEAVER BRAND.

SILK FINISHED
Black Pure Mohairs
ARE HANDSOMER THAN EVER FOR SPRING WEAR.
These Beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Dry-Goods Retailers throughout the United States.
☞ Purchasers will know these goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece, bearing a picture of the Buffalo, Otter, or Beaver.
PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 and 429 Broadway,
305 Canal and 47 Howard Sts.,
New York.
SOLE IMPORTERS.

HAIR!!!
L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,
Bet. 4TH and GREAT JONES STS., over Dry-Goods Store.
The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.
Import and manufacture their own Goods, and RETAIL THEM AT WHOLESALE PRICES.
PRICE-LIST.
Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed,
18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00
Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.
Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.
BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.
Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods send C. O. D., by express, on receipt of col. or and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.

REAL LACES
Embroideries, Muslin Undergarments, &c. Cheapest in the country. Every C. O. D. package subject to examination before acceptance. SAMPLES and PRICE-LISTS mailed free from
EHRICH'S TEMPLE of FASHION,
287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, N. Y.

CLOSING SALE
BLACK DRESS GOODS.
AN IMMENSE STOCK OF THE MOST DESIRABLE TEXTURES.
ELEGANT CASHMERES.....$1 00.
RICH BLACK SILKS.....$1 75.
HANDSOME ALPACAS.....80 cents.
VERY SUPERIOR QUALITY..50 cents.
JACKSON'S MOURNING STORE,
Corner BROADWAY and WAVERLEY PLACE.

TO THE LADIES!
BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING
Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.
No lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.
B. F. BROWN & Co., Boston.

Hosted by Google

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.

RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.

Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,

Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only	$3 00
24 " " " " "	3 50
26 " " " " "	4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.

Established 1843. { CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.

Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.

Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

The Baby of the Period wears a Eureka Diaper.

GET ONE FOR YOUR BABY!

It is seamless, and thoroughly water-proof; protects clothing, retains linen diaper, permits free circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest—4, largest. Sample mailed by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 532 Broadway, New York, on receipt of $1. Sold also by A. T. Stewart & Co., Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable, and all first-class Infant's Clothing, Fancy, and Dry-Goods stores. Ask for the Eureka; see that they bear stamp of Eureka Diaper Co. Take no other.

LADIES' FURS

IN EVERY VARIETY;

SEAL CAPS AND GLOVES,

All at the Lowest Prices.

IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS,

DANIEL D. YOUMANS, { 719 Broadway, N. Y.

LADIES' CHEST PROTECTOR.

Something entirely New.

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO FIT THE FORM.

Price in Felt, $2 00, $3 00, $4 00.
" " Chamois, $3 00, $4 00, $5 00.

For married or single Ladies. In ordering please state which and size of bust.

Sold by all Druggists and Ladies' Furnishing Stores, and at 2140 Third Ave.; 218 Broadway; Broadway, cor. 29th St.; and at 7 Sixth Ave.

WHOLESALE.—Chas. H. Crittenton, 7 Sixth Avenue; W. H. Schieffelin & Co., 170 William St.; Fraser & Lee, 20 Beekman St.; G. S. Crawford & Co., 119 Fulton St.

A. C. JACKSON, Manufacturer,
No. 2140 Third Avenue, New York.

Pratt's Patent Shoulder Brace and Suspender.

For sale by A. T. Stewart & Co., Porter Brothers & Co., H. B. Claflin & Co., Louis Schiele & Co., New York; Field, Leiter, & Co., Chicago; by all first-class dealers, and at Office of the Company, Cleaveland, Ohio.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

SEYMOUR'S SHEARS & SCISSORS.

"The Best are the Cheapest."

Extra Quality. Crocus Polish.

HENRY SEYMOUR & CO., 29 and 31 Rose St., N. Y.

Family Size, - - $1.50
Ladies' Scissors, - 1.00
By mail, prepaid. Send P. O. Order or Draft.

TO the WORKING CLASS, male or female, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods to start with, sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Courtlandt Street, New York.

COLGATE & COMPANY'S
EXTRACT CASHMERE BOUQUET,
FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.
"CASHMERE BOUQUET."
COLGATE & CO'S
CASHMERE BOUQUET SOAP,
FOR THE TOILET.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... No. 8
SLEEVELESS SACQUE AND CAPE, with French Blouse, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 13
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 20
VEST BASQUE, with Over-skirt and Kilt-pleated Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 21
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER.. " 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)..... " 25
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt..... " 27
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt..... " 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT..... " 51

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 11

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

MADAME FOY'S CORSET SKIRT SUPPORTER,

For Health, Comfort, and Style,

Is acknowledged THE BEST ARTICLE of the kind ever made. Numerous Testimonials in its favor are being received from all parts of the United States.

LADY AGENTS WANTED.

HARMON, BALDWIN, & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers,
New Haven, Conn.
ARNOLD & BANNING, New York;
D. B. FISK & Co., Chicago, Agents.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

WOOD CARPETING,

942 BROADWAY.

Send Stamp for Designs.

HOW 'TIS DONE OR THE SECRET OUT

An Illustrated Book of 64 pages, that every one should have. Sent free post paid, by BOND, MARTIN & CO. Springfield, Mass.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

Largest Organ Establishment in the World.

7 Extensive Factories.

J. ESTEY & COMPANY,

Brattleboro, Vt., U. S. A.

THE CELEBRATED

ESTEY COTTAGE ORGANS.

The latest and best improvements. Every thing that is new and novel. The leading improvements in Organs were introduced first in this establishment.

Established 1846.

SEND FOR OUR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING

WITH A

NOVELTY PRESS,

The best ever made for the purpose.

Principal office 349–351 Federal, and 152 Kneeland Streets, Boston. Branch office, 543 Broadway and 88 Mercer Street, New York.

W. Y. EDWARDS is no longer Agent for me or the sale of my goods. BENJ. O. WOODS,

Manufacturer of Novelty Presses, and dealer in every description of

PRINTING MATERIAL.

Send for NEW Illustrated Catalogue, with Agents' addresses.

THE ALBERT TOILET SOAPS ARE PURE AND THEIR PERFUME CHOICE AND LASTING.

ALFRED SAVAGE & SON, Montreal; or
D. FINLEY, Rouse's Point.

$500,000 for Every body!

THIRD GRAND GIFT CONCERT in aid of Public Library of Ky., will be given in the great Hall of Library Building at Louisville, Ky., on Tuesday, April 8, 1873, at which time Ten Thousand Cash Gifts, amounting to a grand total of $500,000, all cash, will be distributed by lot to ticket holders. Only 100,000 tickets, and large proportion already sold or engaged. Two Concerts have been given with complete success and every gift promptly paid. Whole tickets $10, halves $5, quarters $2 50. For tickets or information, apply to Hon. Thos. E. Bramlette, Agent for Trustees Public Library of Ky., Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

HAVE YOU SEEN the New and Wonderful Method of Showing Ghosts in every Man's House without the aid of a medium? Innocent Amusement for the Home Circle. The great demand for this development of Optical Science shows it to be ONE OF THE WONDERS OF THE AGE! Sent post-paid for 50 cts., with directions

M. W. TYLER & CO., Providence, R. I.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

THE NEW BOOKS

OF

THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.

SANTO DOMINGO, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti. By SAMUEL HAZARD. Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

2.

RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

3.

GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50. Popular Edition, 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

4.

HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

5.

ROBIN GRAY. A Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, "Author of "For the King," and "For Lack of Gold." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

6.

THE WANDERING HEIR. A Novel. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," "Foul Play," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.; Cloth, 60 cts.

7.

THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

This work embraces in one volume:

ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.

ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

"NIL DESPERANDUM."—No doubt you have been swindled by "promising" publishers whose "framed" Engraving never come and NEVER will. Try then ONCE MORE and GET what is promised. We offer a large 8-page literary paper a whole year and superb Prang Chromo, all for $1. This paper is no humbug. Established ten years. It devotes nearly a whole page to exposing Swindlers, Quacks, and Humbugs. It tells the truth even if it makes enemies. It will please you. TRY IT. Only ONE DOLLAR a year. Specimens 6 cts. Now is the time. Address

STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

GRAND GOLD MEDAL AWARDED
ESTABLISHED 1837
PARR'S TECHNICAL GUIDE.
NEW, USEFUL, VALUABLE!
Devoted to home enjoyment, instruction, improvement. Containing over 350 Illustrations and naming 1100 scientific appliances; description and price of Tool Chests; Amateur Lathes, Tools and Machines; Model Steam Engines, Steamboats, Sailing Vessels; Mathematical Instruments; Microscopes; Chemical Cabinets, etc. Also series of 145 Chemical experiments and treatise on preparing objects for Microscope; instructions for making Fret or Scroll Work, with home talent, and illustrations of 110 useful parlor requisites, viz.: Bird Cages, Book Shelves, Brackets, Flower Stands, Writing Desks, Work Baskets, etc. Mailed on receipt of 25c., and with first order for $1.00 worth of Designs will send extra copies to refund price of Book free.
GEORGE PARR, BUFFALO, N. Y., Manf. Mechanics' Tools.
HIGHEST PREMIUM
SIXTH EDITION FIFTIETH THOUSAND

Before buying send for our descriptive

SEED AND PLANT CATALOGUE.

AZELL BOWDITCH, 645 Warren St., Boston, Mass.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

Active agents wanted, to canvass New York and the leading cities for "Santo Domingo, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti." By Samuel Hazard. Profusely illustrated. The subscriber has other Books, of a popular character, for agents. Call, or address

AVERY BILL,
Care of Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

"MEN WERE DECEIVERS EVER."

HOSTESS. "Your Husband join a Club, Mrs. Verisoft?"

INNOCENT YOUNG WIFE. "Why not, my dear? Frederick tells me that it will benefit him amazingly in his Profession."

FREDERICK (at the club, advancing the interests of his profession). "What are you going to take, gentlemen?"

FACETIÆ.

PHYSICIANS often prescribe change of air when the change really required for the poor patient's cure is change of circumstances.

When they make an oyster bed do they use a seaweed mattress?

LOGIC.

UNCLE. "You're going back to school, my boy. That's right; stick to your books, and prove yourself a worthy citizen of a free and enlightened country."

NEPHEW. "It ain't a free country—else I shouldn't go to school!"

What inhabitant of the farm-yard does a fashionable young lady of the present time most resemble?—The cock, because she wears a large comb.

PRISTINE PROVERBS PREPARED FOR PRECOCIOUS PUPILS.

Observe yon pluméd biped fine!
To effect his captivation
Deposit particles saline
Upon his termination.

Crytogamous concretion never grows
On mineral fragments that decline repose.

While self-inspection it neglects,
Nor its own foul condition sees,
The kettle to the pot objects
Its sordid superficies.

Decortications of the golden grain
Are set to allure the agéd fowl in vain.

Teach not a parent's mother to extract
The embryo juices of an egg by suction;
That good old lady can the feat enact
Quite irrespective of your kind instruction.

Pecuniary agencies have force
To stimulate to speed the female horse.

The earliest winged songster soonest sees,
And first appropriates, the annelides.

With soap and brush and flannel you tickle
In vain the Ethiopic cuticle.

Bear not to yon famed city upon Tyne
The carbonaceous product of the mine.

The mendicant once from his indigence freed,
And mounted aloft on the generous steed,
Down the precipice soon will infallibly go,
And conclude his career in the regions below.

It is permitted to the feline race
To contemplate even a regal face.

Why should you distrust the opinion of a person who does not use cheap perfumes?—Because he is wanting in common scents.

DETECTED.

FIRST VIOLIN (after the quartette in C major—unsatisfactory somehow). "Hullo!—hark!—there—I knew there was something wrong! This confounded tea-kettle's been singing B flat all the time!"

Why does a photographer use a black cloth?—To make his camera obscurer.

METEOROLOGICAL.—What system of weather signals must be a riddle to every body?—The cone-and-drum, of course.

HUSBAND. "I am going to have a skate this evening, my dear, so I don't suppose I shall be home before ten o'clock."

AFFECTIONATE LITTLE WIFE. "Very well, dear; if you are not home by that time I shall conclude that you have fallen in, so I shall not wait up after then."

AT A PARTY THE OTHER NIGHT, SMITH, THE FUNNY MAN, PICKED FROM THE FLOOR SOME FALSE HAIR, AND HOLDING IT ALOFT, WICKEDLY ASKED WHO HAD LOST IT. IMPULSIVELY THE HAND OF EVERY LADY WITHIN EAR-SHOT WENT TO HER BACK HAIR. IT WAS CRUEL TO THROW THEM OFF THEIR GUARD, AND EXPOSE THEM SO—BUT SMITH SAYS IT WASN'T HIS FAULT.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 11.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Ladies' Street and Reception Dresses, Figs. 1–3.

Fig. 1.—TIGHT BASQUE, WITH APRON-FRONT OVER-SKIRT AND WALKING SKIRT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). This pretty spring suit is made of black silk, trimmed with flounces and folds of the material, black silk fringe, and passementerie ornaments. If the suit is designed solely for house wear, the Dolman sleeves may be omitted, and the close-fitting coat sleeve alone used, as more convenient. Black silk bonnet, trimmed with ribbon and lace, and two blue curled ostrich feathers.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises three garments—tight basque, apron-front over-skirt, and walking skirt.

TIGHT BASQUE.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, side front, back, Dolman sleeve, and close-fitting coat sleeve. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting together. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, to take up the darts, to sew on the trimming at the neck, the size and form of the under part of the coat sleeve, and where to sew on the Dolman sleeve. The front is neatly fitted on each side by two darts and a side front, and is closed to the throat with buttons and button-holes. The back is adjusted by a middle seam, which is left open below the waist line. An extra fullness is cut on each seam under the arm at the waist line, and laid in a side pleat turning toward the front. The coat sleeve is sewed plain in the armhole. Place the longest seam of the sleeve at the notch in FIGS. 1–3.—LADIES' STREET AND RECEPTION DRESSES.

Fig. 1.—TIGHT BASQUE, WITH APRON-FRONT OVER-SKIRT AND WALKING SKIRT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN).

Fig. 2.—GREEN GROS GRAIN AND SILK GAUZE DRESS WITH CASHMERE OPERA CLOAK.

Fig. 3.—LILAC FAILLE DRESS.

[Cut Paper Patterns of the Tight Basque, with Apron-front Over-Skirt and Walking Skirt, Fig. 1, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Hosted by Google

the back of the armhole, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. The large Dolman sleeve is sewed on over it from the front, over the shoulder, down the back, to the waist line in the line of perforations. Place the notch in the front part of the sleeve at the first perforation in the front of the basque near the lower part of the armhole; place the notch at the top of the sleeve even with the shoulder seam. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others. The notches at the top and bottom of the front show where to turn back for the hem.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 4¾ yards.

Extra for pleated ruffle, three inches wide, 1¼ yards.

APRON-FRONT OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, narrow side gores, and three straight breadths in the back. Only half of the pattern is given. Cut the front gore and back breadth with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid making seams. Cut two pieces each of the pattern given for the gore and straight breadth lengthwise of the goods. Pay no attention to the grain of the paper. The front edge of the side back breadth and the back edge of the front side gore are each laid in four side pleats turning upward, according to the perforations, before being joined together. In forming the pleats place three perforations evenly together, commencing at the top one. Turn back the revers in the line of perforations from the lower edge of the garment on the side breadth. A large bow with ends of gros grain is set on the side seam over the upper part of the revers. The lower edge of the front is finished with heavy fringe three inches deep. The lower edge of the back breadths is finished with a bias fold of the material two inches wide continued up the outer edge of the revers. A side pleat is laid on the top edge of the front side gore. The skirt is joined with gathers at the back and plain in front to a belt of the material.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 4¾ yards.

Quantity of fringe, 1½ yards.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, two side gores, and straight breadth for the back. Cut the front gore and back breadth with the longest straight edges laid on the fold of the goods to avoid making seams. Cut two pieces each of the pattern given for the side gores. Put the pattern together by the notches, paying no attention to the grain of the paper. The bottom of the skirt is trimmed with a bias flounce ten inches deep, a row of deep scallops pleated on one side, and edged with a side-pleated ruffle an inch and a half wide, overlapping the deep flounce at the top, and headed by four folds one inch wide.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards.

Extra for flounces and folds, 5½ yards.

Fig. 2.—GREEN GROS GRAIN AND SILK GAUZE DRESS WITH CASHMERE OPERA CLOAK. Dress of sea green gros grain, trimmed with flounces and folds of the material, puffs of sea green silk gauze, and white lace. White cashmere opera cloak.

Fig. 3.—LILAC FAILLE DRESS. Dress of lilac faille, trimmed with flounces and bows, folds and rosettes, and white lace.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1873.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the new and elegant Tight Basque, with Apron-front Over-Skirt and Walking Skirt, illustrated on the first page of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents. For Full List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 175.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain numerous patterns of Ladies' Spring House and Street Dresses; Children's Spring Suits; Ladies' Sleeveless Jackets, Fichus, Aprons, Petticoats, Corset Covers, etc.; Children's Aprons; Gentlemen's Smoking-Caps; Collars, Embroidery Patterns, etc., etc.; with choice literary and artistic attractions.

LENTEN FARE.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

I.

IT may be useful at the opening of the penitential season, which is doubtless observed, with more or less strictness, by many of our readers, to give directions for varying the regulated food in a manner that shall be both healthful and palatable. There are many sanitary reasons, indeed, in favor of a meagre diet and partial abstinence from meat at the approach of spring, when the system needs to be prepared for the change of season. Spring fasting is better than spring medicine, and it would be well for the whole community to prescribe for themselves the moderate use of animal food at this critical epoch, which is enjoined as a rule of faith on the members of some of our churches.

Nor is it necessary to suffer by this change. The abundance and variety of fish, vegetables, fruits, etc., will suffice to please the most fastidious epicure. As we shall hereafter show, Lenten dinners of several courses, with soups and sauces, as well as entrées and rôtis, can be readily arranged.

Two kinds of broth are made for Lenten time, one with vegetables and butter, and the other with fish and a little butter. The vegetables best suited to this purpose are carrots, turnips, onions, celery, leeks, lettuce, and cabbage (if liked). The seasonings are the same as for beef broth. The best fish for fish broth are salmon, trout, pike, bass, and carp at this season of the year.

An excellent fish soup, called bisque, is made with the above broth and lobster. It can be made as rich as desired. Crabs and craw-fish may be used instead of lobster.

Milk is also used to make soups instead of broth, with rice, tapioca, sago, arrow-root, starch, vermicelli, macaroni, etc. Recipes for the different soups are given in every good cook-book.

There are several kinds of fish found in the markets of large cities at any time, and which are very inferior when out of season. To aid our readers in their selections, we give below a list of all those that are in season during Lent—cod, conger-eel, flat-fish, haddock, halibut, herring, mullet, sea and white perch, lamprey, plaice, salmon, Southern shad, brook trout, clams, craw-fish, mussels, oysters, frogs.

The following are in season through March: black bass, carp, frost-fish, pike, muskallonge, yellow perch, ray, skate, smelts, sunfish, white-fish.

The following begin to be in season in April: shad, sea trout, lobsters, prawns.

Eels, flounders, turbot, scallops, and some others are found in the markets all the time, but they should be selected with care at this time, being out of season.

Besides fresh fish, there is also quite a variety of salted, smoked, dried, and pickled fish, which are relished at breakfast, lunch, and supper, as cod, haddock, eels, herrings, mackerel, and salmon.

There is not so great a variety of vegetables as of fish; still, with the dry and canned vegetables, and those coming early from the South, it will be comparatively easy to select, and even to vary, the vegetable dishes during Lent. Many are going out of season at this time, as potatoes, sweet-potatoes, beets, cabbage, carrots, salsify, parsnips, and squash; but if well kept in dry cellars they are good until the warm weather comes. For those vegetables that are somewhat inferior at this time of the year we are compensated by excellent greens that come in season, as dandelions and wild chiccory, which are as good boiled as in salads, and which are as healthful as they are palatable.

We have, besides, rhubarb, Bermuda potatoes, and pease. The delicious tender red radishes also make their appearance early in Lent, and are much relished by every one.

The South sends us cucumbers, string-beans, and tomatoes. If they are not very good, they have the advantage of being early.

Canned and dried vegetables are very convenient at this season also; the principal ones are corn, tomatoes, asparagus, pease, string-beans, dry beans, Limas, sorrel, okra, and lentils.

BILL OF FARE No. 1.

BREAKFAST.

Pickled red cabbage. Olives. Omelet naturel. Smoked herrings. Potatoes sautées. Cheese. Compote of peaches. Pears.

LUNCH.

Sardines. Piccalilli. Smoked haddock. Quince jelly. Apples.

DINNER.

Pickled tomatoes. Red radishes. Pike, Génoise sauce. Mashed potatoes. Fried parsnips. Madeleine cakes. Cheese. Wine jelly. Oranges.

SUPPER.

Pickled cucumbers. Broiled fresh herrings. Currant jelly. Pine-apple.

All the sauces that require broth in their composition, such as the Génoise sauce above mentioned, are made with vegetable or fish broth. For a change, it is better to make one kind of broth one day, and another the next. Besides having less variety, there are comparatively few persons that can eat fish every day for any length of time; we therefore endeavor to vary as much as possible the kinds, and also the sauces, in our bills of fare, in order to suit the different tastes, and not to tire the palate or the stomach.

The days that meat is allowed also help to make a change, and it is well to avoid eating fish on those days.

Butter must always be served with radishes; and when fresh butter (we mean without salt) can be had, it is quite an improvement.

BILL OF FARE No. 2.

BREAKFAST.

Pickled cauliflowers. Horse-radish. Eggs à la tripe. Salt mackerel, broiled, maître d'hôtel sauce. Fried potatoes. Cheese. Guava jelly. Apples.

LUNCH.

Pickled cherries. Lobster-salad. Compote of cranberries. Bananas.

DINNER.

Potage purée of white beans. Chowchow. Pickled apples. Halibut, cream sauce. Fried smelts. Mashed turnips. Sprouts au jus. Floating island. Cheese. Compote of blackberries. Pears. Nuts.

SUPPER.

Pickled beets. Broiled black bass or carp, maître d'hôtel sauce. Compote of peaches. Apples.

Vegetable broth is used for vegetables au jus, as for sprouts, above. We put a number of dishes in each bill purposely: it is easy to omit one or more, according to taste.

BILL OF FARE No. 3.

BREAKFAST.

Pickled onions. Olives. Omelet, fines-herbes. Smoked salmon. Potatoes Lyonnaise. Cheese. Compote of Grapes. Bananas.

LUNCH.

Sardines. Pickled oranges. Fried oysters. Stewed prunes. Strawberries.

DINNER.

Green turtle soup. Pickled carrots. Piccalilli. Plaice au beurre noir. Perch, tomato sauce. Fried mullets. Mashed potatoes. Sweet-corn. Omelet soufflée. Cheese. Savarin cake. Compote of oranges. Pine-apples. Nuts.

SUPPER.

Pickled citrons. Broiled white-fish, caper sauce. Cranberry jelly. Oranges.

EPICUREAN SALAD FOR LENT.

This is a most excellent dish for breakfast or lunch, or even for an early supper. It is composed of ten or twelve potatoes, two white onions, half a pint of claret, one pint of Madeira, two or three truffles, two lemons, parsley, oil, vinegar, and other seasonings.

As the recipe for this delicate dish is not found in cook-books, we will give it here.

The Madeira is put in a salad dish or other vessel, with the truffles, cut in thin slices, seasoned with salt and pepper, a bay leaf, three stalks of parsley, one of thyme, two cloves, and a clove of garlic, bruised. It is left thus for about four hours. After that length of time the slices of truffles are taken off and put on a plate, and the rest is turned into a bowl through a colander, so as to have the wine only in the bowl.

The potatoes are steamed, peeled, and sliced, and put in a salad dish with the onions, sliced also, and the claret. The whole is stirred gently with the salad spoon and fork until the wine is absorbed by the potatoes. Then the Madeira is added, little by little, stirring the while, and also until it is absorbed. Now the truffles, with three table-spoonfuls of vinegar, five of oil, a teaspoonful of chopped parsley, the juice of the lemons, salt and pepper to suit the taste, are added. The whole is well mixed together, and the salad is made.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Echoes.

MY DEAR LUKE,—Was it to you or to some other fellow-traveler that I was lately speaking of the famous echo of the Traunstein, in the Tyrol, and an enchanted day there with a smiling, modest maid of other years, who, as she muses now in cap and spectacles, sometimes recalls perhaps the young stranger who has not forgotten her? Yes, the bugle blew, and set the wild echoes flying; and other bugles are blowing now, I suppose, and the horns of elf-land are replying. I remember as I climbed away from that lovely valley the vision and the music of the day went with me; indeed, as you see, they have attended me ever since. That boatman with his bugle, surrounded with infinite airy responses, soft, subdued, exquisite, seemed to me the leader of a fairy orchestra, filling the world with melody. Yet it was he alone. He blew the bugle. He played the tune. And the echo was not the renowned echo of Ireland, which answered the question: it was a more simple Tyrolean echo, which repeated it.

I have often wondered since, as I was invited to listen among mountains to other echoes, whether it is the surprise and pleasure of them which makes so many of us fellow-travelers satisfied and happy to be echoes ourselves. I sit in my place upon the great journey surrounded by the pleasant company, when another traveler joins us, and putting his bugle to his mouth, we all, like the Traunstein, echo his music. Perhaps the new-comer's name is Hamlet, and instantly we are all Polonius, and find the cloud a camel or a weasel as he sets the tune. And presently we seem to suppose that to call a man the echo of another man is to praise him. The creator of Leatherstocking, a character which Thackeray ranks with what he calls the "prize men of fiction," was supposed to be complimented when he was called the American Scott. It was a well-meant but very clumsy compliment. Then Mrs. Sigourney was the American Hemans. But one Mrs. Hemans is enough. And although the description was meant to flatter, it was fatal. Was Shakespeare the English Corneille, or Dante the Italian Milton? The English Corneille and the Italian Milton, had they existed, would have been superfluous.

When I returned from the grand tour I was sitting one morning in Federigo's studio, and I said to him, as I looked around at his beautiful sketches, "Why have you never seen the great pictures? Why do you stay so constantly at home?" He was turning his head a little to see the effect of the touch he had just placed upon the canvas, and half shutting his eyes, he replied, "I am afraid." The picture was very beautiful. It was full of power and imagination. Of what in his art could a man who could paint such a picture be afraid? "They are sorcerers, your old masters," he continued; "they are terrible magicians. And if I should put myself within their spell, I should become an echo, and repeat faintly and poorly, or even pleasantly, the tunes which they play. I'd rather play my melody upon a fife than theirs upon an organ."

As he spoke I recalled the studios in Italy and the feeling of the painters, and there seemed to be truth in what Federigo said. There is Brush, whom you know, and who went to Italy when I was a young man. He found the churches and the palaces full of pictures of Madonnas and saints and Christian legends, and of Venetian portraits. And for how many years Brush has piously, hopelessly, painted the same subjects! I passed the morning in the Vatican or the Pitti with the great pictures, and then in Brush's studio I saw them all made little. I don't mean that he copied them directly, which, with adequate drawing and color, would have been a useful and profitable work; but he copied them indirectly. He had his Well of Samaria, and his Pool of Siloam, and his Madonnas, and his Saint Francis and Saint Catherine, and all the saints doing all kinds of things. Nobody bought, but sometimes he was commissioned to make an actual copy, and then he groaned in spirit because original art was not encouraged. He did not see that he was exactly wrong, and that it was original art which was respected by the order. Indeed, the surprise was that Brush and his companions were contented to be echoes only. Italy gradually seemed to me to be that lake upon which the art of the sixteenth century blew its bugle tune, and all the Brushes, like the cliffs of Traunstein, answered in faint echoes.

Lord Byron was another of those bugles in literature. Look into the poetry of forty years ago, and it feebly murmurs Byron. Susceptible youths turned wide shirt-collars over their coats, loosened their cravats, and sighed unhappiness in verse. It might be very smoothly and sweetly done, but why could not the poor boys see that it was useless? If we wished that melancholy strain, we went, of course, to the original harp. But if they had had something to say from their own life and their own experience, as Byron had, and could have said it well, we should all have listened as we did to Byron. When Macaulay's essays came, Seniors in college began to write Macaulay. And the better it was, the worse it was. That is to say, the more it resembled Macaulay, the more hollow and unreal it was. Did it occur to those Seniors that if Macaulay had been contented to imitate Dr. Johnson or Edmund Burke, he would not have been Macaulay? and if, in turn, Burke had been willing to reproduce Addison, we should have had no Burke? He was the bugle, not the echo. How simple and sweet is Addison! A lute nimbly fingered. How magnificent is Burke! An organ of various stops. Do we value the lute less because we like the organ? Lute and organ are both precious. Would you not rather be the lute than the echo of the organ?

Yet as we look about at our fellow-travellers do they not seem generally satisfied to be echoes? He who plays his own tune instead of the echo is usually thought to be out of tune and discordant. It is the tendency of some kinds of authority to reduce the whole world to a dumb Traunstein, giving only the clearest and most faithful echo. If Archbishop Laud, in England, heard a Presbyterian air, for instance, he sent for the offender, and asked him if he did not hear the proper tune, nor know that it was the duty of loyal Englishmen to echo it. And he squeezed the thumbs of the erring piper by way of restoring the echo. So when Galileo, in Italy, would not echo the prevailing and authorized tune, he was imprisoned to give him time to adjust himself to the prescribed music. "What we want," says authority, "is harmony. We ask nothing more. But harmony we must have. The central bugle will set the tune, and the rest of the world will harmoniously respond. If not, measures will be taken to preserve harmony."

But there is another theory of echoes than that they are mere subservient repetitions. When I sat entranced in that boat and heard the murmuring reply to the bugle music—a reply infinitely soft and penetrating and tender—I seemed for the first time truly to feel how deep and melancholy the melody was. And have not those other echoes a similar power of revelation? Why is it that the solemn grandeur of Milton draws me on to reproduce it? Why does the stately splendor of Burke's rhetoric fascinate your own pen into some effort to prolong the strain? It is because they touch sympathies and thoughts of our own in unison with those of the masters. It is the Milton and the Burke in us that respond to their call. How could we enjoy them if we had not some intelligence of them—some sympathy with them? When, on Christmas-eve, at Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle's, we all sit around the blazing fire, and the happy children have hung up their stockings and are dreaming of fairy reindeer pattering along the eaves, and Milton's Hymn on the Nativity is read aloud from the massive quarto or from Pickering's antique page, what is our deep delight but the lofty thought, the sublime aspiration, the holy charity in our own souls echoing and re-echoing that noblest strain? The poet sings what we vaguely feel but can not utter. He is poet because he can utter it. And when we hear the glorious sound, we know it, we spring at it, it is our own; and our deep silence answers in responsive music. We sing with him, indeed, but we sing. The melody is ours, although he begins it: as my boatman's bugle song upon the Traunsee was played as perfectly and with as rich a sweetness by the echoing cliff as by his lips.

Hosted by Google

Did you read the other day of the terrible catastrophe of the Northfleet, in the British Channel: a ship at anchor, full of passengers, run down at night by another ship, and instantly sinking? The captain, I suppose, knew all and saw all in a moment. But he quietly drew his pistols, ordered every man to obey, and then did all that was possible to save as many as he could. He had been married only a month, and his bride was upon the ship. He kissed her tenderly, placed her in the boat with the other women, said, gently, "Good-by, darling! I shall never see you again!" then ordered the boat to push off. In a few moments the captain went down with his ship. We read the story: our hearts ache with sorrow and sympathy. We thank God for this human nature capable of such divine self-sacrifice. We consecrate ourselves again to nobler living, to more constant fidelity, to a wider charity. What are those emotions and vows but the response to that lofty sacrifice of similar possibilities in us? They are the heavenly music in us, awakened by that celestial melody without. The dumb cliff answers with softer sweetness the boatman's bugle call.

When a babe smiled in his sleep, the old people said that the angels were talking with him. Whence come, in our life journey, those sudden, happy lifts and wafts of emotion, for which there seems to be no especial occasion—moments of transfiguration, as it were, in which love and hope and faith seem to possess us wholly with a heavenly harmony? They are echoes, perhaps, of the song of an angel whom we did not see, nor consciously hear. It is as if happy lovers floating in summer upon the Traunsee, unable to find words fitted to their feeling, should suddenly perceive the air full of multitudinous, soft-resounding echoes of music blown from unheard bugles—the delicate voice of their else unuttered joy.

Your friend, AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

PLAIN BASQUE COSTUME.

THE costume of which we give a cut paper pattern this week is a good model for spring suits of silk and woolen fabrics. The over-skirt has stylish revers, and the lower skirt is richly trimmed. Its novel features, however, are its plain basque, without postilion pleating in the middle of the back, and its extra Dolman sleeves. Plain smooth-fitting basques are coming into favor again. In this model the middle seam of the back is slashed to the waist to give room for the tournure; the large side-body now used passes under the arm, showing a seam in front and in the back, but none directly under the arm. The Dolman sleeves are placed on street costumes only; for house dresses the single coat sleeve is used; on dresses to be worn both at home and in the street a simple arrangement of hooks and loops attaches the winged Dolman when occasion requires.

IMPORTED SPRING COSTUMES.

A large importation of spring costumes consists of three leading styles, viz., the sleeveless-jacket suit, the Dolman costume, and the polonaise with single skirt. There are also many composite dresses with a basque, and one elaborately trimmed skirt, like those described in Madame Raymond's Paris letter in last week's Bazar. The only evident effort to simplify trimmings is in the use of plain folds, bands, and perpendicular pleatings instead of fancifully gathered flounces. Skirts are still covered with trimming, though of less showy kind, more lengthened and flowing, instead of bunchy Frou-Frou ruffles; indeed, many skirts are shorn even of the flounce around the edge, hitherto thought indispensable. A prevalent idea is to arrange four back breadths in set pleats from the waist down to half a yard from the bottom; the fullness falls thence plain and flowing, and the skirt is faced in the ordinary way. With such skirts an elaborate tablier is arranged on the front breadths and on one of the side gores. The present caprice for trimming the front of the skirt different from the back has by no means reached its height, and will appear in most exaggerated fashion in spring and summer dresses.

OVER-SKIRTS.

Over-skirts are sadly shorn of their dimensions, and appear oftenest as mere aprons, half over-skirts, and intricately draped sashes. There are, however, many plain round over-skirts still shown, while others have their simple shape destroyed by capricious draping which makes each side different; for instance, the left side will be caught up to the belt by a bow and sash ends, while the right falls in a long peplum point, finished by tassels. To complete the diminished over-skirts, sashes are necessary, and these need not be of silk, but are of wool or linen, like the dress or its trimmings. They are two long slanting ends of different lengths, made double, two fingers wide, and are piped around the edges.

BASQUES.

Basques are growing longer, and are more often slashed in the seams instead of being pleated. The fronts have two soft points, and are often double-breasted; fanciful collars and revers are much used; the back is still elaborately trimmed; two buttons define the waist behind. Sleeves are easy coat shape, with square cuffs, or else slit up the outer seam.

SLEEVELESS-JACKET SUITS.

The suit which will probably "take" best is the sleeveless-jacket suit. This costume is so graceful and stylish, so suitable for spring fabrics of two shades or of contrasting colors, so easily made, so well adapted for both house and street, and, above all, offers such practicable plans for remodeling old dresses, that it will be likely to be the standard style for spring and summer. It is beautifully brought out in cashmeres, mohairs, and in simple wool stuffs of two shades of réséda, or of light or dark olive, and also in the old-fashioned contrasts of buff and blue. The dress proper is of the lightest shade possible; while the jacket, the cuffs, and trimmings are of the darkest.

The simplest of these jackets—or waistcoats, as they are called—is shaped like the jaunty English sacque, but is fitted closely by two darts, is square across the front, with small square pockets, and has slashed back seams. Others, again, have a revers collar, and are double-breasted, with two rows of large buttons in front. The simplest piping edges them, and to be stylish they must be cut very short on the shoulders. The jackets of richer suits are cut away to disclose the lighter dress beneath in vest shape, and lace is used for trimming.

The dress waist worn under these jackets is a plain French waist with coat sleeves. Imagine such a waist and jacket of two shades of réséda foulard, cashmere, or alpaca. To complete the suit is an apron-front over-skirt made of a single gored breadth and one side gore rounded up to the belt behind, and held there by a sash and buckle (a cut paper pattern of this over-skirt is furnished with Bazar No. 41, Vol. V.); the darkest shade is used for a wide bias band to trim the over-skirt, and also forms the sash; the back of the skirt is formed of alternate side pleats of the two shades, while the front has narrower rows of side pleating for a tablier. This is also very handsome in écru mohair, with leaf brown jacket, and trimming of écru woolen lace in point duchesse designs. Sometimes the lower skirt is of a dark shade, with light flounces; the over-skirt, waist, and sleeves are light, and the jacket dark. In making over old suits ladies can vary this arrangement to suit their materials. Inexpensive dresses, and those meant for very warm weather, dispense with the extra waist beneath, and make merely a basque of the dark shade, with light sleeves. Such suits of écru and brown mohair stylishly trimmed with dark bias bands are sold at wholesale importing houses for $15 or $20.

BLUE LINEN WAISTCOATS.

For midsummer the novelty to be offered is suits of gray linen and batiste, worn with sleeveless jackets of dark Napoleon blue linen. Bands of this blue linen and of blue percale with polka spots are used for trimming French suits of tea-colored undressed flax linen. Such suits cost about $35.

CASHMERE SLEEVELESS JACKETS.

Black cashmere sleeveless jackets are imported to wear with spring suits of black, gray, or other silks or cashmere. They have revers of black moiré, and are double-breasted, with two rows of large cut steel or old silver buttons on the front. They may be simply edged with a moiré piping fold, but are often embroidered and bordered with yak lace, in which steel or jet beads are introduced.

POLONAISES.

Polonaises reappear without any great change from those now worn. They are long, double-breasted, with or without belts, and are draped very high on the sides. Very large buttons in rows down the front, large buckles in sash bows, immense cuffs, pockets, wide silk facings down the front and back, with the tiniest facing on the edge, are on stylish polonaises. A new appearance is given to some by having sleeves of another shade, and there are some sleeveless polonaises, to be worn over a dress of a different shade. A pretty costume of striped brown and white poplin has solid brown poplin sleeves in the polonaise, and solid bands for heading the flounces on the skirt. This is also a pretty fashion for the black and white striped silks now sold for 90 cents a yard. Black sleeves, black sash, and black silk facings will make the striped polonaise very stylish.

THE DOLMAN COSTUMES.

One of the best designs for spring suits has a simple stylish over-skirt and basque, with a Dolman of the same material. Soft, flexible materials are best for these suits, and they are very largely imported in olive, bronze, réséda, and black cashmeres, trimmed with embroidery and woolen lace or thick wool fringe. The shape of the Dolman is like that already illustrated in the Bazar, with longer side pieces. A new idea is to face the front with moiré, and hold it in vest shape by means of an under belt.

MANTLES.

For independent wraps to be worn with various suits there are black cashmere mantles, Dolmans, and sleeveless jackets. The old-time mantilla will probably be successful this season, though it proved a failure when offered last year. One of the prettiest garments is a black cashmere talma with a wide facing of moiré in front, which by a simple arrangement is made to fit smoothly like a vest, while the loose cape hangs over the shoulders. This is excellent, and is trimmed with embroidery and lace. The newest features among such wraps are the pretty passementeries and yak laces in which steel beads are very effectively introduced. Fine jet beads are also wrought in laces, and larger beads, like studs, are set about between rows of cording. New passementeries of jet or steel on silk are in open leaf patterns that are to be set in, not on, the fabric like lace insertion. Tassel fringes are of mixed steel and jet. Wide watered ribbons in lengthwise bows trim the back of cashmere wraps, and moiré is used for bindings, folds, and piping, instead of repped silk. Quantities of steel and silver buttons are used: there are large flat buttons of polished steel, others are dull, like old silver, and there are groups and rows of tiny shot buttons.

For information received thanks are due to Messrs. THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO.; A.T. STEWART & CO.; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

PERSONAL.

A FEW evenings since there was given at DELMONICO'S by an opulent gentleman of this city a dinner which for originality of design, magnificence of accessories, and perfection of execution has never been approached on this continent, and probably not been equaled, in modern times, in the other hemisphere. The table was some sixty feet long by about twenty feet broad. In the centre was an oblong basin some sixteen feet long, eight feet wide, and two feet deep, filled with water, the base banked with flowers. Rising above and covering this at a height of twelve feet was a delicate wire screen supported by posts garlanded with flowers, the posts crowned by bird-cages filled with songsters. On this fairy little lake swam two splendid swans, loaned to Mr. L. DELMONICO for the occasion by the Brooklyn Park Commissioners, and the mammoth birds glided as quietly and gracefully over the miniature ocean as if in their wider and more accustomed sphere at home. At each end of this fairy expanse were two golden fountains five feet high, whence cherubic figures rained from their heads tiny jets of spray. Flanking these on either side were stately golden candelabra radiant with lights, and at frequent intervals along the table were placed many-lighted candelabra of silver. The extreme ends of the table were banked with huge mounds of flowers, the rarest and costliest, each fragrant hillock measuring ten feet long, five feet wide, and three feet high. The margin of the table, in front of the seats and plates of the guests, was composed of a border of choice flowers, coming to a semi-circle in front of each plate. Lack of space precludes further detail of numberless other dainty bits of ornamentation that imparted brilliancy to the general effect. Add to this fairy creation a procession of viands the variety of which was extraordinary, the cookery perfection, wines of rarest vintage and most delicate bouquet, music which vied with that at the opera, and our readers can form a glimmering idea of what this banquet was for four-and-seventy people—a banquet which, as regards regal splendor, artistic effects, and culinary execution, may be placed among the highest triumphs of gastronomic art. (Cost, $12,000.)

—Don ALFONSO DE BOURBON, who has taken command of the Carlist forces in Spain, is twenty-three years of age. His first military experience was gained in the Papal service in the Pontifical Zouaves. He married, in 1871, the daughter of Don MIGUEL, Princess MARIA ISABELLA of Bourbon and Braganza.

—Mrs. CRITTENDEN, who died recently in Albany, was the widow of the late United States Attorney-General CRITTENDEN. She had been thrice married—first, in 1823, to Dr. WILCOX, of Missouri; second, in 1833, to General ASHLEY, member of Congress from Missouri; and third, in 1853, to Mr. CRITTENDEN. As eminent as she was for personal attractions and mental endowments, her exquisite tact and kindness of heart endeared her to all who came near her. She was never known to speak unkindly to or of any person. During the early period of the war her signal discretion, excellent judgment, and kind motives made her the ornament, as she was the pride, of Mr. CRITTENDEN'S public career during the most anxious and responsible period of his long public life.

—The Rev. ACTON YOUNG has just returned to the pulpit in Tennessee, after an interregnum of thirty years, spent in keeping nearly fifty different hotels.

—The Duke d'Aumale is reputed to be engaged to the Duchess de Luynes, the widow of a duke who fell in the Franco-German war.

—There has just died at Florence Miss BLAGDEN, a lady well known in the world of letters, though more remarkable for the warmth of attachment she inspired in men and women of acknowledged genius than for the fame of her own intellectual gifts, rare and admirable as these undoubtedly were. Miss ISA BLAGDEN, the authoress of Agnes Tremorne, The Cost of a Secret, The Crown of a Life, and many brilliant papers in Fraser, the Cornhill, and All the Year Round, was linked to Mr. BROWNING and his illustrious wife by the ties of the closest friendship. She nursed the poetess in her final illness, and performed the same loving office for THEODOSIA TROLLOPE, to whose memory, as to that of Mrs. BROWNING, grateful Florence has erected a commemorative tablet. It may be added that her charitable presence gladdened the last moments of many obscure sufferers in the fair city where she lived and died, and where she will long be remembered as a conspicuous and honored figure. Her social qualities were of the highest order, and her death leaves a gap in many lives never to be filled up.

—Mrs. ANNIE SAVERY, of Des Moines, Iowa, is an applicant for the office of consul at Havre, now filled by General GLASGOW. A summer-Savery place for a lady!

—Miss CAROLINE CHESEBRO', who died at Piermont on the 16th ult., was for many years a frequent and most acceptable contributor to the various periodicals of HARPER & BROTHERS. She was among the very cleverest of the female writers of the country, and as modest, retiring, and good as she was clever. Her first literary ventures were made twenty-five years ago in the magazines of the day, and three years later, in 1851, she published her first volume of stories, entitled Dream-Land by Daylight. Since then she has been a steady and successful worker in the literary vineyard, occasionally in the form of a book of fiction, but generally in the magazines. In the language of a contemporary, "She was little known in general society, but was always a favorite in the domestic circle, commanding homage from men of intellect, and winning the cordial friendship of persons of her own sex. Her disposition was so considerate and just, there was so little pretension in her manners, so little that was exacting in her temper, that she happily escaped the frequent rivalries of literary life, and numbered among her warmest admirers many eminent persons whom her generous nature prevented from becoming envious of her fame."

—The original RAVEL family—GABRIEL, ANTOINE, FRANÇOIS, JEROME, and ANGELINE—are all alive and in good health, though the youngest of them is over sixty.

—There are two historical personages who, it appears, are not so black as they have been painted. One is NERO, the other shall be nameless. NERO, in the eyes of the latest historical whitewasher, Herr JOST VAN DER LUCHTEN, was rather an amiable individual. "He was," says Herr LUCHTEN, "a large-hearted and imaginative man;" and he proceeds to support his theory by the following anti-Baconian system of reasoning: "He took the first prize at a musical festival. Therefore he never murdered his mother. He paid a soldier more than £60,000 sterling for being affected by his singing in the part of Hercules. Therefore it is a gross calumny to say that he tortured Christians because they did not set fire to Rome."

—Concerning Miss ROSA BENSON, of Ohio, the Gazzetta dei Teatri, of Milan, has the following pleasant words: "ROSA BENSON is the name of a young débutante who came to us from America to study singing in Milan under Professor SANGIOVANNI, who has no need of praise from us, so well is he known to be one of the few masters of unsurpassed reputation. Miss BENSON will make her first appearance at Loreo, Italy, in the opera La Sonnambula, and there is no doubt but that she will have such success as her merits deserve, and of merits she has many. Beautiful in person, a lovely blonde, with a sympathetic voice, fine education, intelligence, she has every thing to arrive at that goal to which all aspire and few attain."

—The respective ages of the most noted of the English peers who have died during the year past are thus stated: Earl of Lonsdale, 84 years; Viscount BOYNE, 75; Lord INCHIQUIN, 72; the Duke of Leeds, 70; the Earl of Clancarty, 68; Lord DALLING and BULWER, 68; the Marquis of Londonderry, 67; Lord SOUTHAMPTON, 67; the Duke of Bedford, 63; the Earl of Moray, 62; Lord HARRIS, 62; Lord AUDLEY, 55; Lord GIFFORD, 55; the Earl of Carysfort, 47; Lord HASTINGS, 47; and the Marquis of Camden, 31 years.

—The widow of Marshal DE LAURISTON died recently in Paris at the age of one hundred. Madame SUCHET, who is still living, and Madame DE LAURISTON were the last maréchales of the first empire.

—PLINY was something of a fashion reporter in his day. He says, "I have myself seen LOLLA PAULINA, once the wife of the Emperor CALIGULA, though it was on no great occasion, nor she in her full-dress ceremony, but at an ordinary wedding dinner, and have seen her entirely covered with emeralds and pearls, strung alternately, glittering all over her head, hair, bandeau, ears, neck, and fingers, the value of all which put together amounted to the sum of 40,000,000 sesterces" ($2,000,000).

—Professor AGASSIZ having stated that Niagara would run dry in about nineteen centuries, the hackmen at the Falls have just held a meeting on the subject, and resolved on an immediate advance in fares.

—Apropos of Lord HUBERT AINSLEY, who did such droll things with some of our Fifth Avenue folk—he now keeps a restaurant in Dresden, and peddles pies and things.

—Senator TRUMBULL resumes the practice of law after March 4. He has been eighteen years in the Senate, and most of that time on the Judiciary Committee.

—An exceedingly amusing personal controversy as to a rich man's expenditure has recently got into print. One "W. R. G." having aimed at JOHN RUSKIN the question, "Where does the rich man get his means of living?" Mr. RUSKIN replies in the following child-like and delicious manner: "Well, for the point in question, the most exemplary manner of answer is simply to state how I got my own, or, rather, how my father got them for me. He and his partners entered into what your correspondent mellifluously styles 'a mutually beneficent partnership' with certain laborers in Spain. These laborers produced from the earth annually a certain number of bottles of wine. These productions were sold by my father and his partners, who kept nine-tenths, or thereabouts, of the price themselves, and gave one-tenth, or thereabouts, to the laborers. In which state of mutual beneficence my father and his partners naturally became rich, and the laborers as naturally remained poor. Then my good father gave all his money to me (who never did a stroke of work in my life worth my salt, not to mention my dinner), and so far from finding his money 'grow' in my hands, I never try to buy any thing with it. The people tell me 'money isn't what it was in your father's time; every thing is so much dearer.' I should be heartily glad to learn from your correspondent as much pecuniary botany as will enable me to set my money a-growing." It may be added that RUSKIN, finding that town society was getting too much for him, had fled from London and hid himself in the wildest part of Cumberland.

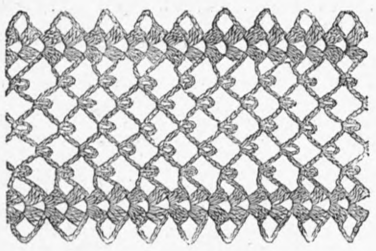

Fig. 1.—CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE.

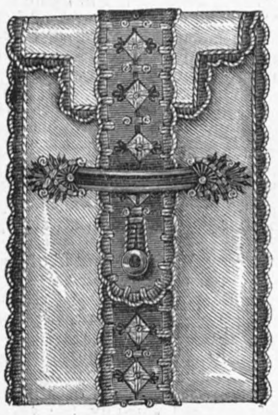
Crochet Insertions for Lingerie, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—This insertion is worked with twisted cotton, No. 80 or 100, crosswise, in rounds going back and forth. Make a foundation of 25 ch. (chain stitch), and crochet the 1st round.—Pass over the last 5 foundation st. (stitch), and work twice 3 dc. (double crochet) separated by 3 ch. on the sixth following foundation st., 3 ch., 2 sc. (single crochet) separated by 1 p. (picot) of 5 ch. on the sixth following foundation st., 7 ch., 2 sc. separated by 1 p. on the sixth following foundation st., 3 ch., twice 3 dc. separated by 3 ch. on the sixth following foundation st., turn. 2d round.—3 ch., twice 3 dc. separated by 3 ch. on the 3 ch. between the dc. in the preceding round, 3 ch., twice alternately 2 sc. separated by 1 p. on the next ch. scallop, 7 ch.; then 2 sc. separated by 1 p. on the following ch. scallop, twice 3 dc. separated by 3 ch. on the 3 ch. between the dc. in the preceding round, turn. Always repeat the first and second rounds, observing the illustration.

Fig. 2.—Work this insertion lengthwise with No. 80 cotton, beginning from the middle, in two equal halves, each counting four rounds. 1st round.—Always alternately 3 ch., 1 p. (consisting of 3 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these). 2d round.—Always 5 stc. (short treble crochet) separated by 1 ch. on the middle st. of every second following 3 ch. 3d round.—5 stc. on the 5 stc. of the preceding round, which are not worked off separately, however, but together, drawing the thread through once; after this always 5 ch. 4th round.—1 dc. on every second following st. of the preceding round, after every second dc. 1 p. Work the first round of the second half of the insertion on the first round of the finished half as follows: * 1 sc. on the middle of the next free 3 ch. of the round, 1 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 p., 1 ch.; repeat from *. Work the following three rounds precisely like those of the first half.



CASE FOR POSTAL CARDS.

Corner of Pillow.—White Embroidery and Wrought Guipure.

See Fig. 1, Page 116, Harper's Bazar, No. 8, Vol. VI.

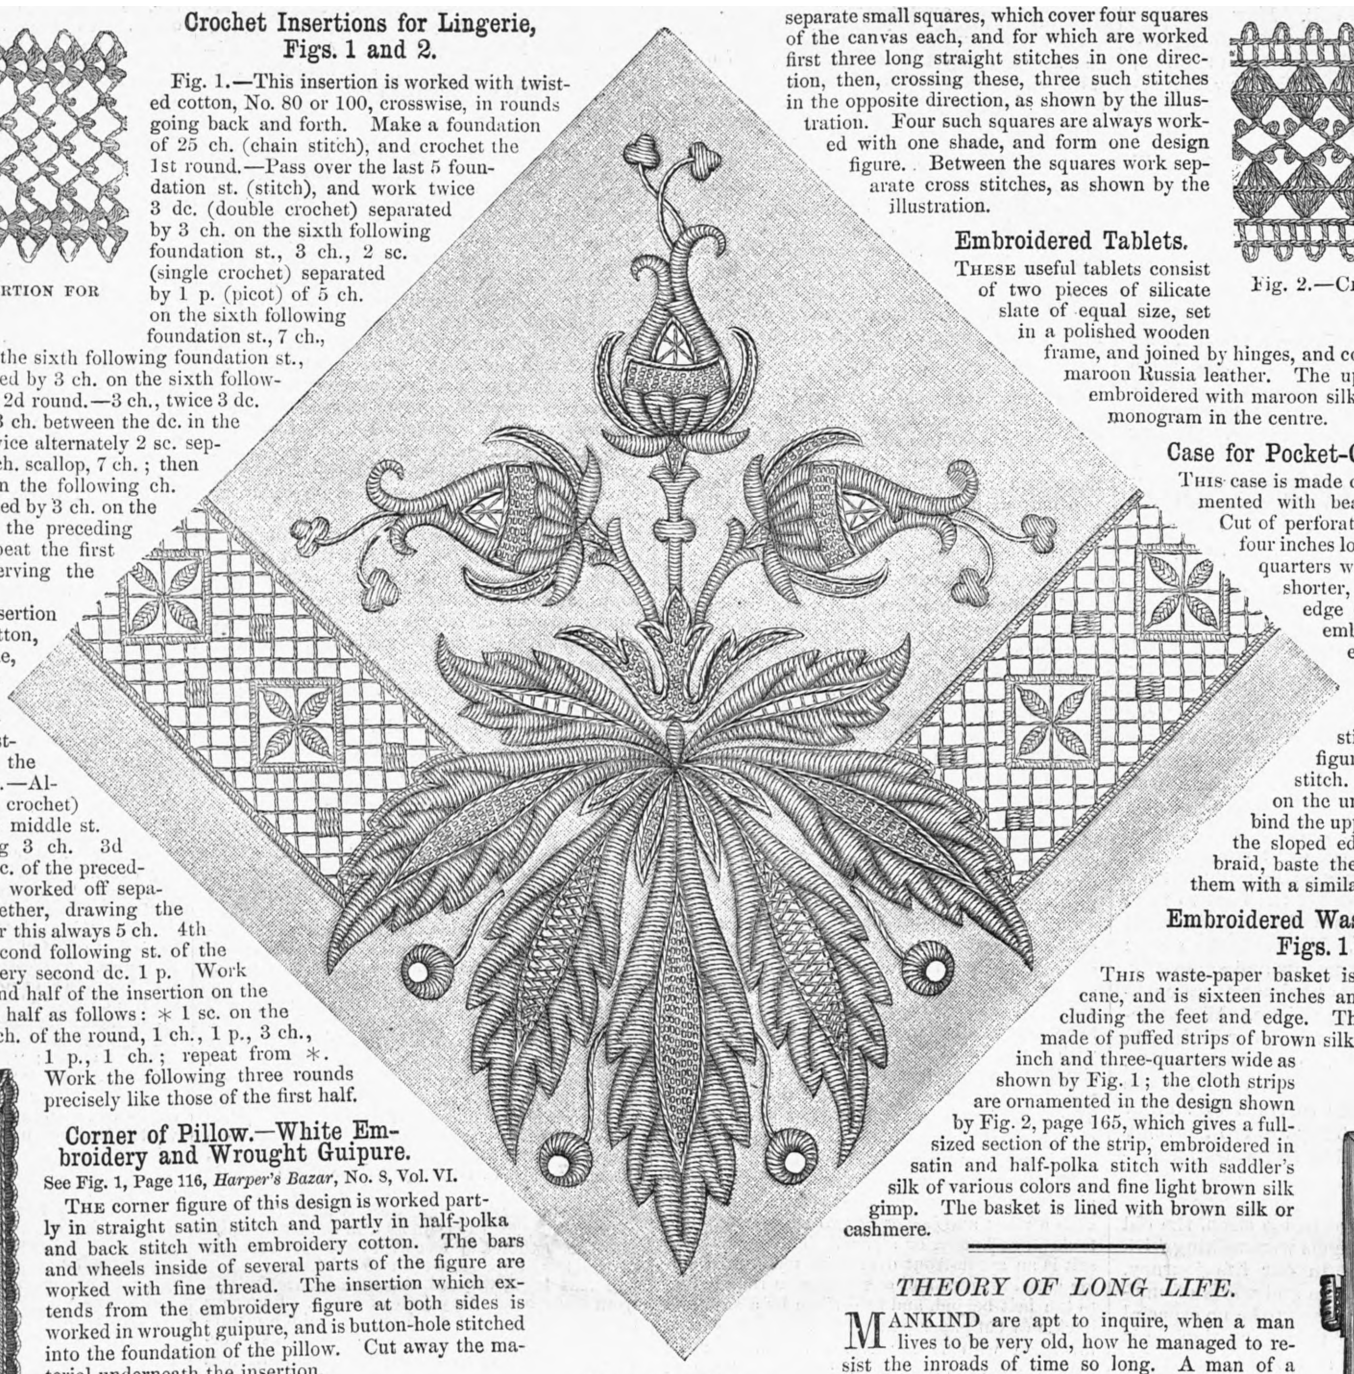
THE corner figure of this design is worked partly in straight satin stitch and partly in half-polka and back stitch with embroidery cotton. The bars and wheels inside of several parts of the figure are worked with fine thread. The insertion which extends from the embroidery figure at both sides is worked in wrought guipure, and is button-hole stitched into the foundation of the pillow. Cut away the material underneath the insertion.

Case for Postal Cards.

THIS case is designed to hold postal cards, and consists of a pocket of fine gray linen of the requisite shape and size, and furnished with a flap. The latter ends in a rounded tab three inches and a quarter long and an inch and a quarter wide, which serves to close the case. The case is ornamented with a strip of red Russia leather, cut out in diamonds through the middle, and sewed on with point Russe stitches of light and dark red silk. The strip and the case are edged with button-hole stitch scallops of the dark red silk. A band of Russia leather, sewed on with point Russe stitches to fasten the tab, and a button and button-hole serve to close the case.



CORNER OF PILLOW. WHITE EMBROIDERY AND WROUGHT GUIPURE. [See Fig. 1, Page 116, No. 8, Vol. VI.]

separate small squares, which cover four squares of the canvas each, and for which are worked first three long straight stitches in one direction, then, crossing these, three such stitches in the opposite direction, as shown by the illustration. Four such squares are always worked with one shade, and form one design figure. Between the squares work separate cross stitches, as shown by the illustration.

Embroidered Tablets.

THESE useful tablets consist of two pieces of silicate slate of equal size, set in a polished wooden frame, and joined by hinges, and covered on the outside with maroon Russia leather. The upper side of this cover is embroidered with maroon silk and gold thread, with a monogram in the centre.

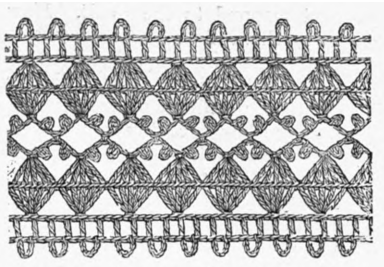


Fig. 2.—CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE.

Case for Pocket-Comb, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS case is made of perforated board, ornamented with bead embroidery and silk. Cut of perforated board two pieces—one four inches long and an inch and three-quarters wide, the other somewhat shorter, and sloped on the upper edge (see Fig. 1). Work the embroidery in the design given by Fig. 2 on page 165, the bead figures with chalk, gold, and blue beads, and every five stitches between the bead figures with red silk in cross stitch. Then cover both parts on the under side with white silk, bind the upper part of the case along the sloped edge with narrow red silk braid, baste the parts together, and join them with a similar binding.

Embroidered Waste-paper Basket. Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS waste-paper basket is made of black polished cane, and is sixteen inches and seven-eighths high, including the feet and edge. The cover of the basket is made of puffed strips of brown silk and white cloth strips an inch and three-quarters wide as shown by Fig. 1; the cloth strips are ornamented in the design shown by Fig. 2, page 165, which gives a full-sized section of the strip, embroidered in satin and half-polka stitch with saddler's silk of various colors and fine light brown silk gimp. The basket is lined with brown silk or cashmere.

EMBROIDERED TABLETS.

THEORY OF LONG LIFE.

MANKIND are apt to inquire, when a man lives to be very old, how he managed to resist the inroads of time so long. A man of a hundred and twelve to whom, when young, we put this question, replied, "I didn't manage it, my boy; I never thought about it, but went on living, and doing what I had to do, just as every body else does."

"But every body else does not live as long as you have lived."

"No; because their constitutions don't hold out so well."

"But didn't you do something to make your constitution hold out?"

"Not that I know of; I minded my business, and lived quite like other folks."

Walter Savage Landor used to relate an anecdote of an English judge, which belongs to the present subject. Being on circuit, two old men were brought before him as witnesses, when he began to chat with them about their age, for the purpose of giving a moral lesson to the young barristers.

"Well, my good man," said he to the first witness, "how old may you be?"

"About eighty-seven, my lord."

"I dare say, now, you have lived a very sober life?"

"Yes, my lord; I haven't been tipsy for the last sixty years."

"There!" cried his lordship, turning to the gentlemen of the bar, "you see what a fine thing sobriety is! The witness looks as though he would live twenty years more."

The barristers nodded assent. In his turn, another witness came forward, who looked particularly hale and robust.

"And how old are you, friend?" inquired the judge.

"Ninety-five, my lord," was the reply.

"Ninety-five! I'll answer for it, you have led a sober life—haven't you?"

Witness hung his head, and answered, "I don't like to say afore all these gentlemen."

"Never mind; speak out."

"Well, then, my lord, I haven't gone to bed sober for the last seventy years."

At this his lordship looked rather blank, and the bar smiled. The judge then said, "We will proceed with the case, gentlemen."

To have a good chance for longevity, an originally good constitution—that is, a sound internal mechanism—is of immense advantage, though to this primary excellence we must needs add carefulness in the art of living. It is within every one's experience that hundreds of their acquaintances, with good

Tapestry Foundations for Slippers, Cushions, etc., Figs. 1–4.

THESE foundations are suitable for slippers, cushions, pockets, covers, small rugs, etc.

The foundation Fig. 1 is worked with one color in alternate oblong cross stitches, each of which covers four squares of the canvas in height and two in width. The illustration shows the points for inserting and drawing out the needle, marked × and ●, and also the canvas threads to be taken up for the next stitch gathered on an arrow.

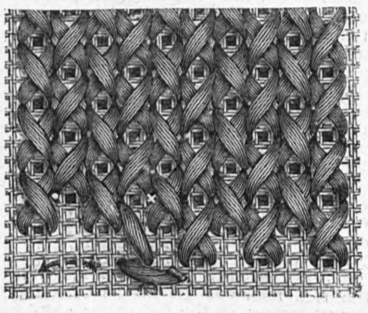

Fig. 1.—TAPESTRY FOUNDATION FOR SLIPPERS, CUSHIONS, ETC.

Fig. 2.—This foundation is also worked with one color, and consists, like the preceding, of oblong alternate cross stitches, with a crosswise stitch stretched across the middle of each. The illustration shows the stitch with the thread loosened, and also the point where the needle is to be inserted for the following stitch marked ×, and where the needle is drawn out marked ●.

For the foundation Fig. 3 first work the foundation in ordinary cross stitch with two shades of one color, leaving free the space for the lighter design figures which are afterward worked in. The latter are also worked in two shades, working for the four leaflets of a design figure first the middle stitch with the darker shade, and then the two side stitches each with the lighter shade. The point marked × in the illustration shows where to insert the needle for the next stitch after drawing the needle out.

Fig. 4.—This foundation is worked in three shades of one color. It consists of

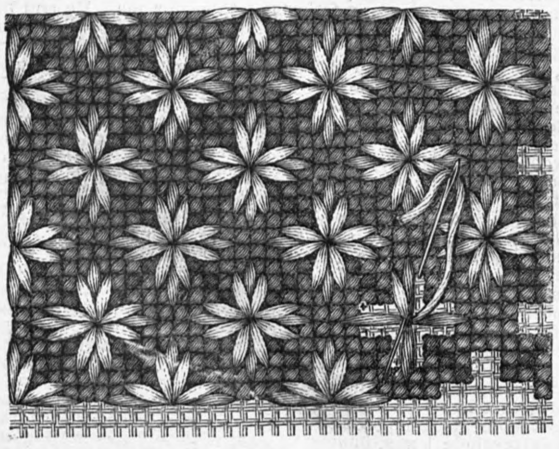

Fig. 3.—TAPESTRY FOUNDATION FOR SLIPPERS, CUSHIONS, ETC.

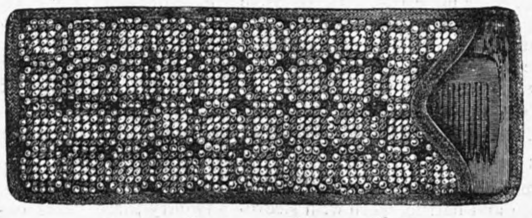

Fig. 1.—CASE FOR POCKET-COMB. [See Fig. 2, Page 165.]

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED WASTE-PAPER BASKET.—[See Fig. 2, Page 165.]

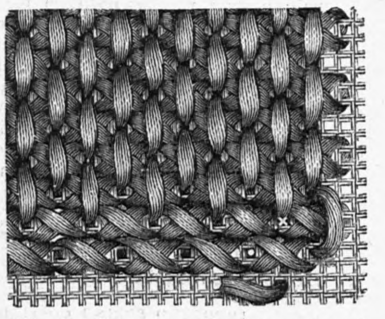

Fig. 2.—TAPESTRY FOUNDATION FOR SLIPPERS, CUSHIONS, ETC.

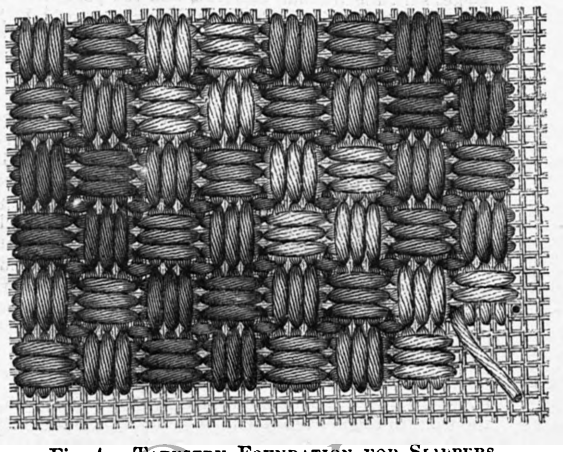

Fig. 4.—TAPESTRY FOUNDATION FOR SLIPPERS, CUSHIONS, ETC.

Hosted by Google

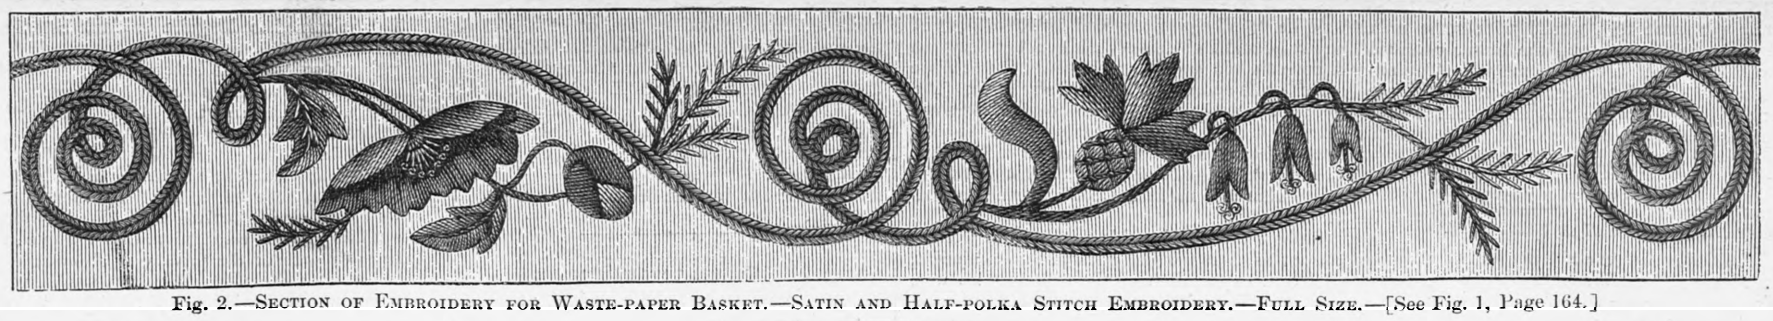

Fig. 2.—Section of Embroidery for Waste-paper Basket.—Satin and Half-polka Stitch Embroidery.—Full Size.—[See Fig. 1, Page 164.]

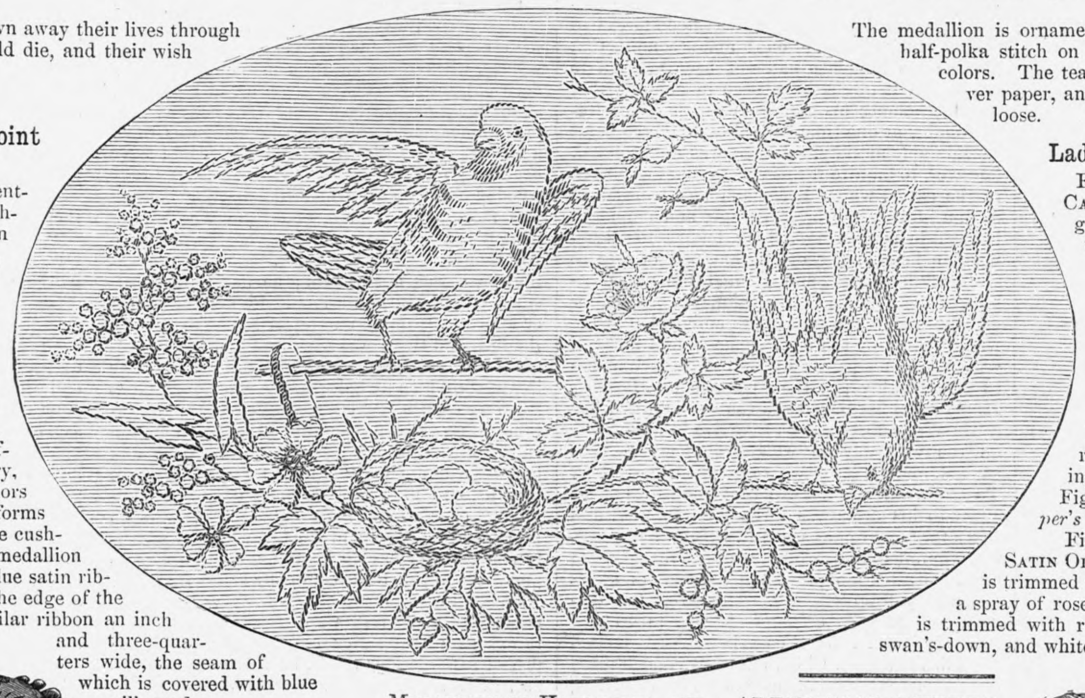
chances of longevity, have literally thrown away their lives through sheer perversity of conduct. They would die, and their wish has been gratified.

Medallion in Half-polka and Point Russe Embroidery.

This medallion is suitable for ornamenting boxes, small portfolios, toilette cushions, handkerchief cases, etc. The design is worked on a foundation of light cloth, satin, or gros grain with fine colored sewing silk in half-polka stitch and point Russe.

Embroidered Pincushion.

This pincushion consists of an oval cushion of card-board and shirting filled with emery, and covered with blue satin. This satin is ornamented in satin, half-polka stitch, and point Russe embroidery, worked with saddler's silk of various colors as shown by the illustration, and which forms a medallion in the middle at the top of the cushion, and a border all around it. The medallion is edged with gold cord and a ruche of blue satin ribbon seven-eighths of an inch wide. The edge of the cushion is trimmed with a ruche of similar ribbon an inch and three-quarters wide, the seam of which is covered with blue silk cord.



Medallion in Half-polka and Point Russe Embroidery.

The medallion is ornamented in embroidery worked in satin and half-polka stitch on white silk with fine chenille of different colors. The tea-caddy is covered on the inside with silver paper, and is furnished with a lid which is laid on loose.

Ladies' Reception Dresses, Figs. 1–3.

Fig. 1.—Pearl Gros Grain Dress with Cashmere Opera Cloak. This pearl gros grain dress is trimmed with a flounce, a narrow ruffle, and folds and bows of the material. Cerise cashmere opera cloak, trimmed with cerise gros grain rolls, a bow of the same, and black lace. Coiffure of cerise gros grain.

Fig. 2.—White Organdy Dress. This dress is made of white organdy, and consists of a double skirt and low-necked basque-waist, trimmed with white lace, a kilt-pleated strip, and bows and rolls of light blue gros grain. Blue morning-glories in the hair. Cut the waist from Figs. 39–42, No. XII., Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 6, Vol. VI.

Fig. 3.—Blue Silk Gauze Dress with Satin Opera Cloak. This blue silk gauze dress is trimmed with gathered ruffles of the material and a spray of roses. The opera cloak is white satin, and is trimmed with ruffles and ruches of the material, white swan's-down, and white Angora fringe. Roses in the hair.

Embroidered Pincushion.

Embroidered Tea-Caddy.

This tea-caddy is made of linden-wood, ornamented with inlaid brown and red colored wood and with tabs of green Russia leather, which extend from the medallion in the middle of the lid and simulate mountings.

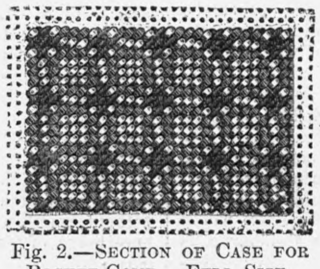


Fig. 2.—Section of Case for Pocket-Comb.—Full Size.

ARTIFICIAL BUTTER.

A METHOD of making artificial butter, announced in a French journal, consists in placing beef suet cut small in water of about 113° F., together with carbonate of potassa and fresh sheeps' stomachs shredded into small slices. The fatty matter which separates and floats on the water is subjected to hy-

Embroidered Tea-Caddy.

Fig. 1.—Pearl Gros Grain Dress with Cashmere Opera Cloak. Fig. 2.—White Organdy Dress. Fig. 3.—Blue Silk Gauze Dress with Satin Opera Cloak.

LADIES' RECEPTION DRESSES.

Hosted by Google

draulic pressure; this, mixed with some milk and water, is churned, and the butter obtained is washed and, if necessary, melted. The authorities of the victualing department of the French navy pronounce this an excellent substitute for butter.

ARBUTUS LINES.

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

WHEREVER lift the solemn pines
Their fearless branches high,
Wherever through their stately lines
Looks down the solemn sky,
Shall waken soon the daintiest flower
That opens to the Spring,
Ere bird in nest or bee in bower
Their grateful tribute bring.

Where flutter mosses, weird and gray,
In Southern forests dim,
Where linger wreaths of snowy spray
O'er Northern hill-sides grim,
When mornings break in blue and gold,
And tender grows the air,
The shy arbutus will unfold
Its petals, clustered fair.

A subtle sense of faint perfume,
From dewy censers shed,
Shall hover o'er the lowly bloom,
So fain to hide its head
From gazing eyes; its waxen white
A thought of rose shall flush,
As if, love-lifted to the light,
It felt a maiden blush.

Yet, brave and true, the timid thing,
Beneath its cradling leaf,
Not once forgets to keep with Spring
A trysting bright and brief.
A vestal at her altar bent,
With sparkling gems impearled,
It lives its little life content,
Unspotted from the world.

The rose may be the garden's queen,
Incarnadined with dyes
That match in loveliness serene
The hues of sunset skies;
The lily with her carven cup
May wait at Flora's throne,
And the star-eyed daisy, looking up,
Claim Summer for her own;

But thou, wee daughter of the woods,
Fair birth of frost and dew,
Thou bringest to our solitudes
A breath of gladness new.
And pure as novice in her veil,
Or babe on mother's breast,
Spring's earliest darling! thee we hail,
And, sweet, we love thee best!

MURPHY'S MASTER.

By JAMES PAYN,

Author of "A Woman's Vengeance," "Bred in the Bone," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," etc.

CHAPTER XIII.

SUSPICIONS.

THE emigrants were harangued by the "young master" with all the effect that he had anticipated: exhausted with their long imprisonment, and delighted to find the green turf once more under their feet, they were unwilling to resume their voyage even for the few days that now remained of it; not only his own people, but a considerable minority of the other passengers elected to remain where they were, under Kavanagh's authority. The captain also, as he had predicted, seemed by no means indisposed to second their wishes; and accordingly the seeds and implements, the tents and dwelling-houses, intended for Australia, were disembarked, along with sufficient provisions to last the islanders for two months to come, long before which Robert might be expected back with stores of all sorts. Before an hour had passed the island with its little hill had become like an ant's nest in the spectacle it presented of activity and business; and by night-fall it wore already the appearance of an infant colony. It was clear warm weather, and most of the tenants of the steerage preferred to occupy their improvised residences on land, and even to camp out on the turf, rather than to remain in their close berths.

When all had been got out of the vessel that could well be spared, including even a couple of her boats, the pinnace and the gig (which had to be paid for very handsomely), and after four days of hard labor, wherein Robert Chesney was pronounced by the ship's carpenter to be the only man of the new colony who understood how to use his hands, the Star with her much-diminished freight set sail for Melbourne. Robert had general instructions as to the articles he was to procure there, as well as ample funds for that purpose, but a great latitude was necessarily left to his own judgment. He had no person to whom to apply to assist his inexperience, except the captain, and, much to his surprise, that gentleman showed a strong disinclination to have any thing to do with the matter. He had been very kind to Robert during the early portion of the voyage out; not only lending him books, as has been said, but taking some pains to teach him to box the compass, and even a little seamanship: but of late his distrust and dislike of Maguire and his associates had seemed to extend in a less degree to Robert himself. Still it did seem strange that he should refuse even such scant courtesy as a little good advice. However, so it was. "I have done Mr. Kavanagh's bidding," said he, "in helping him and his friends out of my ship, and I did it very gladly; but they and I have shaken hands, and I shouldn't fret if we never came across one another any more. No, Sir; I should be very glad to do you a personal service, but I'll neither meddle nor make with their affairs; and since you are a friend of his, and his right-hand man, you had better not inquire what has made me come to that conclusion."

Robert was loyal to his patron, and felt the affront as though it had been put upon himself. His own explanation of the captain's ire was, first, that he had never forgiven the fugitive for having come on board the Star under false pretenses, notwithstanding that two saloon fares had been paid for instead of one; and secondly, that Kavanagh's influence had not been exerted to the extent it might have been in quelling that disorder among his followers which had, without doubt, at one time caused him (the captain) considerable anxiety. Robert was not inclined, however, to inquire if this was so, but kept much to the cabin, which Kavanagh had transferred to him, during the brief voyage, and employed himself in composing a long budget to Lizzy, wherein he told her of all that had of late so strangely happened, and painted the new prospect of their future in the brightest colors. He greatly pressed the immediate emigration of the whole family by the next steamer, and inclosed —thanks to his patron's generosity—such a sum as would easily pay their passage to Murphy's Island by either of the two routes suggested.

He was so fortunate as to arrive in Melbourne on the very day on which the English mail started, and his letter went off by it accordingly. To know that the missive that was to bring his Lizzy to his arms was already on its way, and that every day would speed it, was an inexpressible comfort to him, while the duties that pressed upon his attention prevented the time of sweet expectancy from lagging. Moreover, the discovery of Murphy's Island—it was in 40° 21′ south latitude, 123° 4′ east longitude—excited not a little interest, which naturally concentrated itself upon the person intrusted with the victualing of the new colony; so that curiosity and self-interest together procured for him more than enough of society. Working, in short, as diligently as he could, and sparing no expense to insure expedition, it was nevertheless fully six weeks before he found himself in possession of all that he had been commissioned to procure, and got it embarked on board the sloop which he had hired for that purpose. It was a ship that had already an interest for him, for he had been informed, on application at the office of the mail steamer, that passengers from England could not be taken to the island direct, and this very sloop would probably bring his Lizzy out from Melbourne, as it was now conveying himself. Its crew consisted of some half a dozen men besides the skipper, and one of them, as it happened, had belonged to the Star of Erin, which had sailed for England while he had been delayed (or so his story ran) by illness up the country. With this man Robert was naturally more familiar than with the rest; and on the day they started for their destination, and during some conversation about the stores, the former observed, "Well, whatever we shall find them short of when we reach the island, it won't be liquor."

The sailor's tone was so significant that Robert was tempted to question him; when he learned that the Star had been laden with an unusual quantity of spirits, and that almost all of it had been purchased by Kavanagh for the use of the colony.

"But it seems only right," observed Chesney, "since the ship could be resupplied at Melbourne, that as much as possible should have been left in store on the island."

"No doubt, Sir," answered the man, grinning, "if so be as it has been left in store, though, from what I have seen of our late shipmates, they are not the ones to let good liquors spoil in the cellar."

This reply would not have caused Robert uneasiness but that it had seemed to him that the amount of spirits which he had been commissioned to purchase, and which he was now bringing with him, was very large, while, if it was really true that the store was already sufficient for the colonists in that respect, it would be immensely in excess of their needs.

"Well, well," returned he, with an air of somewhat assumed indifference, "the cellar key will of course be taken care of, and the liquor only given out under proper restrictions."

"By the master, Sir, or the butler?" inquired the other, with a most significant action of the left eyelid.

"What the deuce do you mean, man?" asked Robert, angrily.

"Well, Sir, I mean no offense," returned the other, apologetically. "Only that's what we—I mean we of the crew—used to call Mr. Kavanagh and his man, 'master and butler,' because they were such Lushingtons. I've known three bottles of whisky go into Mr. Kavanagh's cabin of a morning, and come out empty before night. I dare say Murphy helped him, and Maguire too, for that matter; but to have D. T. for the second time during one voyage, well, that's going it a leetle too fast. Of course I thought you had known, Sir, or I would not have mentioned it."

Robert was not so simple but that he had heard of delirium tremens, but until that moment he had been totally unaware that he had himself been a witness to a sufferer from that complaint. This, then, was the explanation of Kavanagh's cries for "Help!" and spectre-haunted gestures, and also of the disinclination of Murphy to admit him on such occasions to his master's cabin. A shadow seemed to fall upon his heart with the revelation; for how unstable, he reflected, must those fortunes be, that but a while ago had looked so fair, which rested on the caprice of a habitual drunkard! The vague but solemn warning of "Miss Mary," the foreboding farewell of Mistress Mulvaney, recurred to him now with novel force, and found at least their partial interpretations. One thing, however, was certain, he had thrown in his lot with Kavanagh, and it was far too late—and indeed for the present impossible—to dissociate their fortunes.

CHAPTER XIV.

WHAT KAVANAGH HAD DONE.

ON the fifth day the sloop made the island; and its arrival was welcomed in the little harbor with evident satisfaction, yet, as it seemed to Robert, without the enthusiasm that might have been expected. There was an air of constraint about these usually frank and light-hearted people, which, under the circumstances, was quite unaccountable. Robert's first act would have been to go to Government House—as the only wooden erection of which the harbor boasted was facetiously termed, and from whose roof floated a huge green flag—to report himself to Kavanagh. "The Governor," however, he was informed, was not within; he had, it seemed, started with Murphy a few hours ago for another spot in his dominions upon the other side of the hill, and there was nothing for it but to proceed with the disembarkation of the stores. The live stock, which included sheep, goats, pigs, poultry, and even a few cows, excited such admiration as no golden medalist of a metropolitan cattle-show ever extorted; for these poor folk had been living on salt junk for the last three months, and milk had been an unknown commodity even to the little children. It was no little disappointment to Robert, who was secretly conscious of having acquitted himself well as purveyor to the little commonwealth, that Mr. Kavanagh was not present during these proceedings; and when they were concluded, and such things as might suffer damage from exposure placed safely under cover, he was naturally impatient to see his patron, to whom Maguire offered to conduct him. The colony had been divided, it seemed, into two parts, in consequence of a "faction fight" that had already taken place between his "Tipperary boys" and the other members of the community; and the latter were located on the south side of the island in a settlement of their own, to which "the Governor" was now paying a visit, just as in disturbed districts "a royal progress" is sometimes made for the purpose of conciliation. On the way Robert noticed with pleasure that some attempts at cultivation had been made, and not without success, for though the agricultural knowledge of the community was for the most part confined to planting potatoes or the sowing of mustard and cress, the soil was so fertile that you had but to "tickle it with a hoe and it straightway laughed in harvest." In a few years it was plain that, with very moderate industry, Murphy's Island might be changed from a comparative desert to a spot not only self-supporting, but teeming with plenty. They were not long before they came in sight of New Town, as it was called—a little cluster of tents with one wooden house, from the roof of which a green flag was flying, similar to that which adorned the harbor.

"That is the sign of your vice-sovereignty," observed Maguire, in answer to Robert's inquiry. "I ought to have told you that it has been arranged that you are to live here. The New Town folks, you see, will have no objection to you, since you are not connected with our Tipperary lot, while, on the other hand, it would never have done to leave them without some representative of authority."

There was a cynicism in Maguire's tone which would not have escaped his companion had his thoughts not been otherwise occupied. The news he had just heard was displeasing to him for a reason which, however, he would have been ashamed to mention. He had pictured himself, as the time drew near for his Lizzy's arrival, rising every morning and sweeping the sea with his glass, to catch the first glimpse of the ship that was to bring her, and from New Town no such view could be obtained, since the hill in the centre of the island obstructed it.

"It is immaterial where I live," observed Robert, "and, as you say, these good folks owe me no ill-will. But I hope Mr. Kavanagh has come to no harm by venturing hither: it is but an hour's walk from the harbor, and I can't understand what has detained him."

"Oh, the Governor is safe enough," answered Maguire, carelessly; "it is quite likely he has gone back the other way, which is a good long round."

"Then he must be in much better health than when I left him!" exclaimed Robert.

Maguire returned no answer.

They had come in sight of a knot of men lounging and loafing in the sunshine at the entrance of the village, looking certainly idle enough, but not so happy as idleness was wont to make them. Perhaps they had been to blame in the late disturbance, and regretted the part they had taken in it; but, at all events, Robert observed the same subdued air, though in a somewhat mitigated degree, that he had noticed in the people at the harbor. At the sight of Chesney they rose and ran to meet him. From the southerly position of their settlement, they had been unable, as he had foreseen, to perceive the approach of the sloop, and its arrival was unknown to them.

Having answered their questions, Robert inquired, in his turn, whether "the Governor," as Kavanagh was gravely termed, was in the village.

"No, indeed," said they. "Why, he has been ill for weeks."

Robert turned to Maguire in blank astonishment.

"That's so," said the latter, coolly; "I'll tell you all about it when we get within-doors."

The wooden house which had been set apart for Robert's residence was the only one in New Town to which that phrase "within-doors" could have been applied; and since such of the people as had not at once started for the harbor on the news of the sloop's arrival were now crowding about him and his companion, they hastened to take advantage of the privacy it afforded. It was but a two-roomed cabin, yet it was very neatly and even comfortably furnished in sea fashion, thanks to Kavanagh's long purse and the acquiescence of the captain of the Star; but, for the moment, Robert was far too indignant to observe this evidence of his patron's kindness, and could think only of the deception that had been practiced on himself.

"And, now we are alone, Mr. Maguire," exclaimed he, impatiently, "be so good as to explain to me for what reason I have thus been made a fool of; or is it for the mere pleasure that you may chance to take in telling a lie?"

"Sit down, my good Sir," said Maguire, quietly, himself taking a chair, "for to tell you all will be a long story. I have told you a lie, no doubt; but that is because, from the experience I have had of you, I did not think you strong enough to bear the truth. I have sounded you during our late voyage together a dozen times, and though you have doubtless done credit to your teaching (against which I have nothing to say, except that it doesn't suit my views), the result has been in every case disappointment. You have no ambition, you have no sense of independence, and you can only think in a groove. Yes, lad; you have sense and spirit, and had you shown a disposition to back me in a matter to which there is now no need to allude, we might all, instead of ending our days on this beggarly island, have had all this side of the world to choose from, and a good ship of our own to take us whither we would."

"You rascal, I believe you would have had us all turn pirates!" exclaimed Robert, striking the table with his hand.

"Perhaps," answered Maguire, coolly. "But wishes unfulfilled are not crimes, I believe, at least in this life, though some good folks have affixed a penalty to them in the next. You are, I see, recalling to your mind the delicate hints that I used to drop upon this subject, my endeavors to make myself agreeable to the poor fools below stairs, the disfavor with which the gallant captain of late regarded me, and other little matters. But let us not waste time either on regrets or self-congratulations. The point is that here we are, and we are not pirates."

"Nay," answered Robert, firmly, "the point is rather that however you might have succeeded in imposing upon your own poor ignorant people, you would not have gained a man with a head on his shoulders or a heart in his breast to join in so mad and atrocious a scheme. No one of them, in the first place, would have moved a finger without their master's bidding; and you will never persuade me that a gentleman like Mr. Kavanagh, however imprudent and misguided, would have consented to become a thief and a murderer—"

"One moment," interposed Maguire, laying his finger on Robert's arm: "by a most singular and unusual accident to have occurred during a flight of virtuous eloquence, you have chanced to hit the nail on the head with your sledge-hammer. What would you say if I was to let you know that Mr. Kavanagh is a murderer already?"

"I should say that you are a Liar, and in point of fact I do say it," answered Robert, hotly.

"Very good; that shows your spirit. There have indeed been days—and not so long ago—when I would have shot a man dead for saying less; but let that pass. I want to come to an understanding with you, my lad, and not to quarrel; and, besides, it is your very pluck that makes me wish, I don't say for your friendship, lest it should offend you, but your alliance. I must still request you to listen to me, even though you may disbelieve my assertions; but the proofs of what I say shall be forth-coming before you leave this room. Mr. Frank Kavanagh had, as you know, a younger brother, Louis; they were born of the same mother, but under circumstances that made the younger the heir and the elder penniless. Mr. Kavanagh senior did not marry his wife until after Frank's birth, whereby the boy was rendered illegitimate, though only a few persons were aware of the fact, either at that time or afterward. The old man liked Frank best, as indeed did every body; though wild and impulsive, he was generous and warm-hearted; and even the political scrapes he got into (which were very serious) seemed in his father's eyes, who sympathized with their objects, but the result of youthful enthusiasm. To the tenants of the estate they endeared him, and even from Louis they never received any direct discouragement (although he held aloof from them) until after the old man's death. It was not till long after Frank had grown up that his father revealed to him the fact of his illegitimacy, and I dare say the revelation did not help to sober him, or to heal the disagreements which already existed between his better-fortuned brother and himself. Of these latter, however, the old man was not very cognizant, or, at all events, attached to them less importance than they deserved. However his sons might differ in politics, he thought they would be loyal to one another; and especially that Louis, who was always full of professions of duty and principle, would take care to see his wishes carried out with respect to Frank after his own death, just as if they had the force of law. He could, indeed, have left his eldest son provided for in his will, but not without the exposure of the shame of his dead mother; so in the presence of both his sons, and with Frank's full consent, he stated how he desired them to share his property. His English estate of Falston, which was much larger than that he possessed in Ireland, he gave to Louis, who disliked the latter country, to which, on the other hand, his brother was devoted. To make up for this unequal distribution, and also because he foresaw that Frank's revolutionary tendencies might one day cause him to need ready money wherewith to make himself a home in the New World, he left him a large sum (which he always kept by him in notes at Falston for the very purpose to which it was afterward applied), as well as the estate in Tipperary. Louis promised solemnly that this arrangement should hold good after his father's death, just as if it had been so devised by will; and so the brothers parted company, never, I believe, to meet again but once: Frank to recommence his desultory existence, made up of attempts at art, attempts at politics—assisted in the latter by the devotion of such poor tools as you see here. Frank Kavanagh was honest; his people were faithful, but they could not discover the way to the moon. Moreover, there were some people who objected even to the experiment being tried. His plots, harmless to the government against which they were directed, were dangerous to himself: he had to use disguises, aliases, and houses that had back-doors to them, while Louis lived with his father at Falston Hall, a model son, with an eye to the county magistracy. When the old man died Frank was in hiding, and, as Louis pretended, could not, therefore, be communicated with; but, at all events, the first hint he received of the fact was from the stoppage of his own allowance, followed by the information that his brother had taken possession of the whole paternal estate, as he had undoubtedly a legal right to do. On the same evening Frank Kavanagh, with Murphy, rode down from town to Falston Hall. What happened there I can pretty well guess; but if you like to see the account of it as written by the penny-a-liners, here it is." Maguire drew a newspaper from his breast pocket, and threw it across the table. "'The murder at Falston Hall' is what they call it, you see."

Hosted by Google

"I see," gasped Robert, looking from that ghastly heading to the date of the newspaper, which was the same as that on which he had visited Herne Street. Oh, why, when Denton had offered it to him then, had he declined to read it?

"How you could be ignorant of what had taken place," continued Maguire, "was always a marvel to me; for if you had missed the papers, yet, being in town, how could you have helped reading this, which was on every blank wall in London?"

From the same pocket he took out a handbill, and spread it out upon the table:

"£200 REWARD.—The above reward will be paid for the apprehension of Frank Kavanagh, charged with the Willful Murder of his brother, Louis Kavanagh, of Falston Hall, Esquire."

It was the same notice which had been pasted opposite to Robert's window at Mulvaney's, but of which he had only read the first two words when it was torn down by Murphy. Now the whole truth flashed upon him. The broad-sheet seller of the previous night had proclaimed the full particulars, though the widow and he in the smoke-room had caught them but indistinctly: he had missed the name, and had taken for suicide what without doubt had been fratricide. Murphy had prevented his going out to buy the broad-sheet, and had invented an excuse for not obtaining it himself, in order to conceal the terrible truth. With Robert, who had had the encounter with the patrol in his mind, and had no suspicion of any other catastrophe, he had succeeded, even after the former had seen the handbill, since he set that down to the same account; but the widow he had been unable to deceive, and hence their quarrel respecting Kavanagh. She had been blind to his failings, tender to his faults, but she could not, like his faithful henchman, excuse his crimes. "I don't wish to see him, Murphy," she had said, when he had spoken of the young master's wishing her farewell, "either here or elsewhere, but least of all under my own roof." And the reason was now only too evident—she had shrunk from taking his blood-stained hand in hers. From the moment she knew that he had taken his brother's life all regard for him had died out in her, or only just so much remained as prevented her from proclaiming his crime. To Robert she had maintained an icy silence, the coldness of which had not escaped his notice, though he had never guessed its cause.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The Murillo.—Sedgewick's Humor.—Mr. Spurgeon on Art.

"THE dead," it is said, "can tell no tales," and perhaps it was to this proverb that the captain of the vessel which ran down the Northfleet trusted when he steamed away from the destruction he had wrought, regardless, like the gods in Tennyson's Lotos-Eaters, of "sinking ship and praying hands;" yet the offender has been discovered, it seems, in one Felipe Berrute, a Spaniard, in command of the steamer Murillo, one of a line which regularly plies between this country and the Spanish peninsula. The telegraph was employed both by her owners and those who wished to bring her to justice, and at Lisbon, where she was due, she was "wired" to go on "if in collision" at once, and without discharging cargo, to Cadiz: which she did, yet not before those warned to watch for her had observed her to be "fresh painted on the starboard bow, to water-line, with indentation near her anchor." It is feared that, since she belongs to Spanish owners, no steps can be taken against her, unless she again ventures into English waters. Cousin Jonathan in such a case would probably send an iron-clad with orders "to see about it," but I fear that will not be done in this case. "Cedunt arma togæ" is our present motto, and all our fighting is done in our law courts.

This reflection reminds me that the claimant to the Tichborne estates and his friend Mr. Skipworth have "got it hot" for their attempts to prejudice the public mind in the former's favor. "Sir Roger" has had to give security to the amount of £1000 that he will not so offend again, and Mr. Skipworth is find £500, and is to be imprisoned for three months. The evidence brought forward concerning this gentleman shows that the race of Justice Shallow (for he is a county magistrate) is by no means extinct. It seems he has written to the Queen entreating her "to see justice done" to his little innocent; and in a pamphlet addressed "to the people of England," on the same vital subject, proves that there was collusion between the counsel for the complainant and that of the defendant, on the ground that he "saw the Attorney-General with his arm round Sergeant Ballantyne's neck." The roars of laughter with which this and similar extracts were received by the crowded court moved not the dull but conscientious Skipworth in the least, and he went to jail appealing from the authority of the judicial bench to "the protection of his Lord and his God." The claimant, as you may conjecture, showed a very different sort of fight, and was, as usual, imperturbably audacious. When Mr. Justice Blackburn addressed him with, "And now as to you, Orton, or Castro, or Tichborne," the air with which he interrupted him with his calm "Tichborne, my lord," is said to have been inimitable. However, he may now no longer hold meetings in his own favor at thirty guineas a night (for which he has been "farmed" by a licensed victualer), but confines himself to appealing to a generous and gullible public per advertisement only.

Having had to speak so much of deceased personages in my recent Gossips, I purposely did not give the death of Professor Sedgewick the place which it deserved as the first topic of the present week. That world-famous geologist died at Trinity College, Cambridge, on Monday last (January 27), at the age of eighty-seven, and in the same rooms, as I believe, which he had occupied as a fellow of that society for more than sixty years. He was of a very genial nature, and a rough but kindly humorist. It is related of him that having cause to suspect his bed-maker—as the old women who attend our collegians are called—of stealing his tea, he placed one pound in his caddy as usual, and another in a secret place, helping himself only from the latter store. When the offender came to the professor, as usual, to say that his tea was gone, he laughed good-humoredly, and said, "Why, my good woman, your tea" (that is, the tea he had suffered her to purloin as usual) "has not lasted so long as mine has," and triumphantly produced his secret store. On another occasion this lady, or perhaps her granddaughter, had taken upon herself in the long vacation to have his chairs, which were in a sad state of disrepair, cane-bottomed, instead of stuffed as before. "No," said this scientific old gentleman: "I am growing an old man, madam, and I am not going to the grave with hexagons imprinted on me." In Professor Sedgewick Cambridge has lost its best-known figure, and science one of its ancient beacons, which had, however, outlived its fire.

Mr. Spurgeon has come home from his tour abroad, and has given a lecture at his "Tabernacle" upon what he saw in Italy, which has driven the art world, and, indeed, polite society generally, almost into hysterics. Because he is vulgar and ignorant, as he certainly is, compared with any "snowy-banded, delicate-handed" priest of the Established Church, the world of fashion and learning despise Mr. Spurgeon, and yet are very angry with him for the personal influence he exerts over his own people—who are numerous and wealthy, if not of a high social standing. The truth is, I believe, that no other living preacher has ever drawn together such enormous audiences during such a length of time, nor does his popularity appear to be at all upon the wane. He differs from the majority of the conventional clergy by boldly grappling with the particular sins of the flock he is addressing; instead of doing vague battle with "the infidel" (not present), or attacking the Pope, I have heard him say to his own people (who are mostly in the retail line, and very pious), "When I mention Mammon, mind you, I don't speak of millionaires, and such-like, but of your pettifogging, grasping shop-keeper, who is as likely as not to invite one into his back parlor to come and pray with him, while he is all the while sanding the sugar."

Again, when Spurgeon had that dispute with the deacons of his own chapel which caused him to migrate to the Tabernacle, he reminded his congregation that it was written in the Scripture, "Resist the devil and he will flee from you," but "let me tell you, if you resist a deacon he will fly at you, for such has been my case." Since, then, this gentleman does not consult the sensibilities of his own flock, it is not very likely that he should pay much respect to the dictum of the critics, or of the admirers of theological high art. He states it to be his conviction that after walking through some twenty miles of pictures "one seems not to want to visit any more picture-galleries." He was "unable to say what the Virgin Mary's countenance was like, but he had seen her as a Frenchwoman, a Dutchwoman, a German, and an Italian, and lastly he had seen her as black as soot."

In the Coliseum he and his friends sang hymns, and he preached a sermon in it, a fact which seems to have given him greater satisfaction than the pictures. Altogether, Mr. Spurgeon has drawn down upon himself a torrent of abuse from all the organs of civilization, which affects him as much as a shower affects a duck—that is, he rather likes it; and upon my word, to a man who knows the art critics and the world of refinement generally, it is pleasant to hear Mr. Spurgeon speak his mind.

Speaking of high art, our loan exhibition of the old masters this year is by no means so good as its predecessors. In particular, there are one or two paintings by "the greatest master that ever lived," as some call him, Velasquez, which would seem to an untutored eye to be not a very munificent gift to a hotel-keeper as a sign for his establishment. There is one labeled Constable also, concerning which a gentleman named Wainewright writes to the papers to say, "I beg to say that I painted that picture with my own hands." About which, of course, there is a very pretty kettle of fish.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

WASHINGTON society is looking forward with eager interest to the grand finale of the season—the Inauguration Ball. A mammoth building—325 feet in length and 150 in width—has been erected in Judiciary Square, in order to prevent the inconveniences so common in connection with a large ball. Every arrangement will be made for the accommodation of all guests. The hat and cloak rooms extend the whole length of the building, and also the supper-room, which will be open from the beginning to the close of the ball. The West Point, Naval Academy, and Marine bands will supply the music for the occasion, and the illumination and decoration of the room will be unusually magnificent. The indications are that there will be a grand display in Washington. About thirty different military organizations from various parts of the country will be present, as well as the West Point and naval cadets. The parades and drills, which constitute a part of the programme of the week, will add much to the interest of the occasion. There will probably be about seven thousand military in Washington, and there is a desire that there should be a general review either on the 4th or the 5th of March.

Considerable dissatisfaction has been felt because letters not fully prepaid in passing through the United States mail have been charged at the office of delivery with double the deficient postage. The question having been referred to the Attorney-General, he has decided that letters not fully prepaid at the time of mailing should not be charged with double the deficient postage, but only with the actual balance not prepaid.

The usual spring alarm has come a little ahead of its time. Peach-growing districts send out the news that peaches will be a scarce article this year. The report is received with stolid indifference.

Cases have been recently developed in Boston where working-women have been cruelly imposed upon by the injustice of their employers. In view of facts brought to light, a meeting was convened in Boffin's Bower for the purpose of devising some means of relieving working-women from these hardships. A statement of individual cases was made by Miss Collins, and resolutions were passed calling upon the public to refuse patronage to those who did not deal justly with their employées.

Boston contributes one hundred and eighty families to the colony about to settle in the Neosho Valley, in Kansas. Seventy thousand acres of land are set apart to be occupied by new settlers.

We are likely to think that in those parts of the country where the thermometer falls to 10° or 15° below zero there must be terrible suffering. So, doubtless, there is in cases of special exposure. But where the atmosphere is dry, intense cold is far more endurable, and even pleasant, than a much higher temperature accompanied by damp, raw east winds. A Quebec paper speaks of delicate women and children going out for their daily promenade when the thermometer marks 10°, 20°, and even 30° below zero without experiencing any injury or special discomfort. But penetrating east winds and the damp atmosphere arising from rapidly evaporating snow chill one effectually.

In Vienna a school has been opened to instruct girls in type-setting. There are about one hundred pupils, a teacher being assigned to every twenty.

An experienced florist says that few house plants can endure the high, dry temperature of most of our living-rooms during the winter. The temperature should not be allowed, so far as the plants are concerned, to go above sixty-five in the daytime. The main thing to be considered in keeping house plants in health is to secure an even, moist atmosphere, and freedom from dust.

A lady of Pittsfield, Massachusetts, recently received by an expressman a box containing a set of costly furs. Supposing they were sent by some dealer for examination, she declined to receive them, saying she had a similar set. As the story goes, she dreamed that night that her own furs had been stolen. Investigation proved that her furs were really gone. She sent to the express office, obtained the box, and recognized her own property. This seems to be a case of conscience.

Foreign journals speak of a marriage of unusual interest which lately was celebrated at Trieste, the parties being Mr. Arthur Sassoon, of London, and Mlle. Louisa Eugenia Perugia, the belle of Trieste. In the middle of one of the magnificent saloons in the house of the bride's uncle was placed a canopy of white silk, under which stood the bride and bridegroom, with the rabbis, the choir behind, and the relatives to the number of one hundred and fifty all around. The bridegroom wore the white fringed scarf usual at prayer, and the men retained their hats, in imitation of the Eastern custom of covering the head with the turban. The bride's brothers held long tapers. The marriage ceremony varied a little from the Oriental rite, some European usages being admitted. The whole service was in Hebrew. When the ceremony was over the company sat down to a magnificent déjeuner, such as might be given in Paris, and which was laid out in a splendid saloon of white and gold. Short and cordial speeches were made in English, French, Italian, and German.

The bride's dress was exquisite and simple. It consisted of a robe of white satin, with petits volants of satin, and flounces of Valenciennes; a train of white moiré, with a guirlande of orange flowers all around it; a corsage of white satin, trimmed with Valenciennes and bouquets of orange flowers. She wore a crown of orange flowers, which fell behind like a garland amidst the dark curls clustering upon her shoulders, and a large tulle veil covered her from head to foot. The sole ornament was a rivière of diamonds (her husband's gift), and which could not have cost less than £10,000. The lovely, fresh young face looked almost too childish for its important necklace. The bride-maids wore pink and white.

The Vienna Exposition is to receive a specimen of the colored marble of California from a manufacturer of San Francisco. The block, which is one foot wide and eighteen inches long, is now on exhibition in that city. It weighs 275 pounds, and is of a beautiful tortoise-shell color. The colored marbles of California are of superior beauty, and are said to be preferred by Italians to the marbles of their own country. It is sold by the pound in Italy, and used in veneering.

A bill recently passed the House of Representatives authorizing a company, chartered by the State of New York, to lay a telegraphic cable between America and Asia. The provision is made that the United States government shall furnish as many vessels as shall be required for laying the cable, and shall also make the necessary soundings.

A burlesque history of Napoleon III., illustrated with numerous plain and colored plates, is to be published in one hundred numbers, at ten centimes each.

Medusa, as conceived by Miss Hosmer, the artist, is a character quite different from that presented by most modern sculptors. Instead of making the representation so repulsive with her writhing hair that no one can look upon it without horror, the figure has a fascinating beauty which seems to make it popular, for the artist has received many orders from all quarters for the head of Medusa. Miss Hosmer is still at Rome.

It may not be generally known that the oleander, which is a favorite plant, is extremely poisonous. Instances are given in medical works of children who had eaten small fragments which had been clipped from the oleander, and the result was very nearly fatal. When handled in a close room a certain benumbing effect is often experienced. The United States Dispensatory states that the French peasantry used the powdered bark of the oleander as a poison for rats.

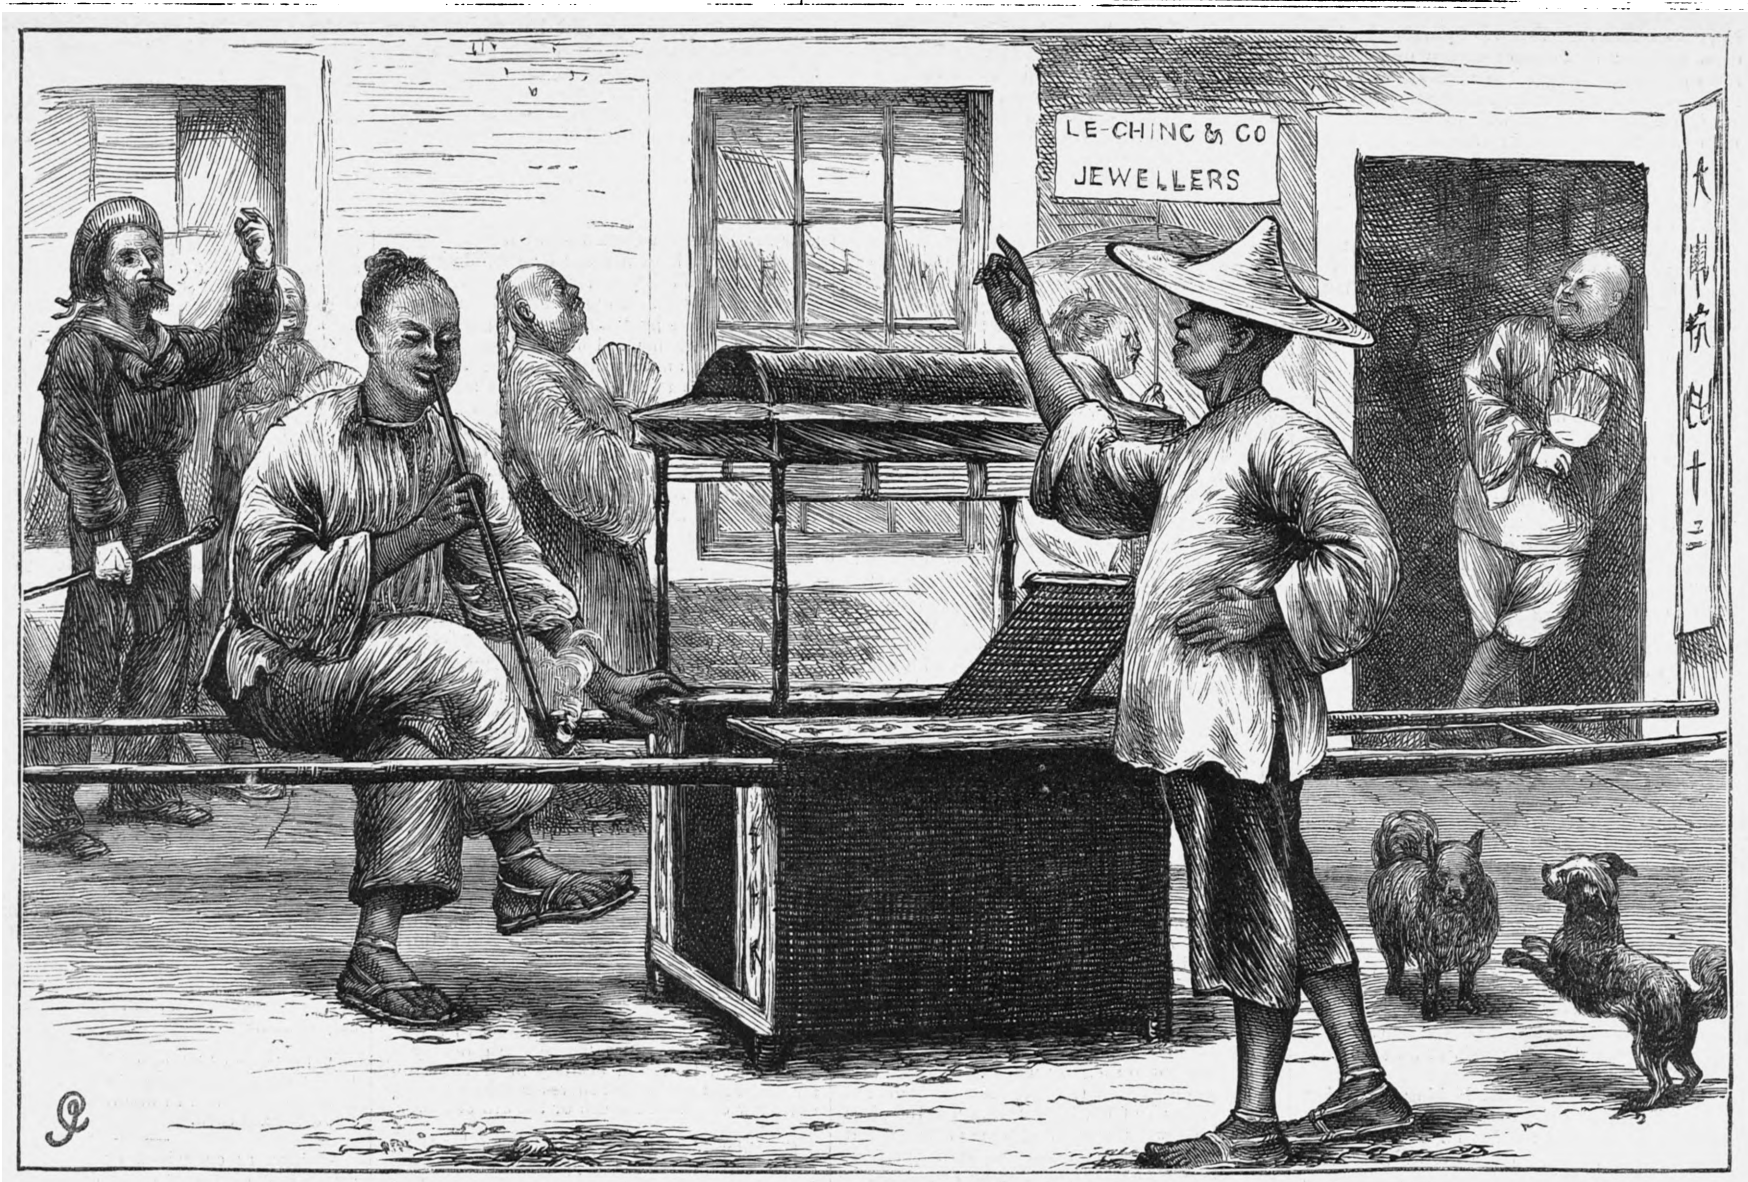
The Khedive of Egypt is about to send out a company of five thousand men to explore Africa. The ostensible object of the expedition is to go into that part of the country where Dr. Livingstone is supposed to be, and co-operate with him if he desires. Otherwise they will undertake to explore the country in hope of discovering something new about the sources of the Nile.

The Working-Women's Protective Union, organized in 1863 and incorporated in 1868, was established to meet the great need which working-women experienced of legal protection. Defrauded as they often were by heartless employers, there existed no efficient means for their defense and redress. Through the instrumentality of the managers of the union and their associates legal gentlemen have been employed to prosecute suits for unpaid labor, and to redress frauds and impositions, women have been assisted in their search for employment, employers have been appealed to for shorter hours and more just payment, and the community has been urged to lend a helping hand to the working-woman in her life-struggles. Moreover, the union has procured the enactment of a special law for the payment of wages due to working-women, coupled with punishment for those who willfully defraud them. Among the methods adopted by this association for the benefit of the working-woman is that of temporary loans. These loans have been made only to meet immediate and peculiar necessities—sometimes ten cents for a breakfast, sometimes three or four dollars to get clothing from the pawnbroker, and sometimes a larger sum to aid in buying a sewing-machine. These loans have extended over a period of four years, and it is believed by the treasurer that not a single cent has been lost in making them, though they were made without pledges of any kind.

No less than 2267 prosecutions have been made on behalf of working-women by the union. The larger portion of the sums recovered by legal proceedings has been in very small amounts. In some instances the working-woman's savings of many years—her entire fortune, amounting to two or three hundred dollars—have been recovered, and in others it has been her thread-money—only twenty or thirty cents—out of which she had been shamefully cheated. In both cases, by the enforcement of regular legal proceedings, begun and carried through by the union at its own expense, and entirely without cost to working-women, the sums due were obtained.

The Working-Women's Protective Union, located at 38 Bleecker Street, is supported by contributions from those interested in sustaining it. The expenses amount to about $3500 per year. A building fund is now in progress, and the board of directors hope eventually to secure such an endowment as will render it a permanent and self-sustaining institution.

Hosted by Google



LIFE IN CHINA—A HONG-KONG CHAIR.

LIFE IN CHINA.

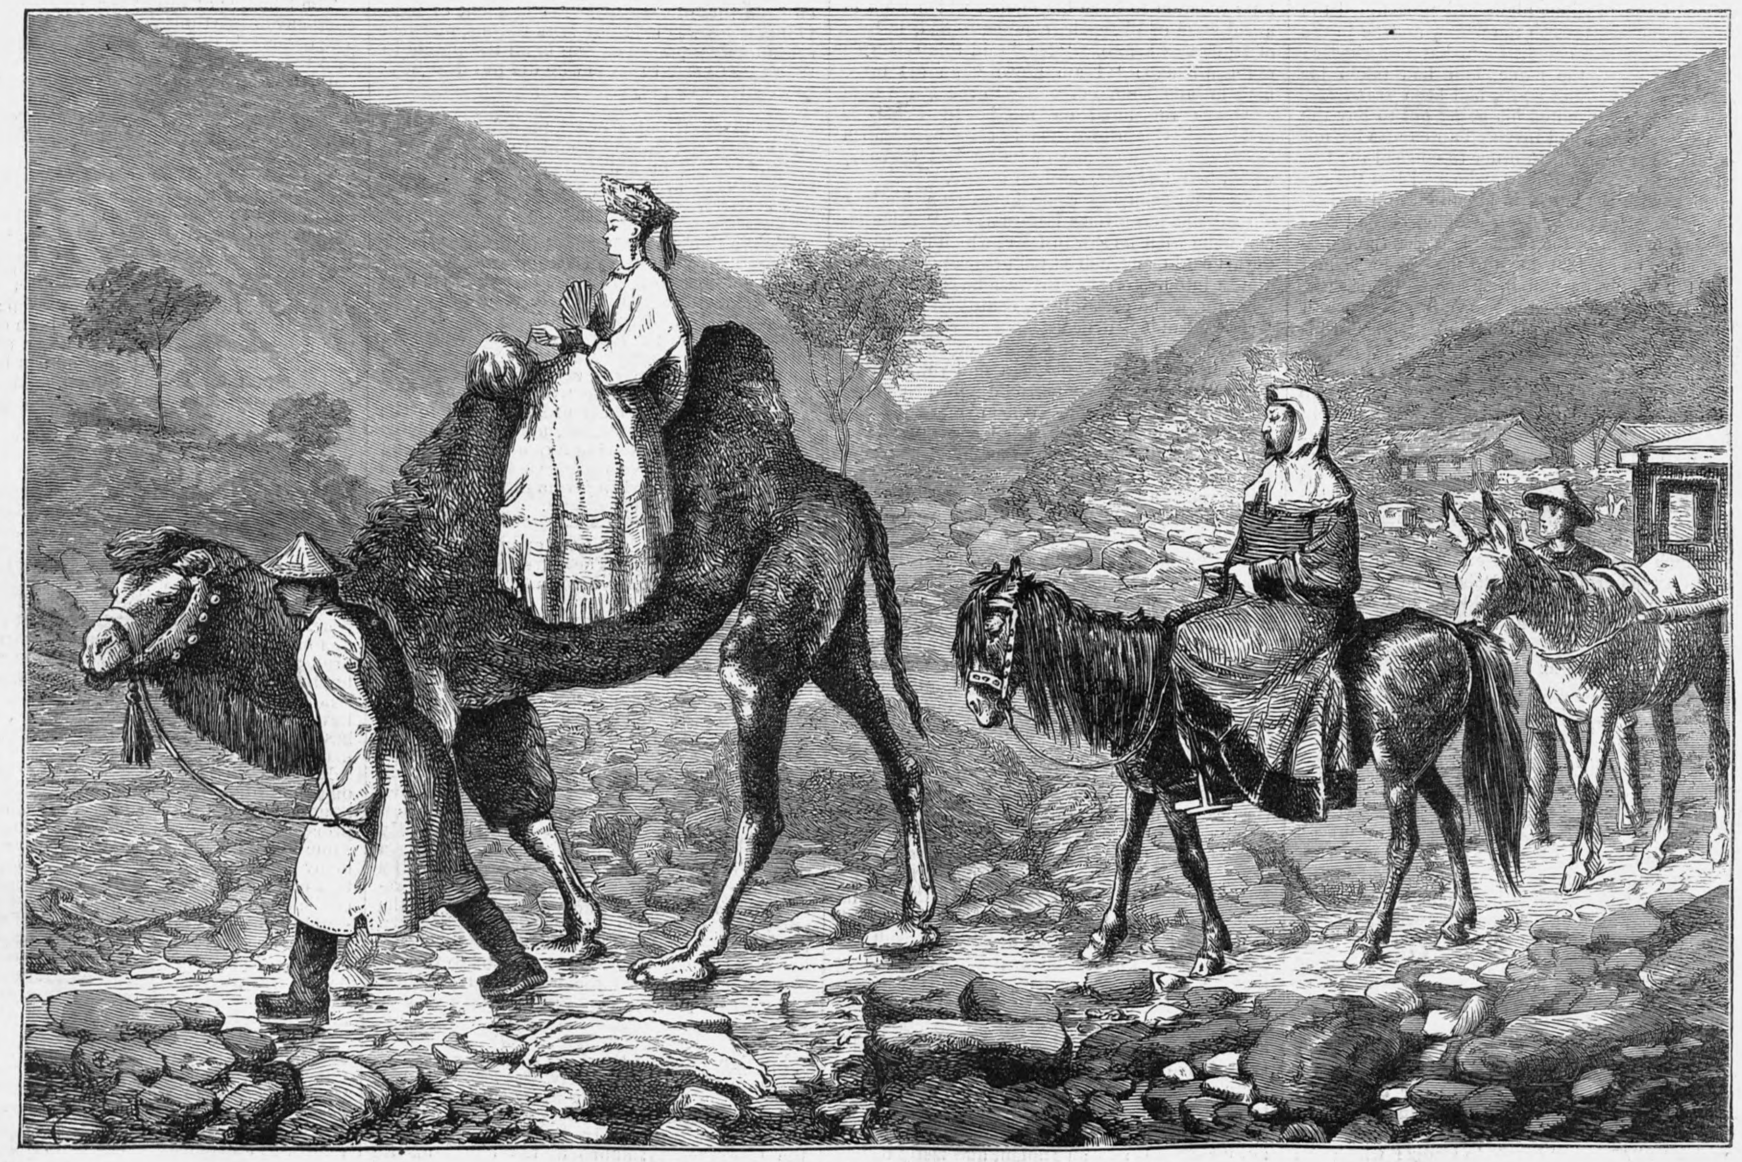
A HONG-KONG CHAIR.

A STRANGER landing at Hong-Kong is at once known by the public chair coolies who surround him, and cut off his advance with a crescent of chairs on the wharf. If the stranger be at all a timid person, he will conclude from the barrier of chairs drawn up in front, the wild gestures of the half-dressed, ferocious-looking coolies, that in the interests of self-preservation he must at once either retire to the boat or consign himself to the care of the first chair-bearers. It may be, in spite of remonstrances, and before he has time to reflect, he will find himself in a sedan on the shoulders of two Chinamen, who are bearing him off to the hotel. These sedan-chairs of Hong-Kong take the place of the cabs of European cities, and also of private conveyances, as the residents who can afford the luxury keep private chairs and bearers who are dressed in a kind of livery. The public chairs and bearers are licensed by government, each chair having attached to it a board bearing a printed form of legal tariff. There are chair stands in front of the places of public resort, and at the wharfs and corners of the principal streets, where the bearers keep a sharp look-out for profitable customers, such as sailors from the men-of-war or merchant ships in the harbor, who, when they have a run ashore, spend a considerable portion of their pay in hiring a chair to carry them about for the day.

The chair coolies make it their business to obtain a knowledge of the habits of the residents: a new-comer has only to be about a month in the place when his habits, his residence, and the houses which he is accustomed to visit will be so thoroughly known, that after a late dinner he has only to step into the first chair to assure his being set down before his own door without a word having been exchanged. Next morning his bearers of the previous night will appear just as he is going to office, to receive their hire from the boy in waiting.

TRAVELING IN CHINA—MONGOLS GOING TO PEKIN.

The traffic from Mongolia to Kalgan, through the Nankow Pass, always increases toward the end of the year. When the winter has fairly set in the Mongols come down from the steppes in great numbers, bearing supplies of frozen game and other produce for the markets in Pekin. They also supply the capital with sheep, pigs, and ponies, which they bring down in immense



TRAVELING IN CHINA—MONGOLS GOING TO PEKIN.

Hosted by Google

herds from their distant pasture lands. Brick tea is sent in return to the Mongolian steppes, where it is not only used in great quantities, but forms the currency in Mongolia, and overland into Siberia. The illustration represents a Mongol family on its way to the capital, or rather to the Mongol quarter of Pekin, situated at the rear of the British legation. It is curious there to observe the thoroughly nomadic tendencies of the race. They frequently hire houses of the Chinese, which they do not occupy, preferring to live in tents in the open court in front.

"FIRST MATE."

THIS pretty picture depicts a feature in London river life which is fast fading away before the advance of modern civilization, with its steamers and their crews of the masculine gender. The slow-gliding, broad-beamed barges, with their copper-colored or saffron-tinted sails, that float lazily along the Thames, usually have for their chief officer a buxom dame like the one represented in the engraving, and who assists her husband, father, or brothers in navigating the craft. And who would not aspire to the honor of commanding the Polly or the Nelly with the chance of having under his orders such a fascinating first mate as this! Not that she is a girl who would stand any nonsense. Observe the muscularity of her arms. A snob who should offer any liberties would speedily find himself hors de combat, struggling in the muddy river. But observe also the tea equipage, the friendly jackdaw at her feet, and, above all, the tranquil smile of content on her lip. Depend on it, she is a good girl, and if there be any Tom Tug, plying at Blackfriars or Chelsea or serving on board a citizen steamer, on the look-out for a suitable helpmate, here is the fair one to serve his purpose. The scene, as above sketched, is laid on the Thames, and the barge has just been steered through Battersea Bridge.

"FIRST MATE."

FEATHERS AND DOWN.

THE principal feathers entering into commerce in any quantity are those of the ostrich, vulture (so called), egret, osprey, cock, goose, swan, turkey, and peacock. The chief downs are eider-down, goose-down, swan's-down, and estridge or ostrich-down. The feathers and down of many other birds are used, but are of less importance. Crow-quills are in some slight demand for coiffures, and for etching and writing. Goose-quills for writing have been largely superseded by the cheaper and now generally employed steel pen.

Hosted by Google

THE TURQUOISE RING.

By Bethune's banks, in days of courtoisie,
There lived a young and gallant chevalier;
Save lance and charger brave no wealth had he,
But served, like gentle knight, his mistress dear.
To her he cried,
One morn in pride,
"Brave news! Once more our barons bold uprear
'Gainst England's power their glorious banners fair!

"Dear France's right may God for aye maintain,
And bless the knight who combats for his king!
Whilst thou, my lady-love, shalt still retain
In pledge of my fond faith this turquoise ring,
Its azure blue
Shall keep its hue
With Hubert's life; but should its brightness wane,*
Weep for thine own true knight in battle slain."

Some gentle tears the lady shed, as o'er
The knight's cuirass her snow-white scarf she tied;
And on her flushing cheeks the tints she bore
Of love's fond grief and woman's nobler pride.
Then bending low
To saddle bow,
He kissed her brow, and vowed his cry should be,
"Sweet Lady Claire, for honor, love, and thee!"

As down the forest glade at early dawn
Her parting knight pricks on his gallant steed,
His weeping dame still watches from the lawn,
As fading form and footfalls faint recede,
Till pennon light
And plume snow-white
No longer waving on the morning air,
She looks to heaven and breathes her fondest prayer.

Three years the Eastern ring shone pure and bright;
Three years for honor, love, and lady fair
Sir Hubert fought, till tidings came at night—
Sad tidings from the battle-field—to Claire.
She knew too well
What page could tell.
"The ring! the fatal ring!" she, fainting, cried;
Beheld the azure's fading hue, and died.

(Continued from No. 9, page 140.)

LONDON'S HEART.

By B. L. FARJEON,

Author of "Blade-o'-Grass," "Grif," and "Joshua Marvel."

CHAPTER XXXIX.—(Continued.)

ALFRED'S LAST CHANCE.

"If I thought you were deceiving me, Alf," said Mr. Sheldrake, "I should know what to do."

"What makes you speak in this way to me?" Alfred mustered up sufficient courage to ask. "If you doubt me, try me."

"I will. I was at your house to-day, as I have told you. I offered your grandfather assistance; he declined it. Both he and Lily were any thing but cordial to me. For the old man I don't care one jot; but he influences Lily, and has power over her. She follows the cue he gives her. The old man said they wanted for nothing; that they had a friend, who had come forward at the nick of time—a friend, said that railway man's little girl, that they all loved—old man, little girl, Lily, and all."

Mr. Sheldrake bit his lips at the remembrance of the blush which had come to Lily's cheek when Pollypod asked her if she didn't love this friend.

"Children talk all sorts of nonsense," said Alfred, "and Polly more than most children."

"Perhaps; but that isn't the question just now. Who is this friend, this paragon, this model of goodness, that every body loves?"

Alfred hesitated for one moment only. Felix had asked them, as a particular favor, not to mention his name as having befriended them, and they had given him the promise. But Alfred felt that to hesitate now, and to beat about the bush with Mr. Sheldrake in that gentleman's present humor, would be fatal to him. So he answered,

"His name is Felix Creamwell. He is an old acquaintance."

"I thought so; the same young cub who interrupted my conversation with Lily after we came from the theatre. What is the special tie that binds him to your people?"

This direct questioning of Felix's motive for befriending them staggered Alfred. It had never occurred to him before; and with the sudden introduction of the subject came a glimpse of light—a new revelation—which enabled him but dimly at present to place a possibly correct construction on Lily's unhappiness. Policy impelled him to reply,

"Friendship for my grandfather, I suppose."

But he stammered over the words, and Mr. Sheldrake said, sharply,

"You don't seem quite certain as to his motive, Alf."

"I know that there's a great friendship between him and my grandfather," said Alfred, and with a fuller consciousness of what was at stake; "and although I have never asked myself the question, I should say that what he has done has been prompted by friendship."

"Not by love?"

"Love for whom?" inquired Alfred, in his turn, with ready cunning.

"Well, let that pass," replied Mr. Sheldrake, only too willing not to have his doubts confirmed. "I dare say I can make the account even between us, if we ever come across each other. I know I can make it even with you. He has a motive, doubtless, and I don't believe in disinterested friendship. Now we will come to our own business." He took the papers which he had laid aside and looked over them. "You know what these are?"

"I see some of my bills among them."

"Accounts of money you owe me—dishonored bills and other documents equally valuable. Here is a bill for sixty pounds, due last week, dishonored. I have had it noted, and have obtained judgment upon it."

"What for?" asked Alfred, trembling.

"So as to be ready for you," said Mr. Sheldrake, coolly, "in case I find you are playing the double with me. It will be best for you to understand at once that I am in serious earnest. Miss Lizzie would not say many more uncivil things to me if she knew this. I suppose you couldn't tell me how much you owe me."

"I haven't kept an account."

"It being no business of yours. Well, I have, feeling interested in it, naturally; and what between me and Con Staveley, the debt is as near three hundred pounds as possible. Is it convenient to you to settle this small account?"

"You know it isn't," answered Alfred, with a groan; and added, entreatingly, "if you will advance me what you promised for the City and Suburban, I shall be able to pay you a good lump after the race."

"How if you lose?"

"I can't lose," cried Alfred; "I must win; I must. Even if I didn't do what I am going to do—even if I trusted entirely to chance—luck must turn. You have told me so yourself a dozen times. But I don't depend upon that."

"How much do you want?"

"Forty pounds;" and Alfred twined his fingers nervously. Indeed, it seemed to him, as it had seemed a dozen times in the course of the year gone by, that the result was a certainty, if he had only the money to back his opinion. "If I can but once get clear," he thought, not for the first time, "I'll never back another horse as long as I live—never, never!"

It was not his debt to Mr. Sheldrake that pressed so heavily upon him; there was a sharper and more terrible sword hanging over him.

"What horses would you back for this money, Alf?"

Alfred, encouraged by a tinge of the old cordiality in Mr. Sheldrake's tone, answered, confidently,

"Kingcraft and Xanthus. I would put ten pounds on Xanthus and twenty pounds on Kingcraft."

"And the other ten pounds?"

"I want that to speculate with on the race-course on the day of the race."

"No," said Mr. Sheldrake, in a decided tone, "I can't consent to that. I shall give you no money in hand to play ducks and drakes with."

"Well, then, I will put it all on Kingcraft and Xanthus—fifteen pounds on Xanthus and twenty-five on Kingcraft."

"What makes you fancy Kingcraft? Xanthus I know is good—all the papers speak up for him."

"Didn't Kingcraft win the Derby?" cried Alfred, excitedly. "I'm told that the horse has come back to his old form, and that he's certain to win. A man told me who knows all about it. The stable has been keeping it dark, and they're all going to put their money on. I shall be able to pay you every penny back, and I shall never know how to thank you enough. I've told Liz and Lily that no man ever had such a friend as you are to me, and I'll tell them again. Will you do it for me?"

"Let me see. The odds about Kingcraft are—"

"Fifteen to one," interposed Alfred, eagerly; "and six to one about Xanthus. I only back Xanthus to save myself. One or other is certain to pull off the race."

"Very well; I'll give you the odds myself."

"You will! You are a trump, and no mistake. How can I thank you! Are you making a book on the race?"

"Yes, and it will be better for you that I should take the bet rather than any body else; for then," he added, with a quiet chuckle, "the money will be safe."

"Yes, that it will," said Alfred, in all sincerity. "Fifteen to one to twenty-five pounds—that will be three hundred and seventy-five pounds if I win on Kingcraft, and ninety pounds if Xanthus wins."

He felt as if he had the larger sum already in his pocket, and the despair which filled him but a few minutes since was swallowed up in the false hope.

"I will send you the vouchers to-morrow, and now I want your voucher for this money that I am going to lend you."

Always willing enough to give his signature, Alfred waited, pen in hand, while Mr. Sheldrake drew up the paper. It was to the effect that Alfred had borrowed of him forty pounds with which he had backed two horses named for the City and Suburban Race, to be run at Epsom on Tuesday, 23d of April, and that he promised to pay back the money the Saturday after the race.

Alfred read it carelessly, and remarked, as he signed it,

"This is differently worded to any of the other things I have signed."

"I have a purpose in drawing it up in this way," said Mr. Sheldrake, as he folded the paper and placed it in his pocket-book. "This document and the protested bills would be awkward things to take to your employers, Messrs. Tickle & Flint, in case you didn't pay, or in case I found that you were playing me false, or in case of other contingencies I need not mention just now. It might induce them to make an immediate examination of the vouchers and books in your care. You are cashier there, I believe, Alf. A tempting thing is the handling of other people's money, Alf—a devilish tempting thing—when one is in debt and wants to get rich too quick."

"What do you mean?" cried Alfred, with such terror in his face and in his voice that Lizzie on the outside of the door was compelled to cling to the baluster for support. "For God's sake—"

"Don't agitate yourself, Alf," interrupted Mr. Sheldrake, with a smile. "I am only putting an extreme case. I hope I may not be driven to such a course. It depends more on others than on yourself. And now I think our little conference is ended. Any thing more to say? You shall have your vouchers to-morrow."

Lizzie glided down stairs noiselessly, and when, a few moments afterward, Mr. Sheldrake came down and shook hands with her, she accompanied him to the gate and wished him good-by with a smile on her lips, although her hand was like ice in his grasp.

"You've tamed that little devil, David," he mused, as he walked along: "she'll be twice as civil and polite the next time you meet her. Now, if Kingcraft pulls off the City and Suburban— Well, Con Staveley can give the odds. I'll tell Alfred that my book is full, and that, as I can't lay any more, I got Con to take his bets. And Con Staveley needn't pay if the horse wins."

Lizzie went back to Alfred, and found him racked by despair one moment, buoyed up by hope another. She went up to him and kissed him, saying, cheerfully,

"Am I not a good girl, Alf, for behaving so well to Mr. Sheldrake?"

"Yes, dear Liz, you are; I wish I were as good."

"Nonsense, dear; you're not strong-minded, that's all. And I don't think you love me enough."

"You mustn't say that, Liz. I love no other."

"I don't think you do, Alf; but if you loved me as well as I love you, you would not keep secrets from me."

He looked at her with sudden alarm.

"Secrets, Liz! Who told you I had secrets?"

"My heart," she replied, with a yearning look, and then, at sight of his troubled face, altered her tone as if she were schooling herself, and said, archly, "Girls are artful guessers. And I'm jealous."

"Of whom?"

"Of Mr. Sheldrake. You have been talking secrets with him up stairs; and I have a better right than he to share them with you. I hate that man!" she exclaimed, with flashing eyes. "There's nothing mean that he wouldn't do; he has a false heart, and his smooth words can't hide his bad thoughts. I saw in his face to-day what seems to be hidden from you. Oh, how I wish you had never known him!"

"It's of no use wishing, Liz. Perhaps it will all turn out for the best. Don't worry me, there's a dear! I want cheering up badly."

He laid his head upon the table wearily; his folly had made life very bitter to him. One of its sweetest blessings was his, and he had set it far below worthless things. As Lizzie's arms stole tenderly round his neck, and as her sweet words fell upon his ears, he was conscious that he had never rightly appreciated her love. He thought now how happy his life might be if he had been contented and honest, and if he had not yielded to temptation.

"Lizzie," he said, with his face hidden, "I have not acted rightly to you. If I could commence over again—"

"Nonsense, Alf," she interposed, in as cheerful a tone as she could command, for his remark, with the meaning it conveyed, brought the tears to her eyes. "I'll not allow you to speak like that. I should be satisfied if I could see you happier in your mind. You have some grief that you will not let me share, and that pains me. You seem to be frightened of something that you can not see. I have noticed that you have often been unconscious of what is passing, and seem to be listening— There! as you are now!"

He had risen to his feet with wild eyes, and was listening, with a terrible expression of fear in his face, to the sound of loud voices in the street. The speakers had stopped outside the house, and Alfred crept softly to the window. They passed away presently, and Alfred, with a sigh of relief, returned to Lizzie's side.

"What's the meaning of this, Alf?" she asked, with a fainting heart. "I have a right to know. Tell me."

"Not now," he replied, taking her cold hand and placing it on his forehead. "I dare not. If you love me, don't ask me questions. I have been foolish, and have not taken care of myself. It will be all right after next Tuesday, and we'll be happy again as we used to be. Come," he cried, with an attempt at gayety, facing her with his hands on her shoulders, "if you want to do me good, wish me luck next Tuesday."

"I wish you luck, dear, with all my heart."

"That's right, Liz; and when you go to bed pray that I may be lucky, my dear. For if I am, all this trouble will be over, and we'll commence a happy life—you and I and Lily. And we'll tell our secret then—our own secret, dearest, that no one knows but you and me."

He drew her on his lap, and she laid her head upon his shoulder. Something in his words made him the consoler now.

"It will have to be told soon, Alf dear, or it will tell itself," she said, in a tone in which joy and pain were subtly mingled.

"I know it, darling; and I've been working and trying hard to get money for you and me and Lil, and bad fortune has pursued me so steadily that I have been driven almost mad. Ah, Liz, I love you! You'll see how I love you when all this trouble comes to an end. And it will come to an end now that you've wished me luck, and will pray for it."

She pressed him in her arms, grateful for his calmer and tenderer mood.

"May I say something to you, dear?" she asked.

"Any thing, darling: kiss me first."

She kissed him, and he said, softly,

"What a pity it is that time will not stand still, isn't it, Liz? Now, if we could be like this for a long, long time, what happiness it would be! I almost feel as if I should like to die now, with you in my arms. What is it you want to say, darling?"

"Something about Lily."

"Dear Lily! Go on."

"Have you noticed that Mr. Sheldrake has been paying her a great deal of attention?"

"I think he likes her, Liz."

"You think! You know, you mean. But, Alf, if I had a sister that I loved as you love Lily, and who loved me as Lily loves you, I would rather see her in her grave than see her placed as Lily is now."

"Lizzie!"

"I mean what I say, Alf, and you ought to have seen it more clearly before. Do you believe that Mr. Sheldrake has any honorable intentions in his open admiration for Lily?"

"If I thought otherwise—" cried Alfred, hotly.

"What would you do?" interrupted Lizzie; "what could you do, placed as you are with that man? He has been working for this, Alf dear, and you haven't seen it. So deep and true is Lily's love for you that if he were to say to her, 'I have your brother in my power, and I can bring misery and shame upon him, and will if you are cold to me!'—if he were to say this to Lily in his own bad way, and work upon her loving heart in his own bad way—oh, Alfred, I could almost pray that some one would kill him! —if he were to do all this, as he may, I tremble to think what Lily would do."

"What would she do?" The words came faintly from a throat parched by remorse.

"Can you ask, Alf? What would I do for you? To secure your happiness is there any sacrifice that I would not make? Lily's love for you, although it is the love of a sister, is not less strong than mine. But I have learned harder lessons than Lily has had to learn, and I should not be so easily led as she would be. A bad, calculating man, as Mr. Sheldrake is, could work upon such a simple nature as hers more easily than upon mine. I should be strong where she, through innocence and simplicity, would be weak. And when she felt, as she would feel, that any sacrifice of happiness which she would be called upon to make would be made to secure the happiness of a beloved brother—"

"Stop, Lizzie!" cried Alfred, rising in his agitation, and turning from her. "Stop, for God's sake! I have been blind!"

Yes, he had been blind; and blindly had walked, step by step, to the terrible abyss which lay before him now, deliberately taking with him a pure, devoted girl, whom, despite all his selfishness, he loved next in the world to Lizzie. All the sweet memories of his life, until he met Lizzie, were of his sister, and he had conspired against her happiness. He was powerless now to undo the past, but he might atone for it. He silently swore that if he were fortunate on Tuesday he would become a better man.

"I have something else to tell you, Alfred," said Lizzie, after a long pause. "Lily is in love."

"In love! Ah, I see more clearly now, dear Lizzie. With Felix?"

"Yes. A happy life is before her, with that true man, if happily they come together."

"And he?"

"Loves her."

"Has he told you?"

"No; but there are things that need no telling. We women know. He has not spoken to her, because—because—"

"Go on, Lizzie."

"Because he sees what you have been blind to, and out of the nobleness of his heart will not add to her distress."

"It would have been better for her," groaned Alfred, "and for you, if I had never been born."

"Nay," remonstrated Lizzie, in a gentle, loving tone, "we must not repine: we must try to do better. Promise—and I will help you, with all my strength, and so will Lily and Felix—ah, you don't know what a heart he has! And your grandfather, Alfred, that good old man—"

"I know what you would say about him, Lizzie. I am punished enough already."

Indeed, he was very humble and repentant, and when he went home he knocked at his grandfather's door. It was dusk, and they could but dimly see each other's faces.

"I have come to ask your forgiveness, Sir," said Alfred.

Old Wheels started to his feet in joyful agitation. He understood it all immediately.

"My dear boy," he said, with a sob, taking Alfred's hand. "Not another word; not another word!"

He pressed the young man to his heart and kissed him. Lily, hearing the voices, came into the passage.

"Come here, Lily," cried old Wheels. "Come here, dear child!"

Lily flew into the room, and after the joy that this glad meeting brought to them they settled down quietly, and talked and thought and hoped, while the evening shadows deepened. The tender movements she made toward Alfred and her grandfather, the expressions of exquisite happiness she uttered, almost unconsciously, every now and then, the loving caresses, the musical little laughs, the words, "Oh, I am so happy now! so happy!" that escaped again and again like music from her lips, delighted the old man.

"We want Lizzie here," said old Wheels, tenderly.

"And Felix," thought Lily. This reunion seemed to bring Felix nearer to her.

* It is still believed by many that this Persian mineral, first introduced to Europe by the Crusaders, changes color and fades considerably with the serious illness of its wearer.

Hosted by Google

CHAPTER XL.

ON EPSOM DOWNS.

"PRAY that I may be lucky, my dear."

Alfred had spoken these words to Lizzie with fullest meaning. He did not ask for a wish—he asked for a prayer. He was not himself given to praying, but on this night before he went to bed he knelt at his bedside for the first time for many, many months, with a distinct devotional purpose in his mind, and prayed with all his mental might that Kingcraft, the horse he had backed, would win the City and Suburban race on the following Tuesday.

He remained at his devotions for fully a quarter of an hour, and had his grandfather seen him in his attitude of contrition, the old man would indeed have been comforted. But during this quarter of an hour no entreaty for forgiveness of folly and crime passed Alfred's lips. Remorse he felt, but it was the remorse born of fear. Every form of prayer with which he had been familiar in childhood was unconsciously made subservient to his present purpose. His one prayerful thought shaped in silence by his lips was, "I pray with all my soul that Kingcraft may win the City and Suburban. Let Kingcraft win, O Lord! I pray that Kingcraft may win! Kingcraft! Kingcraft! Win the race! Win the race!" He transposed these words in a hundred different ways, and thought them with as much agonizing intensity as the most righteous saint could have done. When he rose to his feet he felt strengthened by the charm he had laid upon himself. He felt that nothing could prevent Kingcraft from winning; and he already began to look ahead beyond the day when, with the money he would receive, he could set himself free, and begin again. Already his better resolutions were beginning to be weakened by the prospect of large gains easily obtained. He argued with himself as he had done scores of times before. There was no harm in betting; there was only harm in losing. If there were any harm in it, would the newspapers encourage it? It was reading the newspapers that first put the idea into his head; what followed had followed naturally. He had been unlucky, that was all. Well, luck would turn now. Why, here! he would prove that luck would turn. He did, as he had often done. Once again he wrote on separate pieces of paper the names of the horses that were likely to run in the race; he folded them up separately, and shook them in his hat; he shut his eyes, and putting his hand among the papers, fumbled with them until he selected one. He drew it forth and opened it. Kingcraft! There was a plain proof. How could the horse lose after that? He laughed gleefully, and would not entertain the thought that he had purposely written the name of this horse on a larger piece of paper than the others, so that he might be sure of drawing out the one he wanted. He went to bed, and dreamed of the race. The whole of the familiar scene passed before him in his dream: he had staked a lot of money on Kingcraft, and he saw the horse sailing past the winner's post an easy winner, and found himself the winner of a thousand pounds. "Why not?" he asked of himself as he awoke, exultant; "why shouldn't I win a thousand pounds? If I could borrow money somehow, I could pay it back at once. No one would know, and we should all be happy." He read the daily newspapers eagerly, and sucked fresh hope and renewed incentives from them. The papers said that Kingcraft was in blooming health; that the stable believed in him; that a fine jockey was to ride him to probable victory; and that the public were backing him. Even, thought Alfred, in his endeavors to come to a fair conclusion, even if Kingcraft should by some strange and unaccountable chance not come in first, what horse was to beat him? For, notwithstanding the honest and upright manner in which the national sport is carried on, strange and unaccountable occurrences do sometimes occur, and roguery does occasionally triumph. Well, what horse would win if Kingcraft came in second instead of first? Xanthus, of course: Xanthus, the horse that was rising daily in popular favor. Were not all the honest and disinterested tribe of prophets and tipsters warning their miserable public to look after him? Said one, "Xanthus must not be lost sight of;" said another, "Keep Xanthus on the right side;" said another, "Put a bit on Xanthus;" said another, a cautious prophet, who never allowed himself to be caught tripping, "But—if—notwithstanding—nevertheless—such or such a thing occurred to Bertram—or if Pax is not what is represented—or if a mistake has been made in Marmora's trial—or if Phosphorus gets off badly—or if Kingcraft has entirely lost his old form—or if, notwithstanding and nevertheless, with half a dozen other horses—why, then, keep your eye on Xanthus; he may be dangerous." With what zest and animation did Alfred read the words of these inspiring writers! How attentively he studied their elegant English, and read their prophecies again and again! They all spoke well of Kingcraft, but none gave the horse as the absolute winner. Well, but was not Alfred as good a judge as any of them? Had not the secret been revealed to him, as it was to Daniel, in a night-vision? But the course of reading such worshipers as he go through is of an intensely distracting nature, and Alfred could not be blind to the fact that there were other horses that might have a chance. If he only had some money to back these horses, and to back Kingcraft and Xanthus to be first, second, or third in the race, winning would be an absolute certainty, beyond the possibility of doubt. On Saturday morning he rushed to the sporting papers, and read dozens of columns concerning the race. Some of the most respectable and reputable of these papers gave Xanthus as the winner, coupling him, however, in most instances, with other horses. Alfred was tortured by doubt—now thinking this, now that, until his mind was in a whirl of bewilderment over the miserable affair. Other papers gave other horses as the certain winners. One said Pax or Bertram would win; another, Pax or Bridgewater; another, Bertram or Hector; and so on and so on; and Alfred had not backed one of these horses. If either of them won, he was ruined past redemption. But his favorite prophet had to speak yet—a prophet whose name was in every backer's mouth. On Monday morning this prophet would unbosom himself, and Alfred determined to wait till then before he decided his course of action. He went down by train to his office, and on Monday morning he read the deliverances of his favorite prophet as he sat in the railway carriage. The prophecy recorded with an appearance of satisfaction that backers of certain horses who had made their bets weeks ago had burned their fingers, as the horses they had backed would not run in the race. The horse named Pax, who held the position of first favorite, had been backed heavily in every part of the country by those connected with the stable. The owner, it was said, having played a waiting game with his horse, now intended to win a fortune with him. Alfred's prophet declared he did not believe in Pax, although, after the usual fashion of prophets, he put in a saving clause in a few words which he could quote by-and-by, in proof of his own sagacity, in case the horse won. He pinned his faith, after much wavering, on Xanthus and Bertram, chiefly on the former, and in an elaborate and confusing summing up declared, in capital letters, that one of these must win, and that either Kingcraft or Marmora would be certain to be among the first three. Alfred was much excited by the hopes held out in this prophecy, and with some difficulty obtained from his employers leave of absence for the following day. He had not been too attentive to his duties lately, and his employers demurred at first, but he pleaded the fire that had taken place in Soho, and said that his sister and grandfather required his assistance to set their new home in order. "You shall have no cause to complain of me after this," he said, humbly, and received a reluctant assent to absent himself from his duties. He stopped at the office later than usual that evening, and was very careful and painstaking in what he did. Early in the morning he was up and away. He had told Lizzie that he was going to the races, but had made her promise not to let any one know. Lily and old Wheels supposed he was going to his office as usual, and they stood at the window watching him with smiling faces. Lily kissed her hand to him as he looked back, and he waved his gayly toward the window, and smiled brightly.

"A great change has come over him," said old Wheels, thoughtfully, "for the better, thank God. It makes you happier, Lily."

"Yes, dear, and you too. Things seem brighter and happier than they did a little while ago. He is coming back to us!"

She ran down stairs, and old Wheels followed her. Alfred was at the door.

"I've come back to give you another kiss," he said; "you looked so pretty standing at the window, that I could not help it."

"Prettier than Lizzie?" she asked, saucily and affectionately.

"As pretty, I do believe," he replied, gayly, and shook hands with old Wheels, whose face, notwithstanding its kind expression, had a trace of seriousness in it.

"Isn't he good?" asked Lily, as she and old Wheels stood at the gate. "Dear Alf! See! He's running into Lizzie's house, and Lizzie's opening the door for him!"

"I have had such nice dreams about you," said Lizzie, as she stood in the passage with Alfred's arm around her.

He laughed blithely, and took her face between his hands, and kissed her lips seven times.

"Because seven's a lucky number, Liz," he said.

"Oh, that's the reason!" she cried, with a little toss of her head.

"Yes," he replied, merrily, "and not because I love you the least bit in the world. Here's seven more—and seven more—three times seven."

And, the charm being complete, he pressed her in his arms again, and darted away.

There was something more than idle meaning in his words; in the excited state of his mind he was impelled to place an important construction upon every little incident that occurred. It was not merely an affectionate impulse that caused him to turn back and kiss Lily again. Something seemed to whisper to him, "If you don't go back you will be unlucky to-day;" and if he had resisted the impulse, he would have fretfully made that the cause of any ill luck that might befall him. In the same manner, he kissed Lizzie the number of times which seemed to him to bear the most fortunate significance. In this way he strove to make assurance doubly sure, and drew the most favorable auguries from his attention to these details, connecting them, with strange sophistry, with the great stake he was about to play. Once as he walked he passed under a ladder, and the thought occurring to him that it was an unlucky omen, he retraced his steps, so as to undo the evil consequences that might result from his act, and walked outside the ladder the second time, and congratulated himself upon his wisdom. When he was in the train that was to convey him to Epsom he bought the newspapers containing the last outpourings of his favorite prophet upon the City and Suburban race. He read a glowing account of the appearance of the course, of "straggling gypsy women wandering about," of "knots of men in the middle of the road, or leaning against the public-house corners, talking in quiet and almost solemn tones, which indicated that they were absorbed in considerations much more important to them than racing—the means of living from hand to mouth, of which one sees so much on the turf." He read how one individual "in the centre of these groups, foot-sore, wretched, ragged, and deplorable, had formerly been a tout in highly prosperous circumstances, and absolutely won close upon £1500 when Blair Athol won the Derby;" and how this unfortunate man was "exciting the compassion of his almost equally forlorn companions by narrating how he had walked, or rather crawled, for weeks by road from Liverpool, as nigh starving as makes no matter." He read how the mysterious horse known as Pax was conveyed to the scene of action in high state in a "private van drawn by four gray horses;" and how his owner and backers, confident of victory, declared, in racing phraseology, that the horse would "walk in." This and much more Alfred read, and then came to the kernel—the prophecy—which stated that Pax, Xanthus, Bertram, Kingcraft, or Phosphorus would be certain to win, and that of the five Xanthus, Bertram, and Kingcraft were the three upon which this wise prophet pinned his faith. Alfred looked round triumphantly. The carriage in which he was seated was crowded, and the occupants were reading the prophets' predictions in the newspapers with avidity. Alfred, fingering some crisp bank-notes in his pocket, soon made up his mind as to his course of action. He had twenty new £5 bank-notes, and these he would judiciously invest upon all five of the horses named by his favorite prophet, backing them all to win and to be in the first three, in such proportions as to be certain to win. He took pencil and paper from his pocket, and made his calculations: so much upon one horse, so much upon another, and so much upon the others, at the current odds. Against one of the horses named—Phosphorus—he could get as much as forty to one. He would put £20 upon this horse, so as to gain £800 if the horse won. He gloried at the thought of it! By the time the train reached Epsom he had made his calculations, and had determined so to invest that he could win from a hundred to nearly a thousand pounds. "How happy I shall be to-night," he thought, "with the money in my pocket! I'll be at the office early in the morning to make every thing straight, and then—" The perspective that stretched itself out in his imagination was too delightfully vague for words or distinct thought. It contained a hazy vista of delight, and in this he basked, and saw Lizzie and himself, and Lily and Felix perhaps, the happiest of the happy.

It was a bright clear morning, and a fresh breeze was blowing over the Surrey Downs. Gypsies, beggars, thieves, sharpers, and others of that ilk were about and on the alert, and Alfred moved briskly through them to the scene of action. Every species of rascaldom was there represented, and the noble sport afforded a lawful outlet for roguery in every shape—for roguery in broadcloth as well as roguery in fustian. There was something hideous in the Babel of sound round the betting men, and every thing that was degrading in the features which presented themselves most prominently to the senses. The first race was a race between two horses, and was in no respects interesting. Alfred paid no attention to it, nor to the two races which followed. He was too busy "getting his money on" for the great event of the day, which was the fourth on the card. He staked his money with men whom he considered to be good—that is, "sufficient," as Shylock has it—and when the bell rang to announce the appearance of the horses on the course he had but five shillings left. But his pockets would soon be filled. His mind was thronged with intricate calculations as to how much he would win if this horse that he had backed came in first and that second, or that first and this second; as to how much he would win under the most favorable circumstances, supposing three of his horses came in first, second, and third. Indeed, he worked himself into a state of belief that it was certain two of his horses would be first and second; and if fortune favored him out and out he would go home with twelve hundred pounds in his pocket. Losing was an impossibility. If a shadow of doubt intruded itself he banished it instantly by a reference to his prophet. Twelve hundred pounds! He parceled it out. So much to pay Mr. Sheldrake—so much to replace what he had "borrowed" from the office—so much left. There they were! All the horses were out, and the course was clear. Such bright colorings of jockeys' caps and jackets—such grand action from the beautiful creatures they bestrode—such confident smiles on some of the jockeys' lips—such eager scrutinizing on the part of anxious investors. There was Kingcraft—there Xanthus—there Bertram—there Phosphorus—there Pax, that was to bring any thing but peace to those who believed in him. Alfred had no eyes for any others. On these his hopes and salvation were staked. Away they went—thirty of them in all—in a gay line to the starting-post; and they pranced, and hung back or were held back by astute jockeys, or falsely started, for at least an hour. Alfred was ablaze with excitement, and was eating his heart away with impatience. Another false start—another—another. This torture of suspense was agonizing. At last they were off, and Alfred, craning forward, muttered the names of Lizzie and Lily for luck. Away they sailed over the hill to Tattenham Corner. In little more than two minutes the mile and a quarter was compassed, and there came in, first, Digby Grand; second, Lord Glasgow; third, Hector. Not one of the prophet's five horses was in the first three, and Alfred had not backed one of the winning horses for a penny. He put his hand to his forehead to clear away the mist; but it gathered upon him thicker and thicker. He could not distinguish a face in all the throng of persons around him. A man behind him placed his hand somewhat firmly on Alfred's shoulder, with the intention of passing him.

"No, no!" cried Alfred, hoarsely, cowering down. But the man passed on, not heeding him, and Alfred, hiding his face as well as he could, slunk through the crowd to the rear of the race-course, bearing in his face and manner the air of a hunted animal, with death on his track.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE ETIQUETTE OF MOURNING.

"THE etiquette of mourning!" exclaims one of my readers. "What can you mean? I do not see how a lady in deep mourning can be expected to observe the rules of etiquette at all."

No, dear madam, neither do I. All that society demands of a family in bereavement is a withdrawal for a time from the gayeties of the world—a step that would be prompted equally by one's own feelings and as a matter of taste, and would require no code of etiquette to enforce it. It is not, therefore, to the bereaved ones that I offer a few hints upon social observances, but to their circle of friends and acquaintances.

How soon calls of condolence are to be made is, in this country, I think, an open question, and is generally decided by one's inclination. French etiquette prescribes your card, with "Condoléances" written upon it, to be left in person or delivered by a servant, or at least sent through the post, the day after the announcement of the death. This fashion, if adopted here, would, I think, be found more agreeable for all parties than a personal call. You have shown your sympathy, and been spared an interview which could not but be distressing both to yourself and the bereaved ones. These card-calls, however, should never be delayed beyond a week, and ought to be made within three days.

I have known intimate friends to remain away a month, and sometimes even longer, and never manifest during that time the sympathy that they really felt in your bereavement. "I did not think that you would care to see any one," being the excuse subsequently made: a very poor excuse, I think, and any lady well versed in etiquette would, I am confident, feel it her duty to call and inquire after the sorrowing mother or orphan, whether she was admitted or not.

"I would have come sooner, but I never know what to say when making a visit of condolence," is another and a weaker excuse. It is often in attempting to condole with you that your friends unconsciously increase your sorrow, every word of their well-intended sympathy only recalling what is lost, and renewing all the past agony.

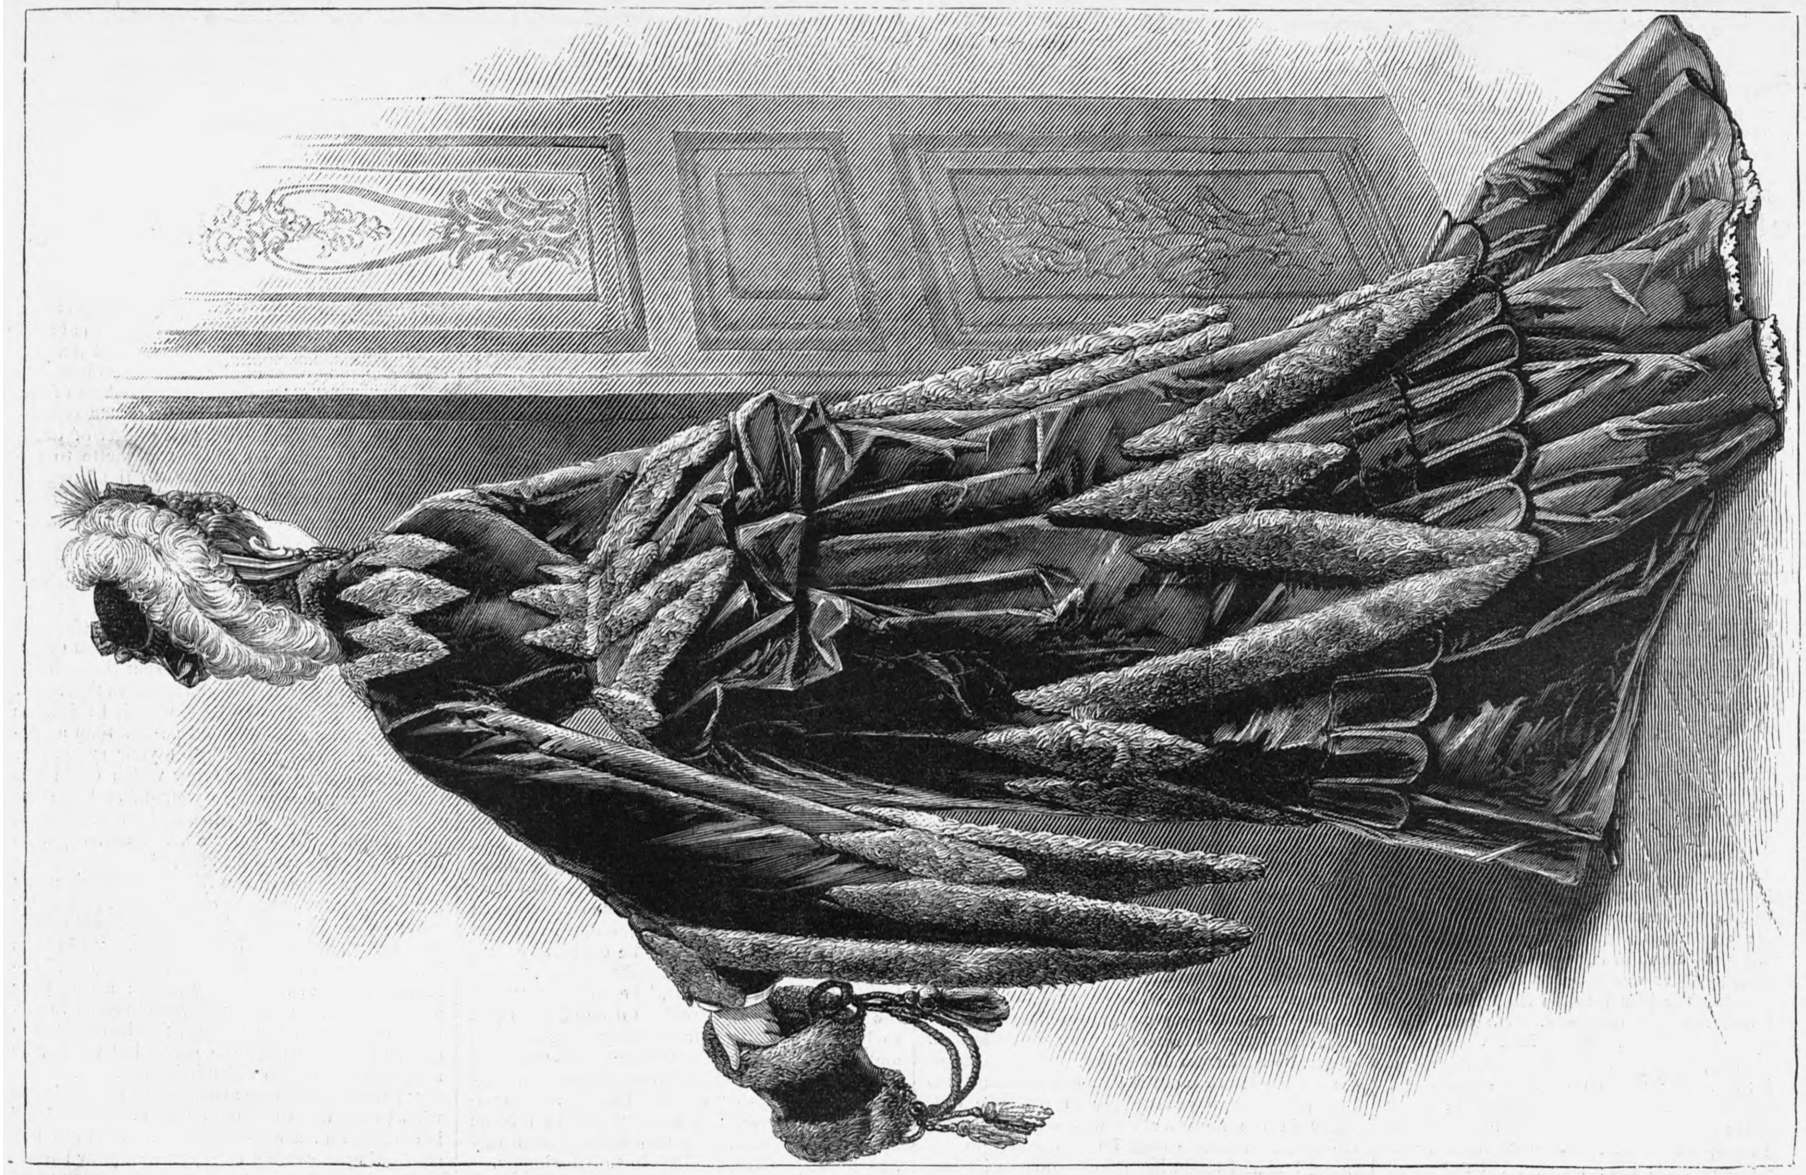
It is, I presume, very difficult for one to act naturally when making a visit to mourners; but if the slight embarrassment of the situation could be thrown aside, and the visitor could confine her expressions of sympathy to the fewest possible words, or, better still, omit them entirely, a bereaved young mother would not anticipate seeing her friends with such dread. Instinct quickly tells her that you feel with her in her sorrow for the loss of her baby, and a little conversation upon ordinary topics is much better for her health and spirits than the floods of tears, the woe-begone countenance, and frequent remarks of "Just the way I lost mine," in which ladies feel it their duty to indulge.

Almost equally to be deprecated is that straining to call up a ghastly smile, and the air of forced levity, with which some visitors endeavor to mask their nervousness and embarrassment, and which never deceives any one. If one can not act naturally, it is, I think, far better to remain at home, for ghastly smiles or depressing sympathy are neither agreeable nor beneficial to a person whose nerves are already distraught from severe mental suffering.

In our great metropolis the existence of a family in mourning is to all appearance partially forgotten or overlooked by the gay circle in which they held a pre-eminent position only one season since. Why should they be dropped now in the time of their sorrow? When the first sacred hours and days are over, and the agonized tears can no longer flow, surely a few little marks of remembrance and attention from the outside world can not be amiss, and may be quite grateful. No one, I fancy, would ever think of sending you invitations for their entertainments while you are in deep mourning, unless among the purely intellectual circles, where forms of etiquette are not scrupulously observed. "Why should we send them cards?" Mrs. S—— will say. "Miss B—— would surely not think of attending our party before she has left off crape collars!" No, I do not suppose she would; but at the same time it is never pleasant to feel that you are forgotten; and after the first shock of bereavement is over, and a slight interest in mundane affairs returns, as it must even to the saddest hearts, the receipt of cards for a ball or soirée may be quite an agreeable incident in the monotonous life of a mourner. Why they should not be sent as well here as abroad I can not imagine. You still exist, although you do not mingle in society; and it is only a mark of respect from your friends to recollect your existence by retaining your name upon their list of guests. No one, I am certain, but a very economical person would then say, "They will not accept, and therefore we will not waste a card upon them."

The same rule should, I think, be observed with New-Year's calls. Of course you do not receive if in the first year of your bereavement; but it would nevertheless be agreeable, when the dreary day is past, to look over the cards that have been left with kind inquiries. Often the excuse is made, "I did not call on New-Year's Day because I knew I should only find a card-basket." Have our American gentlemen, then, so limited an idea of politeness, not to say gallantry, that they can not make a call of respect even when they know they will not be admitted? If it is too great an inconvenience to ring a bell and hand a card to the servant, I would then advise them to send New-Year's cards through the post, and thus show that they have not totally overlooked their bereaved friends.

Hosted by Google



VISITING TOILETTE.

One last word. It is the custom in this country to trust to the newspapers to inform your friends of your loss. Upon the Continent letters of invitation to the funeral are immediately printed and sent to all of one's acquaintance—a custom much preferable, I think, to a brief newspaper notice, which half of your friends may not chance to see. I well remember going last spring to call upon an intimate friend, whom I had not seen for a week or two. The servant looked doubtful as she took my card, and feared Miss Marguerite could not see me. "Curl papers!" I inwardly thought; then viva voce, "Take up my card: I think Miss Marguerite will see me in her room." In a few moments a message was returned—Marguerite's love, but her brother having been buried only the previous day, she did not feel able to see any one. I was then recovering from a nervous fever, and had gone out, for the first time in a month, in quest of a little cheerful company. Naturally enough, I had not read the "Deaths" in the Herald, and this abrupt announcement of my dear friend's loss was not tranquillizing. With regret did I then think of the black-edged billets de faire part in France, which prepare you in a degree for a shock before you open them and learn the sad truth.

CECILIA CLEVELAND.

CARRIAGE DRESS.

THIS pretty dress has a demi-trained skirt of sage green gros grain, trimmed with a wide flounce of the material surmounted by a bias fold. Over-skirt, also trimmed with a flounce, draped on the sides with a large velvet rosette of a darker shade, and draped in a large pouf in the back. Tight gros grain basque with deep collar, trimmed with scalloped gros grain and velvet of a darker shade. Both basque and collar are open in the back. Bonnet of the darker shade of velvet, trimmed with gros grain folds to match the dress, a white feather, white lace, and a trailing spray of pink roses, buds, and leaves. The white lace barbes are tied loosely under the chin.

VISITING TOILETTE.

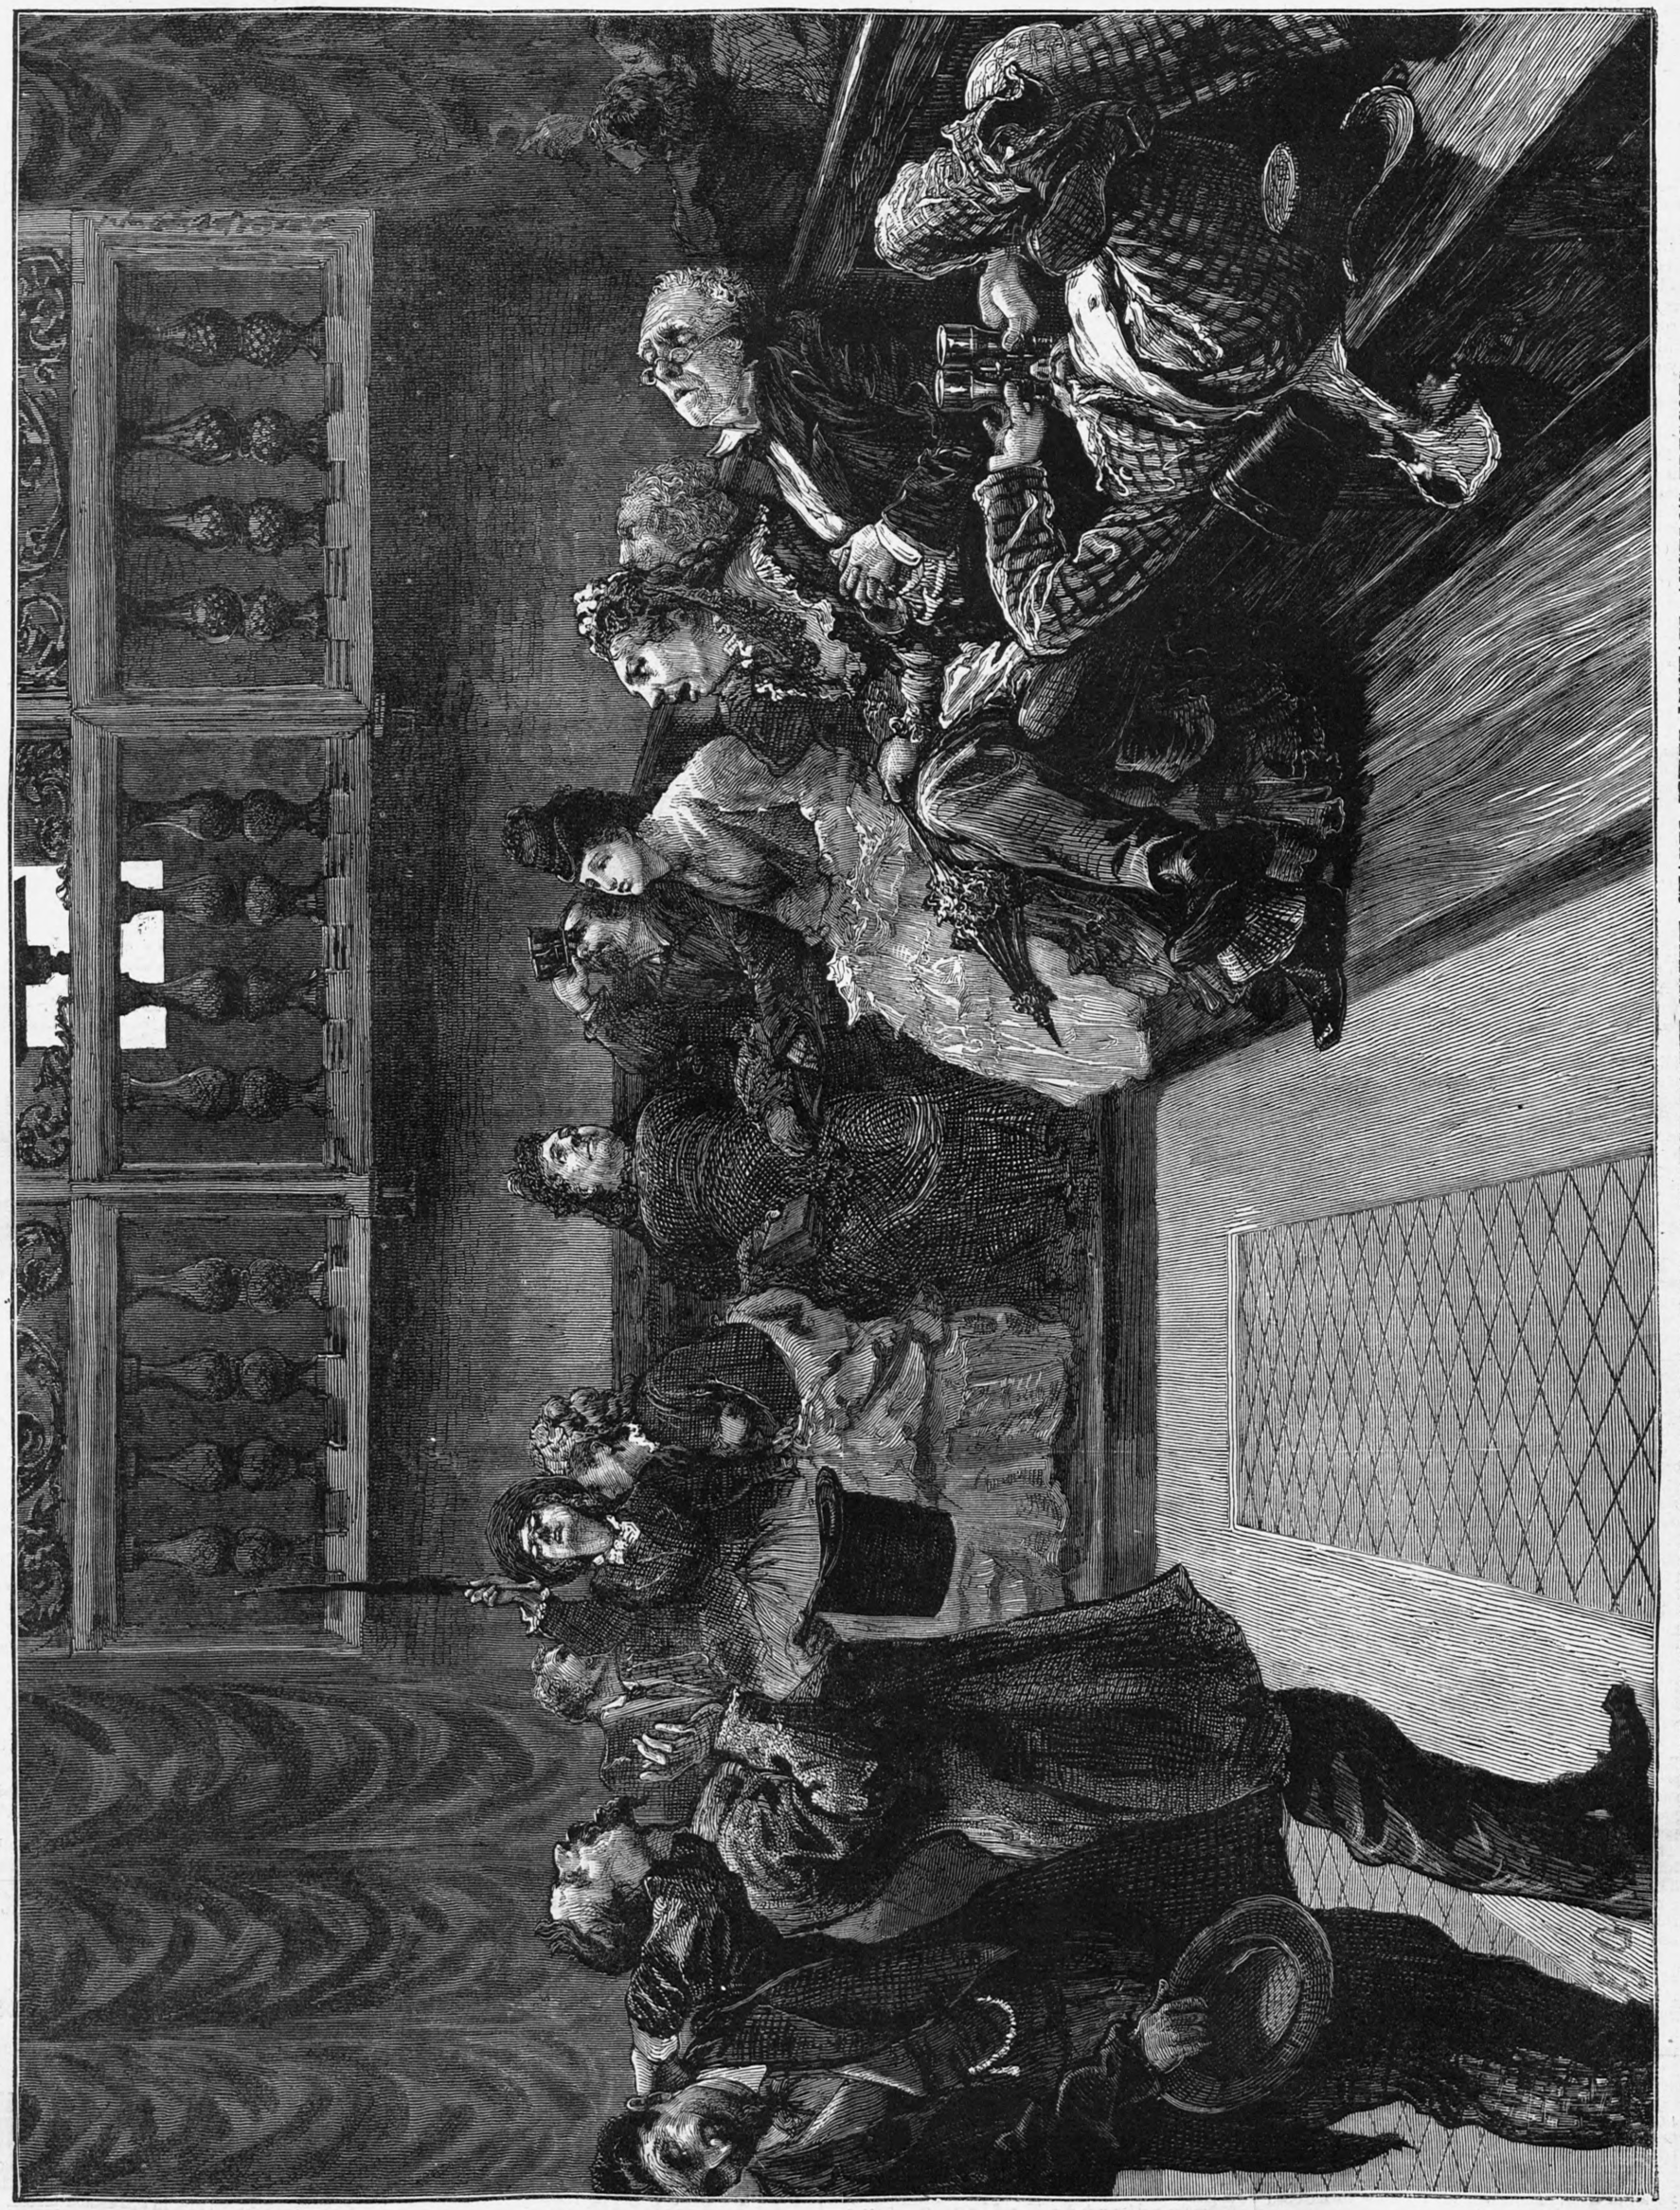
THIS elegant visiting toilette is of myrtle green faille, bordered with black-fox fur. The skirt has a Spanish flounce, scantily gathered, and set on under a row of scallops, and a bias fold of the material. The over-skirt is cut in deep vandykes, and caught up in a pouf behind. The basque has Dolman sleeves, and is without postilion pleats. The basque, collar, and sleeves are edged with fur. A coat sleeve is set inside the flowing one. Rabagas bonnet of myrtle green velvet, with a long rose-colored plume falling low in the nape of the neck, as shown by the illustration. Muff of myrtle velvet, bordered with black-fox fur. Lemon-colored kid gloves. Etruscan gold ear-rings with pendants.

CARRIAGE DRESS.

Hosted by Google

GAULS, GOTHS, VISIGOTHS, AND VANDALS IN ROME.

IT has been lamented that degenerate Italy has become only the hostelry of the world. One would get some such impression in Rome, her museums and palaces crowded with forestieri, more English than Italian heard in the streets. Greater or less herds of barbarians invade her every year. Gauls there are among them, who sack the city of its jewelry, its mosaics, its bronzes, and its photographs. Goths and Vandals are there, who, to carry home a paltry souvenir, do not scruple to pick to pieces a mosaic floor in the baths of Caracalla. One can detect in these barbarians an air of superiority, not of conquerors, but of the payers over the paid. They assume a perfect right to enter every where, affecting that the treasures of Rome belong to the world, not to the Romans. Protestants do not feel themselves under the restraint of respect for an alien religion, and behave just as they please in the churches. In the Sistine Chapel the religious atmosphere seems indeed absent. You want telling that you stand on holy ground. No crucifix or candles are on the altar under Michael Angelo's "Last Judgment." Only the two words, "Psallite Deo," on the railing of the orchestra gallery hint that the voices heard here should be raised to God. Most likely there is a huge scaffolding in the middle, the perch of some painter copying the "Creation of Eve" or the "Expulsion from Paradise." Why, then the frescoes are on the ceiling! You did not see them at the first glance, because your eyes are not set in your head like the eyes of a flat-fish. But it is evident from the attitudes of the spectators. What break-neck work! Stocks and pillory are nothing to it. They seldom or never relieve the tension by looking at the Botticellis or Peruginos below. Ladies are under some disadvantage, chignons not allowing them to set the backs of their heads quite close to their shoulders. Some gentlemen, with more regard for comfort than decorum, lie flat upon the benches. Thus they balance their opera-glasses more conveniently. And this in a chapel! But the supine pose is one of adoration.



GAULS, GOTHS, VISIGOTHS, AND VANDALS IN ROME—A SKETCH IN THE SISTINE CHAPEL UNDER MICHAEL ANGELO'S FRESCOES.

CONTEMPORARY CRITICISM.

THE judgments of contemporaries on each other are not always trustworthy. The long-continued contempt for Bunyan and Defoe was merely an expression of the ordinary feeling of the cultivated classes toward any thing which was identified with Grub Street; but it is curious to observe the incapacity of such a man as Johnson to understand Gray or Sterne, and the contempt which Walpole expressed for Johnson and Goldsmith, while he sincerely believed that the poems of Mason were destined to immortality. We find blunders at least equally palpable in the opinions expressed by the great poets at the beginning of this century. Such, for example, is the apparently sincere conviction of Byron that Rogers and Moore were the truest poets among his contemporaries; that Pope was the first of all English, if not of all existing, poets; and that Wordsworth was nothing but a namby-pamby driveler. The school of Wordsworth and Southey uttered judgments at least equally hasty in the opposite direction. Many odd instances of the degree in which prejudice can blind a man of genuine taste are to be found in the writings of their disciple, De Quincey. To mention no other, he speaks of "Mr. Goethe" as an immoral and second-rate author, who owes his reputation chiefly to the fact of his long life and his position at the court of Weimar. With which we may compare Charles Lamb's decided preference of Marlowe's Dr. Faustus to Goethe's immortal Faust. Our grandchildren, it may be feared, will find equal reason for revising the judgments which now pass current among us. How, they will ask, could people be found to mistake the second-hand pedantry of —— (we leave the name to be supplied according to the taste of our readers) for genuine inspiration, or to overlook the productions of the immortal Smith and Brown, which were then read only by the unlearned, or by some small circle of true believers?

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ETHELFRITH.—Your sacque can be made stylish by taking in the seams to fit more snugly. It should be slashed as formerly. Trim with thick repped silk, bias bands, and a fringe of crimped tape. White over dresses will be worn over black; white and colored blouse-waists with black silk skirts will also be retained.

COUNCIL BLUFFS SUBSCRIBER.—Get blue-gray or olive brown poplin or delaine for your spring traveling suit, and make with a redingote and kilt-pleated skirt by pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V.

PRIMROSE.—Girls of sixteen wear their dress skirts to their ankles. Braid your hair in two plaits and wear it hanging. Send your undressed kid gloves to a scourer.

CONSTANT READER.—According to conventional usage, the residents of a town should make the first call on a new-comer, and take the initiative in expressing their desire for an acquaintance. Circumstance, however, is a higher law than conventionality, and your own instinct must tell you when it is proper to break through this custom. Dress plainly for church and for visits of condolence. Those who pay their devotions in their gayest attire give rise to the suspicion that they have few other occasions on which to display their plumage.—As for the significance of the turned corners of cards, we have answered the question so often that we must refer our readers henceforth to the files of the Bazar.

A SUBSCRIBER.—We can not repeat instructions that have been published at the request of individual readers. In back numbers, which can be obtained at this office for ten cents each, you will find what you require. Directions for knitting infants' socks have frequently been given in our columns, and it is preposterous to expect us to print them anew in this place.

S. A. L.—Make your white organdy with a demi-train, trimmed with wide side-pleated flounces, an apron-front over-skirt, looped behind with a white watered ribbon sash, and a puffed basque, open heart-shape, and edged with Valenciennes.

HATTIE.—Make your black silk with a basque, over-skirt, and flounced skirt. The blue silk should be a gray-blue shade, and made like your black one.

MARY G.—The double-breasted redingote would look very stylish in Turkish toweling stuff. For a jaunty jacket use the double-breasted sacque pattern which forms part of a suit illustrated in Bazar No. 43, Vol. V.

QUANDARY.—A long basque or a very simple polonaise with untrimmed skirt is the only suit you can make from fifteen yards of narrow silk. Would it not be better to make a house dress, with demi-train caught up behind in a puff by a sash, and wear with it a very simple basque?

JASPER.—Make your black alpaca with a double-breasted redingote, like that illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., and a short skirt with kilt pleating. Instead of a polonaise for your black gros grain you will find a basque and over-skirt far more useful. Put a bias fold and lace on the upper garments, and flounces on the lower skirt. Put narrow lapping flounces on the front breadth of street suit, and two wide flounces behind.

CONTENTED READER.—Make your Swiss muslin dress by description for an organdy dress given above to "S. A. L."

JANE L.—We can not obtain samples for you, but think they will be sent by most of the large furnishing houses on receipt of your address and stamped envelope.

FLORENCE Y.—Your sample would look best trimmed with darker brown repped silk cut in bias bands, and as a facing for flounces of the same. Black cashmere sacques are more stylish than silk sacques. Make your black lustre dress by hints given above to "Jasper." Narrow gold bracelets are much worn.

SUE A.—For your spring cashmere use the Loose Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 29, Vol. V. Trim with silk pipings of a darker shade, and have a silk sash to match. The sash should be very wide thick ribbon, or else silk doubled; arrange it in loops on the left side.

A. R. E.—Narrow stripes will be worn again, and the suit you suggest will be tasteful. Use fringe for trimming. Gauzes will scarcely be used on street suits. The white organdy dress described above to "S. A. L." is suitable for a graduating dress in June. Braiding trims little boys' trowsers and jackets very prettily.

A SEWING-MACHINE for a holiday present. Let us tell you how to get one, and what one to get. In the first place, to get a good one should be the aim, and, in the next place, to get it at as low a price as possible, and those in moderate circumstances frequently want time to pay for it. The machine that will just exactly fill all of these requirements is the New Under-Feed Wilson. It is in every way the best machine in use, simple, durable, perfect operating, and beautiful, and capable of doing every grade of heavy, fine, and ornamental sewing ever done on a sewing-machine. It is sold for fifteen dollars less than all other first-class machines, which alone has placed it far in advance of every other machine in existence. You can pay for it in easy monthly payments that will not be felt from the income of the poorest. So that any man can have the pleasure of presenting to his wife on Christmas or New Year's the best Sewing-Machine in use. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the U. S. The Company want agents in country towns. —[Com.]

DIAMONDS.

THE curious story which has been published in the London papers since the report of the discovery of new and extensive Diamond fields in Arizona, about a mysterious stranger, an American by his accent and appearance, who some eighteen months ago entered the establishment of certain Diamond brokers in London, and there bought a quantity of Diamonds in the rough without investigating their weight or worth as separate stones, has, doubtless, suggested to many Diamond fanciers in this country, for the first time in their lives, the fact that Diamonds are not found "a splendor in the soil," and betrayed, like the glow-worm, to the seeker by the brilliancy they emit. One who wanders, for example, into the establishment of Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, 22 John Street (up stairs), where Diamonds are studied as well as sold, will find it difficult to believe that these sparkling drops of crystal light have been evolved by human science and human skill from dull and crusted masses of matter in which only the experienced eye could detect the transparent, translucent, incomparable gems he beholds. The formation of the Diamond still remains a mystery to science. Its identity with other carboniferous bodies was indeed proved long ago by Lavoisier and Clouet. But this gives us no clue by which to reach a rational conclusion as to whether Diamonds are or are not likely to be found in any given locality. Diamond-mining, therefore, whether in Hindoostan, in the Brazils, in Borneo and the Eastern Archipelago, in Siberia, in Australia, in Africa, is still an empirical enterprise. Whether Diamonds are or are not to be found in Arizona, is a question which nothing but actual investigation can determine. Should they be found there, we suspect that it will be easy to show that the speculations of theorists, whether in England or America, as to the effect of the new mines upon the value of the product, are as wild and as wide of any practical importance as are their speculations upon the probability or improbability of the discovery.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HAIR!!!

L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,

Between 4TH and GREAT JONES STS.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

Import and manufacture their own Goods, and RETAIL THEM AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE, Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D., by express, on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

TO THE LADIES!

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.
No lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.
B. F. BROWN & Co., Boston.

LADIES' FURS

IN EVERY VARIETY;

SEAL CAPS AND GLOVES,

All at the Lowest Prices.

IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS,

DANIEL D. YOUMANS, { 719 Broadway, N. Y.

LADIES' CHEST PROTECTOR.

Something entirely New.

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO FIT THE FORM.

Price in Felt, $2 00, $3 00, $4 00.
" " Chamois, $3 00, $4 00, $5 00.

For married or single Ladies. In ordering please state which and size of bust.
Sold by all Druggists and Ladies' Furnishing Stores, and at 2140 Third Ave.; 218 Broadway; Broadway, cor. 29th St.; and at 7 Sixth Ave.
WHOLESALE.—Chas. H. Crittenton, 7 Sixth Avenue; W. H. Schieffelin & Co., 170 William St.; Fraser & Lee, 20 Beekman St.; G. S. Crawford & Co., 119 Fulton St.
A. C. JACKSON, Manufacturer,
No. 2140 Third Avenue, New York.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

WE ARE NOW OPENING
A Most Attractive Stock of
LADIES' COSTUMES AND WRAPPINGS
FOR SPRING AND SUMMER WEAR,
CONSISTING ENTIRELY OF
Imported Goods.

The stock will be VERY EXTENSIVE, embracing a much larger variety than at any previous time, and will be made up from the NEWEST AND MOST FASHIONABLE MATERIALS.
Our arrangements are such as to exhibit
THE LATEST NOVELTIES
at all times during the season, and on terms THE MOST FAVORABLE.
An examination of our stock is solicited.

THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO.,
391 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

FASHIONS TRIPLE FAVORITE.

LE PLUS NOUVELLE.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1873, by A. BURDETTE SMITH, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington, D. C.

As a Polonaise—As a Waterproof.

MAGIC COSTUME.—This is the Acme of Paris ingenuity! The above engraving represents two views of it. And there is still another, viz.: a draped apron front. It makes an elegant Polonaise, a superb Redingote and a tasteful Waterproof. THREE Entirely different Costumes in one! It can be changed from a Polonaise to a Redingote or Waterproof in less than one minute, even while walking! by simply adjusting one button. The original is made in dark blue ladies' cloth, trimmed with herculean braid. This pattern is also PARTICULARLY desirable for wash goods, because when unbuttoned, the Polonaise or Redingote falls into a beautifully shaped wrapper, without pleat or gather, making it easy to laundry. The traveler, especially the voyager, will find it an indispensable convenience. Requires 5 yards waterproof.

This Costume is very simple and easy to make by the pattern. Elaborate instructions telling how to use each piece—how to drape and adjust after completed, &c., &c. Besides this, we inclose a CLOTH MODEL with each pattern, showing just how to put it together, and how it will look when completed—every seam, pleat, loop, and gather.

All sizes, Pattern and CLOTH MODEL complete, ONE DOLLAR, see Premium below.

We furnish it "READY MADE" in Linen or Batiste, from $5 to $15, in English Waterproof, $10 to $20, in any color of ladies' cloth, handsomely trimmed, $25. SEND STAMP for our CATALOGUE of STYLES.

We give a CLOTH MODEL with each pattern, which SHOWS every seam, pleat, gather, loop, &c., how to put the garment together by the pattern, and how it will look when completed. By the use of our Cloth Models any person who can sew can FINISH the most difficult garment as easy as the plainest. They are PERFECT GUIDES.

SUBSCRIBE NOW for
SMITH'S ILLUSTRATED
PATTERN BAZAAR.
ONLY ONE DOLLAR A YEAR.
Sample copy mailed for 25 cents.
BEST AND CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD!

PREMIUM. Every subscriber is entitled to select Patterns to the value of ONE DOLLAR, FREE.

BESIDES this premium, every copy of the BAZAAR contains a "HALF-PRICE CHECK," which entitles the subscriber to select ONE pattern from EACH BOOK, by sending the "Check," with HALF of the price—in MONEY—of the pattern selected.

By inclosing ONE DOLLAR and Stamp to A. BURDETTE SMITH, you will be made a YEARLY SUBSCRIBER, and the pattern of the above engraving, with a Cloth Model, will be mailed to you FREE! OR, if you prefer to select your premium after you receive the Bazaar, we will mail to you a receipt for your subscription, and a "PREMIUM COUPON," which will entitle you to select patterns to the value of ONE dollar FREE at any time. When you send your subscription, please state WHICH.

Address very plainly
A. BURDETTE SMITH,
SMITH'S PATTERN BAZAAR,
P. O. Box 5055. 914 Broadway, N. Y.

PANSY SEEDS! Direct from a celebrated German grower, the finest varieties in cultivation. 25 cts. per pkt.; 5 pkts. $1. J. T. SMITH & SONS, Brentwood, N. H.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 335 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

1873. NOTICE. 1873.

OUR CELEBRATED BUFFALO

AND OTTER

TRADE MARK PAT'D.
BRANDS
BLACK ALPACAS,
AND
BEAVER BRAND.

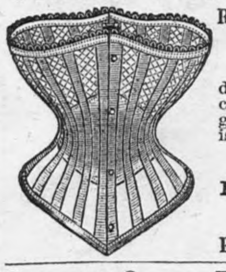
SILK FINISHED
Black Pure Mohairs
ARE HANDSOMER THAN EVER FOR SPRING WEAR.

These Beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Dry-Goods Retailers throughout the United States.

☞ Purchasers will know these goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece, bearing a picture of the Buffalo, Otter, or Beaver.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 and 429 Broadway,
305 Canal and 47 Howard Sts.,
New York.
SOLE IMPORTERS.

PATENT KID-FITTING
SKELETON CORSET.



Recommended by Leading Physicians.

Should be worn by all ladies who value health and comfort. They have been greatly improved, and the fit is perfect.

They are delightful
For Summer Wear.

To be found at all First-Class Retail Stores.

Largest Organ Establishment in the World.

7 Extensive Factories.

J. ESTEY & COMPANY,

Brattleboro, Vt., U. S. A.

THE CELEBRATED
ESTEY COTTAGE ORGANS.

The latest and best improvements. Every thing that is new and novel. The leading improvements in Organs were introduced first in this establishment.

Established 1846.

SEND FOR OUR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

Before buying send for our descriptive
SEED AND PLANT CATALOGUE.
AZELL BOWDITCH, 645 Warren St., Boston, Mass.

$25 A DAY! Agents wanted. Thirty new and useful articles. NOVELTY CO., Saco, Me.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Have made large additions to their

POPULAR STOCK OF

5-FRAME ENGLISH AND AMERICAN BRUSSELS CARPETS, $1 75 per yard.

ENGLISH TAPESTRY BRUSSELS, best quality, $1 25.

ROYAL WILTONS, $2 50 and $2 75.

FRENCH MOQUETTES, very handsome, only $2 50 and $3.

They will open a large assortment of the latest and choicest designs of

FRENCH AND ENGLISH CARPETINGS by the yard as well as in one piece,

SUITABLE FOR EARLY SPRING SALES.

An immense stock of

LINENS, SHEETINGS, DAMASK TABLE-CLOTHS, NAPKINS, &c., AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A splendid assortment of

SATIN DAMASKS, BROCATELLES, PLAIN SATINS, TAPESTRIES, PLAIN AND STRIPED TERRYS, As well as a great variety of elegant NOVELTIES FOR UPHOLSTERY PURPOSES, At prices unusually attractive.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.'S

EXPOSITION OF

SPRING CARPETINGS.

We have now open an unusually large assortment, in NEW DESIGNS and COLORINGS, of DUTCH AND SMYRNA CARPETS, In a Great Variety of Sizes.

AUBUSSONS, AXMINSTERS, & MOQUETTES, In Drawing-Room Sizes, and Colored to Match the New Upholstery Shadings.

ROYAL WILTONS, Manufactured specially to order for Dining-Rooms, Libraries, Halls, and Stairs.

ENGLISH BODY BRUSSELS, A splendid assortment in NEW PRIVATE PATTERNS.

VELVETS and TAPESTRY, THREE-PLY and INGRAINS, ENGLISH and AMERICAN OIL-CLOTHS, And a full stock of DRUGGETS, RUGS, MATS, &c., &c., ALL AT LOWEST MARKET PRICES.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO., Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

LADIES' TROUSSEAU "A"

FOR $150.

3 Muslin Chemises	@	$2 00	$6 00
3 Linen "	@	4 75	14 25
1 Bridal Set (3 pieces)			12 00
3 Pairs Muslin Drawers	@	2 00	6 00
3 " Linen "	@	2 75	8 25
3 Plain Cotton Skirts	@	2 25	6 75
3 Tucked " "	@	3 00	9 00
3 Muslin Night Dresses	@	3 50	10 50
3 Tucked Cambric Night Dresses	@	5 00	15 00
3 Embr'd " " "	@	7 00	21 00
1 Flannel Skirt			5 00
1 " " Embroidered			8 25
2 Corset Covers	@	3 25	6 50
2 Dressing Sacques	@	3 50	7 00
1 Robe de Chambre			14 50
			$150 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Trousseau "B," for $200, and "C," for $250, sent by mail if desired.

LORD & TAYLOR,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN

FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,

NEW YORK, Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING

WITH A

NOVELTY PRESS,

The best ever made for the purpose.

Principal office 349-351 Federal, and 152 Kneeland Streets, Boston. Branch office, 543 Broadway and 88 Mercer Street, New York.

W. Y. EDWARDS is no longer Agent for me or the sale of my goods. BENJ. O. WOODS,

Manufacturer of Novelty Presses, and dealer in every description of

PRINTING MATERIAL.

Send for NEW Illustrated Catalogue, with Agents' addresses.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.

RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.

Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,

Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only	$3 00
24 " " " " "	3 50
26 " " " " "	4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.

Established 1843. CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.

Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.

Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

A NEW STORY

BY

OLIVER OPTIC,

ENTITLED

A BRAVE BOY'S FORTUNE.

In No. 281 of the

New York Fireside Companion.

Out Monday Next (March 3d.)

For Sale by all News Dealers.

TERMS—One Copy One Year.....$3 00
Two Copies One Year.... 5 00

Address

GEORGE MUNRO, New York Fireside Companion, 84 BEEKMMN STREET, NEW YORK.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.....No. 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt..... " 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT..... " 51

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 11

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Write for Large Illustrated Descriptive Price-List to

PITTSBURGH, PA.

Double, Single, Muzzle and Breech-Loading Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, Pistols, &c., of every kind, for men or boys, at very low prices. Guns, $3-$300; Pistols, $1-$25.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

Active agents wanted, to canvass New York and the leading cities for "Santo Domingo, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti." By Samuel Hazard. Profusely illustrated. The subscriber has other Books, of a popular character, for agents. Call, or address

AVERY BILL,
Care of Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Vick's Floral Guide for 1873.

The GUIDE is now published QUARTERLY. 25 cents pays for the year, four numbers, which is not half the cost. Those who afterward send money to the amount of One Dollar or more for Seeds may also order Twenty-five Cents' worth extra—the price paid for the Guide.

The January Number is beautiful, giving plans for making Rural Homes, Designs for Dining Table Decorations, Window Gardens, &c., and containing a mass of information invaluable to the lover of flowers.——One Hundred and Fifty pages, on fine tinted paper, some Five Hundred Engravings, and a superb Colored Plate and Chromo Cover.——The First Edition of TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND just printed in English and German, and ready to send out.

JAMES VICK, Rochester, N. Y.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co., MANUFACTURERS OF WOOD CARPETING, 942 BROADWAY.

Send Stamp for Designs.

$500,000 for Every body!

THIRD GRAND GIFT CONCERT in aid of Public Library of Ky., will be given in the great Hall of Library Building at Louisville, Ky., on Tuesday, April 8, 1873, at which time Ten Thousand Cash Gifts, amounting to a grand total of $500,000, all cash, will be distributed by lot to ticket holders. Only 100,000 tickets, and large proportion already sold or engaged. Two Concerts have been given with complete success and every gift promptly paid. Whole tickets $10, halves $5, quarters $2 50. For tickets or information, apply to Hon. Thos. E. Bramlette, Agent for Trustees Public Library of Ky., Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

SEYMOUR'S SHEARS & SCISSORS.

"The Best are the Cheapest."

Extra Quality. Crocus Polish.

Family Size, - - $1.50
Ladies' Scissors, - 1.00
By mail, prepaid. Send P. O. Order or Draft

HENRY SEYMOUR & CO., 29 and 31 Rose St., N. Y.

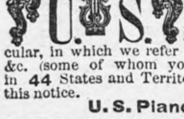
TRICKS AND TRAPS OF AMERICA. 10,000 already ordered. It is the GREATEST book of the age. Exposes, names, and describes every Quack, Humbug, Swindler, and Cheat in America. Nearly 1000 Swindlers Exposed. Tells all about the "sawdust" and ALL OTHER swindles; all about "Rights," "Recipes," and how Maine and Michigan Swindlers cheat the public. All about "bogus" papers, premiums, and "framed" engravings. 100 pages, splendid illustrated cover. Price only 25 cts.; 5 for $1. Sent prepaid by Hunter & Co., Pubs., Hinsdale, N. H.

THE ALBERT TOILET SOAPS ARE PURE AND THEIR PERFUME CHOICE AND LASTING.

ALFRED SAVAGE & SON, Montreal; or D. FINLEY, Rouse's Point.

HAVE YOU SEEN the New and Wonderful Method of Showing Ghosts in every Man's House without the aid of a medium? Innocent Amusement for the Home Circle. The great demand for this development of Optical Science shows it to be ONE OF THE WONDERS OF THE AGE! Sent post-paid for 50 cts., with direct ons

M. W. TYLER & CO., Providence, R. I.



You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE FOR MARCH. With an attractive Table of Contents.

2.

SANTO DOMINGO, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti. By SAMUEL HAZARD. Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

3.

RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

4.

GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50. Popular Edition, 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

5.

HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

6.

ROBIN GRAY. A Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, "Author of "For the King," and "For Lack of Gold." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.

THE WANDERING HEIR. A Novel. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," "Foul Play," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.; Cloth, 60 cts.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

BAZAR

Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 532 B'dway, N. Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

A PHILOLOGICAL POSER.

HERR PROFESSOR. "Iss it not a shdrainch Ting, Laties, dat de Latin Race gan not aguire de Enklish Bronouncy-ation? I haf choost dis Mómend bardet from an Idalian Chendleman (a crade Vrent of mine ant a ferry gleffer Man) who has liffed in New York almóste as long as I haf—Dvendy-vife Eeeerrs—ant foot you Pelief it? He shbeegs Enklish vit a kvite shdrong Voreign Indonation! How to you Agound vor a zo Eggshdra-orrtinary Zeergoomshdanz as tat?"

WHAT LITTLE JONES SAW AT THE OPERA THE OTHER NIGHT.

FACETIÆ.

A GENTLEMAN writes that he has several marriageable daughters, and having bought a house in a fashionable quarter, he desires to be informed of the best way of gaining an entrance to the houses of the best families in the neighborhood. To this the reply is clear: The easiest and most direct way would seem to be by the front-door, but that if he wanted to hesitate slightly in his proceedings, he might tunnel under the pavement from the road, and come up the cellar way.

A short bout between a school inspector and a scholar is thus related:

INSPECTOR (hesitating and swellishly). "What part of speech is the word egg?"

BOY (relieved). "Noun, Sir."

INSPECTOR. "What is its gender?"

BOY (perplexed). "Can't tell, Sir."

INSPECTOR (getting confused). "Is it masculine, feminine, or neuter?"

BOY (looking sharp). "Can't say, Sir, till it's hatched."

A witness recently stated in answer to a magistrate that he was a penman. The magistrate, puzzled at the answer, which did not exactly correspond with the witness's appearance, asked in what class of literature he wielded his pen, when he replied that he penned sheep in the cattle-market.

At a California fair several bottles of strained honey were exhibited, when a man put a bottle of castor-oil with the rest. Several old ladies sampled it, with the same result. The opinion of all who tried it was that the bee who made it was a fraud. One old lady said that even the bees had got to cheating nowadays.

A certain country squire, conceiving that the word "clause," was in the plural number, would often talk of a "claw" in an act of Congress.

Georgia has a hale and hearty citizen who has been struck by thirty-two Minie-rifle balls, one mortar shell, one shrapnel, one three-inch conical shot, struck by lightning, bitten by a rattlesnake, and chased by a mad dog.

A seedy-looking individual walked into a hotel a few evenings ago, and stepping up to the register, seized a pen and wrote his name at the foot of the long list of the day's arrivals. It was a noble name—George Washington Botts—written in a firm, bold hand, and with a big flourish underneath. It was plain that the seedy man was accustomed to making a flourish in the world, if it were only with a pen.

"Have a room?" inquired the clerk, incidentally measuring the man with his eagle eye to see if he wouldn't fit in one of his sky boudoirs.

"No," said Seedy, picking his teeth with a splinter tooth-pick he had selected from the well-assorted supply on the counter.

"Supper, then, I suppose?" added the clerk, preparing to add an S to the end of George Washington Botts's name.

"No, Sir; no supper," said Mr. Botts, with severity. "I simply want to arrive. A-r ar, r-i-v-e rive, arrive. I want neither room, supper, nor any thing else, but I particularly desire to arrive. It is a long time since I have arrived at a hotel—a very long time" (his voice choked a little)—"and I thought if you hadn't any objection, I—I would like to arrive once more before I died."

Here he was compelled to hide his emotions in his coat tail, in the absence of a pocket-handkerchief. The clerk, always ready to do a good action, generously allowed the unfortunate individual to arrive, and George Washington Botts, hastily drying his eyes with a pen-wiper, wrung the captain's hand in mute though heart-felt gratitude, and then stalked gloomily forth into darkness and the night.

Should paniers be made out of a journal of civilization?

A Western genius has an idea which is an idea. He proposes to arrange church seats on pivots, so that the devout may more conveniently examine the toilettes of the back seats. This device would greatly increase the value of church property, for then the pews would all be made alike, well situated, and of equal desirability.

What do you call high tide in water-falls?—Paterfamilias: Bankruptcy.

A Southern paper, speaking of a man who was kicked by a horse, says: "His life was extinct for a short time, but recovered so that he reached home on Saturday evening."

An M.C. has just had his family reinforced, and makes the following remarks:

"Ring out, wild bells—and tame ones too—
Ring out the lover's moon,
Ring out the little slips and socks,
Ring in the bib and spoon;
Ring out the muse, ring in the nurse,
Ring in the milk and water;
Away with paper, pens, and ink—
My daughter, oh, my daughter!"

Is a lady who wears rats in danger of going to the dogs?

ON LOVE.

Love is a little boy. I don't know him, but, by his pictures, he's well fed. His principal costume is wings. He attacks the young, and curls them up like shavings: they like it. He's the same to boys and girls as the distemper is to dogs. If he was my child I'd put him in pants and send him to school. If I don't tell you any more about Love, it's because you'll find out as much as you care to know for yourselves one of these days. When him you see, remember me.

Is a sprained ankle a lame excuse for not dancing?

A school-girl in one of the rural districts was overheard trying to convince a school-fellow that she liked him better than she did some other urchin of whom he seemed jealous. "Of course I like you better than I do Bill," said she, "for don't I miss words in my spelling lesson on purpose, so as to be down to the foot of the class, where you are?"

A Scotch postmaster, puzzling out a very uncertain superscription to an Irish letter, jocosely remarked to an intelligent son of Erin who stood by that the Irish brought a hard set of names to Scotland. "That's a fact, yer honor," replied the Irishman; "but they get harder ones after they arrive here."

STRONG CHILDREN.—A clergyman says it is curious to note how many people attend a circus "only because they want to please their children; but still more curious to observe that in many instances it takes two or three able-bodied men, with as many women, to look after one little boy or girl."

The following obituary notice of a distinguished citizen is from a Western paper: "Peter Ink, an old citizen of Knox County, Ohio, was blotted out the other day, aged seventy-five."

"Give me none of your jaw," as the filbert said to the man.

ON TREES.

Trees are of various kinds and of different complexions. There is the plane-tree, which is quite plain; there is the planed tree, which is sometimes called planks; and there is the unex-plained tree, about which nobody knows any thing. The study of trees may be divided into several branches. In addressing yourself to it you should make a bough, and say, "By your leaves." The oak is the king of trees, and is very long-lived, as is clearly shown by the expression, "Oak king, live forever!" The birch is a sore subject. It is not generally known that apple-trees often grow in pairs, or that beeches are to be met with only at the sea-side. Nevertheless, these are facts. There are many other kinds of trees, but their names are not usually mentioned before ladies. I have told you as much about trees as it is good for you to know. Be happy!

Can a medium be said to write with invisible ink when he writes with spirit?

A Portland clergyman startled his flock one Sunday evening by telling them that "hell was not so full of men and women as men and women were full of hell." Merely a matter of measurement.

A lady about to marry was warned that her intended, although a good man, was very eccentric. "Well," she said, "if he is very unlike other men, he is more likely to be a good husband."

CLAIMING HIS RIGHTS.

OLD GENT. "Aren't you ashamed of yourself, to use such profane language to that poor old Woman?"
BOY. "What fur? Can't I jaw her when she's me own Mudder?"

HORRID CHILD. "Mr. De Brown; what sort of a man lives Next Door to you?"
MR. DE B. (politely). "Why, darling?"
HORRID CHILD. "'Cause I heard Pa say you were Next Door to a Fool."

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 12.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

PARIS GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

THE gigantic calamities which have recently fallen upon two prosperous cities of the American continent have naturally directed a good deal of attention to the question of insurance against fire. In the case of the conflagrations alluded to no amount of precaution in the matter of insurance could have availed. The fire in Chicago was on so stupendous a scale that it swallowed up almost every office which had the misfortune to stand in any way bail for the fortunes of the city; and in Boston, though the circle of the flames was circumscribed, they nevertheless overstepped the border line over which companies, however solid and well-provisioned, can scarcely pass without being themselves severely singed, if not quite swamped. Mercifully, however, such examples are so rare that we need not take them for precedents, or allow them to prejudice us against those prudent measures which all householders feel to be a necessary precaution against accidents by fire. In Paris it is customary for the landlord to insert a clause in his lease which compels the tenant to insure the premises he occupies immediately on taking possession of them. The tenant is obliged to insure not only his own property, furniture, etc., but, in a certain proportion, his neighbor's. This is called "responsabilité locative," which may be freely translated as neighborly responsibility. The system of flats, which makes each tenant so much more dependent on his neighbor for safety than the occupants of separate houses, makes this mutual guarantee plan not only desirable, but absolutely necessary; and no one who reflects for a moment on the extra dangers

Fig. 1.—VIOLET GROS GRAIN HOUSE DRESS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-6.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—GRAY VIGOGNE WALKING SUIT.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—BLACK GROS GRAIN AND VELVET HOUSE DRESS.—BACK.—[See Fig. 5.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 7ª, 7ᵇ-16.

Fig. 5.—BLACK GROS GRAIN AND VELVET HOUSE DRESS.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 4.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 7ª, 7ᵇ-16.

FIGS. 1-5.—LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS.

Hosted by Google

he runs from the possible negligence or bad luck of his next-floor neighbor will grumble at the extra expense which, being reciprocal, aims at protecting his property at least from the effects of them. Foreigners sometimes speak of this compulsory mutual tax as an imposition and a hardship; but it is in reality a wise and valuable protection. I have said that most landlords do not leave it to the choice of their tenants to insure or not, but make it legally incumbent on them to do so. But this is not a fixed rule, and where the choice is left to the tenant he very often neglects the precaution. It is a mistake. Whether it arises from negligence, oversight, or economy, it is a mistake. Every one who takes a lease of an unfurnished apartment in Paris should insure himself in one of the good companies as a matter of course. The expense is indeed so slight that it can scarcely ever be an impediment to any one having furniture worth protecting. For instance, for furniture rated at the value of 30,000 francs ($6000) you will pay twenty-six francs, or a little over five dollars, a year. The chief point to be considered is what office one should go to for the insurance. It is not within the province of the writer's confidential chat with the dreadful Americans to give them any direct advice as to the persons and establishments which they should apply to in this or other emergencies. Their banker, if they consult him, or their medical man, or any friend established in Paris and acquainted with its ways and means, will be able to point them to the right place. But a word of warning against certain swindling operations in vogue among sharpers on the watch for customers may be useful. I would therefore strongly urge on all American families to beware of clerks who present themselves without being sent for or introduced by some reliable person, and come catering for insurances for this or that company. There is a certain young man (whose name I refrain from giving for prudential reasons, but whom some of my readers may be able to identify to their cost) who makes it his business to go about to respectable houses, inviting their owners to insure their property at the office whose agent he is. He comes as any casual visitor might, well dressed, does not send in a card, but requests to see monsieur or madame. He is shown into the salon, and when madame comes out (I speak as one having experience of the performance) the visitor apologizes profusely for his intrusion, but he happened to have business in the house, and took the liberty of calling en passant to inquire if his services would be acceptable. He represents one of the oldest insurance companies in Paris, and would be happy to take all the trouble off madame's hands in drawing out the policy, etc., if she would honor him with the commission. If madame has not already insured her furniture, etc., she in all probability bites at the bait. Then the visitor pulls out a handsome portfolio stuffed with important-looking documents, selects one ready for the occasion, and after volubly explaining to madame that it is a policy in the most authentic legal form, he invites her to sign it. He is such a very polite young man, so plausible and voluble in his explanations, and his policy is moreover so clearly en règle, and the name of his employers so well known as an old-established insurance campany (in fact, the principal one in Paris, Rue R——), that it does not occur to you to doubt his chivalrous disinterestedness, not to mention such a vulgar word as mere honesty, and you sign. It may so happen that no harm comes of it. If you are settled down for ten years, and do not care to change your insurance office meantime, you will not regret having yielded to the blandishments of the Rue R—— emissary. But take notice beforehand that you have committed yourself for ten years; and if you should be leaving your apartment at the expiration of three, and going to stay at a hotel or in furnished lodgings, you are still bound to pay your annual contingent to the flourishing establishment whose agent has swindled you into the bond. A lady well known to the writer, whose experience quite corroborates hers, had a great deal of annoyance and trouble arising from her having signed a policy under the above-named circumstances. The agent, after assuring her that it involved nothing but a payment for the current year, that she was perfectly free to cease her insurance the following one if agreeable, handed her the paper to sign. The lady read it carefully over, and perceived that it engaged her for ten years. She asked what this meant, and the reply was that it bound the office to her for that time, but left her free toward it, and that as a policy should be renewed every year unless it were taken for a term, she would be saved a great deal of trouble and loss of time going to the company, etc., by signing the one in her hand. It sounded reasonable enough, and she signed it. Two years later her lease was nearly out, and she received a visit from her beguiler with a receipt for the following year. She declined payment, as she was leaving the apartment, and perhaps the country altogether, very shortly. Then out came the murder. She must pay, whether she would or not. Had she not signed? And the policy, which had been brought with a view to this result, was produced. My friend, indignant at the fraud, refused to submit. She went to the office with a gentleman who was qualified from his position to see justice done her; but justice in this case was not equity. She had signed: she must pay. The matter was taken before the juge de paix, who pronounced in strong terms on the treachery and mean trick of the office and its agent, but could not punish them further. My friend had to defray the expenses of the little suit, and pay the year's insurance to boot. I believe the clever agent is still at work, and drives a good commission among English and American residents in Paris.

COMET.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1873.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Bridal Dresses, Veils, Coiffures, etc.; Ladies' Spring Street and House Dresses, Sleeveless Jackets, Vests, Mantelets, Hoods, etc.; Boys' and Girls' Suits, Boys' Caps; Glove-Boxes; Writing-Desks; Blotting-Pads; Newspaper Racks; Embroidery Patterns, etc., etc.; with choice literary and artistic attractions.

LENTEN FARE.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

II.

SANDWICHES for Lenten time are made with caviare and anchovies. The bread may be toasted if it is for breakfast. Having cut the bread and spread it with butter, split the anchovies in two lengthwise, remove the bone, cut each half in two, and spread them over a slice of the bread. Have hard-boiled eggs ready, chop them rather fine, with a few stalks of parsley, spread them over the anchovies, cover with another slice of buttered bread, and you have a good sandwich.

Others are made with caviare instead of anchovies. The caviare is sliced and then cut in strips, which are placed on the bread in the same way as the anchovies. Finish as directed above.

Sandwiches are also made with sardines, in the same way as the above. When the sardines are placed on the bread, and before spreading the egg and parsley, cut very thin slices of lemon, which cut again in narrow strips, spread them here and there on the bread and between the sardines, and finish as above.

Mustard may be mixed with essence of anchovy, and spread over the bread before buttering it. The sandwiches may also be served without being covered with a slice of bread.

A Welsh rare-bit makes an excellent dish for supper.

Below we give bills of fare for persons who do not like fish, or who can not eat it oftener than once a day.

BREAKFAST.

Red radishes and butter. Boiled eggs. Steamed potatoes. Cheese. Fruit.

LUNCH.

Pickled gooseberries. Macaroni au gratin. Blackberry jelly. Fruit.

DINNER.

Rice-and-milk soup. Fresh cod, caper sauce. Potato croquettes. Limas au jus. Apples méringuées. Tapioca pudding. Fruit.

SUPPER.

ound-cake. Charlotte-Russe. Apples.

BREAKFAST.

Omelet with jelly. Chowchow. Potatoes soufflées. Cheese. Fruit.

LUNCH.

Pickled nasturtium. Plum-pudding. Wine jelly. Fruit.

DINNER.

Potage purée of squash. Fresh salmon, lobster sauce. Potatoes duchesse. Salsify Béchamel. Hominy. Cabinet pudding. Brioche. Fruit.

SUPPER.

Egg sandwiches, crème au café. Biscottes. Fruit.

BREAKFAST.

Pickled pears. Scrambled eggs. Potatoes, maître d'hôtel. Stewed tomatoes. Cheese. Fruit.

LUNCH.

Pickled walnuts. Macaroni Italienne. Compote of cherries. Fruit.

DINNER.

Potages.

Bisque of lobster. Purée of carrots.

Hors-d'œuvre.

Pickled plums. Olives. Red radishes. Piccalilli.

Relevés.

Frost-fish, egg sauce. Trout, Hollandaise sauce.

Entrées.

Stewed terrapin. Muskallonge à l'Italienne. Matelote of eels, pike, carp, and trout. Sun-fish au gratin.

Rôtis.

Conger-eel. Pike. Salad of lettuce. Corn salad.

Entremets.

Potatoes à l'Anglaise. Stewed cabbage. Green pease. Omelet au rhum. Rice croquettes. Madeira jelly. Tapioca pudding. Chocolate cream.

Dessert.

Cheese. Éclairs au café. Iced oranges. Filbert biscuits. Kisses. Salad of pine-apples. Macaroons. Candied fruit. Fruit and nuts.

SUPPER.

Cake Madeleine. Charlotte of fruits. Crème au caramel. Fruit.

BREAKFAST.

Red radishes. Omelet fines-herbes. Pickled beans. Potatoes à la Parisienne. Carrots au jus. Cheese. Fruit.

LUNCH.

Pickled currants. Cake Milanais. Cranberry jelly. Fruit.

DINNER.

Potages.

Terrapin soup. Tomato soup.

Hors-d'œuvre.

Capers. Tunny. Pickled tomatoes. Olives.

Relevés.

Turbot Béchamel. Shad au gratin.

Entrées.

Green turtle steaks. Stewed snails. Flounder Normande. Trout à la Chambord.

Rôtis.

Lamprey. Fried frogs. Dandelion salad. Lettuce salad.

Entremets.

Potatoes Hollandaise. Stuffed cucumbers. Stewed beets. Omelet soufflée. Apples flambantes. Rissoles. Banana fritters. Soufflé of rice.

Dessert.

Cheese. Glazed oranges. Biscuits of almonds. Creamcakes. Iced coffee. Jelly Macédoine. Lady's-fingers. Croquignolles. Fruit and nuts.

SUPPER.

Cake Nantais. Omelet au sucre. Apple Charlotte. Fruit.

Although we have given quite a variety of dishes, there are still many more that can be served during Lent.

In soups we have not mentioned those made with corn starch, tapioca, sago, vermicelli, macaroni, okra.

It will be noticed also that we have not mentioned oysters, clams, mussels, and scallops, which are quite a different variety of fish. We have omitted these purposely, so that any of them may be used instead of a fish that is not liked, either for breakfast, lunch, or supper.

Dock and poke make good dishes of greens; rhubarb is a healthy vegetable, stewed or made in pie.

Water-cress is eaten in salad, or with salt only.

Pepper-grass and wild chiccory also make a good salad.

Eggs are prepared in several ways besides those we have mentioned—such as au gratin, poached, stuffed; in matelote, in fricassee, in salad, and with cheese. Omelets are made with fruits, cheese, lobster, mushrooms, and oysters.

Lobster, besides being prepared in salad, makes excellent croquettes and pies, and is very good when scalloped.

Oysters, besides being used raw, are served broiled, fried, stewed, scalloped, and in patties.

Several excellent dishes and cakes are made with puff paste, such as allumettes, cakes feuilletés, pommées, portemanteaux, tartelettes, etc.

Vol-au-vent, bouchies, or patties, are also made with puff paste, and filled with oysters, or with any kind of stewed fish, lobster, fruits, and sweetmeats.

Several bills of fare can be made with the above articles, and according to taste.

Others may also be made out of the two last ones suggested for dinner. We have given them as a guide, not with the expectation that they would be executed literally; but, as we have said above, in order to suit every taste and fancy.

Sometimes a person feels the need of food late in the evening, but is afraid to eat any thing that might disturb sleep. The following nourishing drink may be taken with impunity by almost every one:

Put two yolks of raw eggs in a tumbler, and pour boiling water over them little by little, stirring briskly with a tea-spoon; add a pinch of salt, sweeten to taste, and drink warm.

Bavaroises au chocolat, broth, and consommé are also excellent at night.

THE LADY LOAFER'S RIGHTS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

A PAPER published in the interests of woman thus illustrates and denounces

SMALL ARISTOCRACY.

"Women are the most absurd creatures, all owing to the silly fancy that it is lady-like to be a loafer. A little time ago one of my small, busy housekeeper friends asked a lady loafer caller what had become of her sister.

"'She goes down town every day now,' said the lady loafer, hesitatingly.

"'Is she at work?' inquired the housekeeper.

"'Well, ye—yes,' said the lady loafer, still more hesitatingly.

"'What does she do?' inquired my friend.

"The lady loafer stammered, and backed off painfully two or three times, and finally made a clean breast of it, thus:

"'She—she—she has charge of the trimmings in a—dress-making establishment. She has nothing to do with the dress-making. She has charge of the trimmings. It's not a common dress-making establishment. It's one of the fashionable dress-makers. She won't make a dress for a poor person.'

"'Oh, glory! fan me with a cabbage leaf!' quoth my friend, the small, busy housekeeper.

"The idea of a body's dress-maker setting herself to be 'highstocracy!'"

Passing over some little points of style—which, however, it is to be regretted that women are not more careful to observe—does not this paragraph display something worse even than the "silly fancy" which it ridicules? It is, perhaps, weak for a woman who is obliged or who finds it convenient to work for money to attempt to conceal the fact, or to be in the least degree ashamed of it. That there should be an aristocracy of dress-making, however, is no more absurd than an aristocracy of birth, wealth, or station. So far from being an absurd, it is an honorable ambition. To be a successful fashionable dress-maker implies far higher qualities than to be a mere common needlewoman. Any girl can sit in a crowded room and sew up a seam, but to have charge of the trimmings—reflect upon what that word involves in this era of trimmings—in a fashionable dress-making establishment argues a taste, a skill, an ingenuity, a fertility of resources, an administrative ability, which we might, perhaps, vainly look for in the Marquis of Halifax, the great original Trimmer. No: let us by all means encourage every form of professional ambition, that women may be stimulated to use their best efforts and master their craft.

But what is to be strenuously objected to is that our "small, busy housekeeper," who is so superior to the weaknesses of her "loafer" visitor, is a stupid, impertinent, ill-bred little person, and neither she nor her admiring biographer seems to know it; and while a "silly fancy" in a woman is a weakness, impertinence and ill-breeding are fatal vices. The weak woman ought to be gently but firmly guided into strength; the inquisitive and impertinent woman ought to be buried alive. When the small, busy housekeeper inquired for Lady Loafer's sister the latter gave a general answer, and gave even that hesitatingly. The small housekeeper observed it, and her first duty as a woman and a Christian was to glide gently off the subject, and spare her visitor not only the pain of the theme, but the pain of perceiving that she perceived her pain! The little housekeeper was not called upon to preach a crusade against folly, or to bring her visitor to the confessional by torture, but simply to exercise hospitality, and hospitality requires you to make your visitor, as far as possible, comfortable and happy. But the nimble little imp, without the slightest regard to good manners or to the feelings of her visitor—a thing which good-breeding always does regard—this small wretch continues, indeed intensifies, her impudent and vulgar prying into her friend's secret. "Is she at work?" "Yes," says the lady, still more hesitatingly. "What does she do?" pursues this human gnat; and having extorted from the lady the secret which she sought to defend, the gnat seals her triumph with a coarse sneer.

And her biographer names the housekeeper her friend, and calls the innocent victim and visitor a loafer!

But one such prying, meddlesome, unwomanly, pachydermatous little housekeeper is a greater pest to society than all the "lady loafers" that hang upon its skirts. The lady loafer indulges a silly but harmless fancy. She hurts no one but herself. But Mrs. Paul Pry is as mischievous as she is shallow.

In a court of justice, possibly in a Congressional committee of investigation, it is lawful to put questions which the respondent may be reluctant to answer. But no woman has a right to convert a drawing-room, her own or another's, into a hall of justice or a temple of reform without having previously warned all comers. Give out word, Madame Pry, that you do not intend to be bound by the instinctive rules of polite society; proclaim that in choosing topics of conversation you will not have the slightest regard to the history, opinions, prejudices, tastes, sensitiveness, of your visitors; that even when you perceive you are treading on forbidden ground you will only tread all the harder; that when your callers evade your questions you will but make them more pointed and painful—and if we then give you opportunity to annoy us, it will be our own fault. Raise your red flag, and we will take another street.

We can not help being awkward, but we can help being abominable. To enter gracefully, to sit attractively, is a gift of the gods, but nobody is obliged to be hateful. We are all liable to fits of stupidity, momentary or life-long, to stumble upon topics which we should avoid, and to shamble off discomfited when our only salvation is to sweep away unconscious and serene. But to introduce a topic which you are aware may be disagreeable to your friend, to persist in a question which makes him palpably uncomfortable, is a sin for which there is no forgiveness in this world, nor in any world to come which we should care to go to.

That the topic ought not to be disagreeable, that the question is one which it is weak in your friend to be unwilling to answer, is neither here nor there. His weakness is the very thing which his friends ought to be tender of. Where we are strong we can take care of ourselves. Where we are strong we are not liable to be hurt. Your friend's weakness is his own affair. It may not be profitable to him, but he has a right to it. You have no more right to attack it than you have to rob him of his money. The difference, the distinguishing difference, between the lady and the small-busy-housekeeper species of the human female is that the lady perceives and respects the most delicate individual rights, which the small, busy housekeeper utterly fails to discern, and which are consequently trampled into a muddle by her dull, egotistic feet.

Hosted by Google

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SPRING BONNETS.

OPENINGS at the wholesale houses have displayed spring millinery. The new bonnets are not bonnets, but merely round hats with strings. They are odd, picturesque, becoming, but of decidedly incongruous shape, with large, square, sensible crowns, accompanied by most fantastic brims, turned up on one side or the other, no matter which, behind or before, just as caprice dictates, and never twice alike. This queer brim is a feature, and in its variety offers something to suit all faces. The bonnet is placed very far back, mounting the crown of the high coiffure and leaving all the front of the head bare. These new shapes are the outgrowth of the eccentric Rabagas bonnet worn during the winter.

Straw bonnets will be more worn than all others. The choice among these is the fine split Belgian straw, worth $5 50 untrimmed, the soft snowy white dressed chips made of sewed braid, and the écru, or undressed chip, which costs from $3 upward. A new bonnet, called the Valerie, is made of silk floss, buff or lavender, woven to resemble straw. This is $5 untrimmed. There are also quantities of black chip and soft black straw bonnets sent out from the best French houses. These are very light and fine, and when trimmed with fine flowers and lace will be considered more distinguished than the black lace bonnets that have been worn so long.

TRIMMING.

By way of trimming there is less lace than usual, and ribbon is little used except for the very long strings, which are three inches wide, and tied under the chin. The principal garniture is soft repped silk, called gros d'Orleans, cut bias, and arranged in single careless-looking folds, with occasional bows made of many ends or loops, but with fewer flutings, quillings, and streaming draperies than we have lately had. Compactness seems to be the idea in decorations, even in the fine flowers which will be used in a profusion that is positively extravagant; for these are no longer clambering vines and long trailing sprays, but thick wreaths and mélanges, bouquets of various flowers grouped in contrasting hues. Two, three, and even four shades appear on one bonnet; two shades are of one color, and the others in contrast. Thus there are folds of two tints of blue-gray, with folds of the new limon-color—the pale greenish-yellow of limes—and a wreath of pink roses; or else two light olive shades are associated with deepest blue silk and very pale tea-roses; another combination is crimson roses, light and dark réséda reps, with white folds. An elaborate face trimming is seen on all bonnets. This consists of a thick wreath of flowers or a torsade of ribbons, placed directly above the forehead and under the upturned revers or high coronet, or, if you like, all around beneath the whole brim of the bonnet. The pretty ruches of lace and tulle that crowned the forehead so becomingly have disappeared from French bonnets.

WREATHS AND BOUQUETS.

The new wreaths and bouquets revive the flowers of old-fashioned gardens—sweet-pea blossoms, hyacinths, dwarf roses, garden pinks, mignonette, geraniums, violets, bluebells, forget-me-nots, heliotropes, and lilies of the valley in abundance; mixed with these are dried grasses, herbs, moss, pine cones, and berries. The foliage is bronzed leaves, or else very dark autumn hues, with striped grasses. Quantities of wild roses are imported, white, red, and yellow eglantine in a single cluster, and there are many half-decayed faded roses that seem ready to fall to pieces; roses, pansies, and white lily bells form a pretty bouquet. Full coronet wreaths are of blue myosotis, with moss, herbs, and dried grasses; for brunettes are poppy wreaths, with straw leaves veined with jet.

OLD SILVER.

A novelty this season is artistic ornaments of vieille argent, or old silver, set about on the bonnet as buckles, brooches, and darts with swinging chains; especially stylish among these is a comb-like piece in filigree designs representing the top of a high-back Spanish comb. This is used to catch up the side of brims, or is mounted with violets and pink Bourbon roses and worn on the back of the bonnet.

ROUND HATS.

Among the round hats that are not misnamed bonnets are found the same erratic brims already described, with very high steeple crowns. The Medici and Castilian shapes will probably find most favor for city use. The Medici has an ample brim, projecting squarely over the forehead, while each side is turned up high and close against the crown, and the back descends in a very sharp point. The Castilian has a steeple crown, with projecting brim turned up on one side only, and is trimmed with the new long plumes of many green cock's feathers clustered together. The brims stand out very prominently, and are no longer filled up with fluffy puffs and frizzes of hair. There are wreaths of roses, geraniums, and eglantine, or else a twisted ribbon torsade, placed under the brims of Rabagas hats that are turned up all around. To trim a Castilian black straw, take one of Virot's for a model. Face the brim plainly with black faille, turn up the left side very high, and hold it in place by a filigree silver comb piece; put two or three folds of bias silk around the crown, with clusters of loops on the left, and a bouquet of forget-me-nots and rose-buds on the right; two black ostrich tips hanging over the back of the brim complete the trimming. An English straw Rabagas has pale blue facing on the brim, a fringed blue silk scarf passes around the crown, and is fastened behind by a silver clasp showing Egyptian beads, while under the brim is a wreath of rose-buds and lilies of the valley. Another, trimmed with peacock blue, has a wreath of purple heliotropes and well-blown roses.

SORTIES DU BAL.

A new carriage hood for evening is in the shape of a Spanish veil. It is made of white zephyr wool, is attached to a coronet of flowers and ribbons, falls over the neck and shoulders, and is fastened on the bosom by bows and rose-buds. Price $15.

KID GLOVES.

The bulk of kid glove importations consists of long-wristed gloves, fastened by three or four buttons, and ornamented with embroidery on the back and wrists. Pale shades of the greenish-gray called réséda, very light olive green and olive brown, blue-grays that approach lavender, and brown with rosy tints, called mordoré, are the novel colors imported to match costumes of these shades; these are for general street wear, church, etc. For conservative ladies whose gloves serve with various suits there are the staple tans, brown, drab, ashes-of-roses, and steel-colors; blue-black and very dark plum-colored gloves are more stylish than jet black for the present season. For dressy occasions, such as carriage visiting, afternoon receptions, and the theatre, a new caprice is for gloves of a faint green with yellow tinges, that is best described as "gosling green;" salmon, écru, cream-color (not yellow-buff), pearl, and rosy flesh tints will be retained for afternoon and evening. To wear with handsome black costumes of silk or grenadine there are delicate green, lavender, gray, and écru shades, with black stitching on the wrists, or else black binding. Short gloves, fastened by only one button, cost $1 65 a pair; longer gloves, with two buttons, are $2; with three buttons, $2 50; those fastened by four buttons are found only in very soft light shades, and cost $2 75; gloves to be worn with short sleeves have six buttons, and cost $3 25. The yellowish-white (blanc mat) gloves are preferred to blue-white for wedding occasions.

Gants de Suède, or undressed kid gloves, for morning, shopping, and traveling, become more popular daily. They are now brought in darker shades of blue-gray, olive brown, and drabs that do not show soil easily. The most stylish shape among these is very long and closed around the arm, requiring but one button to fasten the slit at the wrist. Those fastened by two buttons cost $1 75; by three buttons, $2; and by four, $2 25; the latter are as long as six-buttoned gloves of ordinary kid. Excellent traveling gloves for ladies are of dog-skin, with double-stitched seams: the price, with one button, is $1 65; with two buttons, $2 a pair. Castor gloves are far lighter than old-fashioned buckskin, and are used for traveling and for bleaching and softening the hands. They have from one to three buttons, and cost from $1 75 to $2 25 a pair.

"Infants'" kid gloves are shown tiny enough for chubby hands of six-months-old babies: price $1 25. Misses' gloves, for girls of from six to fourteen years, are stitched tastefully, fastened by two buttons, and sold for $1 65; plain, long, stylish gloves of lovely pearl, pink, and buff shades, for dressy occasions, are fastened by three buttons, and cost $2 for girls' sizes. For boys there are double-stitched dog-skin gloves, far thicker and stronger than kid, and worth $1 50.

LISLE-THREAD AND LACE MITTS.

Ladies who can not wear kid gloves in warm weather should buy the English lisle-thread gloves that are too soft and fine to "creep," are fashioned throughout like kid, and will wash without fading or shrinking. They come in clear gray shades, and in a brown-buff that washes especially well. They are fastened by from one to four buttons, and cost from 60 to 90 cents.

Black lace mitts of the finest possible texture, made with deep flowing cuffs, will be worn in midsummer. Lace gloves with fingers will cover the entire hand in the old fashion worn by our grandmothers.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The flower parure for a single evening dress, with its garlands, mélanges, and coronet, requires half a dozen boxes to preserve it. One designed for one of the Russian princesses is of geranium leaves of varied hues, with great pouting rose-buds, and the dark tips of peacocks' plumes; another is long, trailing bronzed leaves and grasses, with bird-of-paradise plumage; a third is white water-lilies with aquatic grasses.

Pearl buckles are placed in the centre of bows, and used for fastening the belts of spring woolen costumes.

Very large pearl buttons, white, opal-tinted, and smoked pearl, with eyes or with shanks, are on suits of gray and blue linen. There are other buttons that look like rare yellow ivory, but are probably bone, for trimming piqué dresses.

Among stylish importations are polonaises of black cashmere, trimmed with steel buttons, steel fringe, and a wide moiré sash. A redingote of peacock blue cashmere is richly wrought with jet embroidery, and has a pelerine cape. For early spring is an over-skirt of pale réséda cashmere, and a sleeveless jacket of the same, edged with réséda lace, and fastened by large pearl buttons. This is to be worn over a silk skirt, waist, and sleeves of the same shade. For traveling is a suit of summer camel's-hair made with a redingote with belted front, basque back, and two rows of steel buttons down before.

Imported English jackets of Napoleon blue cloth are double-breasted, slashed, and trimmed with facings of lighter blue repped silk and rows of steel buttons.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; WORTHINGTON & SMITH; BALLARD & HALLEY; and THOMSON, LANGDON, & Co.

PERSONAL.

MR. DANIEL E. BANDMANN, the actor, sends to the Tribune some interesting reminiscences of the late Lord LYTTON: Personally he was the most amiable of men. He never made you feel uncomfortable in his presence. When he spoke it was as if a kind, modest, well-meaning friend was addressing you; and when he listened to your reply he gave you the impression that he desired to be instructed. His laugh was hearty, cordial, and sometimes loud, and when displeased he never spoke, but you could read it in his face at once, and take it as a warning. He disliked disagreeable discussions, and did not wish to displease even his inferior. Like our lamented friend HORACE GREELEY, he was a hard worker and a great enthusiast. Nothing great, he told me once in a conversation, can be achieved without enthusiasm. He would sit for hours over a verse, a line, a few words. I suggested to him that the play was too long and wanted curtailing, to which he willingly agreed, but under his supervision. It was impossible to cut without occasionally destroying the metre; to that he most emphatically objected, and I have seen him think over a few words for hours, and then give it up with the remark, "We had better leave it till morning; I am happier in early hours." One would usually find him in early hours in his study, with his long Turkish pipe by his side (which hardly ever left him when in-doors), working hard while others were yet enjoying "tired Nature's sweet restorer." All his plays were produced under an assumed name. On the night of the production of the Lady of Lyons he was obliged to speak on a great question in Parliament, and could not be present to see his play. After the debate he hastened to the theatre, and, on leaving the corridor, met the Marquis of Salisbury, who was just entering it. "Not at the debate, my lord?" "No; I felt seedy, so I went to the Garden to see the 'new piece.'" "And how did you like it?" "Oh, trash," was the short reply of the marquis, as he entered the House. They both had many hearty laughs over this encounter in after-years. This was the first honest opinion Lord LYTTON received upon the production of his new play.

—The United States has given to the musical world of Europe another prima donna, who, from all accounts, bids fair to rank with PATTI and KELLOGG. We allude to Mrs. EMELINE REED, whose recent début in opera, at Malta, is the subject of enthusiastic encomium by the press of that city. Mrs. REED is a young lady of Brooklyn, who for two years has been in Milan studying under the best masters. Previously to that she was the soprano in the choir of Holy Trinity Church, Brooklyn, and on several occasions has sung at Steinway Hall and at the Brooklyn Academy, always with success. The Malta Times, commenting on her performance of Leonora in La Favorita, says, "Mrs. REED sings with such expression, and in a style so simple and unaffected, as to draw forth bursts of applause, and on the first evening was honored with three recalls." She is to appear at La Scala, in Milan, in April, in Mignon.

—"Shirley Dare" has been on a visit to Mrs. HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD at her home in Newburyport, where the houses all look old and dusty and mossy and vine-covered, as if the people were too busy and having too good times inside to care whether the paint was bright out. Mrs. SPOFFORD'S house is large, old-fashioned, standing close to the street, with low, wide rooms, looking as if people lived in them. Style Mrs. S. has none, which is the highest compliment that can be paid any woman. (She is like a very fine odor that can not be detected if you draw your breath.) She is a fragile woman, with soft dark hair, worn in a careless curl or two at the side, and kind, sensible, dark eyes. What most pleases in her conversation is a matter-of-fact goodness and good sense, and her mental presence is one of the healthiest in the world.

—Mr. WILLIAM SIMPSON and Mr. ROBERT LANDELLS, two of the special artists of the Illustrated London News, have received from the Emperor of Germany war medals as tokens of distinction conferred upon them for their artistic labors in the recent war.

—Speaking of life on the stage, Madame LUCCA sees in it nothing of the fascination that makes it so attractive to most performers. She says:

"It is the saddest life on earth. I want my husband, my parents, my child, my home. I am not as other artistes. I can not become intoxicated, as the Celts do, with admiration, and live on in a stream of excitement. While I am on the stage I do my very best. That is a mean artiste, that is no true artiste, who would not abandon herself wholly to her art upon the stage, not because the public is there—for I never know that the public is there—but because of the sake of art. I do not know that any body sees me when I am Margaret. I only know that I am being Margaret. But I shall stay on the stage just two years more. I do not care for so much money as other artistes do. I shall then have enough to accomplish all I have to undertake."

—Ex-United States Attorney-General JAMES SPEED, in a recent lecture before the Indianapolis Library Association, ably defended the jury feature of our jurisprudence. All the experience of a protracted and busy professional life had convinced him that the outcry which is periodically raised against the system is not well grounded, and that no other human tribunal, on the whole, better subserves the ends of justice.

—A Maine young lady visited the President recently, and writes to the Portland Press: "He gave me his autograph with a smile and shrug of the shoulders. 'The only objection I have to complying with your desire is that it obliges me to put on my glasses, and they make me look so very old to the ladies.'"

—The late JAMES SUYDAM, one of the old and honored merchants of this city, has been made the subject of a bronze statue, which is to be placed on the esplanade in front of Suydam Hall, of the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church at New Brunswick, New Jersey. The execution of this statue is the first great work of Mr. HESS, and critics pronounce it an effort of true genius. It will be exhibited at the Somerville Gallery on the 6th of March.

—The women have had another success in high quarters in England. A department of the civil service, known as the local government board, has just appointed Mrs. NASSAU SENIOR poor-law inspector, with a salary of $2000 a year, to report upon the domiciles and treatment of children who are "boarded out," after the Scotch system.

—Dr. SHELTON MACKENZIE, of the Philadelphia Press, contradicts from personal knowledge the report that Mr. DISRAELI was not the owner of Hughenden Manor and would have to vacate it. The good doctor states that in 1850 he received a note from Mrs. D., whom he had long known, requesting him to call on her in reference to the publication of an engraved portrait of her husband. "'Mr. DISRAELI,' said she, 'will accompany me to-morrow to Buckinghamshire, where I shall give him a pleasant surprise. He now is member for Bucks, you know, which requires a qualification of six hundred pounds a year, and this, like many other members, he has obtained from a friend. I was told some time ago that Hughenden Manor, near High Wycombe, was in the market, and eighteen months ago, when Mr. DISRAELI went to Nottinghamshire to attend the funeral of his friend Lord GEORGE BENTINCK—the only time during the eleven years of our marriage that we ever were separated for four-and-twenty hours—I ran down to Bucks, saw the place, and made up my mind to buy it. To-morrow I will take him there, and surprise him by presenting him with the title-deeds of landed property worth more than the nominal six hundred a year a county member is required to have.' The amount she had paid for this estate was sixteen thousand pounds, I think she said. At twenty-three years' purchase this would represent a rental of seven hundred pounds a year. Mrs. DISRAELI added: 'I bought this estate out of my own money, for two reasons. First, because the member from Bucks ought to have property in that county; and next, because his father, the great author, lived in that neighborhood for many years, and my husband knew the place and the people from childhood.' She loved to talk of her husband, and said: 'I have had a notion of this in my head for some time. When the elder Mr. DISRAELI died, two years ago, I got my husband to mark in the catalogue all the books that he preferred, and sent an agent privately down to buy them at the sale. He also purchased the black oak carved book-cases. So, when Mr. DISRAELI enters into his library to-morrow, he will meet the old books on the old familiar shelves.'"

—Father BJERRING, pastor of the Greek Church in this city, is making his home-like little chapel quite a place of resort for people who are on the alert for a fresh sensation. His parlors at 951 Second Avenue are crowded every Sunday morning. Father B. is a tall, handsome man, with light hair, a full light beard, and blue eyes. His eyebrows and eyelashes are almost white. He speaks very good English, and has the reputation of being a very well read man.

—Mr. RANDOLPH ROGERS, the American sculptor, has been elected a member of the Roman Academy of St. Luke. He is the first American sculptor upon whom this rare honor has ever been conferred.

—The Sheik of Guazan has celebrated with great pomp at Tangier his marriage with Miss KING, an English lady. The bride rode to the British consulate on an Arab horse, which was covered with a scarlet saddle and cloth embroidered with gold, and was presented by the bridegroom.

—Speaking of very old people, a recent number of the Rutland (Vermont) Herald says that WILLIAM EDWARDS, of Jay, who is almost 95 years of age, married a woman of 70 a few days ago. This old man was one of WELLINGTON'S soldiers, and was twice wounded at Waterloo. His grandfather was 104 when he died, his great-grandfather was 113, but he regards his father as having been cut off in his youth, as he died when only 67 years old. Mr. EDWARDS intends to make a trip to London next summer to claim a bounty due to British soldiers over 61 years, which, with accrued interest, will amount to nearly $5000.—The oldest graduate of Yale College, TIMOTHY BISHOP, is 94, and vigorous, taking his daily walk in the coldest weather. His associate, BERIAH BRADLEY, a stripling of 94, scorns to be called an old chap.—During the past year seventy-three persons over 90 years of age have died in New Hampshire. The following-named were over 100 years of age: MARY BROCKWAY, East Washington, 101 years 10 months 22 days; Mrs. GODDARD, North Littleton, 100 years 5 months 26 days; TEMPERANCE JEWETT, Barnstead, 100 years 7 months 7 days; JOSEPH LARAVIA, Somersworth, 100 years.—In Ireland lately died MARY M'ARDLE, at the age of 115. Her strong point was that she worked with the reapers last harvest, and kept up with her son, a frisky youth of 77.—The London Times has just published a list of medical men deceased during the past year. The following reached 80 and upward: HUGH ANDREWS and PETER MILLER, each 94 years of age; BOWYER VAUX, 91; AUGUSTUS BOZZI GRANVILLE and FRANCIS KIERNAN, each 89; ROBERT VENABLES, 88; ROBERT BUCHANAN, 86; THOMAS LEIGH BLUNDELL, 84; WILLIAM BODINGTON and JOHN GARDNER, each 82; THOMAS COLEMAN, 81; ROBERT WADE, THOMAS BARNES, and JAMES ALEXANDER GORDON, each 80 years of age. The united ages of these fourteen gentlemen amount to 1200 years, giving an average of more than 85 years to each.—Dr. CASPAR, of Berlin, in his work on the duration of human life, has placed medical men as representing a medium longevity of 56. Artists are represented at 57; lawyers at 58; military men, 59; farmers and clerks, 61; merchants, 62; and clergymen, 65. To prolong life the same authority adds that good temper and hilarity are necessary, violent passions, the inward gnawings of offended vanity and pride, tending to corrode every viscus, and to lay the seeds of future mental and bodily sufferings. Apathy and insensibility being, unfortunately, the best sources of peace of mind, and as FONTENELLE observed, "a good stomach and a bad heart are essential to happiness," perhaps the best maxim to prolong our days and render them as tolerable as possible is "Bene vivere et lætari."

Hosted by Google

Collar in Guipure Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS collar is worked on Swiss muslin or nansook with embroidery cotton and fine guipure cord or medium-sized thread. Fig. 53, Supplement, gives the pattern and design of one-half of the collar. Having transferred the design to a foundation of paper or linen, or to the Swiss muslin, run the outlines of the figures simulating a branch of coral and the outer edge of the collar with double embroidery cotton, and then stretch the bars of the open-work foundation with guipure cord or thread, in doing which carry the cord along the outlines in order to pass from one stitch to another. Button-hole stitch the outlines and the outer edge of the collar closely, as shown by Fig. 2, page 181, which gives a full-sized section of the collar. On the intersecting points of the stretched bars work a small dot each in satin stitch. Cut away the material underneath the bars. Finally, set the lace on the collar; this lace is worked like the embroidery on the collar. Woven guipure lace may be used instead; and woven netting may be used for the foundation to facilitate the work.

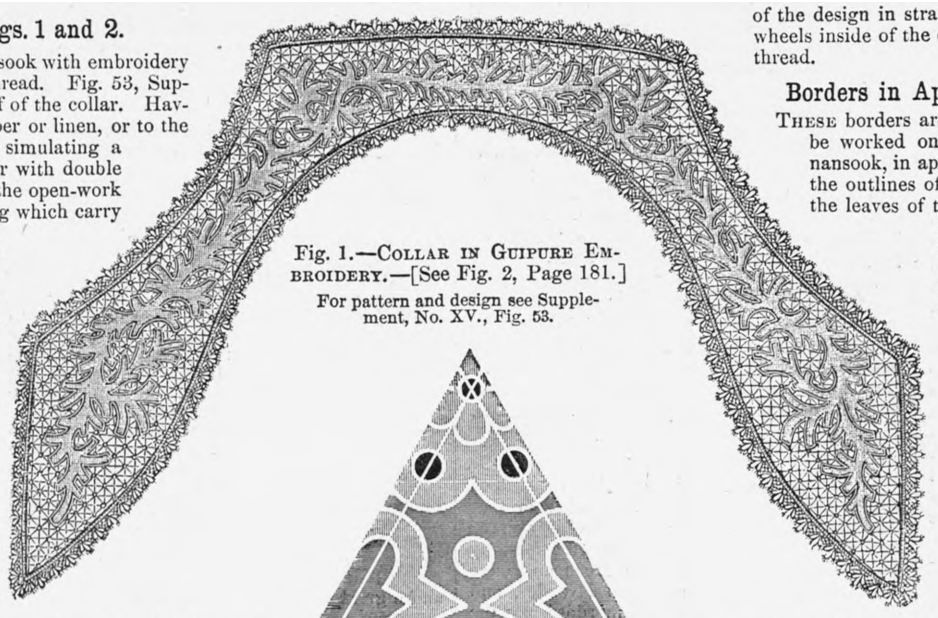

Fig. 1.—COLLAR IN GUIPURE EMBROIDERY.—[See Fig. 2, Page 181.]
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. XV., Fig. 53.

CIGAR-HOLDER.

Cigar-Holder.

THE stand of this cigar-holder is of black polished cane, furnished with a movable lid, and is seven inches and a quarter high, and seventeen inches in circumference. A piece of black polished wood, bored with holes and designed for holding cigars, is fastened inside seven-eighths of an inch from the upper edge. The cigar-holder is covered with a plaiting of brown worsted braid three-quarters of an inch wide and dark brown chenille, which is fastened on thick brown canvas, and trimmed with vertical ruches of light brown silk ribbon ornamented in point Russe embroidery with brown silk as shown by the illustration. This cover is lined with brown enameled cloth. The upper and under edges are bound with braid, and bordered with silk rolls also ornamented with point Russe stitching. The cover for the lid is made in a similar manner of the same material. In the middle of the lid is a button, which is covered with brown silk ornamented with point Russe stitches, and which serves for a handle.

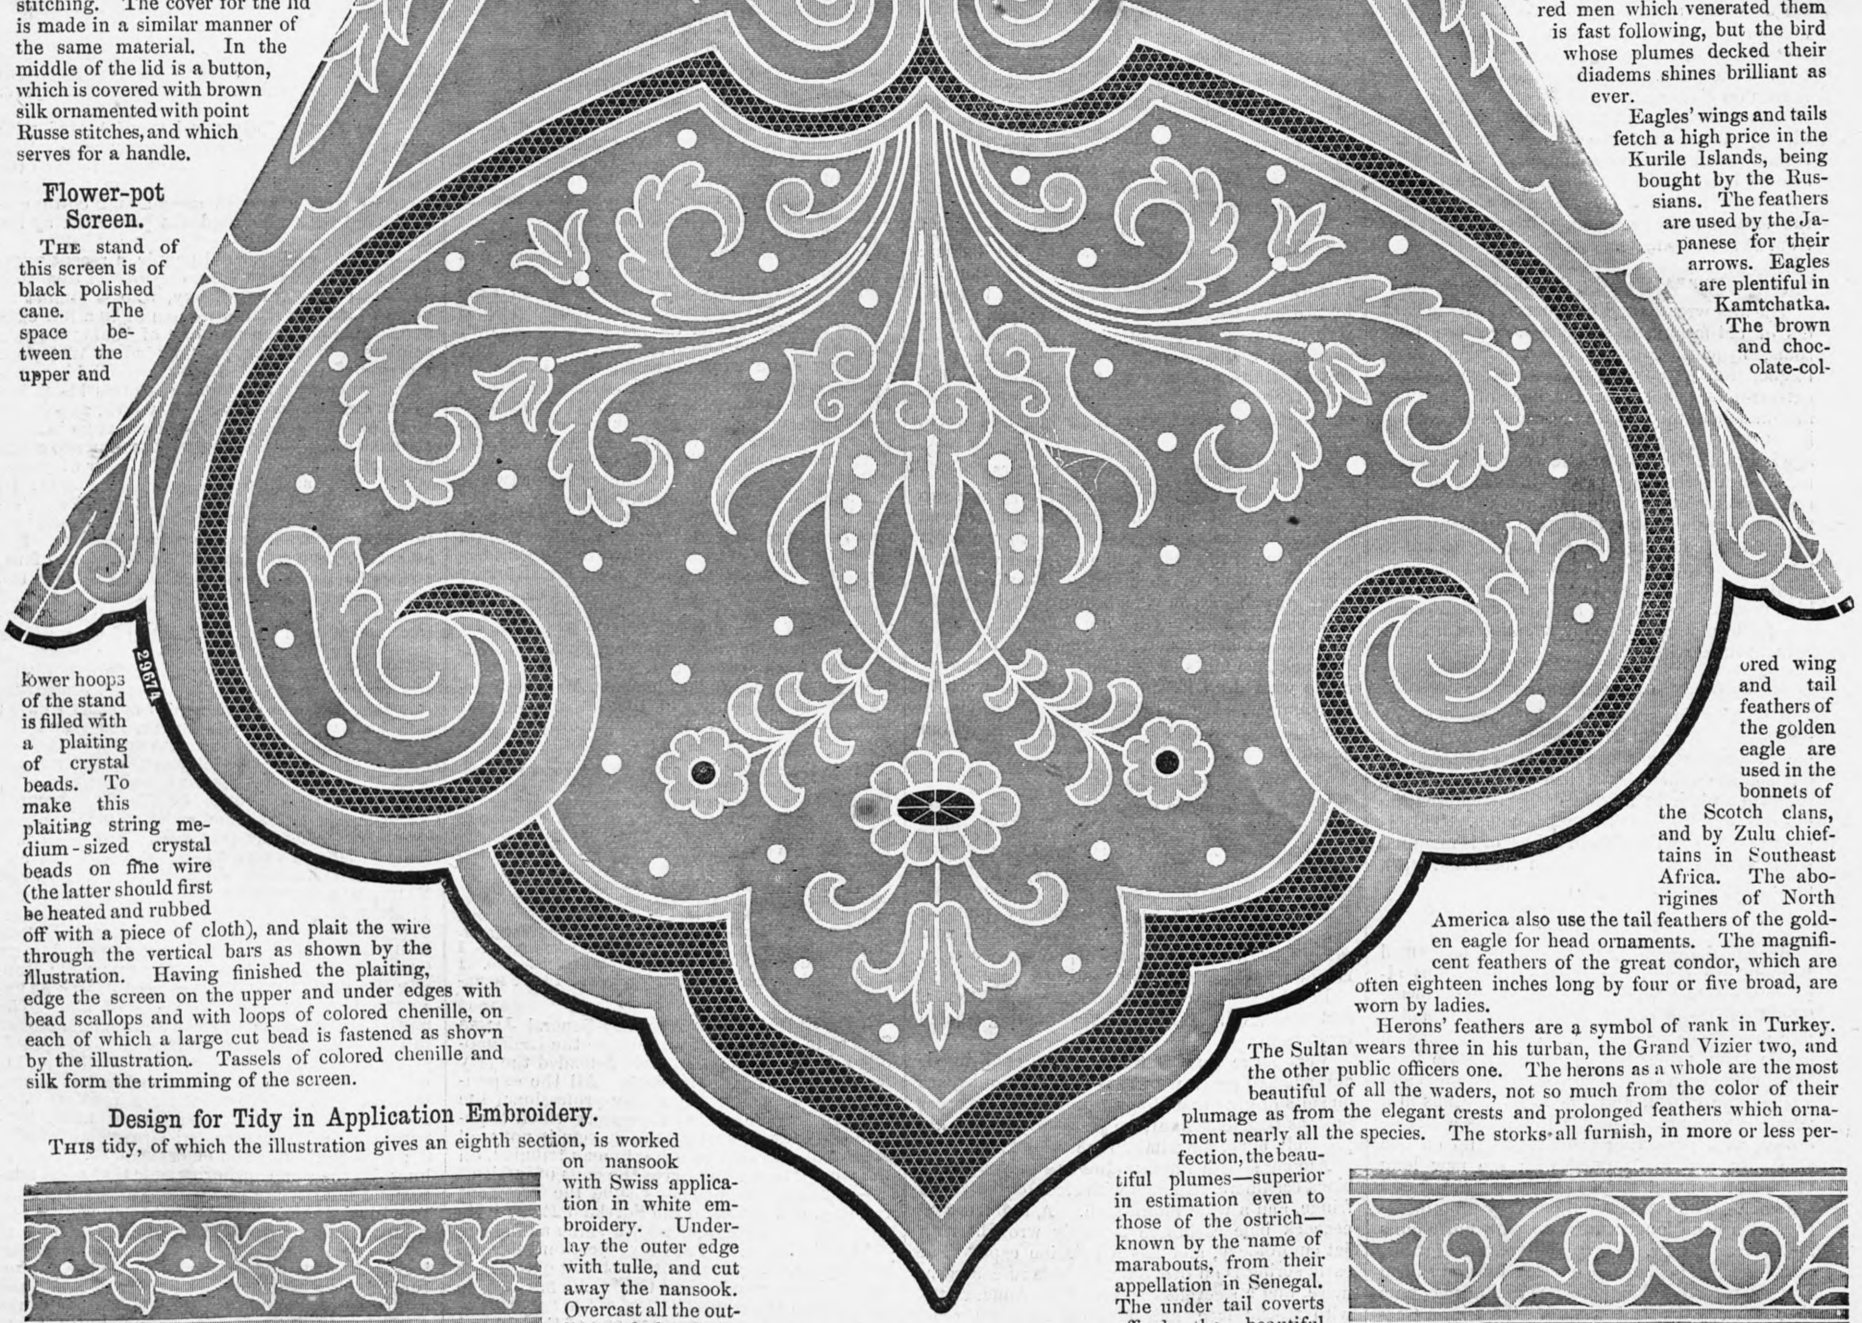
Flower-pot Screen.

THE stand of this screen is of black polished cane. The space between the upper and lower hoops of the stand is filled with a plaiting of crystal beads. To make this plaiting string medium-sized crystal beads on fine wire (the latter should first be heated and rubbed off with a piece of cloth), and plait the wire through the vertical bars as shown by the illustration. Having finished the plaiting, edge the screen on the upper and under edges with bead scallops and with loops of colored chenille, on each of which a large cut bead is fastened as shown by the illustration. Tassels of colored chenille and silk form the trimming of the screen.

Design for Tidy in Application Embroidery.

THIS tidy, of which the illustration gives an eighth section, is worked on nansook with Swiss application in white embroidery. Underlay the outer edge with tulle, and cut away the nansook. Overcast all the outlines of the Swiss application design figures closely, and work the white dots of the design in straight satin stitch. The open-work parts and the wheels inside of the design figures are worked in lace stitch with fine thread.

Fig. 1.—BORDER FOR LINGERIE, ETC.—APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.



DESIGN FOR TIDY IN APPLICATION EMBROIDERY. EIGHTH SECTION.

Borders in Application Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE borders are suitable for trimming lingerie, etc.; they may be worked on foundation material, such as Swiss muslin or nansook, in application of Swiss muslin or fine linen. Overcast the outlines of the application design figures and the veins in the leaves of the border Fig. 1 closely. The small dots of the same border are worked in satin stitch in the manner shown by the illustration.

The border Fig. 2, which is a simple and graceful design, consisting of a scroll between two straight lines, is entirely in application.

FLOWER-POT SCREEN.

FINE FEATHERS.

THE birds-of-paradise, distinguished for their splendor and elegance, are used for ornamenting turbans in the East, as well as for hats and head-dresses by European ladies. The genus Paradisea is chiefly restricted to New Guinea and the small islands in its vicinity. The most elegant in its plumage is the great bird-of-paradise (P. apoda), the back part of the neck being of a pale gold-color, the throat and fore part of the richest changeable golden green, the breast of a deep purple, and the body and tail of a fine dark chestnut. The hen birds are the most esteemed, being brighter in tint; the body feathers, which are yellowish, are partially dyed to enhance the color.

The most splendid bird of tropical America is the Trogon viridis or splendens. Aside from the brilliant metallic splendor of its plumage and the gracefulness of its form, there is a peculiar interest connected with this magnificent bird. The long, slender, gilded feathers of the tail coverts were allowed only to be worn by the royal family of the Incas. The Incas with all their gorgeous magnificence have passed away, and the race of the red men which venerated them is fast following, but the bird whose plumes decked their diadems shines brilliant as ever.

Eagles' wings and tails fetch a high price in the Kurile Islands, being bought by the Russians. The feathers are used by the Japanese for their arrows. Eagles are plentiful in Kamtchatka. The brown and chocolate-colored wing and tail feathers of the golden eagle are used in the bonnets of the Scotch clans, and by Zulu chieftains in Southeast Africa. The aborigines of North America also use the tail feathers of the golden eagle for head ornaments. The magnificent feathers of the great condor, which are often eighteen inches long by four or five broad, are worn by ladies.

Herons' feathers are a symbol of rank in Turkey. The Sultan wears three in his turban, the Grand Vizier two, and the other public officers one. The herons as a whole are the most beautiful of all the waders, not so much from the color of their plumage as from the elegant crests and prolonged feathers which ornament nearly all the species. The storks all furnish, in more or less perfection, the beautiful plumes—superior in estimation even to those of the ostrich—known by the name of marabouts, from their appellation in Senegal. The under tail coverts afford the beautiful plumes. The down of the young adjutant crane, and the white feathers of other cranes, are obtained in India and America, and are made into boas and muffs. The feathers of the white or sacred ibis are much used for ornamental purposes in the East, and are also sent to France, while the scarlet ibis of South America and Africa is likewise in request. The skins of the Arctic divers are dressed and made into cloaks, muffs, and cuffs, and are much esteemed as a covering for the head and breast in the rigorous climates in which they are found, the great thickness of the feathers rendering them very fit for that purpose. Russia and the Levant send us considerable quantities of the skins of grebes, ducks, and divers.

Fig. 2.—BORDER FOR LINGERIE, ETC.—APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.

Hosted by Google

In Chiloe, from the long ash-colored plumage of a species of penguin, which is a little curled and soft, the natives spin a kind of coverlet that is highly prized.

In parts of North America the Indians make an elegant clothing of the feathers of the wild turkey. They twist the inner webs into a strong double string with hemp or fibrous bark, and work it like matting. This appears very rich and glossy, and as fine as silk shag. Fans used to be made of the tail, and of four tails joined together the early French settlers in Louisiana were wont to construct a parasol.

Old writings speak of feathers being woven into a peculiar kind of cloth by the Chinese. Among them was the celestial goose-velvet, the foundation of the fabric being of silk, into which the feathers were skillfully interwoven in a common loom, those of a crimson hue being the most expensive. Tradition states that garments made of feathers, and resembling fur dresses, were presented to the Emperor Shauhau, who reigned twenty-five centuries before our era. The earliest allusion to robes woven with feathers occurs in the history of the Tsin dynasty. In the year 272 A.D. the court physician presented the emperor with a gown made of feathers from the golden-headed pheasant. A son of the Emperor Wuti, notorious for his extravagance, had in the fifth century a robe woven with peacocks' feathers.

It was also the custom of the emperors to make presents annually to certain ministers of state of robes made with the feathers of the variegated kingfisher. At a later period a princess engaged a skillful artificer to collect feathers of every description to make two dresses for the empress, which should, when looked at in front, present one color, when viewed sideways another, and when held up to the light a third. Although the Chinese would seem to have lost the art of weaving feathers, plumage-work is still extensively practiced in the decoration of metallic ornaments, worn by all classes of females. On garlands, chaplets, frontals, tiaras, and crowns of very thin copper, purple, dark and light blue feathers of the kingfisher and other birds of gorgeous brilliancy are laid with exquisite taste and skill.

Fig. 1.—SWISS MUSLIN, LACE, AND VERT D'EAU RIBBON CAP.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 49-51.

SWISS MUSLIN, LACE, AND BLUE RIBBON CAP.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Fig. 48.

Fig. 2.—SWISS MUSLIN, LACE, AND VERT D'EAU RIBBON CAP.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 49-51.

CRÊPE DE CHINE AND LACE FICHU.

For description see Supplement.

CRÊPE DE CHINE FICHU.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Fig. 47.

ular alternation, so as to form close, open-work, and open squares. The close squares are ornamented in point Russe embroidery with filling silk of various colors. Green satin ribbon is run through the canvas as shown by the illustration, and each open square formed by drawing out the threads is trimmed with a bow of similar ribbon and with a clipped green worsted ball. To make the worsted balls tie up a worsted strand of thirty threads at regular intervals with a piece of thread, cut through the strand exactly in the middle between the tied points, and clip the tassels thus formed evenly with the scissors. The canvas ornamented in this manner is basted on stiff linen, bound on the upper and under edges with green satin ribbon, trimmed with a ruche of the same, and fastened to the bars of the stand with small pins.

Crochet Insertions, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE insertions are suitable for trimming linen; they are both worked crosswise in rounds going back and forth with twisted crochet cotton, No. 100.

Fig. 1.—For this insertion make a foundation of 25 ch. (chain stitch), pass over the last 14 of these, and going back on the remaining foundation st. (stitch), work the 1st round.—1 sl. (slip stitch) on the next st., twice alternately 9 ch., 1 sl. on the fifth following foundation st.; t. (turn the work). 2d round.—Twice alternately 9 ch., 1 sc. (single crochet) on the same st. on which the sl. of the preceding round has been worked; in doing this the sl. is thus surrounded in this as well as in the following corresponding rounds; then 9 ch. and 1 sc. on the 15th foundation st. (counting from the beginning), t. 3d round.—Three times alternately 9 ch., 1 sl. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop in the first round (the ch. scallop of the preceding round is not surrounded), then 9 ch., 1 sl. on the last sl. of the first round, t. 4th round.—5 sl. on the next 5 ch., 4 ch., 1 sc. on the same st. in the first round on which the sl. of the preceding round was worked; twice alternately 9 ch., 1 sc. on the same st. of the first round on which the sl. of the preceding round was worked; 4 ch., 1 sl. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop, t. 5th round.—Three times alternately 9 ch., 1 sl. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop in the third round, t. 6th round.—Three times alternately 9 ch., 1 sc. on the same st. on which the sl. of the preceding round was worked, t. 7th round.—Three times alternately 9 ch., 1 sl. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop in the fifth round, then 9 ch. and 1 sl. on the last sl. of the fifth round, fasten to the fifth sl. of the fourth round, t. 8th round.—5 sl. on the next 5 ch., 4 ch., 1 sc. on the same st. in the sixth round on which the sl. of the preceding round was worked, twice alternately 9 ch., 1 sc. on the same st. on which the sl. of the preceding round was worked, 4 ch., 1 sl. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop, t. Continue in this manner until the insertion has gained the requisite length. Edge it first on one side with one round of sl., and then work on both sides two rounds each as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 sl. on the next edge st., 9 ch., with these pass over 4 edge st. 2d round.—* 1 sc. on the fourth st. of the next ch. scallop, 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 2 dc. (double crochet), and 1 sdc. on the following st., 1 sc. on the next (sixth) st. of the same ch. scallop, 2 ch.; repeat from *.

Fig. 2.—To make this insertion work a foundation of 17 ch., one picot downward, and 15 ch.; for the picot work 5 ch., drop the last st. from the needle, insert the needle in the first of the 5 ch., and draw through the dropped st. Going back on this foundation work the 1st round.—4 ch. (the first 3 of which count as first dc.), 1 dc. on the next foundation st., four times alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following foundation st., 5 ch., 9 dc. separated each by 1 ch. on the picot, 5 ch., with these pass over 6 foundation st., 1 dc. on the next st., five times alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following foundation st., t. 2d round.—4 ch., 1 dc. on the next ch. in the preceding round, five times alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. on the next ch., 3 ch., 4 sc. separated each by 3 ch. on the next 4 ch. of the dc. scallop, 5 ch., 4 sc. separated each by 3 ch. on the following 4 ch. of the dc. scallop, 3 ch., 1 dc. on the last of the next 5 ch., five times alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. on the following ch., t. These two rounds are repeated constantly, in the manner shown by the illustration.

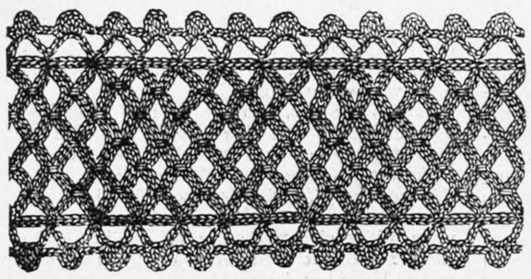

Fig. 1.—CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

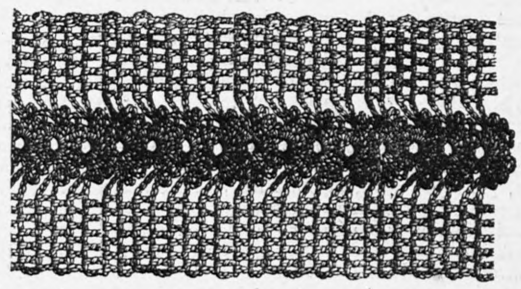

Fig. 2.—CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

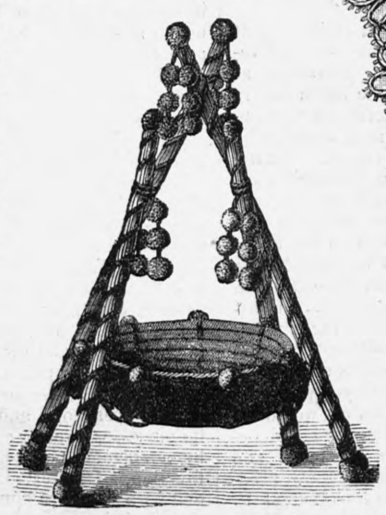
Jewel-Case with Stand.

THIS stand consists of four long and short bars of fine yellow cane, which are ornamented at each end with a clipped red worsted ball wound with fine red silk cord and fastened together with the same. The case is made of yellow straw braid arranged in coils, and is trimmed on the upper edge with a lambrequin of red silk cord and worsted balls, and is fastened to the bars with similar cord. To make the lambrequin sew on a piece of cord, which forms the upper edge, for each scallop six short and long cord loops; work two button-hole stitches in opposite directions into each of these loops and between the scallops on the upper cord, and cover the joining points of the loops with worsted balls. Silk cord tassels and worsted balls form the trimming of the stand.

Bouquet-Holder.

THE stand of this bouquet-holder is made of black cane. It is eight inches and a half high, and is furnished with a tube-shaped zinc vase. The covering is made of light gray Panama canvas, from which are drawn out a certain number of lengthwise and crosswise threads in reg-



JEWEL-CASE WITH STAND.

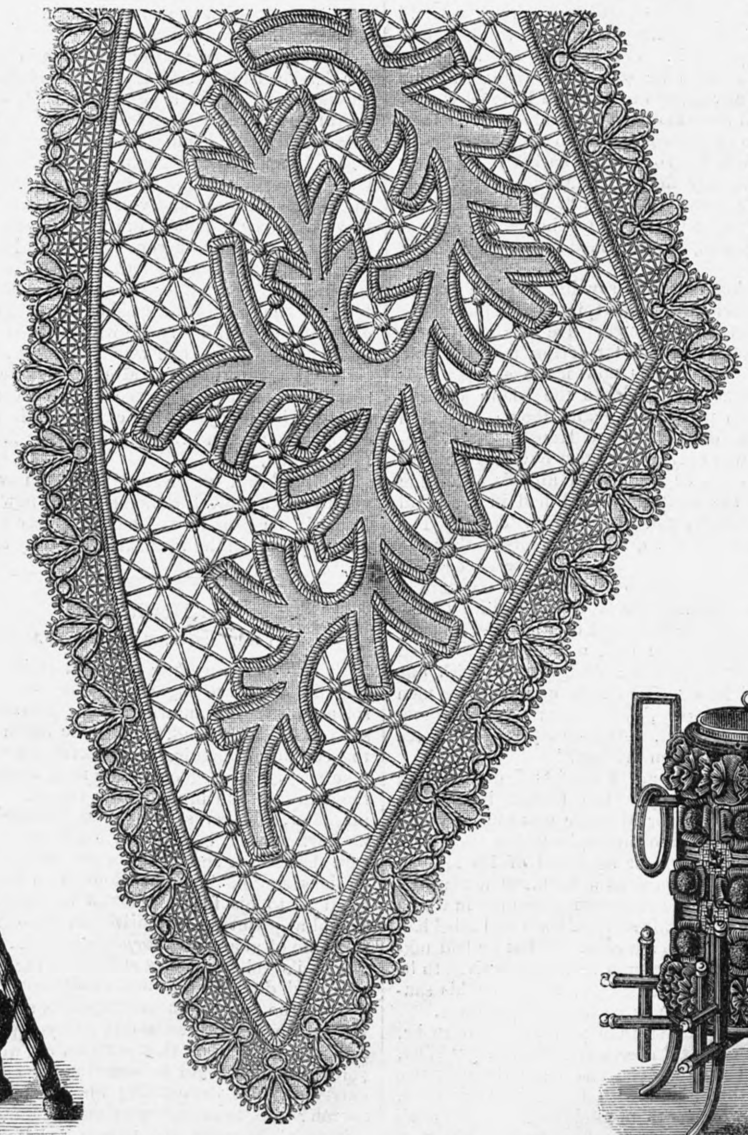


Fig. 2.—SECTION OF COLLAR IN GUIPURE EMBROIDERY.—FULL SIZE.—[See Fig. 1, Page 180.]

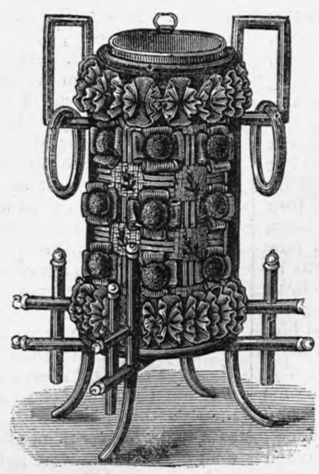

BOUQUET-HOLDER.

Hosted by Google

AWAKENED.

MY heart was like a hidden lyre
In silence that so long hath lain—
Not e'en the cold, neglected wire
Remembereth its own sweet strain:
Till thou, a breeze from summer shore,
Breathed tenderly across the string,
That, waking into life once more,
Began the broken song to sing.

My soul was like a diamond spark
Imprisoned in the rocky mine,
Unconscious, in that eyeless dark,
What hidden fires within it shine:
Till thou, a gleam of noonday light,
Upon the buried jewel came,
That, breaking from its long, dull night,
Leaped up, a many-tinted flame.

My life was like a pallid flower
Within the shadow sprung, alone,
Forgotten of the sun and shower,
And withering ere it has blown:
Till thou, a drop of morning dew,
Stole softly downward through the gloom,
And straight the bud asunder flew
To fill the air with balm and bloom.

Then take, and fashion to thy will,
This heart and soul and life of mine!
Shall not thine own free gifts fulfill
Their utmost hope in seeking thine?
I claim no harvest from a field
My hands have tended not: the tone,
The fragrance, and the light revealed
By thee, belong to thee alone!

MURPHY'S MASTER.

BY JAMES PAYN,

Author of "A Woman's Vengeance," "Bred in the Bone," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," etc.

CHAPTER XV.

MAGUIRE'S ULTIMATUM.

THE revelation of this view of his patron was to Robert in itself sufficiently overwhelming, but what was still more terrible was the reflection, "And with this man I have cast in my lot, and not only mine, but Lizzy's!" In the bitterness of his heart he groaned and bowed his face between his hands.

"Come, come, look up," cried Maguire, encouragingly. "It is no use hiding one's head like an ostrich, to escape from an inevitable position. You called me a Liar, you know, and that perhaps made me acquaint you with these little particulars more abruptly than was judicious. You believe me now, I suppose, or will do so when you have read that newspaper?"

"Take it away!" ejaculated Robert, with a gesture of loathing; "I am convinced enough."

"Now that is what I call a proof of sense," observed Maguire, in a congratulatory tone. "The object of a newspaper writer is, of course, to harrow the feelings; and therefore, when you want any dramatic incident communicated to you in a delicate way, it is better to trust to a friend. What happened at Falston, stripped of cant and sensation, was, as I understand, something of this kind: the brothers had a private interview, in which Frank talked of his mother's memory and his father's dying wishes, and Louis listened, not with very particular attention, his thoughts being probably entirely engrossed by his own affairs; but when the question was directly put to him, 'Are you going to fulfill the promise that you gave our father in my presence with regard to the distribution of his property, or do you intend to take the whole, since the law awards it to you?' I have not the least doubt that he replied, with great distinctness, 'I mean to take the whole.' Perhaps he added (for he was a consummate hypocrite) that, painful as it was to him to arrive at this determination, he had done so no less on public grounds than private, inasmuch as he should deem it dangerous to the state to intrust a man of 'dear Frank's' revolutionary sentiments with the means to carry them into practical effect. At all events, whatever he said, he said too much. Frank's head had long been 'going:' from a child he was subject to paroxysms of passion, which, compared with what people call 'temper,' were as a tornado to a capful of wind, and of late years they had been growing worse and worse. He had begun to drink, too, though not to the extent that he drinks now. You must forgive him that, since it is done, I fancy, to drown the remembrance of the event which I am now about to relate, and for which he is so foolish as to entertain remorse. Well, being in this hot-headed state, and excessively exasperated, while the other was contemptuous and arrogant, there is no wonder that there were high words; then—I don't know who struck them first; that is a nice question for the lawyers—then blows. In the end ensued a dreadful rough-and-tumble, out of which Louis never came at all, for he was left dead on the hearth-rug, with the front lock of his brother's hair in his hand, which he had torn up by the roots. The reason Frank always wears a skull-cap is to conceal that wound; and now you know why the officer at Liverpool was so careful to pass his hand over every body's head who at all resembled Kavanagh. The disguise he had assumed as Denton, however, pulled him safely through that ordeal, which was fortunate for the inspector also, who would, without doubt, have shown his sagacity at the expense of his life. After the trouble and pains that Murphy and the rest of us had been at to get the young master safely on board the Star, and surrounded by his own friends, it is not likely that we would have let him be snatched from their hands at the moment of escape."

"But he is not safe now," ejaculated Robert: "directly he disclosed who he was he surely became liable to apprehension, even on board the Star!"

"No doubt," observed Maguire, grimly, "if there had been any body fool enough to apprehend him. It is more than likely, however, that the captain was himself ignorant of the serious character of Kavanagh's crime; and, at all events, he knew that he had become irresponsible for it."

"Irresponsible for it! How could that be?"

"Because," answered Maguire, leaning across the table, and speaking in hushed tones, "the man is mad, mad as a March hare five days out of every six; and, when drunk, always mad. You saw him once yourself in the latter state, and thought it was D. T., I suppose. Well, so it was; but it was something else besides. He was going through the whole performance that took place at Falston, as he often does. 'There, there he stands, with his strangled face!' he cries. 'He struck me first; I'll swear it.' And then, 'Help, help!' the echo of the cry his brother gave, or perhaps his own terrified call to Murphy when the knowledge of what he had done first forced itself upon him."

"Poor, miserable man!" exclaimed Robert, pityingly.

"Well, no, not poor," answered Maguire, coolly. "The one sensible thing that Frank Kavanagh ever did, or rather which (as I shrewdly guess) Murphy did for him, was to carry off from Falston Hall that parcel of bank-notes which his father had designed for him, and always kept in his desk ready for an emergency—though he little guessed of what sort the emergency would be. I believe this amounted to many thousand pounds, from which we on Murphy's Island have already reaped the benefit."

"You think, then, that Mr. Frank was mad, or nearly so, before the aggravation of his brother's meanness made him lose all command over himself and commit this terrible deed?" observed Robert, shocked by the revelation of his patron's crime, and genuinely anxious to believe him guiltless of it.

"I believe he was always crack-brained," answered Maguire, coolly—"though his friends used to call it enthusiasm—and that the fissure has been growing wider and wider."

"And yet," urged Robert, "on all occasions on which I have seen him, save one, he has appeared sane enough."

"You have seen him in lucid intervals, and, besides, the voyage itself greatly benefited him for the time; but since he has been ashore here matters have been infinitely worse: remorse and drink together have undermined the remainder of his wits, and they have fallen in, higgledy-piggledy."

"Then, if he was to be sent for from England, and taken prisoner, you don't think he could—" Robert hesitated, for he did not forget that Kavanagh had been uniformly kind to him, and had trusted to his bare word in the weightiest matters.

"Don't think he could be hanged? you were going to say, man. No, he could not be hanged, if that is any sort of satisfaction to you. But what interests me greatly more than that far-off contingency is, how his madness is likely to affect us in the mean time. There is no lunatic asylum on Murphy's Island; and if there were, it would be as much as our lives were worth to attempt to shut him up in it. For Murphy will never believe, even when he sees him raving, that his master is any thing more than a little eccentric, and would obey his wildest mandate rather than the advice of the sagest of men; while as for the tag-rag and bobtail over at the harbor yonder, they will believe any thing that Murphy tells them. For all we know, when the fit is on him, Kavanagh may give orders for our immediate execution, as, indeed, has happened to one poor wretch already."

"You don't mean to say that he put a man to death?" exclaimed Robert, in horrified accents.

"Indeed I do, though. He was tried by a sort of court-martial for trying to make off with the 'gig'—it is now made a capital offense, by-the-bye, to leave the island without Kavanagh's permission—and they strung him up in front of Government House. As it happened, it was only a Tipperary boy, but it might have been you or me. Well, all this brings me round to the matter which I had in my mind when I brought you over to New Town. The people here are not quite such fools as they are at the harbor; there the boys are so entirely under Murphy's thumb that they did not dare to whisper to you that the Governor was ill, whereas here you were informed of it, as you remember, readily enough; and, moreover, I am glad to say, they have had a disagreement with one another. Now 'When fools quarrel, wise men come by their own,' says the proverb, or something to that effect. And now perhaps you see at what I have been driving?"

"Not exactly—no, I confess I don't," said Robert, suspiciously. His former interest in and even regard for Maguire was indeed swept away. The circumstances in which they were now placed no longer admitted of his looking upon that personage as a harmless nonentity: the calm and almost approving manner in which he had narrated this story of Cain and Abel had shocked the lad to the core. What he had taken for candor in the man he now perceived to be an unblushing recklessness; he feared his sanity almost as much as Kavanagh's madness.

"You are duller than you are wont to be, Master Chesney," observed Maguire. "Why, is it not clear that you and I are the only two men on this island with brains in their head, save one who has them muddled? If this madman and his man were out of the way, the rest, look you, would be our subjects."

"Granting that," answered Robert, quietly, "for the sake of the argument: how do you propose to persuade Mr. Kavanagh and Murphy to leave the island?"

"I think I could persuade them," answered Maguire, with a cold smile. "At all events, you may leave that matter to me. I have influence with both factions, and you are not disliked by either; moreover, you will have the advantage of such authority as Kavanagh may leave behind him. Why should we not make alliance and reign together peaceably over this little territory? I don't pretend to conceal from you that if you had more spirit, or had not been spoiled by a mawkish bringing up, that I should have proposed a bolder game—such as I very nearly persuaded Kavanagh to play."

"You would have revived the days you spent on board the Mother Carey, on shore, I presume?" said Robert, in as indifferent a tone as he could compass.

"I would, by Heaven!" answered Maguire, roundly. "We could have had our own ship in yonder harbor, and done a good trade, of which no one would have suspected us; and when folks in little vessels dropped in upon us by accident, we should have welcomed them so warmly that they would never have gone away. But you are not fit for such bold strokes, so I think of them no longer. We must be content to call this isle our own, and to have no masters, which is no small thing in these days. You, I hear, are expecting your sweetheart from England." In spite of himself, here Robert could not repress a shudder. How terrible had the bare idea become of bringing his Lizzy to such a spot! too horrible even to think of, but that he had already formed a plan in his own mind by which such a catastrophe should be averted.

"Well, I have also fixed my affections upon a young lass, from King's County," continued Maguire. "To be sure, they are not at present returned, but no doubt they will be when I can call myself co-governor. Altogether, the prospect seems to me very fair and promising for us both, but especially for yourself, who are far the younger man, and will have the sole command when I am under-ground or feeding the fishes. So stands my offer, lad, in return for your alliance. I regret to add—but then it is so much better to be explicit—that if you should decline it, there is an unpleasant reverse to the picture. I have still the ear of the Governor, when, at least, he can be got to listen to any body, and also the confidence of Murphy; and I have only to whisper that this ambitious scheme has sprung from your own head instead of mine to make you dance in the air in front of Government House. Just think over the whole matter, lad, and then answer me 'Yes' or 'No.'" Here Maguire lit his pipe, leaned back in his chair, and began to occupy himself with the newspaper, so as not to interfere with his young friend's deliberations. Robert had already made up his mind as to his future course of conduct, but he thought it better to appear undecided, and to temporize as much as possible.

"Indeed, Mr. Maguire," returned he, after a considerable pause, "all that you have told me is so strange and unlooked for that I must be forgiven for saying that I can promise nothing until I have satisfied myself of the facts you have narrated with my own eyes and ears. Until I have convinced myself that Mr. Kavanagh is mad, I don't see how you can reasonably expect me to deny him my allegiance."

"That would be well enough in a believer in the Divine Right of kings," observed Maguire, carelessly; "but in a person of such delicate moral scruples as yourself the fact of his having committed a double murder ought to weigh somewhat, I should have thought, against his authority. However, there is no hurry about any thing in Murphy's Island, and you have only to see its Governor to be convinced of what I have told you about him. Preserve your decision till to-morrow, or the next day, for that matter, and then tell me frankly whether we are to be friends or foes." The tone of the speaker was still one of conciliation; but he spoke with knitted brows, and with the air of one who is putting a strong restraint upon himself. Moreover, there was a suspicious, searching glance in his keen gray eyes that bespoke but little confidence in the decision which he had requested proving favorable to his views.

"Well," said he, rising, "I shall now leave you to make yourself at home in your new house. You will be over at the harbor before night, I dare say, and in the mean time good-by to you."

CHAPTER XVI.

THE CONSTITUTION.

YES, Robert certainly intended to be over at the harbor before night. It was his fixed resolve to seek an interview with Kavanagh as soon as might be, and, whether he found him in the condition Maguire had described or not, to take passage to Melbourne the next morning by the ship that had brought him thence. With a murderer, whether sane or mad, he would have no part nor lot, and, above all, he would take care that Lizzie should never set foot upon that perilous shore. The only doubt now left in his mind as to his future conduct was whether he should acquaint the authorities in Australia with the state of affairs on Murphy's Island. In justice to its colonists, now subject to the caprices of a mad despot, and fated in all probability to become the prey of an unscrupulous schemer, it was clearly his duty so to do; and yet he shrank from the ingratitude that such an act would involve, for how could he describe what had occurred without denouncing his benefactor and patron? As to acceding to the infamous proposition of Maguire, his nature revolted at it. He believed that the man's hint of being able to "persuade" Kavanagh and his faithful follower to quit the island meant nothing less than that they were to be put to death; and even if he could be so base and vile a traitor, he had little doubt that he himself, having served his confederate's selfish ends, would in turn become his victim.

In order to give his late companion ample time to precede him to the harbor, rather than with any interest in the investigation itself, he went over his little home, and was both surprised and touched to find in it many indications both of the good-will and generosity of Kavanagh. The furniture, and even the decorations of the saloon cabins of the Star, had evidently been laid under lavish contribution to supply his needs; and if Government House should prove to be equipped proportionally to the residence of the second in command, its interior at least would not greatly belie its ambitious designation. For his own part, however, he was to reap no advantage from this splendor, which also filled him with remorseful tenderness toward him by whose forethought it had been provided. With a heavy heart he left the house, and was at once surrounded by such of the population of New Town—mostly women and children—as the news of the arrival of the stores had not attracted to the other settlement. Among the former he noticed the black-eyed, gypsy-faced young girl from King's County upon whom Maguire had deigned to bestow his to-be-one-day enviable affections. Robert had noticed her himself on board the Star—not only from her beauty, but because of the likeness to the "Miss Mary" of Herne Street, whom (although she was much younger) in her general appearance she greatly resembled. Her age could not have much exceeded sixteen, and she had still about her all the glow and radiance of childhood. His heart sunk within him as he heard her merry laugh, and listened to her thoughtless words, for the reflection forced itself upon him, "If I should spare Kavanagh, will it not be eventually at the sacrifice of this bright and innocent girl?"

Escaping from the questions and welcomings of the throng as soon as he could, he breasted the central hill, resolving to take that way to the harbor in preference to the shorter and easier road by which he had come, in order to avoid the possibility of overtaking Maguire, whose companionship he now felt to be intolerable. At the summit he paused—not for breath, for the elevation, to his young limbs and lungs, was insignificant enough, but to survey the ocean, which had of late acquired an interest for him which it had lacked before. "In three months' time," thought he, "or four at furthest, the ship that brings my darling to the home I trust I shall by that time have made for her will be speeding yonder on her course." And even while he looked his heart bounded within him, for there, in truth, but a few miles off, there was a ship, and steering, so far as he could judge, for Melbourne. The next moment he blushed at his own folly, for how could it be the ship in question, since even that which carried his summons to the Alstons had not yet arrived in England! However, taking out a pocket-glass with which he had provided himself in Melbourne, he scanned the vessel with some interest, which increased as he gazed to intense excitement. He was not much versed in seamanship, but surely, surely that was the very sloop in which he had himself arrived but a few hours ago! The harbor was concealed under the hill, but he ran forward quickly until he could command it, and then his worst suspicions were confirmed: the sloop which it had been definitely arranged was to have waited until the morrow was already gone!

It was for this, then, perhaps, that he had been enticed to visit New Town! His idea of taking passage at once to Melbourne had been anticipated, whether by Maguire or others, and thus forestalled. If it was so, the misfortune was indeed overwhelming, for how could he warn Lizzy of her danger in coming to the island? Had it been arranged that the mail was to bring her, he could have carried her on to Melbourne in it, despite all opposition; but the crew of this little sloop could not control the force that the islanders could bring against them, and being in the pay of Kavanagh, were of course subject to his orders. Indeed, it must be in obedience to them that they had now altered their intention of remaining the night, and set sail for home.

The pinnace, it is true, and the gig still lay in harbor; but the former needed at least three men to navigate her, and the latter was a mere cockle-shell, quite unfit to face the open sea. Moreover, had it not been enacted that it was death to embark in either of them without Kavanagh's express permission—a penalty which, unless Maguire had told a falsehood capable of immediate refutation, had been already carried out to its extremity? His position, under every aspect, was indeed growing gloomy and serious, and it was with a heavy heart that Robert resumed his way toward the harbor. For the present he was alone in his peril; how much more terrible would the situation be if Lizzy should arrive to share his fate—perchance his doom!

"Government House," though a structure of absurdly insignificant size to have so grand a title, was a well-built and compact edifice; it was two stories high, and contained eight rooms, yet every piece of timber of which it was composed had a number and place of its own, and fitted into its neighbor piece like the joints of a child's puzzle. In Australia, though house-room might be dear and difficult to obtain, this costly toy—which was painted and fitted up with infinite elaborateness—would have been out of place, if not superfluous, and only have ministered to its possessor's vanity; but on Murphy's Island, by a singular chance, it had found its proper function. Contrasted with the tents around it, and with the more humble dwellings which were already being erected at the harbor out of the timber which Robert had brought over with him from Melbourne, and with the gay banner floating from its flag-staff, it had a lordly if not a sovereign air. Moreover, as though in mimicry of royal state, one of the Tipperary "boys," pike in hand, was strutting sentrywise to and fro in front of its door.

Hosted by Google

"Is the master within, Tim?" asked Robert of this consequential personage, with whom, of course, he was well acquainted.

"He's in, Sir; yes. But Murphy says that he can be seen by none of his people."

"But that does not include me, I suppose?" said Robert, persuasively. "Besides, I have important matters to transact with him, Tim."

Tim lowered his pike, scratched his head with the point of it, and deliberated gravely within himself. He had had his orders, but were they to be put in effect with respect to the master's own lieutenant?

"Well, you can just step in, Mr. Chesney, and ask him yourself whether he wishes you to be admitted or not."

Without stopping to question Tim's logic, Robert opened the door and stepped within. The atmosphere, charged with tobacco-smoke and tinctured with the smell of spirits, reminded him of the little room at Mulvaney's; it didn't smell like a new house at all, though every thing to the eye was spick and span.

"Who's that?" inquired a harsh voice from above stairs. Then Murphy's shock head appeared over the balusters. "Oh, it's you, Mr. Chesney," added he, in a hoarse whisper. "The master is ill, Sir, and can't be seen."

"Come up!" roared another voice from an upper room, in such excited tones that Robert could hardly have recognized them as belonging to Kavanagh. "Come up, and bring another bottle of whisky, Robert, for we are half through this one already."

Murphy, as usual, at once withdrew his opposition to his master's wishes, and only held up his forefinger in warning of Robert knew not what, as the latter obeyed the summons.

In a front-room, handsomely furnished, and close to a round table on which were glasses and a bottle, sat Frank Kavanagh, looking years older than when Chesney had seen him last, and with that blotched, unhealthy flush upon his face which, unlike that resulting from fresh air and exercise, suggests a protracted and deep debauch. His eyes were blood-shot, and regarded the newcomer without disfavor, indeed, but without a particle of the interest that under the circumstances might have been expected; and his dishevelled hair, no longer covered by a skull-cap, displayed above the forehead a bald scar, the sight of which sent a shudder through Robert's frame; for was it not the mark of Cain!

"Sit down, lad.—Dick, bring a fresh glass," exclaimed Kavanagh. "Well, thank Heaven, that sloop's gone, and here we are all alone once more in our own little island!" Then, breaking out into a song:

"'Oh, it's a bright little island—
A right little, tight little island!
Search the globe round, none can be found
So happy as this little island!'"

"I hope it may be a happy one, Sir," observed Robert, quietly.

"Hope, lad! I say it is, and I'm master here, I believe.—Isn't that so, Dick?"

"True for you," answered Murphy, gravely; "you're the king of us all, sure."

"Then why does this mealy-mouthed gentleman talk about his hopes?" resumed the other, with irritation. "If my people are not happy here, I'll know the reason why. And, look you, happy or not, they shall go nowhere else"—he brought his fist down on the table with an emphasis that made the glasses ring again—"nowhere else, so help me Heaven, save to the dickens.—Fishing? No, they shall not so much as fish, unless I give them my royal permission so to do. That was why I hanged Pat Doolan: to encourage the others not to go fishing in the gig without my leave. And as for the pinnace, it is never to be used without my written order, my imperial ukase. You're my second in command, Sir, so look to that." The tragic air and stilted manner of the speaker were such as would have fitted the mock-sovereign of a burlesque, or some self-satisfied inmate of the walls of Bedlam; but there was a certain significance in his words, too, that jarred upon his hearer worse than their mere jangling wildness. This tirade about the boats, as it struck Robert, was intended to apply to his own case, and serve as a personal warning.

"I shall obey your directions, Sir, of course," answered he, respectfully. "But as to quitting the island, as I suppose you hint at, that would not be very practicable in the gig, at all events; and to hang a man for going out to fish seems to me to be hard measure."

"Seems to you?" answered Kavanagh, menacingly. "And what is that to me? When I ask my minister's opinion, he may give it, but not unasked. The power of life and death is the king's prerogative. Murphy and I are drawing up the statutes of the island, and that is the first article of our constitution. To speak against the king or to discuss his acts with strangers has been also made a capital offense. We put them in after Pat's death, lest the crew of the sloop should come to hear of it, and that exercise of my undoubted authority be subsequently questioned elsewhere. It is a great power, look you, lad, and makes one draw a proud breath to be able to say 'Death' to any man who doesn't suit one's fancy. To open to him, as it were, by a word, the gates of Eternity. Yes, yes. The mischief is, however," added the speaker, with a puzzled air, "that one can't get the fellow back again when one wishes it. And one does wish it sometimes—oh, one does." His head drooped gently on his hand, his tones became soft and tender, and his feverish eyes filled with tears. "I had a brother once, lad; we were boys together; I can remember saying my prayers with him at our mother's knee. But he would take out the boat and fish contrary to our express injunction, and—the king must administer justice quite indifferently, you know—and poor Louis paid for it with his life.—Didn't he, Dick?"

The tone of his appeal was very sad and touching, but not more so than the expression of Murphy's answering look. It seemed to say, "Oh, what has happened to my beloved master? His wild words make me tremble to hear them, and yet I will never, never, never think him mad!"

"Don't talk of that, Mr. Frank," answered the other, cheerfully. "Let us speak of other things. You have never said a word to Mr. Chesney, you know, respecting his stay in Melbourne, and the cargo he brought over with him."

"Yes, indeed, Sir," observed Robert, "I should wish to account to you, as soon as you have the leisure, for the money intrusted to me. I have expended nearly the whole of it, but I hope in such a manner as you will approve."

"Yes, yes; I have seen it all, and I do approve. There is whisky enough to supply our royal cellar for—well, one week at least. That is why the man keeps guard over us with a pike—to keep off thieves, and to knock in the head of a cask whenever it is wanted. Isn't that so, Dick?"

Murphy muttered some inarticulate reply, which, by the cheerful nod that accompanied it, would seem to be in the affirmative; but that devoted follower was evidently in sad straits.

"By-the-bye, Robert," continued Kavanagh, his changeful manner, which had been fierce, pathetic, and humorously cynical by turns, becoming suddenly delicately courteous, "you have spoken of the cargo, but not of the passengers. You have not said one word about your Lizzy. Why did you not bring her here to see me? I wish above all things to welcome my friend's wife to Murphy's Island, and especially to introduce her to Mary. The Governor's wife, you know, must call upon the Deputy-Governor's, that is a constitutional necessity. She will go in state, upon a white elephant, if the animal is procurable. But in the mean time the young women should be friends. You have seen my Mary, of course?"

"Yes," replied Robert, hesitating; "but I did not know"—he was going to add, "that she was on the island," when Kavanagh broke in, triumphantly:

"There! he has seen her, Murphy, with his own eyes; and yet you try to persuade me that she is not at New Town. Go away, Dick, go away, and leave me with Mr. Chesney, to arrange our pecuniary accounts, about which your poor stupid head can understand nothing.—The poor fellow is losing what little wits he has, Chesney, and positively tries to persuade me that my own Mary, who has followed me here so faithfully from England, is a girl from King's County. A pretty thing, indeed, that a man should not know his own sweetheart. And there were others too—that fellow Maguire, for one—who were in the same tale. But yours is independent testimony. Hush! not a word. I thank you for it. Empty titles are not to be created under my dynasty; but I give you in reward a solid privilege. You shall go fishing in the gig within the circuit of half a mile, to which our jurisdiction extends.—Put that down, Murphy; it shall form the seventeenth article of the constitution. But there, you can not write. Give me the parchment. 'Given at the Government House'—that is our royal style—'etc., etc.' There, you are free to take the boat and fish, provided only that if you should catch sturgeon, it must be reserved for our own table."

During all this rodomontade Robert maintained a respectful silence. He had endeavored to explain the mistake into which Kavanagh had fallen with respect to "Miss Mary," but the former had refused to listen to it; and was it now worth while (even if it was possible) to set this poor madman right in so absurd a matter, especially, too, as the misunderstanding had brought forth such welcome fruit? For in the gig could he not go forth and meet the sloop, and thereby avert all danger from her it should bring; since on his report it would, of course, put back to Melbourne, whence help could then be sent, if necessary, to the distracted island. On the other hand, Robert perceived that he had deeply offended Murphy. Not only had he brought upon him—itself an unforgivable injury—his master's wrath, but instead of doing his best to mitigate Kavanagh's hallucinations, he had pretended to acquiesce in them—or at least in one of them—in order to reap what must have seemed a very trifling advantage. The pair had never been good friends, but up to this time the contempt had always been on Chesney's side, while the other monopolized the hate. But now Murphy's scowling face exhibited not only the most furious hostility, but the bitterest scorn.

"You vile young viper!" cried he, "to bite the hand that has fed you. I'll—"

"Silence!" roared Kavanagh. "How dare you use such words to the Deputy-Governor! Have I not placed him over you, you dog, you cur?"—and as though poor Dick had been indeed the creature by whose name he was thus addressed, he winced and shrank from every word as from a lash—"and is this the reverence you pay to an officer of my choosing? Be off—be off, I say, or I will set it down in the constitution that to call the Deputy-Governor 'a vile young vipér' is to have earned death." With a subdued though still sullen air Murphy raised his hand to his head—a form of respect enjoined, as Robert rightly guessed, by the new constitution to its founder—and slowly left the room.

"Discipline must be maintained," sighed Kavanagh, regretfully; "but it would cause me intense regret to be compelled to hang Dick Murphy. I tell you what"—and here his look became intensely cunning—"we'll make a statute that the Governor's wife shall always possess the right of pardon, and then, thanks to Mary, we shall be extricated out of all these little embarrassments. I am so glad you recognized her, my dear lad; for not to be recognized is, in society, a very serious annoyance. And now about these accounts—fill your glass—well, then I will; and, sparing us the details (which are always tedious), tell us what is the gross surplus."

"There is about eighty pounds remaining, Sir. But here are the papers, with every item—"

"Very good; an auditor" (with a wave of his hand) "shall look into them in due time, and I have no doubt will find them correct. As for the eighty pounds, I shall give them to Murphy, whose feelings, I could see, were hurt."

"You will remember, Sir," urged Robert, "that I have still in my possession untouched the three thousand pounds with which you intrusted me on board the Star."

"Yes, yes; quite right—you must keep that. I am better, much better now in health; but the necessity may still arise for expending it in the manner suggested. The cares of my high office may be too much for me. Do you know, lad" (he laid his hand in his old familiar manner on Robert's arm, and sunk his voice to a whisper), "I sometimes think my brain is failing me? Suppose the Governor was to go mad like George III.! Don't you think that should be provided for in the constitution?"

Robert bent his head: he knew not what to say. He was ashamed of his own hypocrisy, and yet what could he do but temporize and affect acquiescence? It was clear that Maguire had not exaggerated Kavanagh's condition, which, moreover, was probably much worse than when he had last appeared in public; nothing, indeed, but the slavish affection of Murphy could be proof against the conviction that his master was a madman. And yet in this man's hands were intrusted the destinies, even to life and death, of all upon the island! These reflections were of a nature to make Robert in no mood for speech, and Kavanagh ran on with his wild words, not only without contradiction, but without interruption. "In case any thing should happen to me, Mary, it is true, might be regent; but it is so difficult for a woman to maintain order when there are revolutionary elements at work; and (between ourselves) they are at work even now. No; you, Robert, will be the interim governor, and will also succeed me, in case of my dying without issue. This is very important, and must be entered in the constitution before a witness." The speaker opened the door, and called for Murphy, who rose from the rug outside, on which he had been disconsolately lying, to execute this pressing duty.

The whole interview would have been most distressing to Robert, were it not that pity for his patron was overborne by the gravest considerations for the future both for himself and others. When it was over—that is, so soon as he could decently make his escape—he once more ascended the cone-shaped hill, which, with the exception of his own vice-regal two-roomed residence, was the only spot on the whole island where he could obtain even comparative privacy. The summit was a level flat of a few feet square, and lying down on this, with the sky above him, the sea around him, he could fancy himself alone in the world. Standing up, on the other hand, he could not only survey all that insular domain (except what was hidden by the hill itself, which on the harbor side was somewhat precipitous), but could himself be seen from every part of it. Not a tree, not a bush was there to intercept the view: nothing higher than a grass blade, save the few vegetables that already rewarded the industry of the colonists, appeared above the soil of Murphy's Island. Even now the home of madness and treachery, and fated, perhaps, to witness as dark deeds as any spot beneath the sun, the place was already become abhorrent to him. He swept the horizon in hopes to see a sail (he cared not what nor whence it came) with the feverish longing of a shipwrecked man whose scanty store is lessening fast; but, as his heart foreboded, he looked in vain. The Star had been blown much out of her course, or she would never have chanced upon the island, which lay too far to the southeast to be in the track of the Australian traders; the little chart which he spread out before him told him that much. His only hope lay in the comparatively small direct Tasmanian traffic, the ships engaged in which, however, could be seen, if at all, from New Town. He would watch for them night and day, and if seen, do his best to attract their notice. To-morrow, he would propose to Kavanagh that a flag-staff should be placed upon the hill, with a banner flying, to proclaim his sovereignty. While pondering in his mind upon these things, he was suddenly startled by a low and sullen roar, followed by a perceptible movement of the air, which seemed to be that of the earth itself. He had heard a royal salute fired from Windsor Castle, so that he recognized this at once for the report of a heavy gun. Leaping to his feet, he once more looked eagerly around—for the sound had seemed to come from no particular quarter—expecting to descry the smoke. But there was no smoke to be seen. He saw the New Town people running along the shore, and presently others from the harbor meeting them, each party, as he rightly guessed, believing that the report came from the opposite side of the island to that on which they were. The whole population, of late so depressed and sluggish, seemed to have wakened into life, clustering together in dark masses, and with a murmurous hum, like bees. They too, perhaps, would have gladly hailed the arrival of a stranger strong enough to overbear the authority of Kavanagh, whose severity in the case of Doolan had alarmed them. It was a proof of their simplicity that only one of them thought of ascending the hill, from which their curiosity, if at all, could have been satisfied at once. Robert did not need his glass to be convinced that this personage was Maguire.

FOR LOVE.

CURLY-HAIRED Carl! Were a blithesomer mate
For a ride o'er the snow to be wished for than he?
Yet were it well not to linger too late;
The pines are in shadow, the flakes dance and flee.
Crisp on the white sound the patter and clack
Of hoofs beating briskly, and sharp through the air
Rises ripple of laughter; the bridles hang slack,
And hand touches hand. She is frolic and fair,
Sunny-eyed Marguerite, brightest of girls,
With teeth gleaming whitely and tumble of curls.

"You! Gallant Carl, so they call you! No doubt Bayard the brave were a whipster to you!"
Gretchen the winsome can wickedly flout;
Red curling lips and arch eyes flashing blue
Wing home her taunts. So he flushes and sets
Teeth under lips that are wreathed in a smile.
"Now truce, mocking sprite, to your feignéd regrets
At fair chivalry's flight. Give me glances the while,
And what man may dare to win loyalty's meed,
I, Carl and no Bayard, will venture at need."

Quick rings her laughter; sledge bells at full flight
Never sounded more silverly musical. "You?
Easy is talking, Sir spur-lacking knight;
Were death at my lips, sirrah, what would you do?"
Curly-haired Carl bendeth suddenly. "Hawk
Should stoop straight to its quarry," laughs she, as her lips
Deftly evade him. "Sir Carl, you can talk,
But you do not strike home; feeble sword, Sir, that slips.
What dare you—for love?" Smileth Carl, "It were best,
O, vow-flouting lady, to wait till the test."

On through the snow, for the wood shadows blacken,
The night wind is waking, the pine branches sigh.
They laugh as they fly, for their speed may not slacken.
"Now swift. Stride for stride, Carl!" Hist! What is that cry?
Faces mirth-flushed and wind-bitten go white,
Deep bite the spur-points, and bridles shake free.
Didst e'er hear the yelling of wolves through the night?
Harsh hoarse devils' music that murders all glee.
Now, Brocken, now, Fleetfoot, give proof of your pace,
For hundred-mouthed death is behind in full chase.

One breathless mile is ticked off from the three,
By heart-beats that throb to the pulses of fear.
Swift! Flash along! flying skirts, tresses free;
For death on the track yelleth near and more near.
"Courage!" cries Carl, "we've the pace of them yet."
White is her face, and her breath shudders short;
Watchful his eyes, and his teeth tightly set.
"Bravo, brave Brocken! Well leaped!" Never port
More eagerly looked for by storm-driven bark
Than the red village lights as they flash through the dark!

Two breathless miles! But the swift-sweeping pack
Of mad, yelling demons has gained in its flight.
O God! half a mile, and her gallop is slack.
Those hell-litten eyes, how they gleam through the night!
But one minute more. "Gracious Heaven above!
Too late! Now the test!" Then his voice ringeth loud,
"Ride on, and farewell! But remember!—for Love!"
Then right in the path of the hideous crowd
Brave Carl hath drawn bridle and leaped to the ground,
And a hundred hot hell-hounds have hemmed him around.

* * * * * * *

Yon little brown woman belle Marguerite?—Nay,
Brave Carl, as you know, is beau garçon no more.
Those devil-hounds marked him. We fellows made play
Not a second too soon. Ah! the hideous roar
Of rage and base fear from that hot-throated pack
As we plunged, Heaven-sent, through the pines in their rear.
Two dozen lank demons stretched dead in a crack!
But Carl, Gallant Carl! oh! the sickening fear
That struck to my heart as I lifted his head,
His bonny boy-face all so furrowed and red.

He lived, scarred and seamed as you know him. I hold
No battle-marks borne with more honor. But she?
Beauty seeks beauty. She shrank and grew cold,
Slowly, half shamed, but—the thing had to be—
"Not heart enough for the trial?" Just so,
Many a winsome one fails at the push.
Carl has the little brown woman. I know
She hasn't belle Marguerite's sparkle and flush;
But she has the secret that sets her above
The shallow-bright sort. She would die, Sir, "for Love!"

RECIPE FOR AN ITALIAN CREAM.

A BEAUTIFUL and elegant Italian cream may be prepared at the small cost of one quart of milk, six eggs, with a little flavoring and sugar. Besides these ingredients there are required a shallow stew-pan and skimming spoon (or, in default of such an article, a fish-slicer will serve if thoroughly clean), two bowls, and a fork. Set a quart of milk, sweetened with white sugar, on the fire in the stew-pan to boil; in the mean time break the whites of six eggs into one bowl and the yolks into the other. Beat up the whites to a high froth, and as soon as the milk boils take with the skimming spoon large flakes, whip and lay them lightly on the boiling milk. After letting them boil for a few minutes repeat the operation with the remainder of the whites until all has been set, and pile it high in the centre of a glass dish. Make a custard with the yolks of the eggs and the milk, flavoring it with lemon or vanilla, and pour it round the snowy pyramid. It will maintain its place well many hours, and may be still further embellished according to taste by tipping some of the top flakes with the least possible quantity of cochineal essence.

Hosted by Google

Gentleman's Crochet Smoking-Cap.

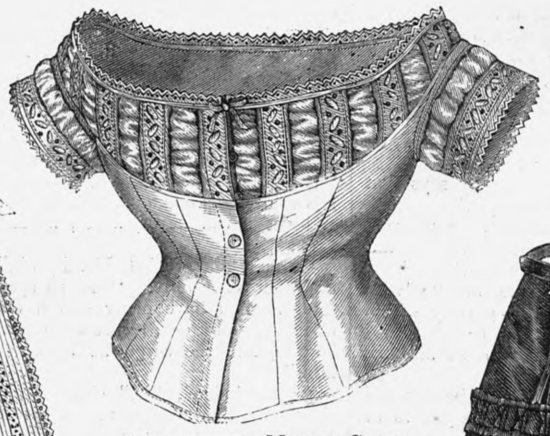
THIS cap is made with dark brown saddler's silk (or split zephyr worsted) and with brown filling silk in a lighter shade, all in single crochet. The filling silk serves for a foundation, and at the same time forms the design figures, for each of which the filling silk is laid over the single crochet of the foundation. Having cut the crown and rim of the cap of paper or net from Figs. 27 and 28, Supplement (Fig. 28 gives only a section of the rim), join them, and transfer the design indicated on the pattern to the net, and then begin the crochet-work with the saddler's silk, from the middle of the crown, with a foundation of 8 ch. (chain stitch), and close these in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch). Lay on the filling silk for a foundation, and crochet, always going forward, with saddler's silk on the foundation as follows: 1st round.—On each foundation st. (stitch) and on the sl. work 2 sc. (single crochet). 2d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the next st., 2 sc. on the following st. This round thus counts 24 sc. 3d round.—∗ 2 sc. on the foundation on the next 2 st., 2 sc. back of the foundation on the following st., thus widening 1 st.; repeat from ∗, always going forward. This repetition from ∗ will not be referred to again, as a matter of course, in the following rounds. The filling silk serving for a foundation in this round is always alternately crocheted on in working the 2 sc. worked on 2 st. of the preceding round, and passed over with the next 2 sc. worked on 1 st., so that the filling silk appears raised on the right side of the work. 4th round.—∗ 2 sc. on the foundation on the next 2 st., 3 sc. back of the foundation on the following 2 st., thus widening 1 st., working 2 sc. on the first of the 2 st. 5th round.—∗ 2 sc. on the foundation on the next 2 st., 4 sc. back of the foundation on the following 3 st., thus widening 1 st. on the middle of the 3 st. In regard to widening, the general rule is that on an odd number of st. it should be done on the middle st., and on even numbers before or after the middle st. 6th round.—∗ 2 sc. on the foundation on the next 2 st., 5 sc. back of the foundation on the following 4 st. 7th round.—∗ 2 sc. on the foundation on the next 2 st., 6 sc. back of the foundation on the following 5 st. 8th round.—3 sc. on the foundation on the next 3 st., ∗ 5 sc. back of the foundation on the following 4 st., 4 sc. on the foundation on the next 4 st.; repeat six times from ∗; at the end of the round work 5 sc. back of the foundation on the last 4 st. 9th round.—5 sc. on the foundation on the next 5 st., ∗ 4 sc. back of the foundation on the following 3 st., 2 sc. on, 2 sc. back of, and 2 sc. on the foundation on the following 6 st.; repeat seven times from ∗; at the end of the round work, instead of the last 2 st., 3 sc. on the next 3 st. 10th round.—∗ 3 sc. back of the foundation on the next 2 st. (these should be the middle 2 st. of the 4 sc. crocheted back of the foundation in the preceding round), 3 sc. on the foundation on the following 3 st., 2 sc. back of the foundation on the next 2 st. (these should come on the same st. of the preceding round), 3 sc. on the foundation on the next 3 st.; at the end of the round work 4 sc. on the foundation on the next 4 st. 11th round.—∗ 1 sc. back of the foundation on the middle of the 3 sc. worked back of the foundation in the preceding round, 4 sc. on the foundation on the following 4 st., 3 sc. back of the foundation on the next 2 st., 4 sc. on the foundation on the following 4 st. 12th round.—5 sc. on the foundation on the next 5 st., ∗ 4 sc. back of the foundation on the 3 sc. worked back of the foundation in the preceding round, 9 sc. on the foundation on the following 9 st.; repeat six times from ∗, then 4 sc. back of the foundation on the next 3 st., 8 sc. on the foundation on the following 8 st. 13th round.—∗ 7 sc. back of the foundation on the next 6 st., 7 sc. on the foundation on the following 7 st. (these should come on the middle 7 of the 9 sc. in the preceding round); at the end of the round work, instead of the last 7, only 6 sc. on the foundation on the next 6 st. in the preceding round. 14th round.—∗ 4 sc. back of the foundation on the next 4 st., 2 sc. on the foundation on the middle of the 7 sc. worked back of the foundation in the preceding round, 4 sc. back of the foundation on the following 4 st., 5 sc. on the foundation on the next 5 st.; at the end of the round work, instead of the last 5, only 4 sc. on the foundation on the next 4 st. 15th round.—∗ 4 sc. back of the foundation on the next 4 st., 5 sc. on the foundation on the following 4 st., 4 sc. back of the foundation on the next 4 st., 3 sc. on the foundation on the middle 3 of the 5 sc. in the preceding round; at the end of the round work, instead of the 3 sc., only 2 sc. on the foundation on the next 2 st. 16th round.—∗ 4 sc. back of the foundation on the next 4 st., 8 sc. on the foundation on the following 7 st., 4 sc. back of the foundation on the next 4 st., 1 sc. on the foundation on the middle of the 3 sc. in the preceding round; repeat six times from ∗, then 4 sc. back of the foundation on the next 4 st., 8 sc. on the foundation on the following 7 st. 17th round.—∗ 9 sc. back of the foundation on the next 8 st., 4 sc. on the foundation on the following 4 st., 2 sc. back of the foundation on the next 2 st., 4 sc. on the foundation on the following 4 st. 18th round.—∗ 8 sc. back of the foundation on the middle 7 of the 9 sc. in the preceding round, 4 sc. on the foundation on the following 4 st., 4 sc. back of the foundation on the next 4 st., 4 sc. on the foundation on the following 4 st. Now work 24 pattern rounds more in the previous manner, observing the design given and the illustration, thus forming 42 pattern rounds altogether. In the 19th to 33d of these pattern rounds widen in the requisite manner alternately in and between the design figures, as seen in the work already finished, so that the widening points may not always come above each other in the same direction; the remaining rounds are worked entirely without widening. After the last (42d) pattern round there follow three rounds all plain (without design), which complete the crown. In connection with the latter work (always without widening) for the rim first three rounds of always alternately 3 sc. on and 3 sc. back of the foundation, transposing every 3 st. as shown by the illustration. Then work two

MUSLIN, INSERTION, AND LACE CORSET COVER.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 40-43.

BLACK GROS GRAIN APRON TRIMMED WITH VELVET RIBBON.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 21 and 22.

EMBROIDERED LINEN APRON.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 17-20.

GENTLEMAN'S CROCHET SMOKING-CAP.
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 27 and 28.



EMBROIDERED MUSLIN CORSET COVER.
For pattern see description in Supplement.

BLACK TAFFETAS APRON TRIMMED WITH LACE AND INSERTION.
For pattern see description in Supplement.

SPRING OVERCOAT FOR BOY FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 34-39.

APRON FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 23-26.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

TRAINED MUSLIN PETTICOAT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 29-33.

TRAINED MUSLIN PETTICOAT, TRIMMED WITH INSERTION AND LACE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Fig. 52.

Digitized by Google

rounds plain, and 22 pattern rounds as shown by the illustration, then again two rounds plain and 3 rounds like the first 3 rounds of the rim. If the cap should be desired larger than the model, a piece of fine twine may be crocheted into each round. Having finished the crochet-work furnish the cap with thin wadding and brown silk lining, and in the middle of the crown set a brown silk tassel.

Ladies' House and Street Dresses, Figs. 1–3.

Fig. 1. CASHMERE HOUSE DRESS.—This gray cashmere dress consists of a skirt and basque-waist, trimmed with flounces of the material and folds and revers of gros grain of the same color. The skirt has a tablier, trimmed with a gros grain fold.

Fig. 2. SICILIENNE STREET SUIT. — Dress of dark green Sicilienne, trimmed with gathered ruffles of the material. Green cloth mantelet thinly wadded, and trimmed with gros grain folds and black lace. Green felt bonnet, trimmed with gros grain ribbon and a feather aigrette. Seal-skin muff.

Fig. 3. BLACK SILK STREET SUIT.—Brown gros grain dress, trimmed with gathered and kilt-pleated ruffles of the material and with a braiding of silk cord of the same color. Gros grain sash. Brown velvet round hat, trimmed with brown gros grain ribbon and feathers.

Fig. 1.—VELVET AND GUIPURE SLEEVELESS JACKET.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 44–46.

Fig. 2.—VELVET AND GUIPURE SLEEVELESS JACKET.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 44–46.

Fig. 1.—CASHMERE HOUSE DRESS. Fig. 2.—SICILIENNE STREET SUIT. Fig. 3.—BLACK SILK STREET SUIT.

FIGS. 1–3.—LADIES' HOUSE AND STREET DRESSES.

GOOD FORM.

THE conduct and demeanor which the "golden youth" of the period call good form was known to their fathers as bad manners. Indulged in by former generations, it would have led to an early burning of gunpowder or the crossing of small-swords. It is easy to stigmatize dueling as barbarous and illogical. It is a practice that has been grossly misused; but it has made and still makes people act — outwardly at least — like gentlemen.

So far as this writer has been able to ascertain, good form is an expression borrowed from the turf. A horse is said to be in "good form" when he is bright, handsome, strong, in perfect health and training, ready and willing to do his best in the work before him. And in this sense it is applied to an oarsman, a cricketer, or an athlete. A billiard-player is also said to be in good form when he plays with nerve and judgment, and his strokes are neat. But the good form which is the subject of these remarks demands no such qualities—rather the exclusion of them. To be in good form the golden youth must be, or pretend to be, 1. Very selfish; 2. Very stupid; 3. Very awkward; 4. Very intolerant.

A leading rule, which we must never forget, is that every thing is a bore, and that every one who appears to enjoy himself, or who contributes to the enjoyment of others, is a cad. To be a cad is simply not to be in good form, just as to be a Gentile is not to be a Jew.

When you are invited to a ball it is good form to decline to dance. When you are bidden to a croquet party it is good form not to join the game. To stand aloof from what others are doing, and wish you to do, evinces a tone of superiority. Look on with a smile of languid pity tinged with contempt, and you are in good form.

In repose it is good form to assume an expression of countenance as closely resembling that of an idiot as possible. The lower jaw is dropped and slightly protruded, and a fish-like, vacuous look thrown into the eye. One elbow at least should be stuck out, so as to be in the way, and one leg bent, so as to give the idea that it is broken. The manner in which his trowsers falls over this limb appears to afford the professor great satisfaction. He will contemplate it for an hour at a time.

In politics good form is strictly conservative. Of course he never argues a point; he is too ignorant to do that. He cuts the Gordian knot with an expletive and an insult. He will make the wildest statements in support of his ideas, and does not scruple to give the lie in cold blood to any one who thinks it worth while to confute them. Although it is bad form to get angry, it is not so to make insulting remarks, or to threaten or recommend violence, providing this be done in the usual drawl, and without any gesture or expression.

The article in the creed of such persons which provides that nothing matters (providing it is not bad form), and excludes all considerations of morality, or even public decency, from its decisions as to what is good form, has gone a long way toward introducing the laxity of manners which prevails in what is called good society. To enumerate all the blessings which this charming quality has bestowed would be tedious. We have written enough to prove the preamble of this article, viz., that good form is bad manners in the strictest, fullest, and worst meaning of the first word.

Hosted by Google

SOME WASHINGTON TOILETTES.

MADAME la Marquise de Noailles, the wife of the French minister, wore at a recent entertainment in Washington a toilette composed of turquoise blue silk. The low corsage, headed by a band embroidered in pearls, was trimmed with a fall of point lace; the tunic or over-skirt was trimmed with the same lace beneath a broad band embroidered in pearls, and the whole front breadth, together with the back of the long train, was heavy with floral designs wrought in silver and seed-pearls. Diamond ornaments accompanied this magnificent costume, and a string of large Brazilian pebbles cut with countless facets into a dazzling brilliancy.

Mrs. Grant, the President's wife, wore at Mrs. Senator Stewart's ball a gold-colored silk, flounced with fine black lace, and flowers and ostrich tips in her hair. Another toilette of Mrs. Grant's is a French dress of white faille, richly trimmed with round point, and with which she wore her husband's miniature, set in diamonds.

Miss Nellie Grant wears a plum-colored silk visiting suit, the many ruffles faced and headed with ciel blue silk, and a hat to match. A very pretty ball dress worn by Miss Nellie is of corn-colored tarlatan, ruffled to the waist in the same material, with wreaths of tea-roses trailing over it from shoulder and belt.

Madame Blacque, now the doyenne of the diplomatic corps, by reason of longer residence here than the others, though not by right of years, and the wife of Blacque Bey, the minister from Turkey, wore lately a light blue gros grain, the complex trimmings of which were faced and intermingled with salmon-color, and edged with deep black lace, the combination being very becoming to her dark and rich beauty.

Mrs. Cooke, the wife of the Governor of the District, wears, over a petticoat of pale green silk flounced with point lace, a court train of emerald green velvet finished with the same lace, the toilette accompanied by diamonds.

Mrs. Senator Sprague has a very artistic dress of Nile green silk, the front made with pleated ruffles of the silk, and the rest of the dress nearly covered with a deep fall of point lace. With this she wears a necklace of diamonds and emeralds hung with numerous and immense pendants; the bracelets are broad gold bands embossed with diamonds, and a diamond aigrette holds a bunch of green and white plumes in her hair, which is arranged in plain thick coils around her classic head.

Lady Thornton, who always dresses with simplicity, was lately seen in a dress of rich white satin, with pearls; the dress was made with no over-skirt, all the trimmings being of thick white lace.

Mrs. Hazen, the daughter of Mr. M'Lean, of the Cincinnati Enquirer, and the wife of General Hazen, U.S.A., the author of a valuable book on the Franco-Prussian war, has worn one of the most exquisite visiting dresses of the season. It is varied through three shades of peacock blue; the under-skirt, of the paler tint, has two flounces, each bound with the third darker shade, and headed by bias bands of the second shade; the over-skirt has a long apron front which falls in a separate piece by itself, and the rest of the over-skirt has one side turned back, with the revers lined in the second shade, and the other side hanging straight and long, and trimmed with the bias band; the basque has a fan-tail postilion with revers and bow, and there is a sleeveless jacket of the first shade, trimmed with bands of the second. A hat turned up on one side, and fastened with a peacock's breast, completes a costume which is exceedingly becoming to the red-gold hair and beautiful blonde face of the wearer.

Madame Preston, wife of the Haytian minister, was dressed perfectly, a few nights since, in a rich white satin, trimmed with point lace and fringe, and with a necklace of solitaire diamonds on black velvet.

Mrs. Senator Stewart received, at her great ball the other night, in a sultana satin of bright crimson, the deep flounces of point duchesse almost covering it; carbuncles and diamonds were the jewelry of this toilette, that threw into fine relief a fair skin and bountiful but prematurely gray hair. Another dress of Mrs. Stewart's is of white faille with complicated ruffles of green silk, and an over dress of white illusion embroidered in green. Mrs. Stewart's parlors are wonders of upholstery, the gilt chairs and sofas framing tapestry so finely wrought as to resemble paintings, and much of the furniture being a sort of bijouterie of Florentine mosaic.

Mrs. Coston, whose husband was the inventor of our invaluable system of signal lights and of the percussion primer of the Dahlgren gun, is sometimes this winter attired in the dress which she wore when presented at the Tuileries. The dress is white satin with a green velvet court train, the low corsage trimmed with green velvet and superb point lace, the train edged with point; a circlet of diamonds on green velvet clasps her throat, and she wears a pearl necklace and ear-rings, with a diamond aigrette holding a pair of white feathers in her hair.

Mrs. Judge Field, of the Supreme Court, wears a very beautiful Parisian dress of silk, the color of burnished gold, and black lace; narrow flounces of Chantilly cover the front breadth, and the bouffant back breadths are encircled by bands of the silk trimmed again with the Chantilly; the ornaments are gold wrought in that delicate Genoese filigree which is as exquisite as a crystallization.

Mrs. Senator Chandler wore at the ball in Masonic Temple a dress of half a dozen shades of mignonette just fading into sage. The front breadths were of the lighter shade, with darker pleatings at the foot; broad bands of pleating went down the side from the waist, in which three shades were mingled; and the back breadths were composed of pleatings in three shades, darker than the front, the fourth shade at the waist and the pleating at the lower edge being almost of a feuille-morte tint. The whole was illuminated by costly diamonds.

Mrs. Senator Ames—Blanche Butler, whose dazzling beauty only deepens every day—has an evening dress of the perfectly tinted vert d'eau, that last dream of green before it fades into white. The front and side breadths of this dress are covered by one immense piece of point lace, the workmanship of which is something marvelous, so delicate are the shadings and so rich the designs; wide flounces of the same lace fall from the waist over the rest of the skirt, and the ornaments are of carved malachite cameos, set in diamonds and yellow gold.

Madame Freyre, the wife of the Peruvian minister, wore at the dinner given by the President to the diplomatic corps a ciel blue silk, which was made with no over dress, but at the back there fell wide sash ends, a quarter of a yard in width at the top and three-quarters at the end, of black velvet lined with the blue silk; white lace ruffles were on the front breadth, and the waist was trimmed with black velvet and white lace. Family diamonds enriched the toilette—a necklace and very large pendent ear-rings, whose fanciful setting of gold and black enamel gave them a double lustre.

Mrs. General Butler, who is a woman of magnificent presence, wears an evening dress of white silk and dark blue velvet, and scarf of point de Venise. The ornaments accompanying it are Genoese gold and diamonds, of which latter Mrs. Butler has some of the largest and rarest in the country.

Miss Worthington, the niece of the Secretary of War, wore, when receiving with Mrs. Grant, a dress of the richest black silk, the lower skirt trimmed with deep kilt pleating, consisting of half a dozen alternate pleats of the black silk and of a deep pink silk; the over dress was made with revers of the pink silk, which color appeared again at the waist.

Miss Derby, the daughter of John Phœnix, the earliest of our comic writers, wears a rose-colored crêpe de Paris over silk, with no ornaments of any description to set off her rare beauty.

Mrs. Senator Stockton, of New Jersey, has appeared several times this season in an amber-colored silk, trimmed with a sort of scroll-work of black velvet, every curve and crescent of the velvet edged with white lace; the corsage was trimmed with black velvet and white lace, and a jet necklace was worn with a second necklace of solitaire diamonds upon black velvet.

LILIAN'S LIFE.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

WE are all of us apt to think that short life and sudden death are among those terrible evils from which we must pray to be delivered. And how few of us there are who pause to consider the possibility of as much bliss and as much experience being crowded into the shorter span, in rich and solid veins, as could be beaten out in thin surfaces over the whole of threescore-and-ten!

For my part, when all the world were pitying and sorrowing over Lilian Holberton's early loss, it seemed to me a sort of sublime and satisfying thing. She was a being so perfect in her way—perfect as a rose or a spray of lily bells is perfect—that if she had lived to be eighty, the experiences of years, with their strictest discipline, would hardly have given her an added perfection. And how much better is it, after all, to have dragged out a long existence of the common aches and ails, to lie in your bed at last fearing pain and dreading death, than to go down in the night with your lover's arms about you—to slip from one heaven into another?

She was the child of wealthy parents, born in a home that was only not a palace, with sisters and brothers about her to brighten the hours of every day. Objects of beauty constantly surrounded her: rich colors, soft draperies; paintings, every one of which was a glimpse into ideal regions; statues of lovely and heroic beings that taught her something of the society of demi-gods; and, without, the house was set in gardens, a bright mosaic of lawn and flower bed and fountain and wood and river. Her childhood was only a long rapture: she fell asleep at night full of the happy fatigue of pleasure; she sprang up in the morning as innocent and fresh and ready for life as the sunbeams and birds and flowers and dew. She was full of natural gifts, moreover; her pencil was as skillful in her hands as her needle, and music came at her bidding like a handmaid. She learned, too, both the pleasure of sacrifice and the pleasure of her own will; and her warm and generous heart never suffered a pang from seeing sorrows that she could not relieve. As she grew older and blossomed into girlhood, beauty blossomed with her. Her shape was round and supple and slender, and her face was of the kind that used to be pictured in the old souvenirs and annuals, and that artists have ceased to believe in—a dazzling face, with the velvet rose on its dimpled cheek, the ivory of its round high brow, with the red of its melting lip, the golden brown of its clustering curls. Yes, Lilian Holberton was as perfect among young girls as a half-blown rose is among flowers—as good as she was beautiful, as happy as she was good. I never shall forget what a vision she was one night at a party in Washington, in which city she was sojourning with her father.

Mr. Holberton had come to Washington on business, bringing Miss Lilian with him for the journey and the change, and giving her in charge to his cousin, Mrs. Sterling, who lived in the city; and of course Mrs. Sterling, being a lady of society, and finding such a treasure as a beauty in her possession, lost no time in mulcting Mr. Holberton to the extent of a ball dress—a ball dress that was simply bewitching—and taking Lilian in it to the only party she ever attended in her life, and whither she went with a delightful mingling of sensations, knowing that it was not intended she should come out for some years to come, and so, more than half conscious of her mother's disapproval, but nevertheless full of satisfaction at the pride in her father's eyes as he surveyed her—her father who had been talked over to this single escapade—and flushed with anticipation of the miraculous delights of the night.

It was said to be, I think, the finest party ever given in the capital. The rooms were no more spacious than those of Lilian's home—perhaps not so spacious; the pictures and statuary, choice as they were, did not strike her with any new emotion; but the white, steady blaze of the wax-lights filled the place with such radiance that it seemed like going inside a star, and the color and fragrance of the flowers made it intoxicating to breathe the air: vines running along the cornices, and blossoming on every lintel, wreathing every statue, and dripping from every picture; one mantel a mere plot of thick purple violets, another a mat of single sweet-brier roses; the sconces twined with great red and white lilies; an illuminated fountain shooting up like lances of flame, but falling noiselessly into the bedded moss around it, and cooling the great ball-room like a dew; rosy oleander and snowy orange trees lining the broad stairways, with night-blooming cereus, like a lamp of light itself, and an aloe in flower; and wreaths and balls and baskets of azaleas and carnations and hyacinths stretching every where from lofty door to door; a murmur of sweet voices; the band playing the Träumerei fit to break her heart. And people passing in such toilettes as she had only seen pictured on fans—this one a moving color with the shimmer of her silks, that one a moving light with the splendor of her jewels. When Lilian looked upon it all, and glancing into the supper-room, saw flowers again softening the glitter of gold and silver and crystal there, and the fantastic erections of confection and sweetmeat, the block of ice with its red hollow of claret-punch, and tasted a single sip of a maddening elixir of Champagne and green tea, it was no wonder that she half fancied it a place of enchantment, and carried herself with all the abandon that comported with the scene.

Of all the lovely maidens there she could not know she was the loveliest. Her dress, of that last pale shade of green that you sometimes see in a late autumn sky before sunset—that ineffable tint which nobody but a milliner was ever audacious enough to catch and label with the name of vert d'eau—was veiled with web over web of flowing silken net, till she might have seemed a water-nymph with the white foam of her shallows about her; and round her neck Mrs. Sterling had hung a wonderful string of aqua marine beads cut in countless facets, which, circling the throat, that had the swan's own curve in it, with their band of light, buried themselves in the laces of the stomacher, and fell in a chatelaine far down among the snowy skirts, and a cluster of the aqua marine hung in the bright hair and trembled above the white forehead like a star. It was a bewildering night to Lilian, with the dress, the scene, the homage to her beauty, the music, the devotion of one partner more marked than all the rest—a pale and handsome Southern youth—and the issuing, to thunder of rolling carriages, into the cold air and the yellow streak of dawn. And a couple of nights thereafter, still too excited for any sleep save in snatches, she was trundling, to the sound of horns and the clank of chains, down the historic street of Baltimore, was rolling across the immense stretch of the Gunpowder rivers, so weirdly desolate, with not a light or sail on all their dark and lonely expanse, rolling across the mile-long Susquehanna Bridge, that shook to the great train's tread, and so northward to her home again.

And then came the single cloud in Lilian's sky—a cloud of no great duration, though black enough, she thought, while it lasted. Her mother, shocked at the escapade of the Washington party, and at its possible effects on Lilian's character, determined that the truant should be sent away to a finishing school, and one so far off that there could be no relenting. An English school, therefore, recommended by valued acquaintances across the water, was chosen; and Lilian, her appetite for excitement having been stimulated till the prospect of the ocean travel quite obliterated the prospect of the school, and conscious herself that her education was not yet all it should be, departed in high spirits for the foreign shores, and was established and left in the famous school by her parents with great satisfaction.

But Lilian Holberton was no tame English lassie to succumb to tyranny without resistance; she was a thorough American, and as often a rebel to unjust rules as any thing else. In fact, she knew her rights, and knowing, dared maintain; and she had not been a month in the establishment before she found that the boarding-school horrors that the English journals now and then reveal were daily occurrences there. She had thereupon announced her intention of leaving the place at once, and had been punished like a child, and held up to the reprobation of all her comrades for such unheard-of unmaidenliness. She had been called an American in the same tone as she would have been called a savage, her beautiful shoulders had known the sting of the bunch of rods, she had been put into pinafores, she had been starved into submission, and her letters home had been opened and destroyed.

Of course, after divining that these letters never went beyond the school gates, it was out of the question for Lilian to think of remaining there, in prison and among enemies, for the sake of all the accomplishments in the world. Accomplishments could be gotten elsewhere, but health and nerves and spirits would be destroyed here; and she thought of her father's wrathful amazement if he could but know of her plight, and of her mother's tears and self-reproach, and her younger sisters' horror, till she fairly cried herself out of pity for them! And one dark night, with a parcel of such articles as were indispensable, she eluded observation, climbed through a window, ran across the fields, and caught the night train at the adjoining station, where the grinning guard, who may have surmised from whence she came, and had perhaps had such passengers before, stowed her away in a coach by herself.

The next morning she stepped from the car, and found herself in a little sea-faring town, of which she knew nothing except that ships sailed thence for the other side of the world. But how to buy a berth on any of them? She had no jewelry, for her father had always disapproved of its influence upon youth, and her purse had been taken away from her at the school; but she had managed to secrete her watch from the hawks' eyes about her, and that she sold now, within the hour, for just money enough to secure a passage in an outward-bound brig. The brig was outward-bound, that was all she understood about it in her haste and panic; but any where away from those shores, away from the power of Miss Montgomery, from the humiliation of her rods, the hunger of her discipline; from the spiked pencil of the music-master, that tore her fingers; from the maulstick of the painting teacher, that bruised her flesh; from the back-boards and braces, from the stocks and pinafores, the slights and insults and outrages—any where away from these daily tortures that had been the only trouble of her life, and had lasted just four months—any where away from these would be traveling Edenward. And so, indeed, it proved for Lilian.

When she learned at last that the brig's destination was Nassau and not New York, instead of being terrified, she congratulated herself that Nassau was so near home; she only feared that before all sail was set Miss Montgomery or her myrmidons might be upon her; and she dispatched a letter by the pilot, which should reach the ocean mail, not closed for a couple of days yet, and should instruct her father either to await her in Nassau or to place funds there by the means of which she might hasten to him and her mother. And that done, and the pilot-boat watched as it went dancing over the waves till it was a speck, and then was nothing, she was sure that she was safe, that she had escaped at last, that she was on her way home—on her way to that home peopled by such heavenly beings as she believed her family to be—that place haunted by sweet voices, gentle manners, beautiful shapes; and she could see one and all running down the white stairs of the pillared porch to meet her as she came up the blossoming paradise of gardens, and she was already embracing them and crying in their arms. And her heart opened to all the world—she could even forgive Miss Montgomery; and having made friends with the captain's wife, she was bubbling over with happiness and all the effervescence of her new experience.

After all, there is nothing so lovely as happiness. The happy smile of a plain face can soon eclipse the sour discontent of a beauty. And what, then, must be the smile of beauty that does not feel a film between itself and the sun! Lilian, dancing here and there about the deck, hanging over the vessel's side in reverie, or brightening the little cabin below, had presently endeared herself to all about. "We shall have fine weather," said the sailors, "so long as she's aboard," and Mr. Taliaferro repeated it to her—Horace Taliaferro, one of the three or four other passengers in the little craft, indeed an old acquaintance, as it seemed to her now, for he was no other than the devoted partner of her only ball, the pale and handsome Southern youth with whom she had danced so often on that bewildering night which she remembered like a splendid dream. She had hailed him here with rapture and the grasp of both hands, never thinking of the difference between the shining ball dress and the straight school attire, never practicing art or wile, only glad to see him from the bottom of her overflowing heart, and not once conscious that her beauty was of the sort that nothing pales but time, and that a hood of hodden gray became her as a crown of jewels might.

"We shall have fine weather, the sailors say, so long as you are aboard, Miss Lilian," said he.

"Then I must forget," said she, "that Jonah is the only prophet who ever went to sea."

"Yet sailors have more prophecies than any other people."

"I hope they are false ones," she answered; "for, of all things, I want a storm. Perhaps I shall never be at sea again in a sailing vessel, and to think of missing a storm!"

Mr. Taliaferro looked at her a moment. "You are such a happy thing," he said, "that your happiness runs over and gives a rosy bloom to horror itself. You forget that storm in those latitudes where we are going means death and drowning and despair, and all the other double d's."

"Hush, hush!" she said. "I am getting as superstitious as a sailor. You must not mention those dreadful things, or they will think you are calling them, and will come. I don't mean, of course, any such vicious storm with murderous intent as all that; only a great blustering gale that we shall ride out, and then the wind will fall, and the sea go down into long swells, and the sun will come out, and we will find ourselves swinging under the lee of a great shining cliff, with a palm-tree bending over the brink of it. Oh, just to think of the moment when we first see a palm-tree towering against the sky—it is enough to live for! And to have it without planning for it, too! How glad I am I ran away from school!"

"So am I," said Mr. Taliaferro.

And then the young girl was suddenly silent, and neither did he say any more; but they leaned there together over the ship's side and watched the slow-sliding colors of the depths below, as they had been watching them any time these three weeks past, and as they were to watch them for these three weeks to come. And of course the rest followed quickly, as it was likely to follow where the only young people on the ship, hemmed in by sky and sea, were hourly in each other's companionship: as likely to follow, indeed, as two drops of water in a cup are likely to roll together and make one drop.

Perhaps the young man's heart had warmed to the young girl before; but this exuberant happiness of hers gave her a great brilliancy that called the deepest passions into play, and her sunny sweetness and gayety were like chains to hold him bound. Presently, if she were absent, he missed her, and went to seek her; and then one does not need beauty or brilliancy when one has propinquity, for propinquity is a wonderful power among the great elemental forces. For her own side, excepting her father and now and then a guest, and the people of her brief Washington sojourn, Lilian had perhaps never spoken to a man before—certainly never to a young man. She was alone and among aliens, among dangers too, and in strange situations. When the wind piped at night in the rigging and made her sigh with an unknown sorrow, or when a heavy sea broke round the bows and made her shiver with an unnamed fear, this protecting manner of his gave her an assurance that no harm could touch her; and when the sun shone, and the fitful breeze just flapped the sail, and they drifted along like a weed on the tide, this interest of his gave delight to the delay. Half realizing that lately she was an oppressed slave, and now was ruling like a queen, she experienced novel and exquisite sensations. When he sought her her heart sprang up and went out to meet him; and lately a hidden thrill had trembled through all her veins as she looked at him, and had made her turn her eyes away, for he had a dark and powerful beauty of his own, and his eyes were saying things to hers that there was no mistaking, and yet, perhaps, she hardly knew what it was they said; she dared not think herself so blessed as to have the right to believe them.

They were sitting together one night on deck. The old gentleman who always said he was going South for his lungs, as if they were something he had mislaid, had gone below for the same things now; his elderly sister had followed with his air-cushions and wraps; the owner—young Taliaferro's father—and the supercargo had turned in long ago, and the captain's good wife played propriety with her mouth so audibly wide open that you knew her eyes were shut; there was only the watch on deck; there was only one solitary passenger sitting almost amidships in the shadow of the main stay-sail; there was only the man at the wheel any where near them, and who ever thought of the man at the wheel being any thing more than a part of the fixtures of the binnacle! The deep purple of the heavens was all alive with starlight as with an informing spirit, the golden shell of a new moon was just dropping in the west; and Taliaferro and Lilian leaned side by side and studied the phosphorescent water depths in the way that had become habitual to them. And they talked low-voiced and in hesitating sentences, and then there were long, sweet silences, in which neither dared meet the other's eye, though conscious of the pulse in either's heart—and in one of them his arm had stolen round her trembling form, and their lips had met in the first long, deep kiss, and they were plighted lovers without a word. And under the shelter of the cloak that he threw around her they sat in one another's arms a long, delicious, whispering hour, while the moon went down, and the wind rose, and the little brig went bounding on.

If these two lovers had had eyes for any thing outside their own meridian, they might have seen the somewhat ominous sight of a dark finger lifted straight against the red horn of the moon one instant ere it sank from sight, like the threatening finger of some dark storm afrit. Perhaps it belonged to the hand of a passenger who could not sleep, and coming on deck, had wet his landsman's finger and held it up to see which way the wind was blowing, while he was yet half below. Perhaps it was the bare topmast of some passing ship far off in the horizon. No matter which; they never saw it; they saw only each other, were aware only of the present; did not so much as dream of the future; felt not one thrill of vaguest fear of any dole that could disturb their bliss. And as they sat there—their arms about each other, their foreheads cool in the gale that blew their hair together, their cheeks warm each against the other, their hearts beating together, wrapped all in peace and joy and passion, the deep, sweet peace, the pure and lofty passion—there came a seething rush and roar every where about us, there was a cry from the look-out, and as we lay that minute in the trough of the sea, a vast black mass was looming above us, was over us! And before a hand could touch the wheel again the wave had slipped from under, and the monster came crushing and rending on, and its huge iron beak had cut us down as an axe cuts a branch. And I had sprung and caught a hanging martingale chain, and clung and clambered, and the great Spanish steamer crashed on with me, and I saw the lovers, not once disturbed in their dreaming, still in each other's arms as death and drowning overwhelmed them, while the little brig went down like a lump of lead.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Le Fanu.—How to get married.

DEATH seems to have declared a vendetta against our novelists. Lever, Lytton, Hannay, have left us within a few weeks of one another, and now we have lost Le Fanu. In my humble judgment he was the very best of our so-called sensational writers. There is at present among the more ignorant of our reading public an outcry against "sensation," which, to take their own definition of the offense, would be equally justifiable against Scott and Shakspeare; and because Le Fanu was a powerful dramatic writer (without, however, the gift of humor), and avoided commonplace as though it had been a cur which had bitten him, he was by no means so popular as he deserved to be. He was not an author for the bread-and-butter misses, and still less for the ladies of fashion, who like to see those human inanities who form their own society reproduced in fiction. His portraits frown out of their dark frames upon a frivolous world, and seem to hint something mystic and terrible of that which is to come. Nobody ever met Uncle Silas at dinner in Grosvenor Place, or rode with him in Rotton Row, but he lives and breathes, for all that, a very noticeable gentleman. In the House by the Church-Yard is described perhaps the most "sensational" incident in the whole range of fiction—namely, when the man whose skull is battered in is operated on by trepan, and recalled to life and reason for a single instant to indicate his murderer. The series of tales lately published by this author, entitled In a Glass Darkly, contain some of the most striking short stories ever written. I remember Mr. Dickens calling my attention to one of them, Green Tea—it first appeared in All the Year Round—as being the perfection of a ghostly story; and so it is. Le Fanu's last novel, about to be republished from the same journal, is singularly enough called Willing to Die, and in the course of it there are some curious speculations upon death, which by this time he has verified, or found disproved, poor fellow.

No sooner has Mr. Charles Reade got out of the frying-pan of the Athenæum than he falls into the fire of the Morning Advertiser. He has brought an action for libel against that newspaper for a criticism which describes his play of Shilly-Shally as "indecent;" and by the help of the Attorney-General, whom he employed in the case (instead of, as usual, fighting his own legal battle), he has obtained a verdict with £200 damages. Half the (surviving) authors of England were subpœnaed upon Mr. Reade's side, but they were unfortunately not called upon by counsel to state their views upon this delicate matter, which might have settled the canon of what is "permissible" for the future. "To the pure all things are pure," said the complainant; the defendant's case was that a theatrical audience is mixed and not pure, and that in this case it applauded what was improper.

If there is not much purity in the world, there is a great deal of simplicity, as is evidenced by the prosperity of the periodical entitled the Matrimonial News. It is a bona fide production, I believe, which has now existed for two years, and contains about three hundred and fifty proposals of marriage every week. It professes itself to be "a journal devoted to the promotion of conjugal felicity," and that it really does make numerous matches which would otherwise never be "arranged" (as the fashionable papers call it) there seems no manner of doubt. Of course it is sometimes the vehicle of practical jokes. A. K. V., for instance, is obviously making game of this very serious business when he advertises thus:

TO WIDOWS.—A. K. V. is desirous of meeting with one of these dear creatures who will consent to marry him for love. He is possessed of beautiful whiskers. The tender age of 45 preferred. His own age is 20.

This gentleman will certainly take in nobody, and he is the only advertiser who appears to be indulging in a joke. One or two of them, however, I am afraid, permit themselves to exaggerate, if not their personal charms, at all events their means of livelihood:

AN OFFICER OF RANK going out to India wishes to marry. He is about 40, tall, good-looking, and has about £14,000 a year. Would like to hear from a lady between 25 and 30.

The last statement is likely enough to be correct, but that he has fourteen thousand pounds (not dollars, mind) per annum we should be inclined to doubt. If he has, he would not be going to India: we were about to add, "nor advertising for a wife in the Matrimonial News." But if we are to believe these advertisements at all, they are by no means inserted only by those in want of money. The address to the public with which this paper is headed seems really, to judge by the results, to have some truth in it when it asserts that "civilization, combined with the cold formalities of society and the rules of etiquette, imposes such restrictions on the sexes that there are thousands of marriageable men and women of all ages, capable of making each other happy, who never have a chance of meeting one another; hence the desirability of having some respectable organ (such as the M. N.) through which," etc., etc.

Certainly all conditions of men and women, except persons of title and servants (there is but one "son of a baronet," and but one young person in domestic service), appear to make use of the M. N. as a channel for getting wives and husbands. In the case of the ladies, especially when young, the epithet "jolly," I find, is often self-applied in recommending themselves to the other sex:

JESSIE, tall, dark, rather good-looking, "jolly," musical, aged 20, would make a loving wife, and would like to hear from 6243—

which is not the amount of lovers she desires, but the number of an advertisement of some previous date—"with a view to a matrimonial arrangement." Widows, of course, do not advertise themselves as "jolly," but there are a good many of them who seem in tolerable spirits, and quite prepared to do mankind the compliment of risking slavery a second time:

A HANDSOME young widow, aged 28, tall and fair, with a good independent income, desires to marry. Would like a gentleman of about 40 years of age. Editor has carte and address.

Again:

A HANDSOME young widow, aged 32, no family, and with £7000, desires to hear of some gentleman of good means and position, etc.

In some respects these widowed advertisers, who must be to some extent their own mistresses, and able to select mates for themselves, amaze one even more than the young ladies, though, perhaps, on the whole, the latter are the greater puzzles.

With one example of the masculine wooer—for all are wooers—I have done. He is, like many others, a clergyman:

DIDYMUS. I am a young curate, aged 27, middle size, fair, good-looking, and with good prospects. Would like to make the acquaintance of a young lady of moderate means, and especially of amiable and "jolly" disposition. Would like to hear (with cartes) from Nos. 6326, 6263, and 6404, of November 16.

This, I think, is pretty well for Didymus. But I wonder how 6326 takes it upon discovering that he has fallen equally in love with the descriptions furnished by 6263 and 6404? Or is there "safety in numbers" from the pangs of jealousy?

Altogether the Matrimonial News is a curious product of civilization, and makes one open one's eyes.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS

WHETHER the spring of 1873 will prove an abnormal season remains to be seen. Certainly winter was most reluctant to resign his icy reign, and gave us some fine specimens of his vigor even in the very last days of his nominal life—just as if he dared us to say that he was in the least bit old or worn out. Naturally we would have supposed that there was enough snow for spring sunshine to melt away without that heavy storm the latter part of February, which in some sections of New England added eighteen inches to the previous accumulation. The Court Journal contains a description of a snow-plow, which, for the first time in London, was used to clear the streets early in February. We think it must again have been called into requisition when on February 24 the snow lay on a level to the depth of one foot in the streets of the metropolis. The winter of 1873 will stand on record as one of the severest. It is pleasant, in contrast, to be reminded that there have been exceptionally mild winters. We have had them in this country, and they have also been known in Europe. A correspondent of the Cologne Gazette has been consulting old chronicles, and gives some curious data in regard to the temperature of certain winters in Germany, where usually the season is more severe than in England. In the year 1241 the trees were in bloom in March, and cherries were ripe in May. In 1289 there was no winter, so to speak, and the temperature was so very spring-like at Christmas that young girls decorated themselves with violets. In 1538 the gardens were green in December, and in full bloom in January. In 1572 the trees were covered with foliage in February; the same took place in 1588. There was likewise no winter in the years 1607, 1609, and 1617. In 1659 no snow fell, and there was no frost. In January of 1722 people were able to dispense with firing, and all the trees were in bloom in February. In 1807 there was also almost no winter. The mild winters of 1834 and 1846 are still remembered by many. The weather chronicles of the United States would reveal facts not very unlike these statements concerning German winters.

We are told curious things concerning the amusements of great men who lived long ago. Studious minds often take up some oddity to rest their brains in spare moments. Swift used to run up and down the steps of the deanery for exercise and amusement; Dr. Samuel Clarke, the Bible commentator, amused himself by jumping over tables and chairs; Shelley took great pleasure in making paper boats and watching them as they floated on the water; Tycho Brahe amused himself with polishing glasses for spectacles, and Socrates in playing with children; Petavius, at the end of every second hour of study, used to twirl his chair for five minutes.

A lady of Des Moines has received a patent for a wash-boiler and attachments, wherein the water and steam are so controlled that the clothing is by them automatically moved, rubbed, and cleansed. The whole process is completed in the boiler, and the garments come out thoroughly clean, requiring no subsequent rubbing. If this affair proves a practical success, the griefs of "washing-day" may be mitigated.

The yearly increasing uncertainty of the fruit crop is referred by scientific inquirers to the clearing of the country from forest trees. In the early settlement of this country peaches were easily grown in localities where now they are seldom found. It would surely be desirable to preserve favorable conditions for the culture of this fruit in those localities where it can now be ripened.

Biela's comet was expected to make its nearest approach to the earth during the latter part of 1872, but it failed to make its appearance. Neither could it be found in 1859 or in 1866, though careful search was made for it. This comet was first recognized a hundred years ago, in 1772, and rediscovered by Biela in 1826. In 1846 it was noticed that it was gradually separating into two portions; and on its last appearance, in 1852, the space between the two portions was estimated to be 1,250,000 miles. Astronomers of Vienna and Copenhagen have discovered that the orbit of this comet is marked by a meteor stream, and hence many interesting speculations arise.

Twenty thousand men and ten thousand horses and oxen are in the lumber woods of Maine this winter.

The site of the Lenox Public Library is on Fifth Avenue, between Seventieth and Seventy-first streets. Considerable progress has been already made on the building, and it is estimated that the whole will be completed within a year and a half. It will be remembered that some time ago Mr. James Lenox contributed his valuable collection of books and works of art, together with about five hundred thousand dollars and ten lots of land, toward the establishment of a free library in this city. Little is known in detail concerning the Lenox collection of treasures, as it has never been open to public view, and has but in rare instances been inspected by private individuals, but it is known to be the result of thirty or forty years of time and great expenditure of money.

The Court Journal contains the following item, which may be interesting to some of our readers:

"The court went into mourning on Tuesday, the 4th instant, for her late Majesty the Dowager Empress of Brazil, viz., the ladies to wear black dresses, white gloves, black or white shoes, feathers, and fans, pearls, diamonds, or plain gold or silver ornaments; the gentlemen to wear black court dress, with black swords and buckles. The court to change the mourning on Tuesday, the 11th instant, viz., the ladies to wear black dresses, with colored ribbons, flowers, feathers, and ornaments; the gentlemen to continue the same mourning. And on Friday, the 14th instant, the court to go out of mourning."

A contract has been signed for a railway tunnel under the Alps. It is to be nine miles long, to be completed in eight years, and to cost ten million dollars.

Twenty thousand quarts of milk are condensed daily in the great milk establishments in the cantons of St. Gall and Freiburg, in Switzerland. A large proportion of this goes to supply the great city of London.

Darwin may as well resign his position. A scientific luminary has just discovered that the human race had its origin in a "yeast fungus!" An exchange remarks, "It now only remains to be ascertained what brewery furnished the yeast."

It is rumored that Alexandre Dumas is about to set out on a voyage of several years around the world.

Housekeepers will do well to keep a close watch upon their flour barrel, since it has been settled by high scientific authority that flour will explode. The immediate cause of investigation into this subject was an explosion which took place not long ago in the Tradestown Flour-Mills in Scotland. Dr. M'Adam, Professor of Chemistry in the Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh, studied into the case, and concluded that the conditions requisite to bring about a flour explosion are somewhat similar to those which cause a gas explosion. Ordinary gas will burn when unmixed with air, but will explode when sufficient air is mingled with it. "Flour," says Dr. M'Adam, "agrees with coal gas in simply being combustible when unmixed with air, and equally agrees with coal gas in being explosive when mixed with air." Still we fancy people may go on making and eating bread, cake, and pies without incurring any great danger.

Tobacco has been undergoing an investigation in France. The "weed" has often been subjected to analysis both by itself and in connection with its effects upon individuals. The result is that very few change their opinion: if an individual smokes or chews tobacco, he seldom thinks it is injurious to himself; if he does not use it at all, he believes it to be universally harmful. One of the professors of the Polytechnic School in Paris recently made investigation into the habits and scholarship of the one hundred and sixty students. He found that one hundred and two were smokers, and fifty-eight never used tobacco. Further inquiry showed that in each grade the students who did not smoke outranked those who did smoke, and that the scholarship of the smokers steadily deteriorated as the smoking continued. Influenced by several reports of a similar nature, the Minister of Public Instruction in France has issued a circular to the directors of colleges and schools forbidding tobacco to students as injurious to physical and intellectual development.

A wealthy New Yorker visited Hartford a week or two ago, and wishing to drive about the city, went to a livery-stable to hire a "team." The man of horses was loath to trust a valuable "turnout" to an entire stranger, and so asked for references. The gentleman replied that he could give no references, but that he would buy the horses and sleigh, and when he returned from his ride the stable-keeper might refund the money. A price was agreed upon, and the cash paid down. When, later in the day, the stranger brought the team back to the stable, his money was returned and he started to go.

"Hold on," said the man of horses; "you have not paid your horse hire!"

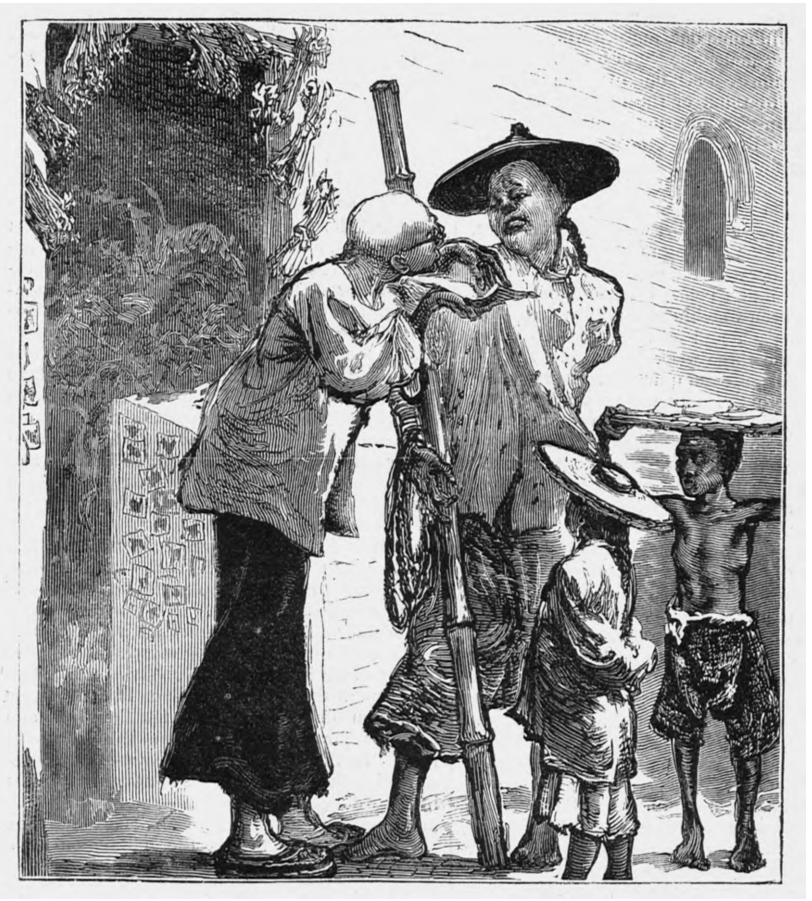
"Why, my dear Sir," said the New Yorker, coolly, "I have been driving my own team this morning!" The stable-keeper looked disgusted, but did not force his claims.

In Paris street-singing is a lucrative employment. But the number in the profession is strictly limited to one hundred; a new license is never granted except to fill the place of one who is dead or who has retired from the business. With the license the artist receives a medal, which he is bound to produce when called upon, and he must submit every song to the censor.

Digitized by Google

LIFE IN CHINA.

THE CHINESE CANGUE.



AN HERB DOCTOR.

THE CHINESE CANGUE.

CRIME in China is punishable in a variety of ways which would not be tolerated in a Christian country. Criminals are at times suspended by the thumbs, by the feet and hands, in the most painful attitudes; made to kneel on chains, or sit in constrained positions, and, as in the illustration, to wear a wooden collar, or cangue, inscribed in bold characters with the particular offense committed by the wearer. If it be a theft, the prisoner has to expiate his crime, chained in the cangue, close to the threshold of the dwelling from which the property had been stolen.

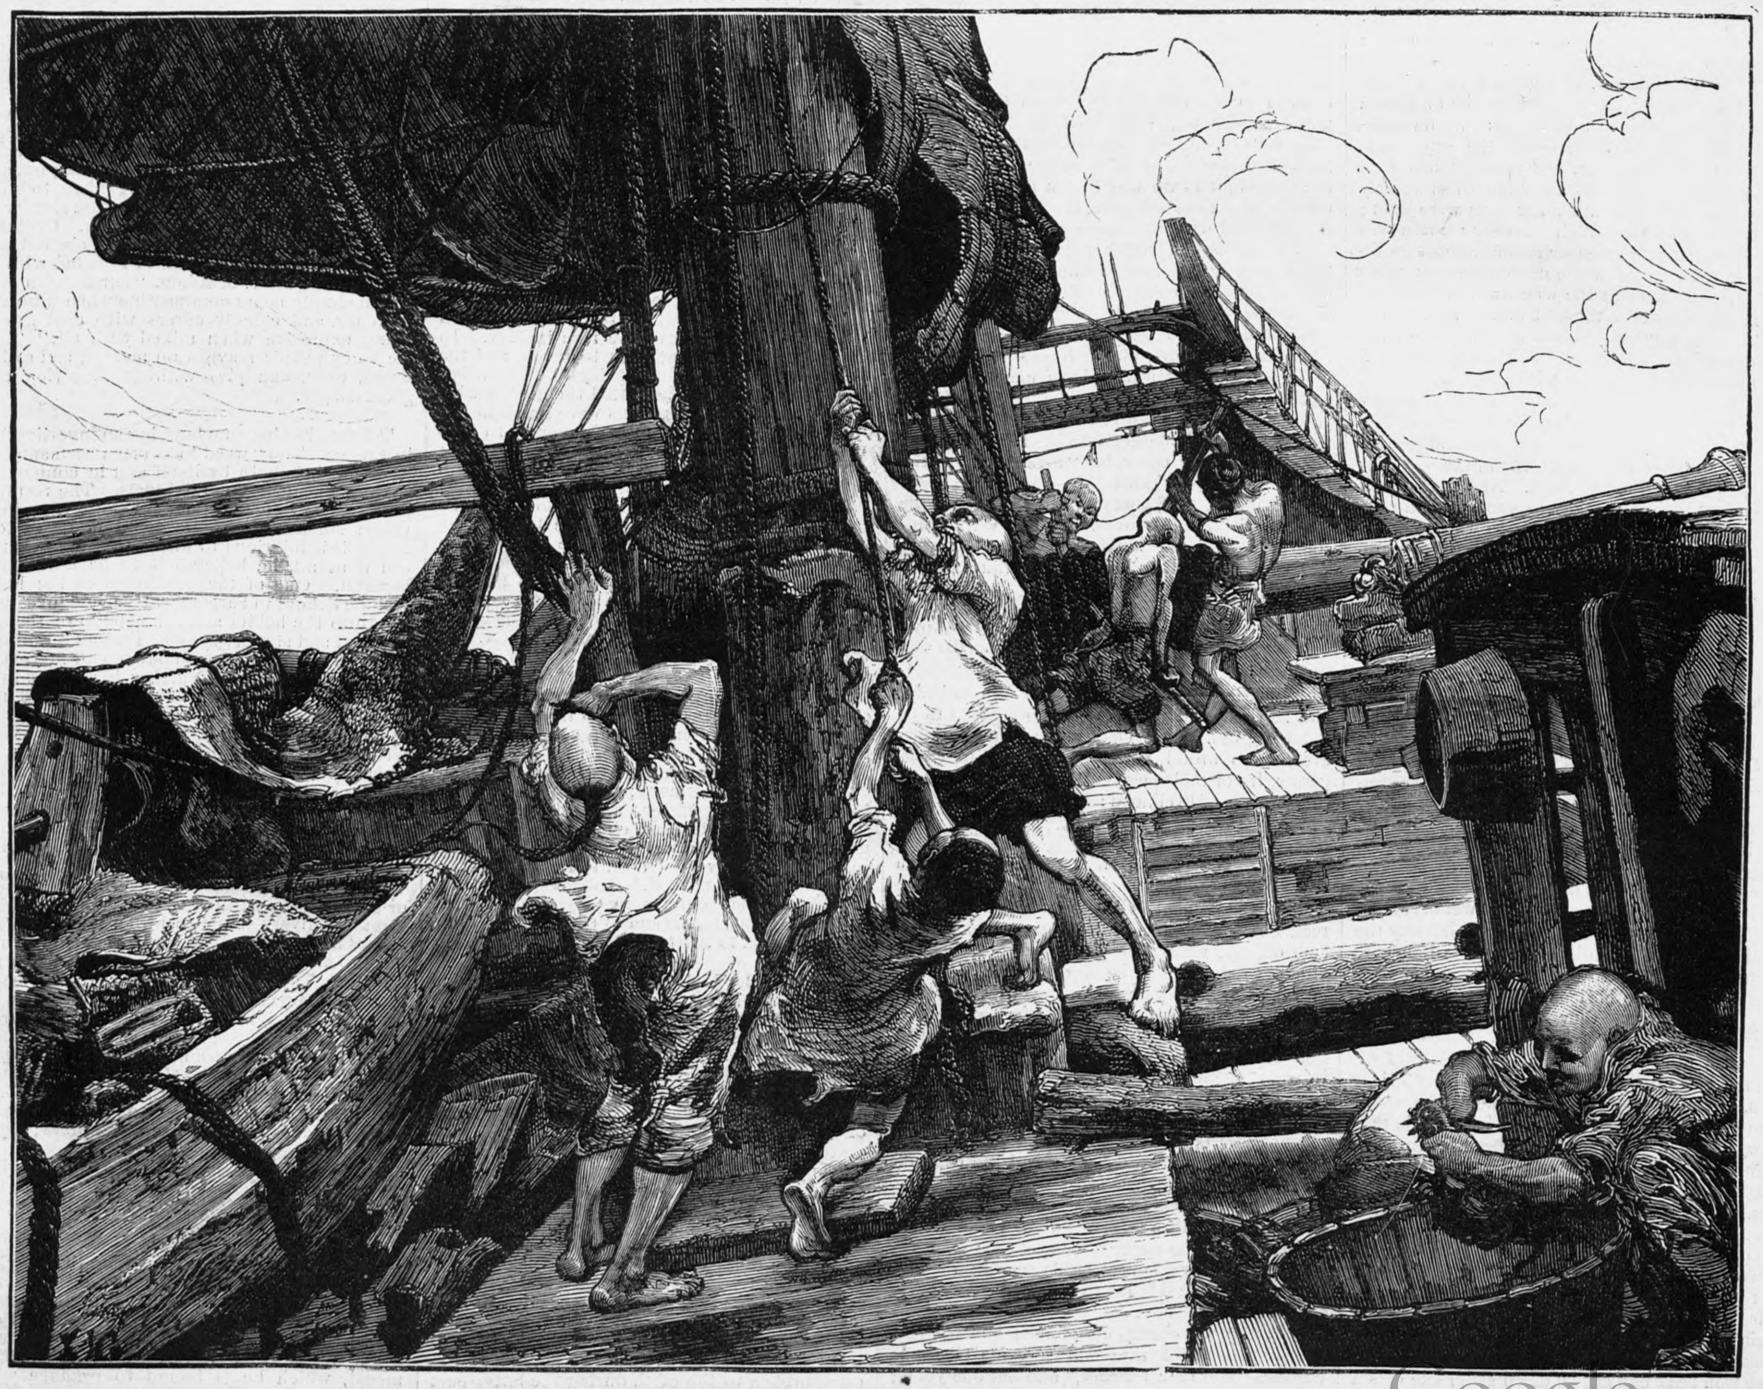
THE HERB DOCTOR.

The medical knowledge which the Chinese possess can hardly be dignified by the name of a science, and there is no school of medicine in China where men receive a special training and diploma entitling them to practice as physicians.

The doctor of our sketch has gained a degree of celebrity among the lower orders for the wonderful efficacy of his plasters, composed of the extracts of a variety of herbs. Like the vendors of patent medicines in our own country, this old gentleman has a host of testimonials to which he points with pride as a proof his skill. These testimonials consist of his own plasters, which, when they have effected a cure, are brought back by the patient and stuck on his doorway, or the herb-covered counter of his little shop.

SETTING SAIL ON BOARD A TRADING JUNK.

The vessel is bound on a coasting trip, and the crew are setting sail—an operation conducted with skill and alacrity when each individual composing the crew has been persuaded in his own mind that it is the correct thing to do. The task of persuasion devolves upon the gentleman whose turn it is to be captain. It becomes, then, a matter of grave difficulty to know who is captain, as the vessel and part of her cargo are owned by a number of men on board, who have each a voice in the management of the junk. The matter is not unfrequently decided by a toss up of the prognosticating sticks connected with the small shrine of the sailors' goddess, which has an important place, and performs important functions on board. Should bad luck or foul weather be indicated by the goddess, the crew betakes itself to pipes and gambling until all is favorable for the voyage, when an offering is made to the goddess by decapitating a cock and sticking a portion of its blood and feathers to the bow and mainmast, and pouring a cup of wine upon the water, when the sails are hoisted, and the craft bowls away before a fair wind.



ON BOARD A TRADING JUNK—SETTING SAIL.

Hosted by Google

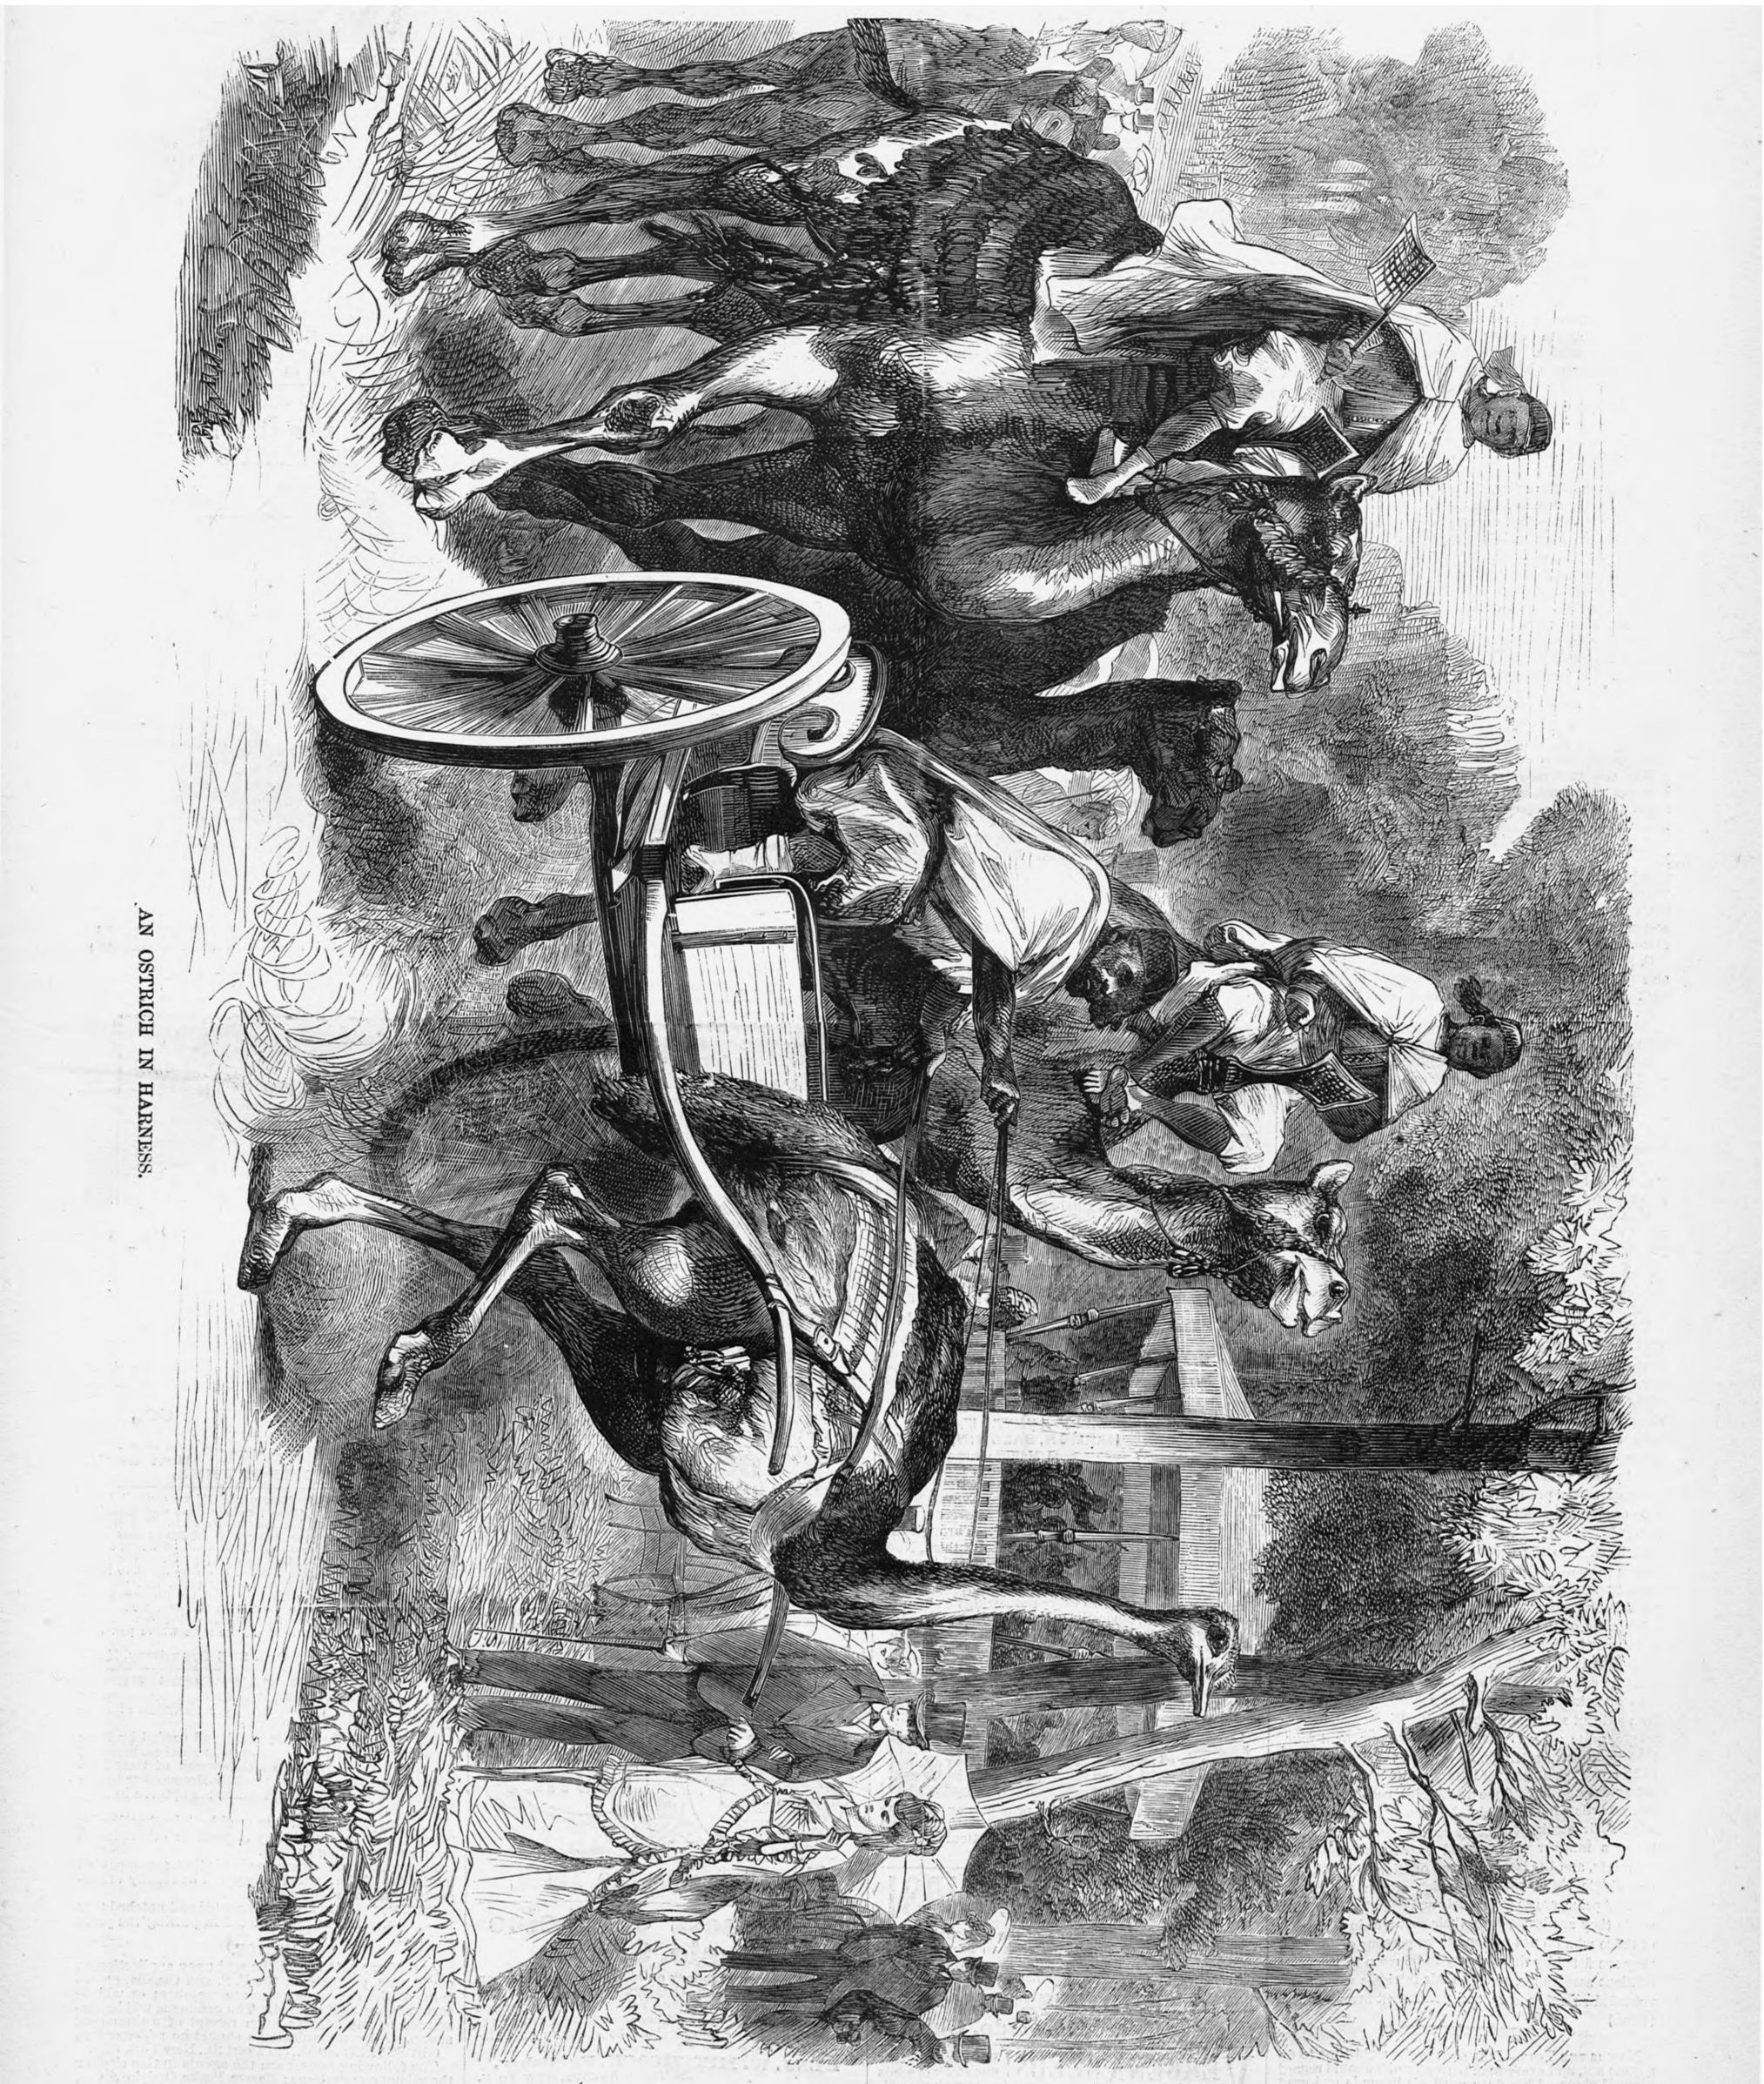
AN OSTRICH IN HARNESS.

THE accompanying illustration represents an attempt which was made some time since to drive an ostrich in single harness in the Bois de Boulogne, Paris. This ostrich, with several dromedaries, which are also seen in the picture, and a white-faced antelope, was sent from Algiers to the Jardin d'Acclimatation, with an Arab and two Soudan natives, the former of whom had the exclusive care of the ostrich, while the others had the remaining animals in charge. Said, the ostrich driver, is a pure-blooded Arab, of gentle and pleasing demeanor.

The large ostrich is a young male, with glossy black plumage, quite unlike the female bird, whose feathers are of a uniform dusky gray. He has strong-jointed legs and close hoofs, a camel-shaped neck sparsely covered with hair, and a hollow, mournful, lowing voice. This bird measures exactly seven feet from the head to the ground, and four feet from the back; his neck is about one-third of its entire height in length. His food consists principally of hard bread, leguminous vegetables, bran, oats, and hay. He swallows vegetables with apparent relish, but prefers bread, giving preference to the oldest, hardest, and most stale army biscuits that can be found. The propensities of the ostrich for eating iron have long been celebrated.

Undoubtedly the ostrich might be made subservient to the purposes of man, if we had but the means of breaking and managing it as we do a horse. The first successful experiment of this sort was made by Said, the Arab. He had repeatedly met with signal failure whenever he had tried to lead his charge from one place to another. The ostrich was stubborn and refractory, and positively refused to stir. In this emergency the Arab exclaimed, "I can not draw the ostrich; I will make him draw me." With the ingenuity of his race he soon devised and carried into execution the following plan. He first fastened a collar around the animal's powerful chest, then put a sort of girdle about his thighs, and united it to the breast collar in front by two narrow straps. He also fastened to the straps a pair of reins. After completing this arrangement he placed himself behind the ostrich, and took the reins in his hand. The bird made no further demur; he expanded his wings, and obediently started off at a brisk trot.

Since the favorable issue of this experiment the ostrich has been harnessed to a light wicker wagon and driven in the Bois de Boulogne. He was very docile, and trotted along like a nimble



AN OSTRICH IN HARNESS.

Hosted by Google

pony. A ring was adjusted to his neck, to which a strap was joined. This strap was pulled by the driver when he wished the animal to stop. The driver likewise carried a whip, to strike the neck of the bird on the right or left side, according to the course which he desired him to take. Throngs of admiring spectators assembled to witness the novel sight, and the greatest enthusiasm prevailed.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

X. Q. Z.—A muslin dress for a short stout lady should have two plain untrimmed skirts and a surplice waist, or else a loose polonaise with single skirt.

OLD SUBSCRIBER.—An informal invitation is all that is required from the bride's mother to the bridegroom's family in a distant city, but that much is necessary.—A sage green, olive, or blue-gray poplin or cashmere would make a pretty traveling dress for a bride in the spring.

CONSTANT READER.—Read reply just given "Old Subscriber." Get one silk suit either black or blue-gray for a church dress. A black dotted or striped grenadine, a Napoleon blue foulard with white polka spots, and écru linen suits, will be standard dresses for blondes next season; but as you do not tell us your means or the state of your wardrobe, we can not give very explicit advice. For a morning wrapper get violet delaine, or else a low-priced striped silk. White muslin dressing sacques will be worn with various skirts for breakfast; also pleated blouses.

J. M. H.—Your sample is black cashmere of very fair quality. Make it by cut paper pattern of Double-breasted Redingote Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V.

IGNORANCE.—The story of Rosamond's bower is almost as well known as Little Red Riding-hood. A very little inquiry will suffice to put you in possession of it.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Any carpenter or joiner will furnish you with a simple support for your table-top, which you can stain according to your fancy.

C. M.—Your reference is too indefinite to permit us to find the poem. You can easily look it up yourself in a file of the Bazar.

C. M. A.—Unsophisticated is usually regarded as signifying unversed in the knowledge of the world and its ways. It is susceptible, however, of a wider application.

MRS. G. R.—Boys six months old wear Gabrielles and yoke slips long enough to touch the ankle. They are precisely like girls' dresses, and need not be lengthened, as they are worn shorter as the boy grows older.

MARIA.—Make your spring alpaca suit with a double-breasted redingote, and a deep kilt pleating on the skirt. Use the cut paper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V.

RETT.—The bride-maids should wear white gloves. In accompanying your daughter to the altar you should take the arm of the groom. The gentleman who gives the bride away takes her to church. Your son's dress suit should be a swallow-tail coat, vest, and pantaloons, all made from the same piece of black cloth. Your black silk will be appropriate.

E. M. O.—There are rubber sandals for the street, and kid sandals, that are merely toes, soles, and straps, for the house. Use west-of-England beaver cloth for your sacque.

SUBSCRIBER.—Adam Bede is pronounced as though the last name was spelled Bead.

S. A. D.—Flounces of thin washing fabrics are cut straight; thick cotton goods, such as percales, piqué, and satine, and all linen ruffles, may be either straight or bias.

MRS. M. R. H.—You will require from twenty to twenty-three yards of gros grain for a suit. Use the Louis Quinze Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., and trim with ruffles of the same and lace, or else tape fringe and passementerie.

MRS. O. T.—Guipure lace is the best lace for trimming Japanese silk. You will require about twenty yards, and perhaps more.

DIAMONDS.

THE very name of the Diamond is so closely associated in most people's minds with the idea of costliness, that many persons who are fitted by their taste to enjoy the beauty of these pure and concentrated drops of light, imagine it to be out of the question that they should ever regale themselves with the possession even of a single stone. Yet what present can affection make of more lasting value? Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, in their establishment at 22 John St. (up stairs), have solved the problem how to bring these incomparable ornaments within the reach of moderate purses. It needed only the application of cultivated taste and artistic skill to the setting and arrangement of the stones to achieve this result. Between a Diamond of the first water unset, and an inferior Diamond unset, the difference is not only great but striking. Between a Diamond of the first water well set, and a Diamond of inferior tone ill-set, the difference is still more striking. But it has long been known that persons even of some experience in these matters may be deceived into mistaking an inferior for a first-water Diamond by a skillful setting of the former. Diamonds, for example, quite off color, have been set azur, or a jour, that is, in open settings, so artfully lined with silver as to make them pass for limpid gems. What dishonest tradesmen have done to deceive, can be done by honest artists to embellish. Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, with their stock of first-water brilliants, have combined a number of Diamond ornaments, necklaces, bracelets, and the like, and even of Diamond solitaires and single-stone rings, in which stones, not of the highest price, are so judiciously and effectively set, that while they are brought by their cost within the reach of those who do not pretend to be persons of fortune, they are fitted by their beauty to be worn in the most brilliant assemblies, and by their intrinsic value to be regarded as a fair, safe, and permanent investment.—[Com.]

NOW IS THE TIME.—It is always the right time to do a good act, and every man with a family should regard himself short of his duty until his home is endowed with a Wilson Improved Under-Feed Sewing-Machine. Let it be understood that this admirable machine captured the gold medal at the Northern Ohio Fair last fall, and has every where demonstrated its superiority as a first-class family machine. Add to this the fact that it sells for $15 less than any other really superior machine, and you have an array of advantages in its favor that must be irresistible. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

WORTHINGTON & SMITH,

IMPORTERS AND JOBBERS OF

MILLINERY & STRAW GOODS,

W. I. WORTHINGTON,
W. R. SMITH, JR.

507 BROADWAY, N. Y.,
Under St. Nicholas Hotel.

HAIR!!!

L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,
Between 4TH and GREAT JONES STS.
The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.
Import and manufacture their own Goods, and RETAIL THEM AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.
Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.
Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D., by express, on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

LADIES' CHEST PROTECTOR.

Something entirely New.
ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO FIT THE FORM.
Price in Felt, $2 00, $3 00, $4 00.
" " Chamois, $3 00, $4 00, $5 00.
For married or single Ladies. In ordering please state which and size of bust.
Sold by all Druggists and Ladies' Furnishing Stores, and at 2140 Third Ave.; 218 Broadway; Broadway, cor. 29th St.; and at 7 Sixth Ave.
WHOLESALE.—Chas. H. Crittenton, 7 Sixth Avenue; W. H. Schieffelin & Co., 170 William St.; Fraser & Lee, 20 Beekman St.; G. S. Crawford & Co., 119 Fulton St.
A. C. JACKSON, Manufacturer,
No. 2140 Third Avenue, New York.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 335 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

TO THE LADIES!

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING
Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.
No lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.
B. F. BROWN & Co., Boston.

MADAME FOY'S CORSET SKIRT SUPPORTER,

For Health, Comfort, and Style,
Is acknowledged THE BEST ARTICLE of the kind ever made. Numerous Testimonials in its favor are being received from all parts of the United States.
LADY AGENTS WANTED.
HARMON, BALDWIN, & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers,
New Haven, Conn.
ARNOLD & BANNING, New York;
D. B. FISK & Co., Chicago, Agents.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

BETTER THAN BONDS!

An investment in the lands of the National Colony will pay 100 per cent. better than any Bonds or Stocks upon the market. A small sum invested NOW will secure a good farm. For particulars address
MILLER, HUMISTON, & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

VERBENA SEEDS! We have another fine stock of seeds of this beautiful flower, saved from our large collection of more than 100 varieties; 25 cts per pkt., 5 pkts. $1. J. T. SMITH & SONS, Brentwood, N. H.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

A NEW TOMATO.

Early, Solid, and Enormously Productive. Originated by H. Dwight Smith, Esq., of Arlington, Va., and is a cross between the Early Smooth Red and Feejee. Fruit of perfect form, smooth, bright red color, very solid, having small seed cells, and no hard core at the centre, being of the same delicate texture and brilliant color throughout. Ripens with the earliest. Fruit often weighing 24 to 26 ounces, with ordinary field culture. Enormously productive, and of excellent flavor. Stands the drouth better than any other variety.
☞ Price 25 cents per packet; 5 packets for $1.

From L. J. TUTTLE, Assistant Treasurer United States, Washington, Jan., 1873.
I find the "Arlington" has in a remarkable degree all the requisites of a perfect Tomato. I know nothing that equals it. (Signed) L. J. TUTTLE.

From the President's Gardener, Washington, Jan., 1873.
The Arlington Tomato, tested under my supervision in the President's gardens, was superior to any other kind. (Signed) ALEXANDER McKERRICHER,
Gardener at the White House.

The Nineteenth Annual Edition of our celebrated Seed Catalogue and Amateur's Guide to the Flower and Kitchen Garden is now ready for distribution, and will be mailed free to our customers of 1872, and to all applicants upon receipt of 25 cents; an edition elegantly bound in cloth, $1 00. This is without exception the largest and best Catalogue ever published in this or any other country. It contains 200 pages, including several hundred finely-executed engravings of favorite flowers and vegetables, and a beautifully colored chromo of a group of some of the most popular flowers in cultivation. Also a descriptive list of 2000 species and varieties of flower and vegetable seeds, including all the novelties of the past season, with full directions for culture. Address
P. O. Box 5,712. B. K. BLISS & SONS,
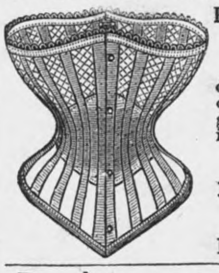
23 Park Place & 20 Murray St., N. Y. City.

PATENT KID-FITTING
SKELETON CORSET.



Recommended by Leading Physicians.
Should be worn by all ladies who value health and comfort. They have been greatly improved, and the fit is perfect.
They are delightful
For Summer Wear.
To be found at all
First-Class Retail Stores.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

$500,000 for Every body!

THIRD GRAND GIFT CONCERT in aid of Public Library of Ky., will be given in the great Hall of Library Building at Louisville, Ky., on Tuesday, April 8, 1873, at which time Ten Thousand Cash Gifts, amounting to a grand total of $500,000, all cash, will be distributed by lot to ticket holders. Only 100,000 tickets, and large proportion already sold or engaged. Two Concerts have been given with complete success and every gift promptly paid. Whole tickets $10, halves $5, quarters $2 50. For tickets or information, apply to Hon. Thos. E. Bramlette, Agent for Trustees Public Library of Ky., Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

For Cleansing the Teeth.

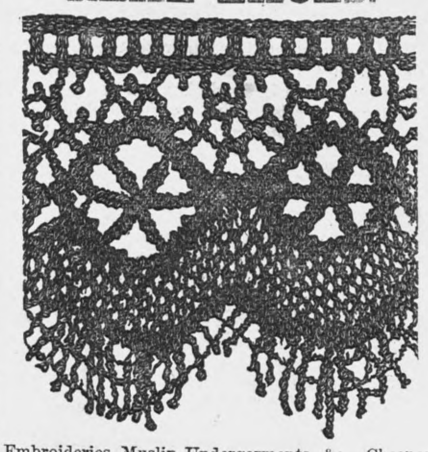
20 Sheets of Choice Music, $1 00.

Why throw away money on high-priced Music when you can select from our Catalogue of 700 pieces? Any 20 Half-Dime, or 10 of Dime Series mailed on receipt of One Dollar. Sold by all booksellers, and can be ordered through any newsdealer. Send stamp for Catalogue. Address
BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
439 THIRD AVENUE, NEW YORK.

A WIDOWED FRENCH LADY, who can speak the German language fluently, desires a situation as Companion to a family who intends visiting the Vienna Exposition. Will make herself generally useful in case of sickness. Is a good dressmaker and milliner. Can be highly recommended. Address Madam DEVINU, care K. J. Livingstone, Genoa, Nevada.

12 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS mailed for 50 cts., by C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

REAL LACES.



Embroideries, Muslin Undergarments, &c. Cheapest in the country. Every C. O. D. package subject to examination before acceptance. Send for Spring Catalogue. SAMPLES and PRICE-LISTS mailed free from
EHRICH'S TEMPLE of FASHION,
287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, N. Y.

1873. NOTICE. 1873.

OUR CELEBRATED BUFFALO

AND OTTER

BRANDS
BLACK ALPACAS,
AND
BEAVER BRAND.

SILK FINISHED
Black Pure Mohairs
ARE HANDSOMER THAN EVER FOR SPRING WEAR.

These Beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Dry-Goods Retailers throughout the United States.
☞ Purchasers will know these goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece, bearing a picture of the Buffalo, Otter, or Beaver.
PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 and 429 Broadway,
305 Canal and 47 Howard Sts.,
New York.
SOLE IMPORTERS.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.
U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:
1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.
2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.
3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.
4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.
NOTICE.
Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.
The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

WORKING CLASS, MALE OR FEMALE, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Cortlandt St., N. Y.

Hosted by Google

NEW SPRING AND SUMMER FABRICS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.,
HAVE OPENED AN EXTENSIVE LINE OF ALL THE LATEST PRODUCTIONS IN SATIN STRIPED AND PLAIN ALGERINES,
FIGURED AND STRIPED GAZE CHAMBRAIS,
FIGURED, STRIPED, AND PLAIN BAPTISTE,
ARMURE CHALLIE, PERCALES,
CAMEL'S-HAIR SERGES AND CLOTHS,
INDIA CASHMERES AND FRENCH SERGES,
SELF-COLORS IN SATIN STRIPE SERGES,
ENGLISH AND FRENCH STRIPED POPLINS,
EMBROIDERED AND PLAIN PIQUES,
PARIS PRINTED ORGANDIES AND LAWNS,
BORDERED CAMBRICS, LAWNS, & ORGANDIES,
&c., &c., &c.

EXPOSITION OF
SPRING CARPETINGS.

We have now open an unusually large assortment, in NEW DESIGNS and COLORINGS, of
DUTCH AND SMYRNA CARPETS,
In a Great Variety of Sizes.
AUBUSSONS,
AXMINSTERS, &
MOQUETTES,
In Drawing-Room Sizes, and Colored to Match the New Upholstery Shadings.
ROYAL WILTONS,
Manufactured specially to order for Dining-Rooms, Libraries, Halls, and Stairs.
ENGLISH BODY BRUSSELS,
A splendid assortment in NEW PRIVATE PATTERNS.
VELVETS and TAPESTRY,
THREE-PLY and INGRAINS,
ENGLISH and AMERICAN OIL-CLOTHS,
And a full stock of
DRUGGETS, RUGS, MATS, &c., &c.,
ALL AT
LOWEST MARKET PRICES.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS!

A. T. STEWART & CO.

HAVE OPENED
250 PIECES OF GRISAILLE and other LIGHT-COLORED SPRING SILKS at $1 per yard, the greater part recently sold from $1 50 to $2.
500 PIECES JAPANESE SILKS, at the extraordinary low price of 50 cents.
A large assortment of
NEW SHADES OF FAILLE, POULTS DE SOIE, &c., &c.
And they have largely replenished their very extensive and popular stock of HEAVY BLACK SILKS,
from $2 per yard upward.
REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR LONG AND SQUARE SHAWLS, very handsome, from $100 each upward. Paris and New York READY-MADE SILK DRESSES, very elegant, from $50 each upward.
A splendid assortment of
EMBROIDERED CASHMERE SACQUES, POLONAISE, &c., the very latest PARIS NOVELTIES.
An usually attractive stock of Ladies', Misses', and Children's UNDERWEAR, Wardrobes, Embroidered PIQUE WALKING SUITS, CLOAKS, &c.
BOYS' READY-MADE CLOTHING,
The very latest cut and fashion, at Extremely Low Prices.
DRESSMAKING DEPARTMENT,
Under superior management, in which orders for MOURNING as well as BALL, RECEPTION, CARRIAGE, AND PROMENADE DRESSES
Are executed in
ONE TO THREE DAYS' NOTICE, in style and elegance equal if not superior to any foreign production.
CHARGES MODERATE.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

INFANT'S WARDROBE "B"

FOR $100.

2 Flannel Bands	@	$0 50	$1 00
2 Barrie Coats	@	2 00	4 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	3 00	6 00
3 Cambric "	@	1 50	4 50
3 " " Tucked	@	2 00	6 00
6 Linen Shirts	@	1 00	6 00
6 Night Dresses	@	2 25	13 50
6 Slips	@	2 50	15 00
1 Calico Wrapper			1 50
2 Day Dresses	@	4 00	8 00
1 Robe			9 00
1 Basket, Furnished			6 50
6 Pairs Knitted Socks	@	0 62½	3 75
1 Embroidered Merino Shawl			5 50
1 Eureka Diaper			1 00
A Set of Linen Diapers			2 50
1 Rubber Bib			0 50
2 Quilted Bibs	@	0 50	1 00
1 Lace Cap			4 75
			$100 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Wardrobe "A," for $75, and "C," for $125, sent by mail if desired.

LORD & TAYLOR,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN
FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,
NEW YORK, (Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

$25 A DAY! Agents wanted. Thirty new and useful articles. NOVELTY CO., Saco, Me.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

COLGATE & COMPANY'S
EXTRACT CASHMERE BOUQUET,
FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.
"CASHMERE BOUQUET."
COLGATE & CO'S
CASHMERE BOUQUET SOAP,
FOR THE TOILET.

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.
SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.
RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.
32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.
Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,
Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only	$3 00
24 " " " " "	3 50
26 " " " " "	4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

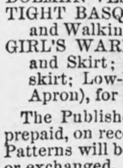
Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.
Established 1843. CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.
Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.
Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS
IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.
The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	No. 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER	" 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)	" 6
PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 8
SLEEVELESS SACQUE AND CAPE, with French Blouse, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 13
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 20
VEST BASQUE, with Over-skirt and Kilt-pleated Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 21
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER	" 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)	" 25
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt	" 27
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)	" 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old)	" 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)	" 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt	" 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT	" 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT	" 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt	" 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT	" 51
Vol. VI.
DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT	" 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE (Sacque; Sailor Blouse and Skirt; Basque fastened behind; Over-skirt; Low-Necked Over-dress; and Bretelle Apron), for girl from 2 to 13 years old	" 13

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.
In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.



Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 532 B'dway, N.Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

TRUE TIME FOR $1. 50,000 SOLD.
Magnetic Time-Keeper, Compass, and Indicator. A perfect GEM for the pocket of every traveler, trader, boy, farmer, and for EVERY BODY desiring a reliable timekeeper, and also a superior compass. Usual watch-size, steel works, glass crystal, all in a neat OROIDE case. WARRANTED to denote correct time and to keep in order—if fairly used—for two years. Nothing like it! This perfect triumph of mechanism will be sent in a neat case, prepaid to any address, for only $1; 3 for $2. Circulars sent free. Try one. Order from the manufacturers' Agents. Eureka Manufacturing Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.
Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.
Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING
WITH A
NOVELTY PRESS,
The best ever made for the purpose.
Principal office 349-351 Federal, and 152 Kneeland Streets, Boston. Branch office, 543 Broadway and 88 Mercer Street, New York.
W. Y. EDWARDS is no longer Agent for me or the sale of my goods. BENJ. O. WOODS,
Manufacturer of Novelty Presses, and dealer in every description of
PRINTING MATERIAL.
Send for NEW Illustrated Catalogue, with Agents addresses.

HEALTH AND WEALTH,
With good homes, in good society, may be found in the NATIONAL COLONY by industrious, temperate people. No others need apply. For the COLONY JOURNAL, with full particulars, send stamp to MILLER, HUMISTON, & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

SEYMOUR'S SHEARS & SCISSORS.
"The Best are the Cheapest."
Extra Quality. Crocus Polish.

HENRY SEYMOUR & CO., 29 and 31 Rose St., N. Y.
Family Size, - - $1.50
Ladies' Scissors, - 1.00
By mail, prepaid. Send P. O. Order or Draft.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.
Active agents wanted, to canvass New York and the leading cities for "Santo Domingo, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti." By Samuel Hazard. Profusely illustrated. The subscriber has other Books, of a popular character, for agents. Call, or address
AVERY BILL,
Care of Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.
An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.
Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THE NEW BOOKS
OF
THE SEASON
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.
SANTO DOMINGO, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti. By SAMUEL HAZARD. Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

2.
STUDENT'S HALLAM'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND. The Constitutional History of England, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II. By HENRY HALLAM, LL.D., F.R.A.S. Incorporating the Author's Latest Additions and Corrections, and adapted to the Use of Students. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D. 12mo, 747 pp., Cloth, $2 00.

3.
RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.
Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

4.
GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50. Popular Edition, 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

5.
HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

6.
ROBIN GRAY. A Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, "Author of "For the King," and "For Lack of Gold." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.
THE WANDERING HEIR. A Novel. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," "Foul Play," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.; Cloth, 60 cts.

8.
THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.
This work embraces in one volume:
ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.
ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.
CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.
It is a complete hand-book on this subject, and has also a permanent critical value to every ministerial student of the book.—Christian Intelligencer, N. Y.

9.
THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF A PHAETON. A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "In Silk Attire," "The Monarch of Mincing-Lane," "Kilmeny," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.

10.
NORDHOFF'S CALIFORNIA. California: for Health, Pleasure, and Residence. A Book for Travelers and Settlers. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper. $2 00; Cloth, $2 50.

11.
HARPER'S HOUSEHOLD DICKENS. With Original English and American Illustrations by Thomas Nast, W. L. Sheppard, Thomas Worth, C. S. Reinhart, J. Barnard, J. Mahoney, and others.
The following volumes are now ready or in preparation:
OLIVER TWIST. With 28 Illustrations by J. Mahoney. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00. (Ready.)
MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT. With 59 Illustrations by J. Barnard. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. (Ready.)
THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP. With 54 Illustrations by Thomas Worth. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25. (Ready.)
DAVID COPPERFIELD. With Portrait of Author and 61 Illustrations by J. Barnard. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. (Ready.)
DOMBEY AND SON. With 52 Illustrations by W. L. Sheppard. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. (Ready.)
NICHOLAS NICKLEBY. With 52 Illustrations by C. S. Reinhart. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. (Ready.)
BLEAK HOUSE. With Illustrations by J. Barnard. (In Preparation.)
PICKWICK PAPERS. With Illustrations by Thomas Nast. (In Preparation.)

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.
☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

THE ALBERT TOILET SOAPS ARE PURE AND THEIR PERFUME CHOICE AND LASTING.
ALFRED SAVAGE & SON, Montreal; or D. FINLEY, Rouse's Point.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co.,
MANUFACTURERS OF
WOOD CARPETING,
942 BROADWAY.
Send Stamp for Designs.

HOW IS YOUR HEALTH?—If you would be well and strong, study the Laws of Life and Health, by reading the SCIENCE OF HEALTH, the best Health Journal published. Not the organ of any business but independent. Monthly $2 00 a year, and a beautiful Oil Chromo called the "ANXIOUS MOTHER" given to every new subscriber; 30 cents extra for mounting and postage. The "Science of Health" and Chromo with either of HARPER'S a year for $3 30. Agents wanted, and cash commission given. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

PEOPLE who believe the stories about intelligent dogs will read with pleasure that a lost dog in Norfolk, having seen his master's advertisement in one of the local papers, promptly went home.

THE CONTROLLER-GENERAL—Cupid.

The season for keeping diaries begins with the first of the year, and lasts up to about the first week in February.

DIFFERENT VIEWS.

ELDER SISTER. "Won't you be sorry, Minnie, when the boys go back to school, it's so very nice to have them home for the holidays?"

YOUNGER SISTER. "It's not nice for me—it's nasty—for they've teased my dog, and worried my cat, and they've killed a rat, and scattered some malt, and knocked down my house that Jack built; and they've eaten my pudding, and eaten my pie, and spent my money, and made me cry; they've laughed at me, and thrown a stone. I'm sorry they came; I'll be glad when they're gone!"

What length ought a lady's petticoat to be?—A little above two feet.

What comes after cheese?—Mouse.

Wrong? of course you are, stupid! Egypt is not a Nile land; it is part of a continent.

A story is being told of a fashionable tailor. One of his aristocratic customers, thinking to annoy him, went up to him as he was walking on the Parade at Brighton at the most fashionable hour of the day, and said to him, "See how badly this coat fits." The great Sartor was fully equal to the occasion. Taking up a piece of a chalky substance at the side of the road he marked sundry hieroglyphics over the back, and then, turning him adrift, said, "There, my lord, you go and show yourself to my people, and they will soon put you right."

Edwin declares he won't believe that Angelina knows what a kiss means till he has it from her own mouth.

Why would a tax on tarts be objectionable at sea?—Because it would be encouraging pie-rates.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Declined, with thanks, Castor-Oil and Senna, A Night in the Rain, Kicks and Cuffs, and Good Advice.

Where can we find a more benevolent type of man than the glazier? He is always attending to the panes of others, and is never so happy as when he is building up or fortifying their frames.

"FANCY MEN"—Men who fancy themselves. (N.B.—There are a pretty lot of those about just now.)

Uncommonly intelligent are the coroners' juries in Mississippi. Twelve men in Warren County, in that State, returned a verdict that "The deceased died by the will of God or some other disease unknown to the jury."

Why is chloroform like Mendelssohn?—Because it is one of the greatest composers of modern times.

THE CROW THAT HAS NO VOICE—The scarecrow.

A female lecturer says that the only decent thing about Adam was a rib, and that went to make something better.

LAKE SHORE QUOTATIONS WERE VERY DULL.

THE NEW FIVES SHOWED WELL ON THE STREET.

THE FEATURES OF ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC WERE MUCH THE SAME.

A CORNER ON ROCK ISLAND WAS PREVENTED.

PACIFIC MALE WAS SUDDENLY ACTIVE.

BROKERS IN SPECIE SHUNNED GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

WALL STREET OPERATIONS.

HINTS TO MAKE HOUSES WHOLESOME.

(FOR THE USE OF SERVANTS.)

Always keep the windows shut; for thus you not only prevent unwholesome draughts, but stop the smut from flying in and dirtying the furniture.

Never sweep under the beds, or the sofas, or the sideboards, but allow the dust to remain there undisturbed, for otherwise its particles might float into the air and injure respiration.

For the same reason, suffer the dust to settle on the tops of wardrobes, pictures, book-cases, and cabinets, and refrain from injuring your health by attempting to remove it.

When visitors are expected, and you are honored with instructions to clear out a bedroom closet, or perhaps a chest of drawers for them, do so in as gentle a manner as you can, and spread clean paper on the shelves without disturbing the dust which there has peacefully accumulated.

Always put away your wine-glasses and decanters without washing them; and when a flower vase is sent down from the drawing-room, let the water remain in it to be ready for next time. You thus may save yourself much trouble, and avoid the risk of breakage.

When you are directed to light a bedroom fire for an unexpected visitor, never look to ascertain if the register be closed. Should the room be filled with smoke, recollect that fumigation is prescribed as a means to stop infection.

Take it for granted that all the household linen has been well aired at the wash, and do not disturb your mind by any doubts upon the subject.

If damp sheets are the consequences, and illness should ensue from them, you will have the consolation of reflecting that your carelessness has been the means of bringing profit to an honorable member of the medical profession, and that your master, and not you, will have to pay the charges.

It is convenient to keep a dirty cloth or two underneath the sofa-cushions, in order to be handy to wipe up any mess which you unluckily may make in case you should upset the milk jug while you are handing round the tea tray.

If you are bidden to poke the fire (particularly in the library, where you find your master intensely busy at his writing-desk), do so with all the violence and vehemence that you can muster, in order that the dust may fly into the room instead of falling in the ash pan, whence you would have to undergo the labor of removing it.

When you go to light the gas, always turn it fully on before you strike your match, which you will take care to keep damp and probably incombustible. A slight escape of gas not merely imparts a piquant perfume to a room, but serves to turn the observation from detecting even more offensive odors.

Never shake the rugs and door-mats, or so much as even stir them, if you possibly can help it. A goodly quantity of dirt may thus be snugly stored beneath them, and need not be dislodged until the yearly cleaning.

If your mistress be attached to pug-dogs, cats, or parrots, encourage her to let them have their meals at the same table as herself, and refrain from sweeping up the scraps which they may leave, lest they afterward may wish for them.

If canaries be her pets, do not clean their cages oftener than once in every month or so, and fill up their baths and drinking fountains without previously emptying them.

Above all things bear in mind that scrubbing is a painful and degrading operation, and abstain, therefore, as much as possible from practicing it.

HUSBANDRY—Mormonism.

The earth about Cape May is being annoyed by seekers after Kidd's treasures. The late pirate would have saved much trouble and expense to the descendants of the Puritans had he buried Bibles instead of gold.

A Muscatine clergyman is speaking against the re-establishment of the death penalty in Iowa. He says he does not want his congregation thinned out too fast.

WOMAN'S MISSION—Submission. Likely!

"Good blood will show itself," said the old lady with the red nose.

Orpheus's melody caused the stones to move. Are we to assume they were stepping-stones?

RELAPSE.

SQUIRE. "Why, Pat, what are you doing, standing by the wall of the public-house? I thought you were a teetotaler!"

PAT. "Yes, yer honor. I'm just listenin' to them impenitent boys drinkin' inside!"

THE LAST THING OUT—The policeman.

"You can't do that again," said the pig to the boy who cut his tail off.

GOOD NEWS FOR HUSBANDS.—Ladies wear their dresses longer than they used to do.

When is the weather artful?—When it's knowing (it's snowing).

TO A YOUNG LADY.—Why are you like a polar bear?—Because you're an ice creature.

It is reported that a son of Brigham Young is going to marry a newly established female seminary.

THE BEST COMFORTER FOR BACHELORS—A good wife.

CUM GRANO.—A paper states that a mountain of pure salt, five hundred feet high, fifteen miles long, and three miles thick, is reported to have been discovered in Arizona. Now if they can only discover a mountain of beef and mutton pretty handy to eat that salt with, oh, would not a meating like that make amends for a journey to that prolific spot?

PROVERB.—A thorn in the bush is worth two in the hand.

THE NOTES THAT COMPOSE FAVORITE TUNES—Band notes; they make for-tunes.

About time "the beautiful snow" was "run into the ground."

Our valetudinarian being told by his medical adviser that he must wear thicker boots, replies that when a fellow has to walk through so much water, pumps would be more appropriate.

To keep warm on a cold day the women double the Cape, and the men double the Horn.

Which is the oldest, Miss Antiquity, old Aunty Diluvian, Miss Ann Terior, Miss Ancestor, Miss Ann T. Mondane, or Miss Ann T. Cedent?

THE INVENTORS OF MATCHES—Adam and Eve.

A malicious libel is going the rounds that vegetation is so scarce at Cape Cod that two mullen stalks and a whortleberry bush are called a grove. The truth is that unless there are three whortleberry bushes they never think of saying grove.

Two fatigued travelers, having to travel ten miles further, comforted themselves by the calculation that it was only five miles each.

To a marriage notice in a Vermont paper is appended, "No cake—no cards—no divorce."

CANDID, AT LEAST.

MAMMA. "And if poor Mamma had not recovered, and had gone away from her little Georgy forever, what would he have done?"

LITTLE GEORGY. "I don't know, Ma, but I guess me an' Jimmy Goggins would have gone Skating on the Ice!"

TRUE TACT.

MRS. SILVERTONGUE (who has been chatting most agreeably to Mr. Wilkes for the last two hours). "Oh, don't talk to me of Ugly Men, Mr. Wilkes! I make a point of never even Speaking to one!"

[Mr. Wilkes, who is rather sick of being told by women that they on the whole object to good looks in the male sex, appreciates the remark immensely.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 13.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

HOME-MADE BOOK-SHELVES. ARTIFICIAL MAHOGANY.

AMONG the objects that are most easily made, and that afford the greatest convenience, are book-shelves. When a family possesses a hundred volumes or so—and most families own as many as this—the books are a source of constant annoyance. When they are allowed to lie on their sides on tables, if we wish to consult one we are frequently obliged to toss over the whole of them; they accumulate dust, and get shaken, soiled, and injured generally, all which might be avoided by the use of a few simple shelves, and these may be easily made of very cheap material and very simple construction. The best material is pine, since it is cheap and easily worked. It is not generally known that a plain pine board, if stained and varnished, may be made to look very like mahogany, rose-wood, or black-walnut, and the process of staining is so simple that any housewife can perform it. We know a lady who has stained and varnished dozens of pine shelves that her husband has fitted up during his leisure moments, and to-day they look as if they were mahogany.

To stain shelves a mahogany-color take a pound or two of logwood chips and boil them in water, so as to make a strong decoction. We have found that this gives better results than can be obtained by using extract of logwood. Wet the board thoroughly with this decoction; when dry it will have a reddish-yellow color, and must then be varnished with what is known as spirit or shellac varnish. This varnish can be bought ready-made at the paint shops, but we prefer to make it by dissolving good shellac in alcohol. Put a quantity of good shellac into a wide-mouthed bottle, cover it with alcohol, cork the bottle tightly, and let it stand until the shellac is dissolved. No skill is required in the application of this varnish, which dries very rapidly, and forms a hard glossy coating on the surface of the board. When dry, the shelf must be carefully smoothed off with sand-paper and again varnished. The second coat will give a very bright appearance to the shelf, but if we sand-paper it before applying the first coat the staining will probably be removed in spots and the shelf will not look well. An application of the sand-paper after the second coat will still further improve the finish of the wood; but this, of course, involves a third coat of varnish. By adding the least quantity of alkali, such as washing soda, to the logwood decoction, the pine will be made to resemble rose-wood. In all cases, however, the shelves do not acquire their proper tone for some months; but if well done—that is, if the decoction be strong, the varnish thoroughly applied, and all roughness removed by means of the sand-paper—at the end of a year nine persons out of ten will take them for mahogany or rose-wood, as the case may be. Every fibre of the pine shows so that the grain is as apparent as if the shelves were made of hard wood and polished. The appearance is, therefore, greatly superior to that of any ordinary painted work, and the process is so simple that no intelligent housekeeper need dread a failure. We have now in mind a set of shelves prepared in this way by a lady whose husband, although not a mechanic, fitted up the wood-work as an amusement during the winter evenings, and they compare favorably with much of the cabinet-work that we find in market.

Having prepared our shelves, the next step is to put them up, although in actual practice the best plan is to fit the shelves to their places, and then take them down for staining and varnishing, returning them after this process is finished. If there should happen to be a recess in the room, the shelves may be cut to fit it, and cleats to support them may easily be nailed up. Cast iron brackets, which are very cheap, and may be obtained at any hardware store, form a very neat and efficient support. When they are to be attached to a wooden partition, all that is necessary is to screw them directly to it; but when they are to be fastened to a brick or plaster wall, it is best to take two strips of wood, about two inches wide and, say, seven-eighths of an inch thick, and screw them to the wall by means of numerous stout screws, after which the brackets may be screwed to these strips; screws readily penetrate plaster, and even soft brick, and when they enter the lath they hold with great power. We must remember, however, that the strain caused by the weight of the books does not tend to draw the screws out, but to press them down, and brick, plaster, or lath will bear a very heavy strain in this direction. After the strips have been fastened to the wall, take a board with a straight edge and mark off the places where the shelves should come, and be careful to allow room for the thickness of the shelves in addition to the height of the books. Then screw on the brackets, arrange the shelves upon them, and fasten each with a couple of screws to prevent their slipping, and you will have a set of book-shelves that will be quite as useful and nearly as ornamental as one for which the cabinet-maker would charge a good round sum. In order to exclude dust, and add to the appearance of the arrangement, the upper shelf may be made a little wider than the rest, and to the edge of it may be fastened a wide moulding, which may be obtained from any dealer in picture-frames. The moulding should be of pine, and it may be best to have it attached to the shelf by a workman who can mitre the corners so as to make a neat job. After this it may be stained and varnished like the rest of the shelving, and to it may be attached a transparent curtain, which will not only protect the books from flies and dust, but will add greatly to the general appearance of the shelves.

Fig. 1.—GROS GRAIN DINNER DRESS.—BACK. Fig. 2.—GROS GRAIN DINNER DRESS.—FRONT.

[See Fig. 3 on page 197, and description on page 196.]

Hosted by Google

When a still simpler and more portable arrangement is desired, the shelves may be merely strung upon cords and suspended from a hook or stout nail. This method is too simple and well known to need description; but even in this case a knowledge of easy and reliable methods of staining and varnishing will prove of great use.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1873.

☞ WITH the next Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be published gratuitously an EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, containing the concluding chapters of

"LITTLE KATE KIRBY,"

and the commencement of Lord LYTTON'S new and fascinating Novel,

"THE PARISIANS,"

a work which recalls the best days of the author of "The Caxtons" and "My Novel."

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the Girl's Wardrobe, consisting of Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-Skirt, Low-necked Over Dress Sacque, and Bretelle Apron, for Girls from 2 to 13 Years old, illustrated on page 197 of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents for the entire set. For a Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 207.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Bridal Dresses, Veils, Coiffures, etc.; Ladies' Spring Street and House Dresses, Sleeveless Jackets, Vests, Mantelets, Hoods, etc.; Boys' and Girls' Suits, Boys' Caps; Glove-Boxes; Writing-Desks; Blotting-Pads; Newspaper Racks; Embroidery Patterns, etc., etc.; with choice literary and artistic attractions.

HAVING ONE'S WAY.

OF all the various ways of having one's way, a long series of observations convinces us that the ill-tempered way is the swiftest and most effectual.

To any other way the objections are almost insurmountable. Take, for instance, the persuasive way: its very title proclaims its tedious character, the loss of time and loss of breath that it occasions, the effort to be put forth, it may be fruitlessly, and all the arts and resources of ready wit that it requires, so that in order to have your will—about a pudding sauce, perhaps—you need to use as much ingenuity and rhetoric as a lawyer does when pleading a bad case at the bar, and as wary approaches, minings, and counterminings as a soldier does when attacking a fortified position, and meanwhile neither side is perfectly satisfied in the end.

On the other hand, there is the persistent way. But we all know what that is: the unwearied return to the charge in hopes of wearing out the patience of the opposite party, often with no result but the destruction of our own; the perpetual nagging and annoying, like that of a fly in August who will not be gone; the poet's "damnable iteration," adopted with the idea that constant dropping wears away a stone, but which, so far from cutting the desired channel, quite as frequently as not creates a more solid opposition than before, as we see the droppings of limestone caves build up stalagmites to oppose the stalactites. In fact, this is a way of having one's way as dangerous as it is uncertain, and the occasion may be altogether over and done with before, even if successful at last, one can accomplish one's purpose by the means of it.

There is yet, however, what may be called the method of insistence. But this, though exceedingly upright and downright, has far too many faults ever to be strictly popular, except, of course, with those despotic characters to whom the slavery of a whole household seems the proper and desirable thing. A person who can pursue this method in cold blood is one who will assuredly have his or her own way even if it be necessary to ride over the dead body of every natural affection to obtain it. There are, however, few such persons, thank Heaven, the strength of character—or shall we say the absorption in self and the consequent total disregard of others?—requisite in order to lay down the law without appeal being something tolerably rare; for the one who can do this is one who can dispense with approbation, with praise, with fellow-feeling; who desires no sympathy; to whom the family is a slave-pen; to whom domestic life in its sweet and mutual forbearances is an unreadable riddle; who would think it the purest absurdity in the whole range of ethics to assert, even for the sake of argument, that there is sometimes as much enjoyment to be had in surrendering one's way as in having it; and who never admits any thing for the sake of argument, but who is so upright and downright in asserting determinations, and insisting upon them, and giving no reason for them, not only because it saves trouble, but because a different course implies argument, and argument implies dissension at the family hearth—implies that there is another entity in the household, suffering or enjoying as the case may be, but, at any rate, a thinking being, and not merely a dumb beast of burden—and we can tolerate no pretenders near the throne. This course, indeed, is candid and is logical; it is, to be sure, somewhat patriarchal, and has feudal, and therefore romantic, pretensions. It secures peace, we admit—of that kind where they make a desert, and then call it peace; but, to mention no other obstacle in the way of its general adoption, it is sufficient for us to remember the common idea that under certain circumstances tyrannicide becomes a virtue.

We are, then, driven to consider the only remaining course by which it is possible to have one's own way, and ultimately to enjoy the achievement with suitable complacency—and that is the ill-tempered way. To insist without argument involves, as we have just seen, great likelihood of hatred; to insist with argument involves a likelihood of being sometimes badly worsted; but to insist in a storm and flash of anger, and then to clear off into the sweetest sort of sunshine, why, that involves having one's cake and eating it too.

When, either through temperament or after mature deliberation, this method has been chosen, difficulties fly from the path like leaves before a hurricane: the hurricane passes on, the way is cleared, the sun comes out again, and if eventually under such processes the tree is stripped, there are plenty more trees in the forest.

The first thing to do, then, if you have decided upon this course, and have a measure to carry which you are sure will be obnoxious, is to tell every one that you feel extremely irritable, and are not to be held responsible for an outburst of passion if you are crossed. You then proceed to make yourself as charming as possible, as gay and kind and witty as you know how, so that the contrast of such behavior with the apprehended outburst of passion causes every body to feel ready to make any sacrifice rather than change your delightful mood by contradiction or opposition. But the fateful moment draws near: perhaps your husband prefers peach leaf in the pudding sauce, while you have come to the conclusion that a mild flavor of prussic acid proper is more to the point; or perhaps your wife has decided upon vanilla, and you are determined to carry up the chromatic scale of flavors to its highest expression, and so pronounce for sirup of poppies in the same; and, of course, such a preposterous idea is to be deprecated, and will be, even at the expense of destroying that delightful mood of yours by contradiction and opposition. Then is your chance. Spring from your seat, open your eyes with a blaze of wrath, your mouth with a torrent of words; if you are a man, stamp and swear; if you are a woman, scream and cry, toss your arms with frantic gestures, take hold of your hair on both sides and shake your head by it, slap your hands together before and afterward till the air rings; tell terrible truths, make terrible threats, denounce every one's pet sin if you have divined it; appall people with your objurgations or your oaths, with your maledictions that make them shiver, with your declarations that make them fear murder for themselves and suicide for you, with your raging and storming and foaming that make them fear your permanent insanity; keep it up till these cowards run to appease the offended deity in your person with burnt-offering and turtle-doves, and those are dissolved in heart-breaking tears, and the others hasten with exactly as much hydrocyanic acid or laudanum as you want; and when at last you have reduced all desires and emotions to a perfect chaos of fear and disgust and resentment and abject submission, then condescend to be soothed, subside into gloom and sighs, utter an exclamation of contrition, of regret for such a temper, of faint hope that you have hurt nobody's feelings; but do not once abandon hold of the object for which you made all the rout—if you did, though, it would make no odds, for no one would interfere with you now; taste the sauce at length, look up and laugh, draw it toward you and finish it; presently be as gay and kind and witty as before, and think yourself a superior sort of creature because those over whom the deluge of your anger has just swept do not all at once know how to hold up their heads and laugh with you; but, in your own time, you will forgive them out of consideration for sulky dispositions.

On the whole, we think it will be almost universally allowed that this plan is, as we said in the beginning, the swiftest and most effectual plan for having your own way. If it is subject to such small abatement as loss of love and respect and confidence, as real if not apparent isolation from the lives of those about you, as the concealment from you of all that you might question, as the creation of a circle of hypocrites who breathe a bated breath so far as you are concerned,—if, in the long-run, it is subject to such abatement, you have probably counted the cost, have decided that it is not more blessed to give than to receive, have failed to find pleasure in affording pleasure, in yielding a point, in receiving gratitude, and are prepared to pay the full price for having your own way.

FAMILY MARKETING.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

TO SELECT BEEF.

LIKE every other kind of meat, beef must be fat to be good. An animal that is not fat has suffered in some way, either through sickness or disease, or from want of food or the proper kind of food. All healthy animals, even including the goat and the ass, will get fat if properly fed.

Of all the different kinds of animal food, beef takes the lead; it is the greatest restorer of exhausted muscular power. The best beef looks fine, of a bright, clear, red color, with streaks and spots of fat all through. The suet, or fat, has a yellowish hue, and breaks easily. The fat of cow beef is nearly white, and the flesh is paler than that of the heifer and steer or ox. Bull beef, as well as beef coming from diseased or ill-fed animals, looks coarse, of a dark, dirty red color; the fat is yellow, and full of fibres.

For the benefit of the purchaser we will give the names of the twenty-four different parts of a side (half) of beef as cut by New York, Philadelphia, and Boston butchers:

NEW YORK.	PHILADELPHIA.	BOSTON.
1. Hip sirloin, or thick sirloin.	Pinbone sirloin.	Part of the rump or hook bone.
2. Second-cut ribs, or middle ribs.*	Middle-rib cut.	Second prime ribs.
3. Small end sirloin.	Sirloin.	Sirloin.
4. First-cut rib, or first rib piece.	First-rib cut (1st and 2d ribs).	Fore-rib, or first prime rib.
5. Third-cut ribs, or thick ribs.	Third-rib cut (6th and 7th ribs).	Third prime rib.
6. First-cut chuck ribs (8th and 9th ribs).	Best chuck rib.	First chuck rib.
7. Second-cut chuck ribs (10th and 11th ribs).	Chuck-rib cut.	Second chuck rib.
8. Cross-rib piece.	Boler piece.	Leg or shoulder-of-mutton piece.
9. Third-cut chuck ribs, or chuck piece (12th and 13th ribs).	Chuck piece.	Chuck piece.
10. Rump of beef.	Tail and rump.	Aitch or edge bone (part of).
11. Socket, or face rump.	Rump piece (part of).	Rump (part of).
12. First-cut round.	Round.	Round.
13. Second-cut round.	Round (part of).	Leg-raw.
14. Top of sirloin.	Cut with sirloin steaks.	Thick flank.
15. First-cut neck, or neck piece.	Neck cut.	Neck piece.
16. Second-cut neck, or neck piece.	Neck cut.	Neck piece.
17. Plate piece.	Plate piece.	Rattleran, or runner piece.
18. Navel piece.	Thin end of brisket.	Navel end of brisket.
19. Brisket piece.	Thick end of brisket.	Butt end of brisket.
20. Shoulder clod.	Clod (part of).	Clod (part of).
21. Flank piece.	Flank.	Thin flank.
22. Third-cut neck, or neck piece.	Neck.	Neck piece.
23. Leg of beef, or leg.	Leg.	Shank.
24. Shin of beef, or shin.	Shank.	Shin.

The following are the pieces of beef generally used for roasting, some of them also being used for steaks: the thirteen ribs, the hip and thick sirloin, the middle cut sirloin (next to the preceding), the cross-rib piece, the rump, the first cut of round, and occasionally the tenderloin. The piece most prized is the third, fourth, and fifth ribs, counting from the sirloin toward the neck; the next best piece is the first and second ribs; then the sixth and seventh, the eighth and ninth, etc. Some prefer the sirloin to the ribs, which is only a matter of taste.

* Third, fourth, and fifth ribs.

Steaks are cut from the following pieces: tenderloin, sirloin, chuck, cross-rib, rump, and neck. It is with steaks as with roasting pieces, some prefer one part and others another. The one called porter-house steak seems to be the favorite. The name porter-house has no reference at all to the steak itself. The name comes from the fact that when in olden times porter-houses were the principal eating places, that kind of steak used to be served in them. They were then something like the English chop-houses of to-day, where large and peculiarly cut mutton-chops are swallowed by many who honestly believe that they are eating some of Queen VICTORIA'S ovine quadrupeds. There is nothing like faith!

A porter-house steak is simply a piece cut across both the tenderloin and sirloin, thus really being a double steak—a tenderloin as well as a sirloin steak.

The tenderloin, as its name expresses it, is the most tender of all, and the highest in price. When the tenderloin is detached from the sirloin piece it sells about twice as high as the other pieces.

Some prefer a chuck steak to a rump one; they find it sweeter and more tender. This is also a matter of taste.

Butchers generally cut the steaks too thin, but it is not their fault, for the majority of people like them so. The immediate cause of this wrong custom is the great demand for steaks, to supply which butchers are obliged to turn every piece they can into them. The result is that half of the time the steak is tough and tasteless.

If those housewives who feed their families on tough steaks (not being willing or able to pay for juicy ones) would take a little more pains—that is, would stew an inferior piece instead of broiling or frying it—they would have more palatable and more nourishing food.

Pounding a steak to make it tender is a mere farce. You may pound a tough and tasteless steak for hours or for days, and you will never make a tender, juicy, and palatable one. Pounding breaks the fibres of the meat, it is true, but it does not remove them, and does not change tasteless meat into that which is juicy and tender. A pounded tough steak while being masticated may appear to an inexperienced palate tenderer than if it had not been pounded, but it is a delusion. It does not show as much resistance under the teeth, it is true, but the nature of the meat remains the same: it does not become more nutritious or more juicy.

A thin steak, even a good one, can not be cooked properly, for a quick fire and a good draught are required to broil a steak, and if it be too thin it is dried up in a moment. The intensity of the heat penetrates through and through, and leaves only a dried, tough, and tasteless piece, instead of a juicy and palatable one.

A steak should never be less than three-quarters of an inch in thickness. It should be broiled rather underdone, as quickly as possible, placed on a warm dish, with butter, chopped parsley, and a few drops of lemon juice spread all over, and served quickly.

A steak broiled beforehand and kept warm in an oven gets dry, tough, and tasteless. If kept in a closed vessel in a warm place, or over steam, it soon gets soggy, and loses its juicy and delicious taste. Fried potatoes or water-cresses are a most excellent accompaniment to a steak.

The round pieces are the best for à la mode beef and for stewing. The other pieces of beef are used to make soup, daube, stews, etc.

VEAL.

The best veal is that killed when between five and eight weeks old, but it is good after four weeks. Most veal looks whitish, because the majority of people seem to prefer it so. It is made white by a certain erroneous process of bleeding. Calves should be slaughtered, and not bled. The meat then would be firm, have a somewhat pale, greenish appearance, and would be excellent. The veins of good veal have a reddish hue; those of bled veal are hardly seen. When veal looks yellowish it is not fresh.

The loin, leg, shoulder, and breast pieces are generally roasted. Veal chops are cut from the loin piece and from the rib piece. The fillet, the fricandeau, and the cutlets are cut from the leg. The breast and neck pieces are used for blanquette, matelote, stewing, ragout, etc. Veal soup is only made for a certain class of invalids who require the lightest kind of food.

MUTTON.

Wether mutton is the best. When the fat breaks easily and is white and clear, it is good and young. The fat of inferior mutton is yellowish, and the lean is soft and spongy. A wether leg has a large and hard piece of fat on one side of the larger end.

Mutton is generally cut in quarters. The hind-quarters are composed of the leg and loin; the two loins, when not separated, form the saddle. When chops are cut from the saddle they are commonly called English chops; this is a double chop. A forequarter is composed of the shoulder, the rack or rib piece, the breast, and neck. The roasting pieces are, the saddle, the loin, the leg, the shoulder, and sometimes the forequarters, not separated, but cut lamb-like. Haricot and stews are made with the breast and neck pieces. Chops are cut in the loins and legs, and the rib chops (côtelettes) in the rack piece. Mutton that tastes woolly is generally that which has been housed too long.

Hosted by Google

The roasting pieces certainly have a much more delicate flavor, and are more juicy and tender, when allowed to season for from one to four weeks from the time the animal is killed, according to the state of the weather. In England, where more mutton is eaten than in any other country (comparatively to its population), they seldom roast a saddle or a leg of mutton until it has turned somewhat bluish, when it is called by many venison-mutton.

The flesh of goat mutton is of a dirty reddish color; the fat is thin, and has a yellowish hue. The lower part of the leg is elongated, and the thick end of it is more flat than that of good mutton. There is more goat mutton sold in New York than is generally supposed. Those who raise goats do not seem to relish their flesh as much as their milk and companionship, if we may judge from the answer given by one of them to a neighbor. "Good gracious! Mrs. O'Connor," said the latter, "do you go four blocks to buy a pound of meat, when there is a butcher two doors from your house?" "Troth and I do," was the answer. "I never get mutton from him: he buys all our goats."

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

GIRLS' CLOTHING.

A GROUP of cut paper patterns illustrated in the present number will furnish models for the principal outside garments and dresses worn by girls from two to thirteen years of age. The sailor blouse suit, made of dark blue twilled flannel, trimmed with bias bands, collar, cuffs, pockets, and sash of lighter blue, or else white cashmere, is the favorite dress for spring, and will also be worn in cool summer mornings in the country and at the sea-side. Solid-colored cambrics, soft-finished piqués, prints, and dark-ground percales with polka dots, will also be made by this pattern, and trimmed with white cotton washing braids. The over-skirt and basque buttoned behind are excellent for best dresses of spring woolen stuffs and silks, or for summer piqués, white muslins, and colored linens. The skirt of the sailor suit completes this dress. The low square-necked over dress or polonaise, when made of black alpaca, can be worn with any plain school dresses. It is also made of fancy-colored silks, to be worn with white dresses, and of Swiss muslin, ruffled, tucked, and edged with Valenciennes, to wear over silk dresses. The sacque for the house, or for a spring wrap in the street, should be of cashmere, or else of light twilled cloth prettily braided or embroidered. The bretelle apron is more stylish and dressy than the pinafore or bib apron so long worn. For every-day use it should be made of white cambric, cross-barred muslin, dimity, diaper, or else gray or buff linen. Swiss muslin aprons, edged with Italian Valenciennes, and trimmed with black or cherry velvet ribbon, brighten up a simple dress; light peacock blue, green, or black silk aprons, edged with lace, or else with pinked ruffles, are worn with white dresses. All the patterns mentioned above are folded in a single package, and sent by mail for 25 cents.

LADIES' FASHIONS.

SPRING MANTILLAS.

Old-time mantillas, with new and stylish accessories, are the wraps for spring and summer. The material is black cashmere — black silk wraps are passée; the trimmings are yak lace, yak insertion, passementerie inserted like lace, bias silk and moiré bands, bows, belts, and sashes of watered ribbon, with buckles, buttons, and chatelaines of old silver, steel, or jet. The stylish shapes have talma backs, usually belted underneath, with long, square mantilla fronts, or else straight scarf ends crossed in fichu fashion, and fastened back on the tournure. A novelty among these is a fraise, or high standing frill, around the neck, made of black lace, or else of pleated silk edged with yak lace. It is three inches wide behind, and slopes away to a point at the throat. New hoods are simply squares of cashmere, silk lined, edged with lace, and folded toward the middle, to look like a Watteau fold. Cord and tassels are arranged to draw it up into a hood. The most elaborate mantillas are trimmed with fine insertion and lace dotted with tiny jet beads; these have the long, square fronts belted with a small bow on the left, and the back is trimmed with lace in jabots, or arranged to give the effect of a Watteau. A simple, stylish round mantle of cashmere edged with lace has a talma front, with belted back, and a lengthwise sash bow of doubled silk, fringed, and held by a carved dull silver buckle; a high silk fraise edged with lace stands around the neck, and a hood fastens the front. The fichu wraps are like the scarf-mantles that were illustrated last year in the Bazar. The Verdi mantle has a talma back, pointed mantilla fronts, a high fraise, and when made of cashmere, with lace and cords for trimming, costs but $20 at wholesale houses. One favorite shape has the talma back laid in many pleats from the neck to the waist, and confined there by a watered ribbon sash; the front has a Marie Antoinette collar. The loveliest loose Dolman mantles (not sacques) are made entirely of lengthwise strips of cashmere alternating with passementerie insertion in open designs dotted with jet. Cord ornaments swing from the left shoulder to the waist on the back of belted mantles. Medallions of crocheted open-work are inserted in cashmere capes; the edge of the wrap is then scalloped and finished by narrow lace. Thread lace is not used at all, and silk guipure is superseded by the fine yak wool lace. Carved steel, silver, and jet buttons and ornaments are very effective in brightening up lustreless black cashmere. Russia leather belts, with mother-of-pearl buckles and chatelaines of silver and pearl, are on some of the wraps. Small double collars, one of silk, the other of cashmere, square sailor collars of silk, and erect frills or fraises, very full and stiff and high, trim the neck.

Among the few silk garments shown the most dressy are sleeveless polonaises shaped something like a gentleman's dress-coat, with vest front, and many-looped sashes of watered ribbon, the inevitable high fraise, yak lace, and jet.

SPRING SUITS, BASQUES, ETC.

Fresh importations of French dresses arrive weekly, and give many new suggestions, though they still repeat the standard styles of basques with aprons and over-skirts rivaling polonaises and single skirts. The new basques are the very perfection of corsages, and show off a fine figure to best advantage. They are of simplest possible shape, with very few seams, and without postilion pleats behind, while for trimming they are merely edged with two thick cords covered with silk. The part below the waist is sometimes cut in square lapels, and tiny pockets are put in the front squares; the seams behind open over the tournure, and two large buttons define the waist in the back. The front is plain, with a fraise or a simulated vest, or else is double-breasted, and has two soft points. For such basques the sleeves are usually coat-shape, with very deep cuffs, quite plain, or else of fanciful pleating. There is also a fancy for sleeves that widen below the elbow, and are tied there with silk folds or ribbon. In this case a close cuff like the dress is often added, to be used or removed at pleasure. The Plon-Plon basque has the sleeveless jacket idea, viz., a dark basque with light vest, light sleeves, and a narrow light piping around the garment. Some very dressy basques are long and deeply pointed in front, and very short behind. New polonaises have small double collars like those worn on mantles, and many have high standing fraises. The fullness added below the belt is often gathered in a panier puff behind, and held there by a sash ribbon that passes under the puff. Fichu-mantles are also made of the dress material to complete suits. Aprons and over-skirts are small, and are attached to the lower skirt at the belt, making a suit consist of but two pieces. Lengthwise trimmings on the front breadth and from the belt to the edge are becoming very elaborate.

SILK COSTUMES.

As a model for spring suits take this of two shades of réséda silk. The skirt is the light shade, trimmed behind with five deep side pleatings alternately light and dark, while the front has one puffed and gathered flounce, and a very long apron made of three breadths of dark réséda silk, edged with lighter pleating and shaded ball fringe. The basque is dark, with light vest, long sides like a polonaise, and sash backs that cover the tournure and extend to the top pleating on the skirt. A second costume, of Napoleon blue silk with blue-gray, has four deep gathered flounces behind, made of blue, edged with narrow gray pleatings; an elaborate side trimming on the first side gore is of lengthwise folds of the two colors, and bows made of ends, not loops. Two flounces cross the front, and there is a double apron, one blue and the other gray. The simple blue basque is edged with two gray cords, and has tiny pockets in front, and large embroidered buttons. Coat sleeves with cuffs made of folds of the two colors.

WOOLEN SUITS.

For woolen stuffs the model is a suit of Napoleon blue challi, almost as dark as plum-color. This is contrasted with écru challi, and is made with a belted polonaise that has great revers in front, deep hanging cuffs, and sashes of the blue material, trimmed with écru yak lace and bias bands of écru poplin. The skirt has a deep gathered bias flounce, with facing and folds of écru. For an olive poplin suit of two extreme shades make a Plon-Plon basque of the darkest brown, light coat sleeves with dark wide cuffs, and edge the entire basque with two light cords. The skirt should be of the light shade, with a small rounded dark apron in front, and a large puff behind held by a dark sash. The pretty trimming on the light lower skirt is two narrow bias gathered ruffles of dark brown piped with light, headed by a very deep kilt pleating of the light shade. The buttons are large flat moulds covered with the dark shade, with an embroidered star of the lightest tint of silk. A small fichu-mantle is sometimes added to such suits.

COUTILLE SUITS.

Suits of the blue and white coutille in bed-ticking stripes, described by Madame Raymond, are among the importations. The fabric is not yet imported by the yard, but percales are shown in precisely the same patterns and color. These coutille suits are very simply made with a single skirt, finished by a deep bias Spanish flounce set on at the knee, and rounding slightly like a train behind. The over dress is a long loose polonaise, worn with a belt, and has a deep sailor collar. The lower part of the polonaise is closed, and it is trimmed with three horizontal ruffles that are met on the sides by ruffles that extend downward from the shoulder and edge the garment.

ROUND HATS.

The round hats that city milliners are selecting for their customers are the stately Medici, the Castilian, and the slouchy artistic Rubens. They have high sloping crowns, and most fanciful irregular brims. For garden, sea-side, and country wear, the old-fashioned calash is revived, and called the Incroyable. A few of these were worn last summer at the watering-places, and excited more amusement than admiration. The "tip-tilted" Lynette is also favorably received, and the Palmetto hats made in Florida are to be introduced in Japanese shape for flats.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

MR. SAMUEL WILLIAMS, the oldest printer in that region, walked into the office of the Rondout Freeman a few days since, and set 1000 ems for the GREELEY statue. He is eighty-four years old, and started the Bennington News-Letter in 1812. Mr. THURLOW WEED makes this the subject of one of his charming little notes to the Commercial Advertiser, and says: "Though a stranger for many years to the 'space-box,' I am strongly inclined to follow the laudable example of my old friend WILLIAMS. In February, 1816, just fifty-seven years ago, I was working with SAMUEL WILLIAMS as journeyman printer for JESSE BUEL, in the office of the Albany Argus. And now, at the age of eighty-four, Mr. WILLIAMS contributes his '1000 ems' in commemoration of a departed craftsman who has since filled a large space in the world's eye, but who, when we, mature in years, had commenced the battle of life, was but six years old."

—The late JESSE GEORGE, of Philadelphia, will glide down pleasantly to posterity for having given $91,000 to various public institutions—say, Pennsylvania Hospital, $2000; Pennsylvania Historical Society, $5000; Quaker Yearly Meeting, $5000; West Town Quaker Boarding-School, $10,000; Quaker Insane Asylum, at Frankford, $7000; library at Hestonville, Pennsylvania, $30,000; and so on. The old gentleman seems to have been especially sweet on the Quakers.

—The Shah of Persia will start for Europe the first week in the coming month, having been officially invited to the Vienna Exposition. He will be accompanied by the principal nobles of the empire, and will come with princely retinue. The priests opposed the journey, but he is proud of the idea that he will be the first Shah to abandon the old usage and set foot on European soil. The sacerdotal influence is the main obstacle to advancement in Persia; but it will be greatly shaken by the impressions which the monarch and his ministers will bear away from their European travels. The Shah will visit St. Petersburg, Vienna, Berlin, Paris, and London.

—The Marquise de Noailles is making herself very popular in Washington. Recently at a ball an American gentleman said to her, "Ah, madam, if I only spoke your language, what graceful compliments I might pay you!" "Tell me, then, in your language," she answered: "I should understand;" and there came a roguish twinkle of her eyes.

—NATHAN JACKSON was a good man. Not a doubt of it. What did he? Some years ago, having in view the cravings of the body as well as of the mind, he bequeathed a certain portion of his estate, the interest of which should be devoted each year to procure a dinner for the students and those of the alumni of Williams College who could be present. And those half-famished students and hungry alumni, headed by good old Dr. HOPKINS himself, have been enjoying the annual gorge. He was a jolly old mortal, was JACKSON, and on each and every 22d of February in the long hereafter he is to be held in festal honor. Dr. HOPKINS did a little speech, in which he smashed WENDELL PHILLIPS on the Lost Art business, observing in a vein of subtle humor that "Irish bulls were once calves in Greece." Awfully good that.

—The manner in which men pay for too freely expressing their views was sufficiently conspicuous in the case of General CZAYKOWSKI, who has returned to Poland after forty years' exile and service in the Turkish army. He now declares himself a zealous supporter of the Russian government, and thinks if the Poles had not drifted into an insane rebellion against ALEXANDER II., they would have been a happier and more respected people than they are to-day. It is yet to be determined whether the ultimate absorption of Poland is to be in Russia or Germany. The latter is getting up a fine appetite for it.

—The traditional intermarriage of the ROTHSCHILDS has been broken up by the marriage of a daughter of Sir ANTHONY ROTHSCHILD to the Hon. ELIOT YORKE, son of the Earl of Hardwicke. Some sensation was also created in England in consequence of a section of the clergy of the Church of England lodging a caveat in the diocese court at Ely against the wedding being allowed to proceed in the parish church at Wimpole, the bride being a Jewess. The court, however, wisely declined to interfere, and after a civil marriage before the Register-General, the second ceremony took place at the Wimpole church, in the presence of a crowded congregation.

—Miss JENNIE BROWN is the name of a charming Wisconsin belle—a sort of diving belle—who has received fifty yards of watered silk as a reward for saving three men from a watery grave.

—BRET HARTE has had the honor of being done into French, his first series of stories having been translated into that language by A. PICHOT and others, under the title, Scenes of California Life, and Sketches of Transatlantic Customs.

—Notwithstanding the fame of HUMBOLDT, he died bordering on poverty. His embarrassments were caused by his loss in 1843 of nine or ten thousand dollars which the King of Prussia had presented to him. It was believed at the time that the money had been stolen from him, but the police were unable to find any clew to its disappearance. Strange to say, a short time since the gentleman now living in the house formerly occupied by HUMBOLDT found the money in a small box among some old rubbish in the cellar. How it got there puzzles HUMBOLDT'S intimate friends exceedingly.

—Mr. TRUEBNER, a publisher of some eminence in London, who some months since was distinguished by the Grand Duke of Baden with the order of the Lion of Zahringer, has recently been decorated by the Emperor of Germany with the order of the Crown of Prussia. American publishers prefer the Money Order—say, Half Eagles.

—Madame ARABELLA GODDARD, England's favorite pianiste, made her farewell appearance in London, and, it is said, her last public appearance in England, on the 11th ult. She goes to Australia, and afterward comes to the United States on a professional tour. She made her first appearance as a child prodigy when a pupil of THALBERG.

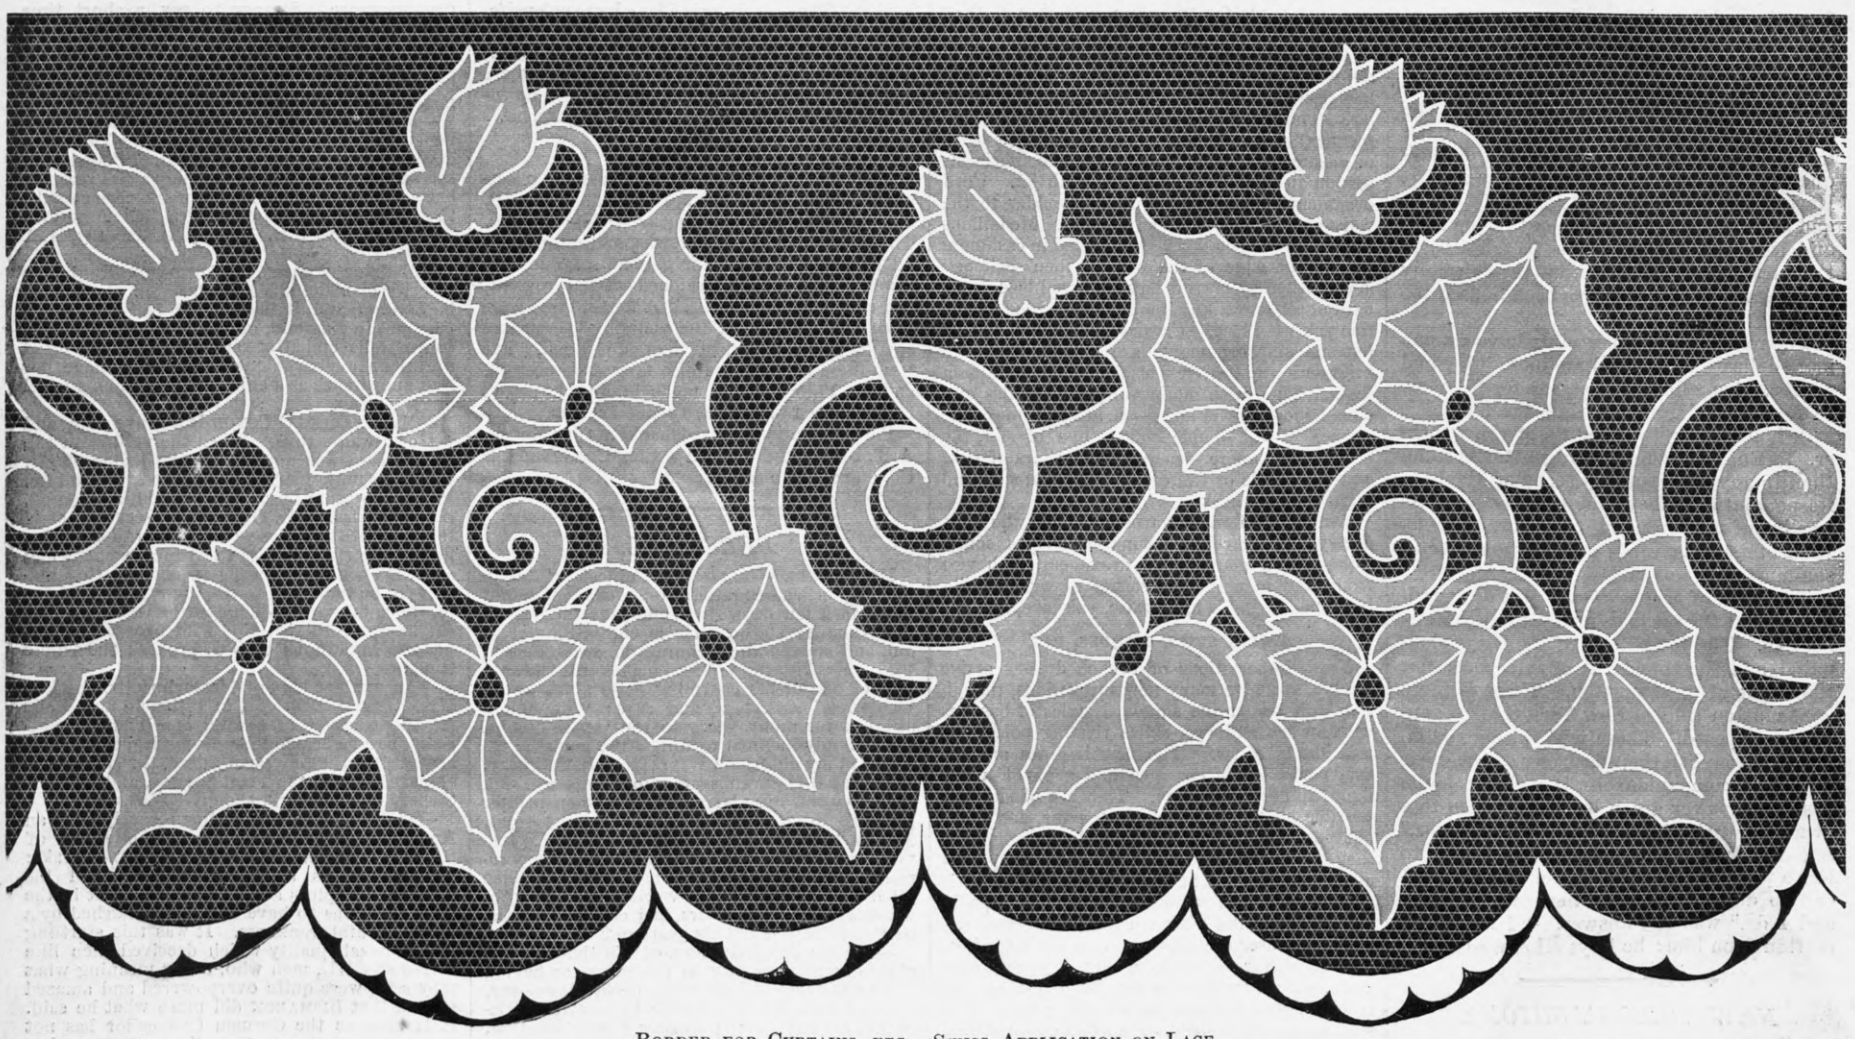
—Mr. CHARLES O'CONOR is a grave man, and yet of a wag-y turn. When the verdict in the JUMEL case was announced, the ladies of Mr. CHASE'S family gushed and rushed toward him. Mrs. FRANCHELL absolutely kissed him—a good, resonant kiss. Mr. O'CONOR observed that if the elder of the ladies were entitled to kiss him, he had the right to kiss the younger ones; and as C. O'CONOR proceeded to execute that manœuvre he remarked to the Court, "Behold the privilege of age!" Judge SHIPMAN didn't take the first step to stop this wild proceeding, but let the impetuous C. O'C. proceed the whole thing.

—An opulent lady of Massachusetts, the late Mrs. BETSEY D. TRACY, of Pittsfield, has made fat the treasury of several charitable institutions, besides leaving handsome legacies to relatives. To the American Board, the Home Missionary Society, the Tract Society, and Friends' Society of New York, she gives $5000 each.

—M. THIERS, in conversing recently with an American gentleman on the characteristics of the late LOUIS NAPOLEON and BISMARCK, said: "BISMARCK as a diplomatist has had his schemes and plots and stratagems. But in the main he seems to have been distinguished by a certain brutal frankness. It was this startling and unusual quality which deceived men like NAPOLEON III., men who, never meaning what they said, were quite overpowered and amazed to find that BISMARCK did mean what he said. It is because the German Chancellor has not been a conspirator that, dealing with conspirators, he has gained his astonishing success."

—His majesty the present First King of Siam was born on the 21st of September, 1853, elected king by the Royal Council on the death of his father, October 1, 1868, and crowned on the 11th of November following. Owing to his youth, an executive minister of state was appointed to administer the government during his minority. His majesty is a prince of good abilities. After acquiring some knowledge of his own language, he commenced studying English under the tuition of Mrs. LEONOWENS, an English governess in the royal family. She left her position in June, 1867, when Mr. J. H. CHANDLER, the American missionary at Bangkok, was appointed tutor. Mr. C. left Siam on a visit to the United States in 1868, and as the prince succeeded to the throne soon after, no other tutor was appointed; but his majesty still kept up his English studies with his private secretary, who spent about three years in England, and had acquired some knowledge of the English language. His majesty visited Singapore and Java in the early part of 1871, and British India in the early part of 1872, and was received with distinguished honors on both occasions. No Siamese sovereign ever before visited for pleasure and information foreign countries, though some have crossed over their boundaries in time of war. His majesty is fond of improvements, has introduced a modified European dress among his officers, and is doing much to improve the country. His majesty will attain his majority on the 21st of September next, and after celebrating his natal day will, in accordance with Siamese custom, give up his authority to a regent, and enter the priesthood for a short time. On coming out of the priesthood it will be necessary to go through all the ceremonies of another coronation, and commence counting his reign anew from that time. The recoronation is expected to take place in October next. A large part of the royal palace has been torn down, is fast rebuilding, and great preparations are making in anticipation of this event. Although only nineteen years of age, his majesty has numerous wives and children. His majesty the Second King of Siam was born on the 30th of August, 1838, elected Second King by the Royal Council on the 1st of October, 1868, and crowned on the 25th of November following. He is a prince of much ability. His literary and scientific education was well attended to. His majesty has considerable knowledge of the English language, and is especially fond of the arts and sciences. His father, the late Second King, paid special attention to physical science, and collected a great variety of scientific instruments and a valuable library. The son possesses the same fondness for science, art, and useful knowledge, and has enlarged the library collected by his father with many late works and treatises, besides adding to his chemical and other kinds of apparatus. The artisans under his majesty display skill and taste in whatever they do. His majesty pays great attention to the drill and discipline of his soldiers. Their orderly and neat appearance and skillful manœuvres surprise most foreigners. The military bands, with European instruments and music, which have been trained during the last few years, display much musical skill and great progress. Both of the kings have good military bands, and there is considerable emulation among the soldiers and musicians of the two palaces, which is exerting a good influence. The political relations between the two kings in Siam is something like that of President and Vice-President in the United States. The Second King is usually eligible on the demise of the First to the vacant throne; but there are few instances in Siamese history where the Second has become the First King. Strictly speaking, there is no heir-apparent among the princes in Siam, the succession being determined on the demise of the First King by the Royal Council. There have been times when the throne of the Second King has been vacant for many years, but the government is considered irregular at such times.

Hosted by Google



BORDER FOR CURTAINS, ETC.—SWISS APPLICATION ON LACE.

Border for Curtains, etc.—Swiss Application on Lace.

THIS border is especially suited for curtains, window-shades, etc., and may also be used for the edge of a table-cover. It is worked, according to the article for which it is designed, on fine or coarse lace with Swiss muslin, cambric, or nansook application. Transfer the design in the usual manner to the foundation (for the two opposite parts of window-curtains it must, of course, be transferred in opposite directions), baste the lace on a strip of enameled cloth or coarse linen, cover it with the foundation, and hem-stitch the edges. Work the veins and leaves in half-polka stitch, and button-hole stitch the outer row of scallops. Separate the embroidery from the foundation, cut away the double material along the scallops, and cut out the foundation along the edges.

Jewel Casket, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS casket is made of carved wood stained brown, and is ornamented with appliqué embroidery and lined with green satin quilted in diamonds. The foundation for the embroidery is of dark green cloth, on which green satin figures, ornamented in half-polka stitch with green silk and edged with gold cord, are applied. Green silk soutache is stitched on in connection with these figures, as shown by the illustration. On the middle of the foundation is set a piece of velvet, on which the initial is worked in satin stitch with green silk and gold cord. Fig. 2 shows the embroidery for the cover. The sides of the casket can be ornamented in the design shown by the illustration, or else covered with cloth without embroidery.

Blue Crêpe de Chine and Lace Cravat Bow.

THIS cravat bow is made of white lace insertion an inch wide, white lace an inch and a quarter and two inches wide, and loops of light blue crêpe de Chine arranged spirally on a tulle foundation, as shown by the illustration, so as to form a nearly circular fan-shaped bow with ends, the ribbon being in the centre.

BLUE CRÊPE DE CHINE AND LACE CRAVAT BOW.

FIG. 1.—JEWEL CASKET.—APPLICATION AND SATIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.

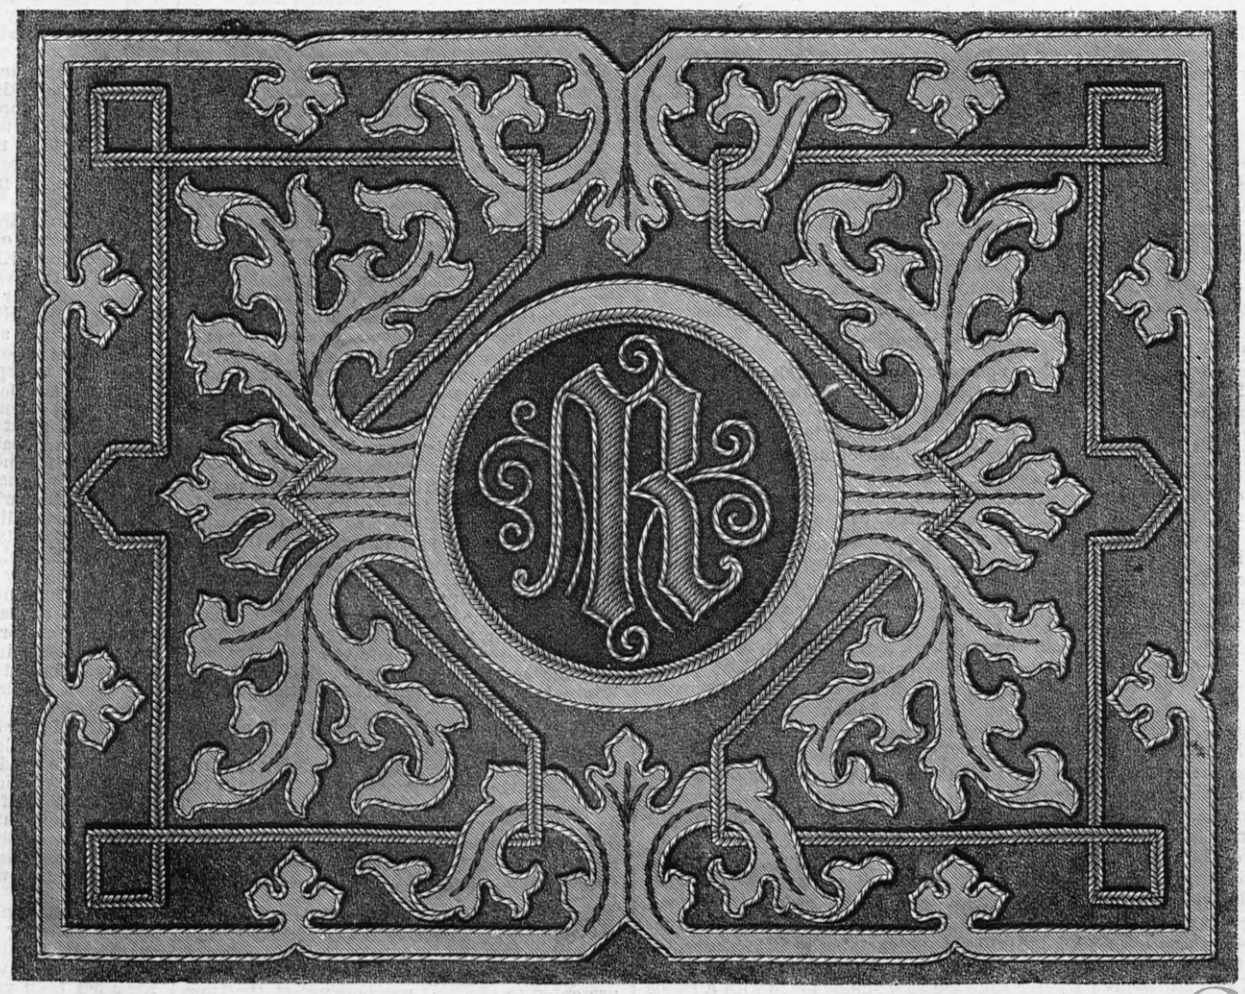


FIG. 2.—DESIGN FOR COVER OF JEWEL CASKET.—APPLICATION AND SATIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.

Cerise Crêpe de Chine and Lace Cravat.

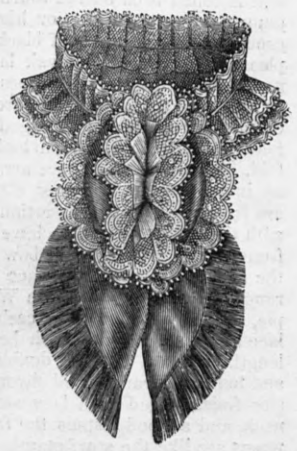
THIS cravat is made of gathered lace as shown by the illustration. It is trimmed in front with a rosette of lace and cerise crêpe de Chine. The crêpe de Chine ends are fringed out seven-eighths of an inch long. The rosette and ends in front are arranged in such a manner as to simulate a jabot of ribbon and lace.

Gros Grain Dinner Dress, Figs. 1-3.

See illustrations on first page and on page 197.

THIS dress, which is shown with a heart-shaped waist by illustrations Figs. 1 and 2, on the first page, is made of buff and violet gros grain, and consists of a skirt and waist. The front breadths of the skirt are of buff gros grain, and are trimmed with ruffles of the material as shown by the illustration. The back breadths of the skirt, which are arranged in a puff in the back as shown by the illustration, and bound with buff gros grain, overlap the front breadths. The sash is of buff gros grain. The heart-shaped basque-waist is of violet gros grain, and is edged with double cording and furnished with a collar of the material. A piece of buff gros grain is basted into the neck of the waist. The waist is trimmed, besides, with pleated crêpe lisse and white lace, arranged in the form of a Marie Antoinette collar. The sleeves are trimmed with gros grain cuffs, with puffs of crêpe lisse, and with white lace. This dress is very pretty made up in black silk, with white lace trimmings.

Fig. 3 shows a low-necked waist to be worn with the same skirt for full-dress occasions. The waist is made of violet gros grain, and is trimmed with revers of the same, with bands, puffs, and bows of buff gros grain, and with white lace. Silk tulle chemise Russe and puffed sleeves. The sleeves are trimmed with ruffles of the material. Coiffure of violet feathers. Necklace of pink coral beads. Coral and gold bracelets and ear-rings. Pink silk fan.



CERISE CRÊPE DE CHINE AND LACE CRAVAT.

Hosted by Google

GIRL'S WARDROBE.

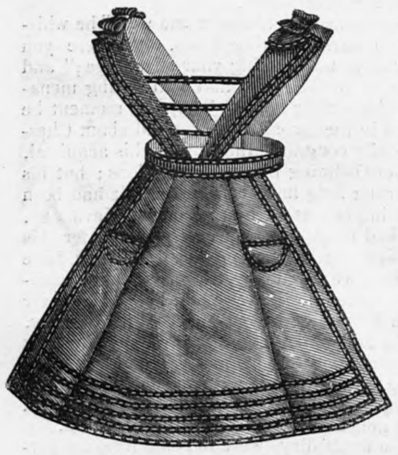
WITH CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

THIS wardrobe will be found extremely useful for girls of all ages from two to thirteen years, as it comprises the most popular and necessary garments of the season. The sailor blouse and skirt make an extremely pretty dress, which can be varied by combining the skirt of this suit with the basque and over-skirt, or the low-necked over dress, furnished with the wardrobe. The basque buttoned in the back is a favorite style at present for children, and answers a large demand. The graceful sacque is convenient for indoor wear, and also for the street during the warm season. The bretelle apron is very pretty, and equally well suited to children of all ages. The wardrobe can be made up in any material, from the cheapest to the most costly, and trimmed to suit the taste. The patterns are graded from 19 to 30 inches bust measure. To take the size pass a tape measure straight around the body, under the arms, drawing it moderately tight.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

THIS set comprises seven articles—sailor blouse, skirt, basque fastened behind, over-skirt, low-necked over dress, sacque, and bretelle apron.

SAILOR BLOUSE.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, back, collar, sleeve, and cuff. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting them together. The perforations show where to baste the seams; those in the sleeve at the top show the size and form of the under part. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edge, and the collar and cuff with the shortest straight edge laid lengthwise on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut an opening in the middle of the front from the top down to the notch, and face the sides. Cut the sleeves lengthwise of the goods. Baste the seams according to the notches, and hem the bottom, then run a tape through the shirr thus formed to adjust the garment to the figure, and try on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back of the armhole, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. Sew the collar to the neck, placing the middle of the collar at the middle of the back, with the seam on the outside, then turn the collar over to conceal the seam. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seam on the shoulder and under the arm, and a quarter of an inch for all other seams.



GIRL'S BRETELLE APRON.—WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for child two years old, 1⅛ yards; eight years, 1⅞ yards; thirteen years, 2½ yards. One-eighth of a yard is added for every year.

SAILOR SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, side gore, back breadth, and pocket. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting them together. The perforations show where to place the pocket. Cut the front gore and back breadth with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut the side gore with the edge of the pattern which has one notch laid lengthwise on the edge of the goods. Turn the top of the pocket down in the line of perforations. Close the seams of the skirt according to the notches, and gather the top of the back breadth. Lay two pleats in the side gore turning toward the front, and sew the skirt to the belt. Trim the bottom, about four inches from the edge, with a band of the material three inches wide. A quarter of an inch is allowed for seams in this pattern. If the skirt is too long or too short, add to or take from the bottom the quantity required, always keeping the same shape.

Fig. 3.—LOW-NECKED WAIST FOR DINNER DRESS.
[See Figs. 1 and 2 on First Page.]

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for child two years old, 1½ yards; eight years, 3 yards; thirteen years, 4¼ yards. One-quarter of a yard is added for every year.

BASQUE FASTENED BEHIND.—This pattern is in six pieces—half of the front, side front, back, side back, sleeve, and half of the cuff. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting them together. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulder and under the arms, and across the side front; the perforations in the sleeve at the top show the size and form of the under part. Cut the front with the longest straight edge, and the cuff with the shortest straight edge laid on the fold of the cloth to avoid seams. Cut the back with the longest straight edge laid lengthwise on the edge of the goods. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back for the hem. Slash the middle of the front up to the notch from the bottom. Baste the seam across the side front and all other seams according to the notches, and try on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back part of the armhole, holding the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. Set a narrow band standing upward around the neck, and close the back to the waist line with buttons and button-holes an inch and a quarter apart. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others. If the sleeves are too long or too short, add to or take from the top and bottom an equal quantity.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for child two years old, 1½ yards; eight years, 2¼ yards; thirteen years, 2⅞ yards. One-eighth of a yard is added for every year.

OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—half of front gore, side gore, half of back breadth, and strap to loop the skirt. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting them together. Cut the front gore and back breadth with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut the side gore with the edge of the pattern that has one notch laid lengthwise on the edge of the goods. Close the seams according to the notches. Slash the middle of the back breadth from the top as far down as the notch, and turn back for the hem. Gather the top of the back breadth and side gore, and sew to the belt. Tack one end of the strap under the skirt near the front of the gathers, and the other end at the perforations in the back breadth. Cut two pieces like the pattern given of the strap. Trim the bottom with fringe headed by three bias folds of the material, their own width apart. A quarter of an inch is allowed for seams on this pattern.

GIRL'S SACQUE.—WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for child two years old, 1½ yards; eight years, 2¼ yards; thirteen years, 2⅞ yards. One-eighth of a yard is added for every year.

LOW-NECKED OVER DRESS.—This pattern is in seven pieces—half of front, side front, back, side back, sleeve, strap, and piece for trimming. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting them together; the notches also show where to lay the pleats. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulder and under the arms, the size and form of the under part of the sleeve, and where to tack the straps in the middle of the back and on the side of the skirt. The front is cut with extra width on the side, and laid in a deep box-pleat at the waist line before joining to the side form. The back is fitted with side back and middle seams. At the side back and under arm seams the skirt is cut with extra width, gathered across the top, and tacked to the corresponding seams on the under side. The back edge of the front is laid in two, and the front edge of the back in four side pleats, according to the notches, and turning upward,

GIRL'S LOW-NECKED OVER DRESS.—FRONT AND BACK.—WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

GIRL'S BASQUE FASTENED BEHIND AND OVER-SKIRT.—FRONT AND BACK.
WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

GIRL'S SAILOR BLOUSE AND SKIRT.—FRONT AND BACK.
WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

GIRL'S WARDROBE.

[Cut Paper Patterns of Girl's Wardrobe, comprising Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-Skirt, Low-necked Over Dress, Sacque, and Bretelle Apron, for Girl from 2 to 13 Years old, from 19 to 30 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Hosted by Google

before joining together. The neck is cut square at both the front and back, and finished with points of the material. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back for the hem in front. The sleeve is left open from the bottom up to the notch on the outside seam. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back of the armhole, holding the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. The skirt is draped in the back with three straps. Tack one end of each strap at the three seams in the back at the waist, and the other end at the single perforations in the skirt. Baste up and try on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for child two years old, 2½ yards; eight years, 3¼ yards; thirteen years, 3⅞ yards. One-eighth of a yard is added for every year.

SACQUE.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, back, sleeve, and pocket. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting them together. The perforations show where to baste the seams, where to place the pockets, and the size and form of the under part of the sleeve. Cut the front with the longest straight edge laid on the edge of the goods. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back for the hem. Cut the back with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid a seam. Baste the seams according to the notches, and try on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back of the armhole, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. Finish the neck with a band standing upward. Close the front at the neck with three buttons and button-holes. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for child two years old, seven-eighths of a yard; eight years, 1¼ yards; thirteen years, 1½ yards. One-sixteenth of a yard is added for every year.

BRETELLE APRON.—This pattern is in five pieces—half of front gore, side gore, bretelle, pocket, and belt. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting them together. Cut the front gore with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid a seam. Cut the side gore with the edge of the pattern that has one notch laid lengthwise on the edge of the goods. The perforations show where to place the pocket, and where to sew the bretelles on the belt. Sew the top of the apron plain to the belt; the notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back for the hem on the belt. Join the shoulder of the bretelle by the notches, and ornament with a bow of ribbon. A quarter of an inch is allowed for seams in this pattern.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for child two years old, half a yard; eight years, three-quarters of a yard; thirteen years, 1⅛ yards. One-sixteenth of a yard is added for every year.

SONG.

I WOULD be a sunbeam bright!
Not that I might flash with light
On the world's bewildered sight—
No! ah, no!
I would go
Diving through my love's blue eyes
Down into her inmost soul;
Then from azure deeps arise,
While a pearly tear I stole.
Laughing, I
Then would fly,
Kissing all her golden hair.
Were I but a sunbeam fair,
All things I might do and dare!

MURPHY'S MASTER.

BY JAMES PAYN,

Author of "A Woman's Vengeance," "Bred in the Bone," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," etc.

CHAPTER XVII.

ARRESTED.

"So you are on the look-out, Mr. Chesney, with your map and your glass," said Maguire, when he had come up to Robert's side, "in hopes to see a friendly sail?"

He spoke in a dry, cynical tone that was habitual to him, but the expression of his face was less grim than usual, though not more genial: it was grave, set, and determined.

"I am looking, like other people," answered Robert, carelessly, "for the ship that fired that gun."

"Yes," answered the other, contemptuously, "and you were also wishing that you had a white table-cloth to wave, or a pile of wood to fire, in order to attract her attention."

"Why not?" inquired Robert, coolly: "all sails are friendly to us here, I suppose."

"To you, perhaps, they may be; but not to him who rules this island for the nonce, nor to him"—and he struck his own broad breast with his hand—"who is about to rule it. No ship shall land here with my leave; be sure of that; and woe be to the man who brings one hither."

"I did not know that the island was provided with such heavy batteries, and that you had the command of them," observed Robert, with heightened color. "As to your menace—if you intend it to be a personal one—it is thrown away upon me."

"Ho, ho! so you have already made up your mind upon the subject we discussed a while ago. We are to be enemies, are we, Robert Chesney?"

"We are not to be friends, Maguire, if at least you are so free with your threats," answered Robert, boldly. "You may kill me—and you look this moment as if you would like to do it—but be sure of this, you shall never bully me. If I had a flag here, I would wave it, if I had a bonfire here, I would light it, though it were to be the last movement of my hand."

"What a pity that I shall some day have to kill you, Chesney, if you let your courage so far outstrip your wits," said Maguire, not without some admiring pity. "It is lucky for you that both you and those poor fools yonder are alike in error respecting the sound you have just heard. That was no ship's gun, my lad, as you imagine, but an earthquake shock. In the China seas I have heard such more than once, though never in these latitudes. You doubt me? Well, if it be a ship, then, you may signal her, and may I swing at her yard-arm."

"An earthquake shock!" answered Robert, wonderingly. "Well, it is true I thought I felt the island tremble."

"And you were right, lad. I have told you the explanation of that; now why not be taught by me in other matters? Did I deceive you as to the condition of Kavanagh? Is he not stark, staring mad? Are not our lives hanging on a mere thread while we submit ourselves to his tyrannical caprices?"

"All that is true," said Robert, firmly. "But I will not have him harmed—that is, as you would harm him."

"You would rather let him kill you than kill him, perhaps?" observed Maguire, significantly. "And yet," added he, when the other made no answer, "I have heard it said you once drew a knife upon a man yourself."

"On Murphy: yes. But I had no other means whereby to defend my life."

"Oh! that was it," said Maguire, carelessly. "I thought you had a slighter reason. Well, our intelligent friends yonder have hit, I see, at last upon the idea of using the hill as a look-out; and as I don't want to have to explain to them the phenomena of earthquakes, I shall be off; so good-evening."

He nodded, and moved slowly off toward the harbor. Unconcerned as he strove to appear, Robert knew that Maguire felt baffled, angry, and evilly disposed toward himself; that he had made his last effort to win him over to his views, and was now resolved to act without him—perhaps against him. Full of serious thoughts and apprehensions, Robert felt as little inclined to chatter as his late companion, and went down the hill to his own house. Instigated by some presentiment of danger to those precious treasures, he dug up the flooring of his bedroom, and hid beneath it his map, his telescope, and also a little pocket-compass he had purchased in Melbourne; then feeling that he had taken all the poor precautions that were within his power, he lit his pipe, to think and ponder once again. Before it was smoked out there came a knock at the door, and Tim appeared at it, pike in hand.

"You're wanted," said he, "at the harbor."

The curtness of the man's manner, and the absence of the "Sir," which he had used but a few hours ago, would have suggested to Robert that there was something amiss, even had there not been at Tim's back two other men, also with pikes, presenting on the whole a far from friendly-looking embassy.

"Why, what's the matter, Tim?" inquired Robert, good-naturedly.

"That you must answer to the master—I mean the Governor," was the gruff reply. "I'm to bring you to him, and these are to stay here and search about."

When Tim and his prisoner were on their way together to the Government House, however, the former relaxed in his sternness, and became more communicative. Maguire, it appeared, had impeached Robert to Kavanagh, accusing him of a design to attract strangers to the island, for the purpose of destroying his authority; and the poor mad Governor was more beside himself than ever with fury.

"Bedad, if it's proved against you, he'll string you up just as he did Pat Doolan," was Tim's fixed opinion, in which Robert himself was obliged to concur: and if that was to happen, what would then become of Lizzy, left on Murphy's Island without even the protection of his slender arm! This reflection, however, instead of paralyzing him, seemed to nerve him with courage, and if it did not sharpen his wits, determined him at least to exercise them without scruple. He had an arrow in his mental quiver which, if the worst came to the worst, he would let fly at Maguire's own breast, be the issue to that traitor what it might.

In front of Government House there was a little crowd assembled, that made way for him with a pitying murmur; and what was far more ominous, there projected from one of its front windows a stout pole, from the end of which a rope was already dangling, the same, no doubt, which had cut short poor Doolan's mortal coil.

CHAPTER XVIII.

HIGH TREASON.

ROBERT was ushered by Tim into the same room wherein he had been before admitted, but which now presented a somewhat different appearance. Upon the round table, on which bottle and glasses were still standing, had been hoisted an arm-chair, and in this elevated seat was Kavanagh, holding in his hand, by way of symbol of sovereignty, a wooden ruler, which he waved, as Robert entered, with a majestic air. By his side stood Murphy, with a drawn sword; and in a corner of the room, in an empty tea-chest, which came up to his hips, and supplied the place of a witness-box, stood Maguire—both with the gravest faces, as of persons impressed with a due reverence for judicial ceremonial. Perilous as he felt his position to be, Robert could hardly maintain his gravity at this ludicrous spectacle; though the black beam projecting from the window, and the murmur of hushed expectancy that came up from the crowd below, might well have quenched the mirth of a braver man.

"Robert Chesney," observed the Governor, in a solemn voice, marred, however, by an occasional hiccup, "you are accused of endeavoring to bring upon us a foreign power, thereby to subvert our authority—an offense contrary to the constitution, and which by it is punishable with death. It is my hope, dearly beloved cousin, and second only to ourselves, as you are, within this realm, that you may clear yourself of this hateful charge. But if otherwise, you shall pay the penalty, like the meanest. There stands your accuser!" And Kavanagh pointed to the tea-chest with his ruler, and drained a glass of whisky to the dregs.

Then Maguire repeated so much of the conversation Robert had held with him on the hill as referred to the ship, erroneously expected, adding certain expressions of aspiration to which the young fellow had never given utterance, but that really gave a certain treasonous aspect to what had been said, well fitted to inflame a tyrant's suspicions. The very repetition of his story, in fact, evidently aroused Kavanagh's jealousy and alarm, and at its conclusion it was with an impatient gesture that he motioned to the accused, and bade him say what he had to say in his defense.

"Much of that which Maguire has stated, Sir," said Robert, firmly, "is a malicious lie; but as to my saying that I intended to hail the ship, if such it had proved to be, I did say so; nor did I know—nor do I—that I should have done wrong in so doing."

"Death, by article nineteen of the constitution," observed Kavanagh, hastily. "Get ready the rope there."

"To be punished, Sir," pleaded the unhappy lad, "for transgressing a law of which I was wholly ignorant—"

"It's the same in the British constitution, my good fellow," observed Kavanagh, cheerfully.

"That may be, Sir; but the one that you have so wisely framed upon its model should not copy its faults. Doubtless all the rest of your subjects have been made acquainted with this admirable document, whereas I alone when it was proclaimed was absent from the island upon business of your own and of the state."

Kavanagh shook his head.

"De minimis non curat lex," said he: "we can't take notice of these little matters. Are you acquainted with any just cause or impediment—no, that's not it. Have you any reason to offer"—and here he put on his black skull-cap, like a judge who is about to award the last penalty of the law—"why sentence of death should not be passed upon you?"

"Yes," answered Robert, boldly, "I have a state secret, the revelation of which may well earn for me my life at your hands, and which I pray you to let me whisper in your ear."

"Whisper in my ear?—How the deuce can he do that, Murphy? I'm too high up. This has not been provided for in the constitution."

A stool, however, was brought, and Robert, ascending it, spoke a few words earnestly to Kavanagh in a low tone. They seemed to affect him in an extreme degree.

"Tim!" cried he to the sentinel, excitedly, "go to New Town, and fetch our royal consort, Mary Becher."

Tim scratched his head; the mandate being unintelligible to him, as it well might be.

"It's Mary Beamish that the Governor means," whispered Dick, in explanation.

"It's not!" roared Kavanagh, in a transport of fury. "What do you say, Robert? You know it's Mary Becher, don't you?"

Robert assented eagerly: he would have recognized her with equal facility as Mary de' Medici, Mary of Burgundy, or Mary Queen of Scots.

"Now I know who are the traitors!" exclaimed Kavanagh, looking reproachfully at Murphy, and then casting an angry glance upon Maguire, who, indeed, if to grow pale and red by turns is to be of doubtful loyalty, exhibited very traitorous symptoms. "But nevertheless let the crime be proved."

Here the door opened and admitted Mary Beamish, whom Tim had found in the crowd without, all the inhabitants of New Town having by this time congregated thither at the news of Robert's impeachment. She was a pretty brunette enough, and the slight paleness caused by her alarm at this unexpected summons mitigated her somewhat too rosy charms.

"We sent for you, Mary," explained Kavanagh, with elaborate courtesy, "to know from your own lips whether that man yonder"—pointing to Maguire—"has ever ventured to abuse your ear by protestations of affection. Speak the truth, and fear not."

Mary hung her head and blushed.

"Mr. Maguire has courted me," faltered she; "but—"

"Ah! you concealed the matter that the wretch might keep his life," interrupted Kavanagh.

"Well, Sir," continued the puzzled girl, "I thought him too old and too ugly."

"Most faithful of women!" ejaculated Kavanagh, admiringly, "you have said enough.—Tim, remove our consort.—What ho! without there! get the rope ready! Maguire shall swing. Executioner, do your duty."

Maguire turned deadly pale, and thrust his hand into his breast; but the weapon that he looked for was not there. He had come unarmed to a council where affairs, as he thought, could never have taken a turn so perilous to himself. Murphy was advancing toward him with a rope to pinion his wrists, when Robert suddenly interposed. He certainly owed this man no favor, but the idea of his being put to death at his instigation was abhorrent to him.

"I humbly beg, Sir, that you will spare Maguire's life," cried he.

"Why so?" asked Kavanagh, testily. "He is your own enemy."

"I know it, Sir; and for that very reason would not have his blood upon my hands."

"Blood upon my hands!" repeated Kavanagh, fiercely, and looking at his own fingers. "What is that to you? Have you not just heard that he has committed high treason? You call yourself my loyal subject, and yet you would have me pardon him. You ask his life—well, take it, then. The man is free; and now I have not a friend, not one, not one—but you, Dick."

Murphy had run to his master, and was now helping him to descend from his chair of state with affectionate solicitude. "Blood on my hands, Dick! Did you hear him? I will never forgive him that. Send them away, send them away!"

As Maguire and Robert went down the stairs together from the hall of audience, the former grasped the latter's arm.

"You turned the tables on me well," he whispered, in harsh, grating tones. "Where you erred was in not pushing your advantage;" and he pointed to the noose that still swung menacingly above their heads. The next moment he was lost in the throng that crowded about Chesney, noisily congratulating him on his acquittal, and overwhelming him with questions; but his words rang long in Robert's ears. It had been indeed imprudent in him to offend Kavanagh, as he had manifestly done, by pleading for this man's life, who, without provocation, would have taken his own; and now, as impervious to gratitude as to mercy, it was plain he would never rest till he had destroyed him. With Murphy, Maguire had still great influence, so long as it was not used against his master; and there was nothing, Robert felt, but Kavanagh's waning favor to preserve him from the fate that he had for the nonce escaped but by a hair-breadth.

These forebodings were in some measure corroborated by finding himself on the succeeding day denied to Kavanagh—with whom he had wished to confer respecting the house-building at New Town, which was proceeding with more dispatch than care—and also by the establishment of a sentry on the hill-top, who had orders to prevent any person ascending the same. This latter arrangement, as Robert only too well understood, being to give Kavanagh early and exclusive notice of a ship's approach.

On the other hand, Chesney was not personally interfered with; his authority, both at New Town and elsewhere, seemed to be acknowledged as usual, and indeed he was thought to be in especially high favor with the Governor, since he was allowed to use the little boat. In this he paddled about for hours daily, not for pleasure, but in order to make it an accustomed sight, so that, should the opportunity arise of going out to meet the sloop, his doing so should not excite comment. No opposition was even offered when he tried the experiment of beaching the gig at New Town, instead of leaving it in the harbor, though he had reason to suspect that a messenger had been dispatched from the latter place to learn whether he had returned to the island. To Maguire, and probably to Murphy, the news that he had not done so would have been welcome, for it was not likely, if once carried out to sea in such a tiny craft, he would ever have seen land again. There was much to do in the way of superintendence of affairs, for little as he knew about agricultural matters, he knew more than his brother colonists, while in the matter of architecture, since it was almost wholly confined to carpentering, his advice and help were always in request. It was fortunate that it was so, for if he had had less to occupy him, he would have been consumed with anxieties and apprehensions upon Lizzy's account, the time for whose arrival, as he calculated, was now drawing very near. He had no doubt that the Alstons would at once embrace the opportunity that had been offered them, and leave England by the next mail; and bitterly indeed he now regretted the haste he had urged them to use. His hope was that they had found themselves unable to so immediately obey his summons, and that before another two months had passed help might arrive from some unlooked-for quarter. If not, and especially if any thing should happen to Kavanagh, who was understood to be in very ill health—or at least that was the reason given for the denial he always met with at Government House—he might expect the worst indeed. In the mean time he seemed to be growing more and more out of favor with the Governor, who had sent him orders, through Murphy, that he was to confine himself to his own district of New Town, and not presume to come over to the harbor without permission—an edict which, as he guessed, had a similar intention with that of the appointment of the hill sentry: other persons had made the same calculations as himself respecting the probable arrival of the sloop.

One morning early there came a timid knock at his door, and rising in haste, though nearly dressed—for he held himself day and night in readiness to take to the boat at a moment's notice—he found Mary Beamish. This girl was very grateful to him for having delivered her from the persecutions of Maguire, who, since the day that had so nearly proved fatal to him, had not ventured to molest her, and was well aware of his anxiety on Lizzy's account, with which (in spite of a little tenderness she felt for Robert herself) she warmly sympathized.

Hosted by Google

"What is it, Mary?" inquired he, eagerly.

"Come to our cottage, Sir, and I'll tell you," said she, cautiously. "I can not tell you in the street."

"But is the sloop come? For Heaven's sake tell me that."

"Yes, it arrived not an hour ago; and has sailed away again. I could not get to tell you sooner."

"But Lizzy? Is she at the harbor?"

"No, indeed, Sir; you must not go to the harbor. Mr. Maguire, bad cess to him! would only be too glad to see you disobeying orders.—Well, stop one moment;" and as Robert was about to start madly off at the top of his speed, she lifted the latch of the cottage door, and added, with a sly smile, "she's here, Sir." The next instant he was clasped in Lizzy's arms.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

IVIES.

THERE is no plant more suitable for the in-door decoration of a rural home than the ivy. It will grow in almost any ordinary soil; does not require any heat in order to make it thrive; its thick papery or leathery foliage enables it to resist great changes of temperature; and it grows well in the shade. We have seen it doing admirably trained round the mouldings of the sliding-doors between the parlors, and very pretty effects can be produced by training it upon properly constructed wire or rustic frames on the inside of the windows. It also forms a staple plant for hanging baskets or rustic plant stands, as its rich, deep, dark green foliage forms an efficient contrast to the lighter green or colored foliage of the other plants used for this purpose.

It is also useful for covering stone or brick walls where it is hardy, but it is not hardy north of the city of New York, and can scarcely be called hardy there, as, unless protected by straw mats, it often gets killed or has its beauty defaced by the extreme cold. Fortunately, for these purposes and for covering the trunks of trees, we have a native plant, Ampelopsis quinquefolia, commonly known as the Virginia Creeper and American Ivy, whose magnificent foliage gives us a good substitute for the true ivy, except that it is deciduous, and therefore does not clothe our walls with green in the winter season. In sections of the country where the ivy is found to be hardy, it is a very useful plant for planting in the crevices of rocks, in order to cover them with foliage, and to break up their naked appearance; it is also well adapted for planting on banks and terraces, which it soon covers with its rich, luxuriant foliage.

The ivy has the curious habit, after it has attained the top of a wall or ruin, of throwing out fruiting branches, the foliage of which is different from that of the climbing portion of the plant, so that the top of the wall or ruin will appear to have a hedge from three to six feet high growing upon it. These fruiting branches are propagated by cuttings, or grafting upon the climbing stems, and then retain the arborescent form for many years. In this state they make very elegant pot plants for house culture, but, of course, are not useful for training around windows, etc. The climbing forms can be made to assume various shapes, such as pyramids, canopies, etc., by the use of properly constructed wire frames and judicious training. In Germany, where this plant is greatly used for in-door rustic adornment, it will be found trained in the vestibule, up the balustrades of the stairs, over the piano, and even as a dividing screen in a room, and also in the shop windows, and on the supports of the shelving for the goods.

As to soil, the ivy will grow in any good garden soil. When grown in pots or boxes, use the same soil as you would for geraniums, fuchsias, or heliotropes, except that for the variegated-leaved sorts no manure should be used, as it has a tendency to make the variegations run out. They should be kept rather moist, and have their foliage, under house culture, occasionally washed or sponged off, to get rid of the dust. The variegated-leaved varieties require more light and air than the self-colored. As is the case with all variegated-leaved plants, they are not so robust as those with wholly green foliage.

Among botanists the ivy is known under the generic name of Hedera. Nearly sixty species are known, mostly natives of the tropics, but only three species are ordinarily cultivated in our gardens. These are, H. helix, the English ivy; H. grandifolia, the Irish ivy; and H. coriacea, the Colchican ivy. Much confusion has existed in the nomenclature of the varieties. That which we have here adopted is that of Mr. Shirley Hibberd, who has made the ivy a special study, and has recently published a monograph of the cultivated sorts.

We have made a selection of the best and most distinct varieties for house culture, and appended the prices in such cases as we have found them priced in our nurserymen's catalogues.

HEDERA HELIX.

Of the Hedera helix, or English ivy, we recommend the type species and the following:

CLIMBING VARIETIES.

Gracilis.—A light, airy-growing variety, with small wiry stems and small leaves of a light dull green color, richly bronzed in the autumn. Price 25 cents.

Tortuosa, syn. Glymii.—This variety is not of very robust growth. The leaves are deep green, with blotches of dark bronze, and are curiously curled and twisted. Well adapted for pot culture.

Lobata major, syn. Sagittæfolia.—Of free, robust growth, with deep green, hard, glossy leaves. A handsome variety.

Sagittæfolia.—A free, wiry grower, with the arrow-shaped leaves somewhat sparsely set on the stems. The leaves are dark green with purplish-bronze shadings in the autumn, and light green veins.

Lucida, syn. Poetica.—The handsomest of the self-colored varieties. It grows very free and robust; the young leaves are of a bright grass green, the older ones dark green; in winter shaded with chocolate-color, and very glossy or shining.

Nigra, syn. Willseana.—This variety has very dark green leaves, which become almost black in winter, and are slightly blistered.

Deltoidea, syn. Rhomboidea obovata latifolia.—A very striking and peculiar variety, with stout stems and curious shield-shaped leaves, which are blackish-green in color, changing to purplish-bronze in autumn; they are very leathery. Price 40 cents.

Digitata, syn. Palmata, Crenata, Pennsylvanica.—This has curious digitate or finger-shaped leaves of a dark, blackish-green color, with whitish veins. It is a free grower and a fine pot plant. Price 40 cents.

Marginata, syn. Argentea elegans.—Has green stems with slightly purplish leaf-stalks; leaves medium size, dull green, washed with gray, mottled with patches of bright green, and margined with creamy white, which in the autumn becomes striped and blotched with deep carmine or purplish-pink.

Marginata grandis, syn. Marginata robusta, Arborescens marginata, Tricolor.—Similar to the above, but has broader leaves and a more massive appearance; the green of the leaf also has a bluish tint, the variegation never assuming a yellowish cast. It runs freely, is very robust, with stout wood, and is one of the very best for pot culture. Price 50 cents.

Marginata major, syn. Marginata argentea, Marginata pulchella, Marginata elegantissima, Silver Stripe.—Is of robust growth; leaves large for the class, broad, color deep bluish-green, with a broad margin of a decided yellow tinge. It is a beautiful pot plant, and in a suitable climate well adapted for walls. Price 30 cents.

Marginata media, syn. New Japanese, Japonica variegata, Japonica argentea.—This is similar in character to Marginata grandis, but is not so robust in growth; the variegation is creamy white, without any yellow. It is a fine plant for pot culture. Price 40 cents.

Marginata minor, syn. Marginata elegans, Marginata argentea, Cavendishii, Marginata latifolia.—Has small delicate foliage, and of delicate growth; leaves shield-shaped, of a dull olive green, slightly washed with gray, margin cream-colored, with a pinkish-red edging in the autumn. A pretty variety for pot culture, but not a sufficiently strong grower for the open air. Price 30 cents.

Marginata rubra, syn. Cullisi, Elegantissima, Argentea rubra, Latifolia elegans, Tricolor, Marginata pulchella.—This variety is very similar to Marginata media, but in the autumn and winter has the creamy white margin edged with deep rosy red. It is a slow-growing and tender variety, but is very beautiful. Price 50 cents.

Sub-marginata, syn. Rhombea variegata, Marginata major, Rhomboidea japonica, Japonica variegata, New Japanese.—Leaves of medium size, somewhat rhomboid shaped, color deep bluish-green, with a narrow white margin. A very distinct variety. Price 50 cents.

Marginata lactea, syn. Alba lutescens, Arborescens alba lutescens.—A very beautiful and distinct variety; has deep purple stems, with reddish-purple foot-stalks to the leaves, which latter are somewhat triangular in shape, of a dark green color, with a few gray blotches and whitish veins; the margin is cream-colored, with a bright pink edge in winter. A slow grower, but fine pot plant. Price 50 cents.

ARBORESCENT VARIETIES.

Latifolia, syn. Baccifera latifolia.—This is the finest variety of the arborescent forms of H. helix. It has broad ovate leaves of a deep green color; the berries are black.

Chrysocarpa, syn. Baccifera lutea.—This variety has deep orange-colored berries, and fruits very freely; the color of the leaves is a rich deep green, and the growth very dense, dwarf, and compact. It makes an elegant pot plant. Price 25 cents.

Argentea major, syn. Canariensis, Argentea elegans, New Silver.—This variety is rather free and somewhat scandent in growth; the leaves are of a deep holly green, highly varnished, with a broad, rich, creamy white margin. It is one of the finest varieties.

Argentea minor, syn. Marginata argentea, Marginata aurea, Pince's New Silver.—A decidedly arborescent variety, bearing an abundance of berries; the leaves are of a deep grayish-green, with a broad margin of clear cream-color. Price 30 cents.

Luteola, syn. Pumila aurea, Aurea spectabilis.—This variety is very superb, and is of vigorous growth. The leaves are dark green, mottled with gray; the margin broad, and of a rich yellow cream-color. Elegant for pot culture. Price $1.

Sub-lutea, syn. Arborescens minor lutea, Arborescens alba lutescens.—Well adapted for pot culture, as its abundance of greenish-white and sulphur-colored variegation renders it quite conspicuous. Price 50 cents.

HEDERA GRANDIFOLIA.

This is known in the books as H. canariensis, the Canary Island ivy; H. hibernica, the Irish ivy; and as H. vegeta; but as it is a very scarce native plant in Ireland, and as it is found growing in Africa, as well as in other places, the name has been changed as above on account of the large size of the leaves. In growth it is remarkably free and robust, and appears to withstand our winters better than the English ivy, probably because it ripens its wood better, not growing late in the autumn. The leaves are very large, papery in texture, the surface smooth, hard, and of a rich deep green color. The petioles, or foot-stalks, are long and of a reddish-purple color. This is the species generally grown by our florists for hanging baskets and floral stands. There are not as many varieties of this species as there are of the English ivy. Price 25 cents.

CLIMBING VARIETIES.

Viridis, syn. Algeriensis.—This differs from the species in having very large leaves, sometimes measuring six inches across; they are of a yellowish-green color. It is a fine variety either for out-door or pot culture.

Pallida, syn. Golden-blotched, Hibernica fol. var., Aurea maculata, Canariensis var. aurea, Golden-blotched Irish Ivy.—In this variety some parts of the plant are green and other parts are variegated with pale yellow or primrose-color, some of the leaves being half yellow and half green; others entirely yellow; others, again, patched and blotched. It is a fine variety.

Variegata, syn. Algeriensis variegata.—This variety is somewhat scarce; it is not a robust grower, but is very handsome and quite distinct. The leaves are dark green, margined with bright primrose-color. Price $1.

Maculata, syn. Latifolia maculata, Marmorata variegata.—This is the finest variegated variety of H. grandifolia, and is a very beautiful plant. The foot-stalks and stems are bright purplish-red; the leaves are large and variegated with blotches, splashes, and streaks of cream-color, intermixed with deep green and grayish-green. The variegation is very abundant and constant, and the plant a free grower. It is admirable as a pot plant. Price 30 cents.

Canescens, syn. Algeriensis foliis variegatis.—This variety requires age to develop its beauty. The leaves are of a grayish-green color, with a broad cream-colored margin. This latter color spreads as a thin wash over the green color, and gives the leaves a hoary appearance. Price $1.

ARBORESCENT VARIETIES.

Cordifolia, syn. Hibernica arborescens latifolia.—This variety has cordate or heart-shaped leaves of thick texture, and of a bright yellowish-green color.

Cuspidata major, syn. Hibernica palmata.—The three lobes of the leaf of this variety are drawn out into long points, and are curiously cockled at the indentations. The leaf is very thick and hard, and of a deep green color.

Flava, syn. H. arborea flava var.—This variety is decidedly arborescent; the leaves are abundantly variegated with deep yellow.

Striata, syn. H. arborea latifolia striata.—This variety has broad stout leaves, striped and patched with cream-color.

HEDERA CORIACEA.

Hedera coriacea, also known as H. colchica, H. cordifolia, and H. rœgneriana.—This is an Asiatic species; the leaves are very large, often measuring seven inches by five, and are very leathery; of a deep green color, and highly varnished. Price 25 cents.

There are but few varieties of this species; the two best are Purpurea, a climbing variety, having in the autumn bronzy-purple leaves mottled with green, and Dendroides, syn. Rœgneriana arborea, an arborescent form which branches freely, and assumes a decided tree-like appearance.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IF great events, long expected and elaborately prepared for, should really happen to transpire in every particular exactly as was anticipated, how tame they would seem, and what would the newspapers do for a sensation! Elaborate processions would only be "a perfect success," and the grandest ball only "the most brilliant affair of the season"—descriptions which are threadbare. Hence newspaper reporters seem to have experienced a secret delight in that sudden freak of the weather which sent the mercury zero-ward at our national capital, and enabled them easily to give a crisp and spicy account of the events of the 4th of March. The day was most uncomfortably cold—there is no doubt of that. So we are not surprised to be informed that "several cadets half frozen fell out of the line of march, and were taken into houses to be thawed out;" that the "instruments were frozen up, and wouldn't sound a note;" that "the tail of the brass Jackson's horse in Lafayette Square had to be padded to preserve it;" that one had "to break the ice before eating stewed oysters;" that "the colored people in attendance at the ball froze in great numbers, but relays of fresh hot darkies were brought in from some warm locality;" that ladies danced "wrapped in opera cloaks and clouds;" that when informed that some guests desired to shake hands with him, President Grant remarked that "not only his hand, but his whole body, had been shaking for some time;" that "by one o'clock an efficient police were carrying out corpses from the ball-room in a stiffened condition;" and that "the administration and suite formed a funeral procession, and by rapid walking managed to keep the blood in circulation." Otherwise, barring the cold, so say the same veracious reporters, "the thing was a decided success."

A simple description might seem tame after reading these sensational items. Suffice for us to say that if the extensive preparations made for celebrating March 4 were less agreeable in any respect when the time came than was anticipated, the entire blame rests on the broad shoulders of "Old Probabilities." He is a very reliable personage; yet if his "foresight had been as long as his hind-sight," he would three months ago have advised all persons intending to visit Washington on the occasion of the inauguration to prepare for January weather.

More than five thousand persons left New York for Washington on the 3d of March. On the 5th of March it seemed dangerous to attempt to get out of the capital by rail, so great was the crowd in the cars.

Gambling, like other wickedness, flourishes best in secret. Consequently the novel and efficient method adopted by the chief of police in Louisville, Kentucky, for suppressing gambling-houses is based on substantial grounds. A policeman is stationed at the entrance of each resort, with strict orders to take down the name of each person entering, and file the list at headquarters. This plan decidedly meets the disapproval of the gambling part of the community.

A small library of about three hundred volumes has been sent by some considerate ladies of New York to the young men connected with the signal service who are spending the long and dreary winter (for winter is not gone, though spring has come) amidst the blasts and frosts of Mount Washington.

It is said that Lord Bulwer Lytton once assured a friend that in no single instance within his memory had he devoted more than three hours a day to literary labor, but during those hours he worked with all the power of which he was possessed. As Bulwer performed an immense amount of brain-work, this fact affords a hint to literary laborers.

Pogson, director of the astronomical observatory at Madras, in Southern India, asserts that on the 2d of December, 1872, he found the long-lost Biela's comet. He describes it as circular, bright, and without any traces of a tail. Its companion comet was missing. Quite a change this, since, twenty years ago, it was seen as a double comet.

West Point cadets were greatly admired at Washington. Their appearance in the inaugural procession is thus wittily described: "They are absolutely covered with buttons, and so tight laced, and walk so straight, that a ramrod looks puffy and humpbacked beside them."

For the first time in many years the Senate held a session on Sunday night preceding the inauguration to complete unfinished business.

The identical chair used by General Washington at his first inauguration was placed in the Senate-chamber to be occupied by President Grant at his second inauguration, and it will be kept for a similar purpose hereafter. It is a plain piece of furniture, substantially made, and bears the marks of age.

The late Viscountess Beaconsfield once desired to please and surprise her husband by erecting a monument to Mr. Disraeli's father. She took an intimate friend of the family into her confidence, consulted an architect, and selected a suitable site upon a hill of the estate within view of Hughenden, their country-seat. As soon as Parliament opened, and Mr. Disraeli and his wife went into town, workmen began to prepare the foundations. Naturally Mr. Disraeli would have returned to Hughenden for the Easter recess, and then the secret would have been discovered. But Lady Beaconsfield adroitly prevented this by filling the house with painters and repairers. All through the spring and summer the work went steadily on, until in August an obelisk of 120 feet or 130 feet high had reared its lofty and graceful outline against the horizon. When the prorogation enabled husband and wife to return to their country retreat, the surprise of Mr. Disraeli may be conceived. The obelisk, surrounded by a palisading of stone pillars and iron rails, cost upward of £600.

Sweden carries on an immense business in the manufacture of safety-matches. The total exports from Sweden amount to 13,961,644,800 matches, and of these nearly half go to England alone. Indeed, it is estimated that about 225 matches per annum for every man, woman, and child in Great Britain are supplied by Sweden.

The boy boot-blacks of our city are said to have been among the greatest sufferers from the inclement winter. Of course there is no special call for their services when rubbers are essential for foot protection. Consequently they have had little to do during the past two months. Many of them, for lack of employment, which simply means lack of bread, have been compelled to apply to some of the charitable societies for permanent homes. A large number have found homes in the West.

The writings of Mr. Farjeon, author of Grif, Joshua Marvel, Blade-o'-Grass, and of London's Heart, which is now being published as a serial in Harper's Bazar, are familiar to our readers. The Home Journal gives a "pen portrait" of this author, from which we learn that he is still a young man of perhaps thirty-five, and physically has the strength of an athlete. His personal appearance is described as pleasant and prepossessing.

"There is something inspiring in his whole presence; he is quick, impulsive, sympathetic, discerning; reads human nature like a book, and scarcely hesitates a moment in compassing the characteristics, desires, and weaknesses of those with whom he is brought into close contact. It can be said of him much more truly than of most successful men in literature that none know him but to love and admire him. None can doubt for a moment but that his own soul vivifies his living, breathing, palpitating creations—that his works are a part of his life. His hospitality is gracious and whole-souled; his benevolence unobtrusive and far-reaching. Frank, free, joyous, loving, and lovable, he has a smile and a kind word for every body, and literally scatters sunshine along his way."

Our winter has been long and severe. More than 25,000 persons have asked help from the "Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor." The managers appeal to the public for $20,000.

Seal-fishery is an extensive and important business; yet it seems to be carried on with a dreadful and needless cruelty, which also threatens the extermination of the seal. The season chosen for catching seals is in March, and the harpooner selects a place where a number of young seals are lying, knowing well that the mothers will soon make their appearance to see if the young are safe, and they are then shot without mercy. This work goes on for a few days, until tens of thousands of young seals are left motherless to die of starvation. The cry of the young seal is not unlike an infant's, and, when suffering from hunger, the noise made by these thousands of helpless creatures is dreadful. It is said that all that is required to put an end to this unnecessary cruelty is an international treaty among sealing vessels, that an annual secure time should be given to the seals, and that they should not be killed before the 6th of April.

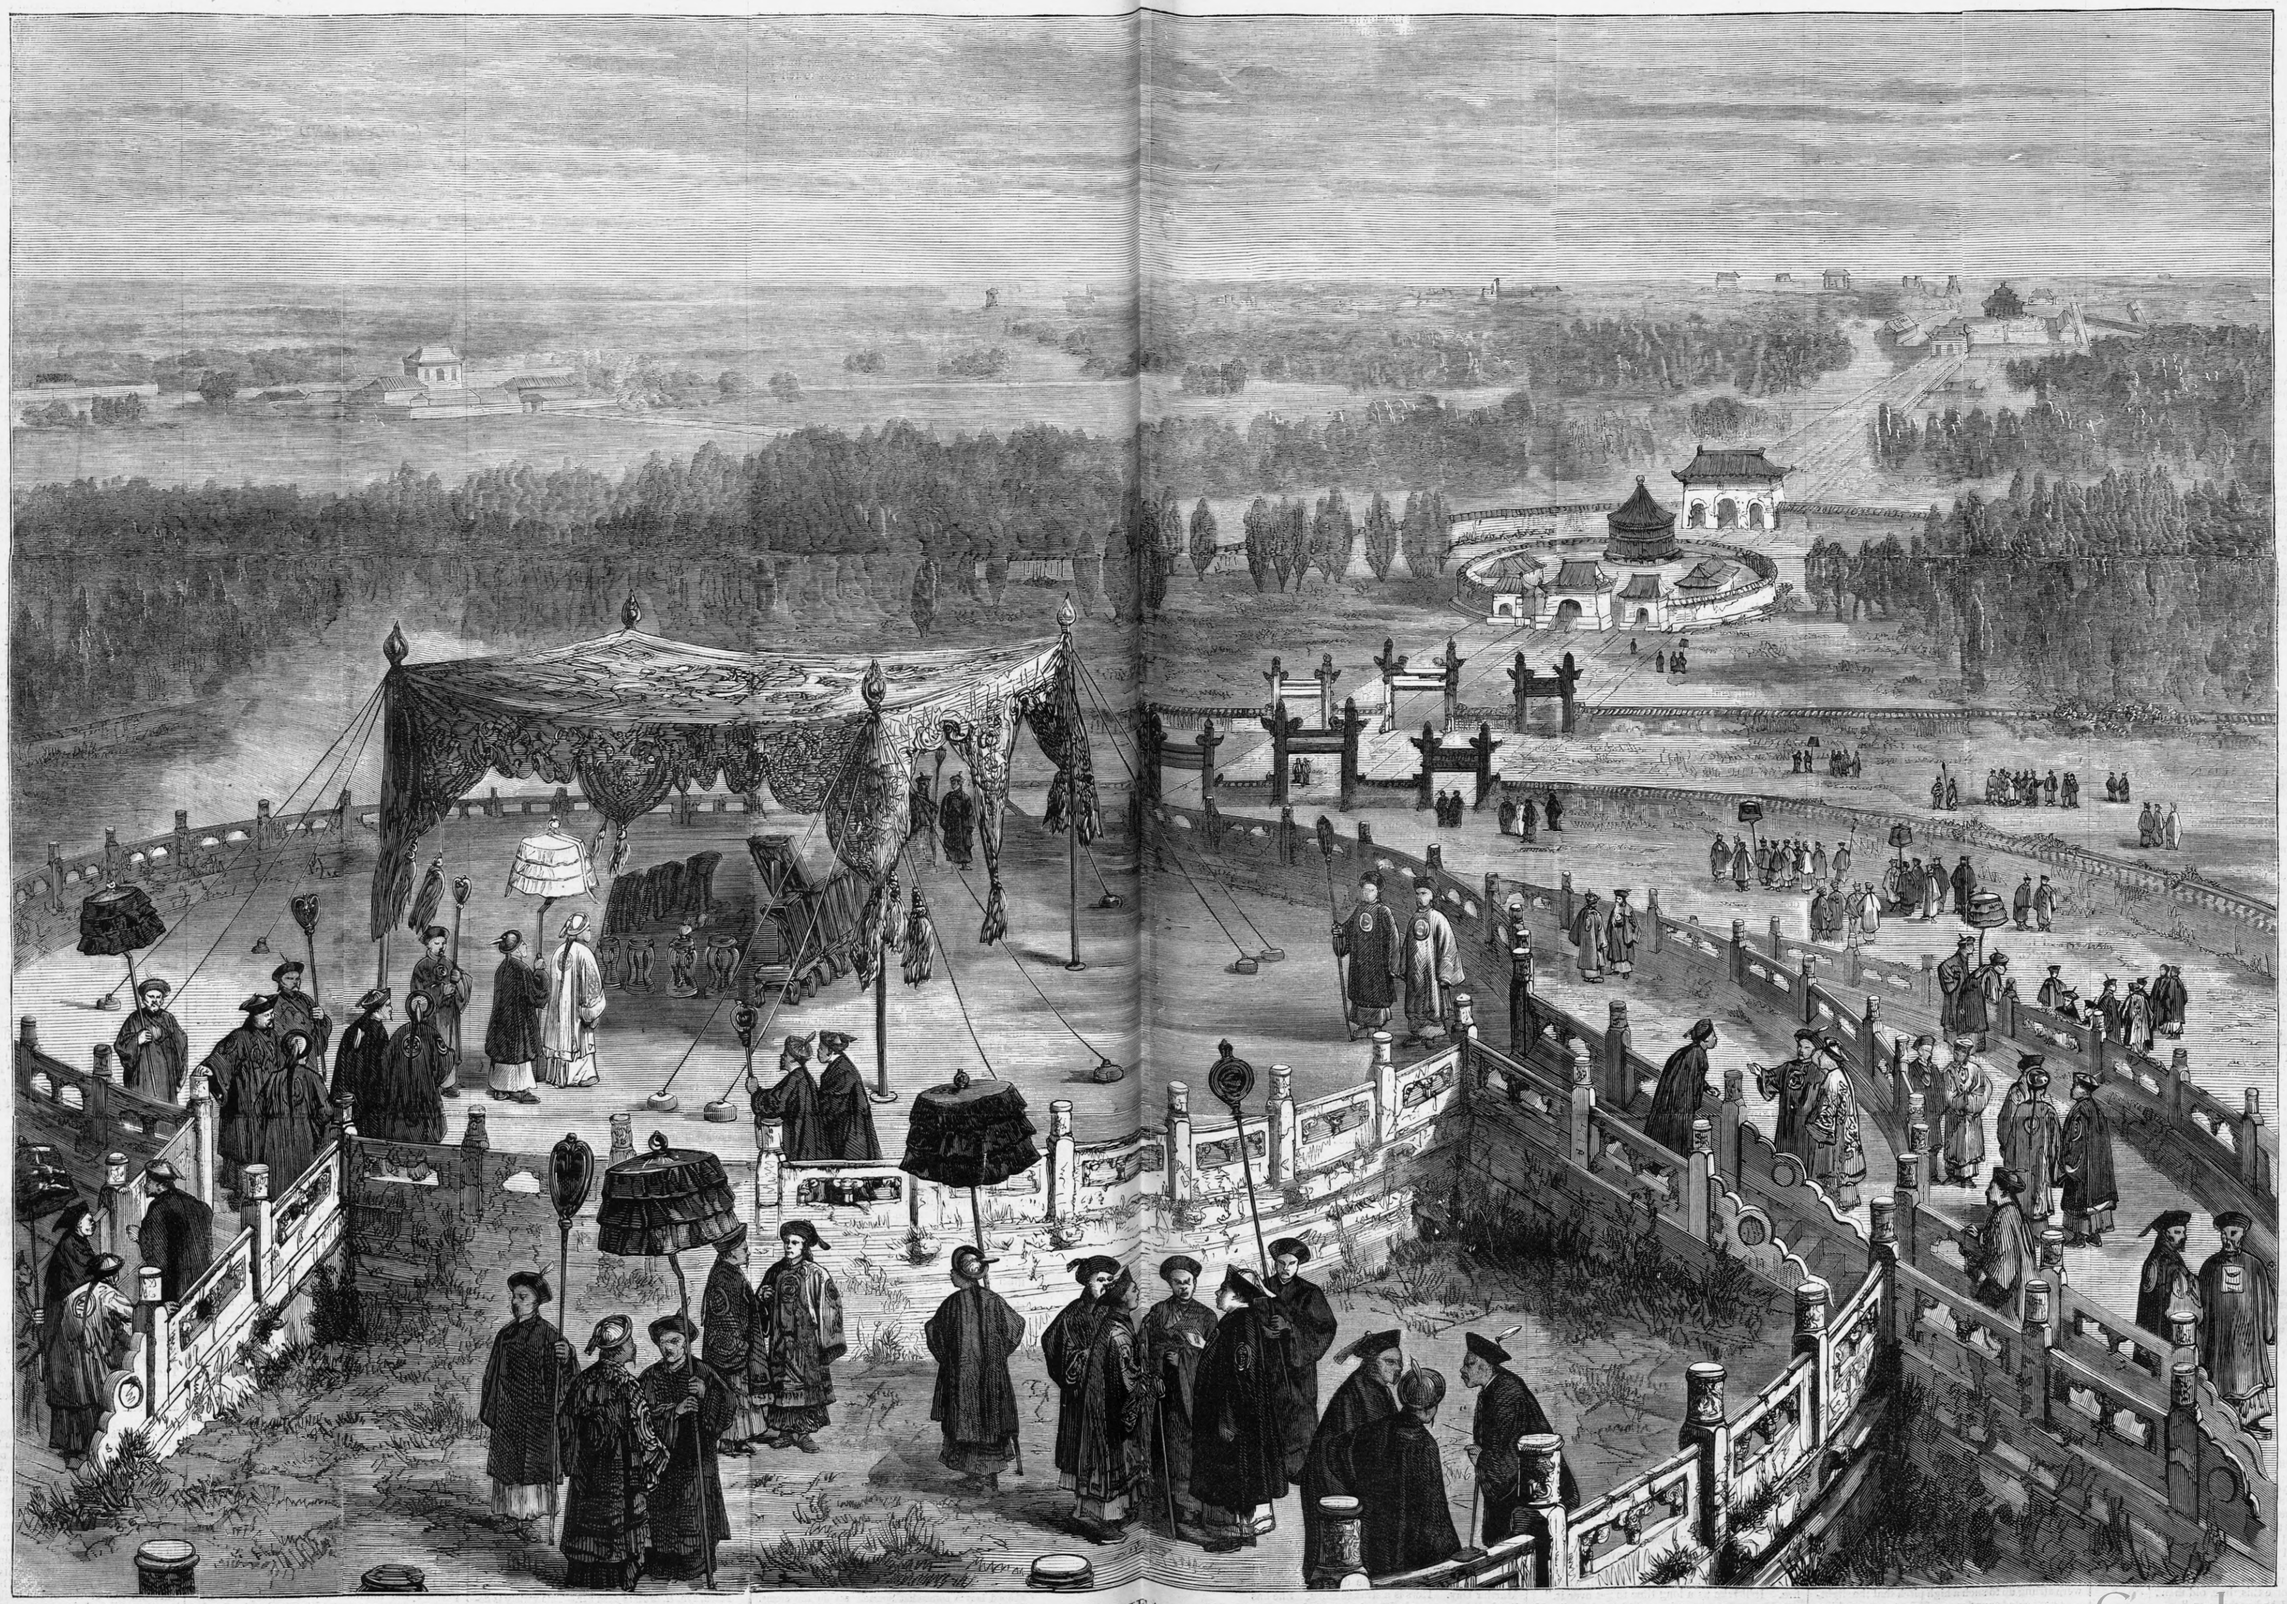
The Lady of Lyons is said to have been written by Lord Lytton within ten days. It first appeared anonymously. On the first night of its representation at Drury Lane Theatre the author happened to be occupied in making an important and brilliant speech before the House of Commons. When the House adjourned Lord Lytton went to the theatre, reaching it just in time to see the final act, and to hear the enthusiastic applause with which it was received. With an air of supercilious indifference he watched the scene, and in response to the commendation of a lady in whose box he was seated, remarked, cynically, "It's very good; very good indeed—for that sort of thing!" Shortly afterward it came out that the indifferent critic was the author of the play.

The "Jubilee Singers" have raised about $37,000 toward the $70,000 required for the Fisk University. About the middle of April they will start on their proposed European tour.

Mineral water was found in the west end of the Hoosic Tunnel more than a year ago. Recently it has gushed out from the rocks in such abundance that it is proposed to make an analysis of it to ascertain its virtues definitely. One tumblerful of it proves a powerful cathartic, and when used for washing, it leaves the skin soft and pliable without soap.

The island of Ceylon abounds in vegetable curiosities, not the least singular of which is a tree called "Eve's apple-tree." The color of the fruit is very striking and beautiful, being orange on the outside and deep crimson within, and it presents the appearance of having had a piece bitten out of it. It is also a deadly poison. These two facts have caused it to receive the name of "forbidden fruit," or "Eve's apple-tree." The Mohammedans considered Ceylon as the site of Paradise.

"The Marble Room" is the popular name given to the cash-room of the Treasury Building in Washington, and it is one of the most beautiful rooms in the world. The floors, walls, counters, and even the clock, are made of marble. The principal kinds of marble from the two continents are here represented—eight different varieties—so combined as to form a harmony of subdued colors most pleasing to the eye. Some of the marble was cut in Italy, and some in New York, and the American workmanship is as perfect as the European. The Marble Room, which is about seventy feet long and thirty wide, is thirty-two feet high, running up through two stories of the building. Half-way up the walls a balcony runs around the whole room, with marble floor and bronze railing. The railing is a beautiful work of art.



THE TEMPLE OF HEAVEN, PEKIN.—[See Page 205.]

Hosted by Google

(Continued from No. 11, page 171.)

LONDON'S HEART.

By B. L. FARJEON,

AUTHOR OF "BLADE-O'-GRASS," "GRIF," AND "JOSHUA MARVEL."

CHAPTER XLI.

ON THE WATCH.

WHEN Alfred was clear of the crowd he paused for a moment, and looked around with a vacant stare. In that moment his eyes fell upon Mr. David Sheldrake, who accosted him gayly. Alfred's parched lips moved in response, but no sound came from them. He thought he had spoken aloud, however, and his eyes, after the first swift recognition of Mr. Sheldrake, sought the ground miserably. Mr. Sheldrake made a pretense of not observing Alfred's uneasiness, and he went on to say, airily, that he had had a slice of good luck in the City and Suburban, and that he had strolled away from the betting-ring to cool his excitement.

"I was looking for you before the race," he said; "I wanted to give you the tip. I was told by the best jockey of the day that Digby Grand could not be beaten, and I backed the horse, and I wanted you to back it also. But perhaps you did."

He paused for a reply, but Alfred said no word. He was in a stupor of despair. Mr. Sheldrake continued:

"You'll be able to square up now, I suppose. I don't care so much for myself, although, of course, the money will come acceptable, but Con Staveley swears he'll be down on you to-morrow. He says he'll go to your place of business, and if you don't pay, he'll split on you to your employers. That would be serious, wouldn't it? I should advise you not to have any thing more to do with Con; he's a hard nail. How much have you won? A couple of monkeys at least, I hope. You must let me into the secret of that new system of yours."

Still no reply from Alfred. Mr. Sheldrake's tone grew grave. He laid his hand upon Alfred's arm, and Alfred shivered at the touch, and feebly endeavored to shake off the grasp.

"I must insist upon an answer, Alf. Have you won or lost?"

"Lost!" muttered Alfred, hoarsely.

"How much?" demanded Mr. Sheldrake.

"Every shilling I had in the world. Let go my arm."

"Be still, or I'll set the police on you! Be still, and tell me," said Mr. Sheldrake, with distinct emphasis, "how you are going to replace the money you have taken from your office."

Alfred trembled violently, but did not raise his eyes.

"You wonder how I know, I dare say," pursued Mr. Sheldrake; "but I know more than you are aware of. What are you going to do?"

"I don't know," replied Alfred, and moved away slowly, Mr. Sheldrake following him thoughtfully.

They were not the only actors in this the last act of the sad drama. An old man, whose eyes never left them, was following them watchfully and warily. A pause of several moments ensued. Then Mr. Sheldrake said, weighing every word:

"I don't like to desert an old friend, even when he has behaved shabbily to me, as you have done. It seems to me that, unless something is done for you at once, it is all up with you. You daren't go back to the office till your accounts are squared, and you daren't go home. The detectives will be on the look-out for you. I dare say if Tickle and Flint could get back a portion of the money you have—we may as well speak plainly—stolen, they would be inclined to let you off. I'll see if I can serve you."

Alfred's white face was raised imploringly at this glimpse of hope.

"But I must have authority," continued Mr. Sheldrake. "I must have something to show your people, and to prove to them, if necessary, that they may trust me. Here—write as I dictate."

He tore a leaf of paper from his pocket-book, and handed it to Alfred, with a pencil.

"Put the date first—that's right; and the place—Epsom. Now write: 'I am in great trouble and danger, and can not come home; my friend, Mr. Sheldrake, is the only man I can trust, and the only man who can save me. Put full faith and trust in him.—ALFRED.'"

Alfred, dazed and helpless, wrote the words, and Mr. Sheldrake took the paper and placed it in his pocket.

"I must get back to the ring now," he said, with a friendly nod. "You know where to find me when you want me."

With these words he turned away: the old man who had been watching him and Alfred tried to avoid him, but Mr. Sheldrake had left Alfred very suddenly, and the old man's movements were not quick enough. Mr. Sheldrake's sharp eyes lighted upon him instantly.

"Hallo, Muzzy!" he exclaimed. "What brings you here?"

"I came to see the race run," said Mr. Musgrave, standing before his employer in a submissive attitude. "It's my favorite race, and I've not missed a year. I was at the first City and Suburban in 1851, when Elthiron won; and the next year, when Butterfly won; and the next, when Ethelbert ran a dead heat with Pancake. I lost a hatful of money over Pancake, at the very moment I thought I had made a fortune."

"It's always the way, Muzzy. You're a regular walking racing calendar! Did you back the winning horse this time, old man?"

"No, Sir; I had nothing on."

"Found out the error of your ways, eh? Well, now the race is over, you can do a little business for me. You see that young fellow," pointing to Alfred, who was walking away with hanging head.

Mr. Musgrave shaded his eyes with his hand.

"My eyes are not so good as they used to be, but I fancy I know him."

"Oh, you know him well enough. It's Alfred, Lizzie's young man."

"Ah, yes; to be sure, to be sure. I recognize him now."

"Keep your eye on him; watch him; don't let him go out of your sight. I want to know what he's up to, and where he is going to."

"I suppose he'll go home to-night," said Mr. Musgrave.

"I am not so sure of that; and if he doesn't, you must see where he puts up, and keep near him. I may want him."

"For what?"

"What's that to you?" retorted Mr. Sheldrake. "Perhaps he owes me money, and I don't intend that he shall give me the slip. Perhaps he's lost on the race and can't pay, and I want to do him a service."

"For the sake of his pretty sister," suggested Mr. Musgrave, humbly.

"You dog, you!" retorted Mr. Sheldrake, half angrily, half approvingly. "Whatever it is, it's my business, and not yours. Mind that, old man. If you don't want to be turned off at a moment's notice, do as you are told, and ask no questions. And look here, old man. You know the Myrtle Inn? Well, inquire there the first thing in the morning for a note. I may have to write to you, to give you instructions. And if the place is handy, you can put up there to-night."

Mr. Musgrave nodded submissively, and crept away in the direction that Alfred had taken.

"Mind," said Mr. Sheldrake, overtaking him, "he's not to see you, and not to know that you are watching him. You can drop a line to me to-night, telling me where he puts up. Here's a sov. to pay ex's."

Although the old man took the sovereign in silence, his manner did not seem to please Mr. Sheldrake, who muttered, as he looked at the slouching figure creeping away:

"I'd give him the sack if I could: but I must get things straight first. He knows too much. I'll square up the concern, and get rid of him this year. I'll have all the books and vouchers moved from Ivy Cottage this very week."

While this scene was being enacted, Alfred pursued his sad way. His great desire was to escape from the crowd, among which probably there were persons who were acquainted with him. He must get to some place and among people where he could hide himself and would not be known. Mr. Sheldrake had rightly said that he dared not show his face at the office. To-morrow all would be discovered. It had been his unhappy fortune yesterday to receive an uncrossed check, payable to bearer, in settlement of a large account due to his employers. This check he had cashed, and had used the proceeds in backing the horses of the false prophet upon whom he had placed all his hopes. This was not the only money he had used; for some time he had pursued a system of falsifying the books of the firm, and of appropriating such payments as would be the least likely to be missed. Discovery was imminent every day, every hour. All this money had been lost in betting, and in vainly striving to recover what had gone before. Even in the midst of his despair he groaned to himself that he had done his best, that he had tried system after system, prophet after prophet, with the same result, and that ill fortune, and not he, was to blame. There was some special reason for each fresh loss—some special reason applicable to that case alone, and which could not by any exercise of forethought have been anticipated or avoided. It brought that smallest of consolation to him which consists in the reflection that the same thing would have happened to any body else placed in his position; but it brought sharp stings also in the reflection that he might have known, or ought to have known, that such and such a thing might have been anticipated, or suspected, or guessed, and the unfortunate result avoided. No consideration of this description, however, intruded itself in what had occurred to-day in his speculations on the City and Suburban race. Here was a prophet, whose name was known to every betting boy and man in the kingdom, who had actually named five horses as the winner of the race, and not one of these five horses came in among the first three. In the eyes of a reasonable being such a circumstance would be sufficient to stamp this prophet as the veriest impostor and incapable that ever put pen to paper; and he might feel a natural indignation that such mischievous utterances should be openly allowed to lead weak men to acts of folly and crime. Even Alfred, never given to moralizing, caring only for himself, and not one jot for the public, cursed this false prophet as he staggered over the Downs, and gave vent to weak imprecations against the man whose cruel prophecies had brought him to this stage of infamy and disgrace.

What would they think at home? Would they guess the truth? What would Lizzie do? He thought mostly of her. If he could get to some new country with her, where they could commence a new life, what happiness it would be! If he could undo the past! In the midst of these repinings and vain repentances, the terrible thought intruded itself that there was no escape for him. He had but five shillings in his pocket; every article of jewelry he possessed had been mortgaged to raise money to swell the fatal stake he had played this day. The detectives would soon be after him. Could he disguise himself in any way so as to escape detection? His nerves were strung up to such a high pitch that the slightest unexpected sound was sufficient to terrify him, and the roar from the distant race-course which proclaimed that another race had been decided was converted by his fears into the shouts of pursuers on his track. He quickened his steps instinctively, preparing for flight, but the next moment his reason returned, and he ascribed the shouts to their correct cause. With a faint smile on his lips, he turned his head in the direction of the cries, and as he turned he suddenly saw Mr. Musgrave slouching in his rear. The sight of the old man gave Alfred a shock, and the first thought which flashed through his mind was that the old man had been set to watch him. That this presumption was the correct one was due not to Alfred's perspicacity, but to his fears. In his condition, every face that was familiar was a face to be suspected. Alfred cast furtive glances at the old man, who, having seen Alfred's recognition of him, looked about listlessly in every direction but that in which Alfred was. He seemed to have come to the spot entirely by accident, and Alfred was partly thrown off his guard by the old man's manner. "But I will make sure," thought Alfred, and began to set traps, into which the old man unconsciously fell. Alfred slunk behind a hedge, which was not thick enough to hide him completely from sight, and remaining there for fully a quarter of an hour, watched and waited, and when he emerged into the open plain, the old man was still there, looking about him with ill-concealed listlessness. "He is watching me," thought Alfred, trembling in every limb. "Who set him on? How can I escape?" He had no thought of addressing the old man to ascertain his purpose. No cordiality had grown between them during their acquaintanceship; Alfred knew that in some way Mr. Musgrave was connected in business with Mr. Sheldrake, and this circumstance was sufficient to convert the old man into a spy, if not into an enemy. Faint, despairing, and weary, Alfred stumbled on across the Downs, and stopped at a quiet inn. The old man was still on his track. Alfred called for brandy, and tried to eat; but the food almost choked him, and he put it aside, sick at heart, and drank more brandy. "Can you give me a sheet of paper and an envelope?" he asked of the girl who served him. She gave him what he asked for, and pen and ink as well, and he sat down in the parlor, looking at the blank paper and trying to think. A voice at the bar roused him. It was Mr. Musgrave's voice asking for refreshments. For a moment Alfred thought of going boldly to the old man, and appealing to him, for Lizzie's sake; but he dismissed the thought immediately. "It will be betraying myself," he muttered; "but I must let Lizzie know. How can I get a letter to her?" He went to the rear of the inn, and asked a hostler if he knew any one who was going to London that afternoon. Yes, the hostler said, a man from the yard was going to London by the next train, which would start in a quarter of an hour. The hostler pointed out the man to Alfred. Returning to the parlor, Alfred wrote:

"I have been miserably unfortunate to-day, and I dare not come home. I don't know where to turn for safety. At this very moment I am being watched by an enemy; you know him well, but I will not pain you by naming him. I have done you injury enough already, and I can never, never atone for it. All hope has left me, and I wish my miserable life were ended. I can only ask you to think kindly of me and to forgive me. If I did not love you, I should not be as unhappy as I am. I am afraid to think of the future.—I send this by a stranger. I want you to get it to-night, and the post would not arrive in time. No one must know that you have heard from me. God knows what will happen to me. I have brought shame and disgrace upon all.—A."

Alfred inclosed and addressed the letter, and seeing the man going to the railway station, ran after him, and bargained with him to deliver the letter for four shillings, which was all the money he possessed.

"Don't deceive me," said Alfred, imploringly.

"Do you take me for a thief?" was the surly answer. "The young woman shall have the letter all right. You look as if you've been backing the wrong horse, young fellow."

Alfred did not reply, and when the man was out of sight, walked to a quiet spot, and threw himself on the ground, waiting for night to hide himself and his despair from the sight of man.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE CLOUDS BRIGHTEN FOR LILY.

ALL unconscious of the terrible crisis that was occurring, Lily went about the house that day as blithe as a bird. Her life seemed to be brightening, and the shadows that had hung over it appeared to be clearing away. She ran up and down the stairs, and in and out of the rooms, singing her old songs. She was in the happiest of moods, and her grandfather listened with a grateful heart to her fresh voice. He expressed his delight to Mrs. Podmore, who came down stairs with Pollypod, dressed for walking. Mrs. Podmore had a basket on her arm.

"Lily is like her old self again, Mrs. Podmore," he said.

"Bless her heart!" exclaimed Mrs. Podmore. "It does one good to hear her. It's an ill wind that blows nobody good, and the fire has done Lily the good turn of sending her here, where the air is fresher for her. Polly likes it too, don't you?"

"Oh yes, mother," answered the child.

"So we've got to be thankful even for misfortune," said Mrs. Podmore, with a half sigh. "It was a hard blow for Jim, though, was that fire. It 'll take us a long time to get over it."

"How much worse it would have been," said old Wheels, "if some of us had been hurt and burned, instead of our clothes and sticks of furniture!"

"Ah, yes, indeed, Mr. Wheels. It's downright wicked to grumble, after all. But I never shall forget it, never! I shall remember Jim carrying Polly and me down the rope to my dying day. Jim's never been himself since then, Mr. Wheels. I wish he was any thing but what he is, and that he could get a living in a reasonable way, where he wouldn't be worked to death as he's being worked now. It ain't fair to flesh and blood, and flesh and blood can't stand it. Dear, dear! here I am grumbling again! I don't know what's come over me! We're going to town, Polly and me, to get one or two little things. We sha'n't be home till night. Can I do any thing in town for you, Mr. Wheels?"

"No, thank you."

A silence ensued, caused by Lily commencing a verse of a favorite song, which they paused to hear.

"She sings like a bird," said Mrs. Podmore; and added, with a meaning smile, "but there's something else besides fresh air to account for her light-heartedness. Here's Mr. Felix himself to bear me out in what I say."

"And what is that, Mrs. Podmore?" asked Felix, who entered as she spoke, and heard her last words.

"Ah, that's a little secret between me and Mr. Wheels," replied Mrs. Podmore, with another smile of much meaning, intended especially for the old man; "but I've got Jim's dinner in the basket, and I must go and give it to him."

"There's another thing to be thankful for, Mrs. Podmore," said old Wheels. "Your husband hasn't so far to go home when his work's done as he had when we lived in Soho. You see how lucky the fire was, after all, to bring you here to live, so near to the station where your husband works."

"Well, we know who we've got to thank for it," replied Mrs. Podmore, with an affectionate look at Felix; "don't we, Polly?"

And with other grateful words the mother and child left the house.

"You have come early to-day, Felix," said old Wheels; "has any particular business brought you?"

Felix, looking both happy and anxious, answered:

"Yes, Sir, one or two very particular things. First, a stroke of good fortune. Through the influence of my friend Charles, of whom I have spoken to you, I am appointed London correspondent to a leading colonial newspaper. By his advice I sent an initial letter—in my best style, of course, a regular trap for them," added Felix, with a light laugh—"and the result is that I have obtained the appointment. It adds a hundred pounds a year to my income, and the labor really is very light."

"That is good news indeed," said old Wheels, rubbing his hands; "I congratulate you heartily on it."

"I am becoming quite an important person," said Felix, with comic seriousness, "from a worldly point of view. But there are other matters I wish to tell you of. I have spoken to you of my father's housekeeper—"

"Martha Day?" interposed old Wheels.

"Yes."

"She has left my father's service suddenly. I do not think I have told you that Lizzie, Alfred's sweetheart, is Martha Day's niece."

"No; this is the first time I have heard it."

"It was a matter of no great importance for you to know; but now that Martha has left my father's house, and may be more nearly connected with me, it is right that you should be acquainted with every thing that concerns me. Martha is with Lizzie at the present moment at Mr. Musgrave's house. And, interrupting myself here, it seems strange to me that you and Mr. Musgrave should never have met."

"It is strange," said old Wheels, after a little pondering; "and now that you speak of it, it comes to my mind that, on every occasion when we were expected in the natural course of things to meet, sudden business has called Mr. Musgrave away. You are not acquainted with any reasons why he should avoid me?"

"No; I know of none."

"He is eccentric, perhaps; disinclined to make new acquaintances. Some men are so."

"He is exceedingly fond of Lily," observed Felix.

"That makes it all the more strange," said old Wheels, with a thoughtful air; "and yet I should not say that. The child would win her way to any heart. It speaks well for him; I am very glad to hear it. Exceedingly fond of Lily, you say!" He repeated these words, as if he wished to make some obscure thing clear to his understanding.

"I think he shows more tenderness toward her than toward his adopted daughter. It seems to me as if he feels that he can not be considerate enough of her. That is Lily singing, is it not?"

"Yes, the dear child! She is more cheerful than she has been for a long time past."

Felix listened, with a pleased expression on his face, and the old man watched his attitude and manner with a curious mingling of hope and anxiety. Presently Felix resumed:

"I am doing nothing but flying off at tangents, and I have so much so say. About Mr. Musgrave: he and I have had confidential business together lately—business, I hope, which will turn out well."

"Profitable?"

"Well, not in the common sense of the word—that is, it will not put money in my pocket; but it will do something better, perhaps. You will hear of it, I dare say, some day. Now about Martha Day. Hers is a strange story. She has lived all her womanly life with my father as his housekeeper, and has out of her savings brought

Hosted by Google

Lizzie up, given her a tolerable education, and supplied her with money. My father, it appears, knew nothing of this; he supposed that Martha had no family ties. Lately, however, he has discovered her connection with Lizzie, and has discovered something else also. Lizzie, it appears, is not Martha's niece; she is her daughter. The story that Martha tells of an early marriage, and of being deserted by her husband, who enlisted and died in India, my father refuses to believe. He insisted that Martha should promise not to see Lizzie any more, and Martha indignantly left his service. She has been with him for a great many years, and she says that it suited her, that she was fit for nothing else, and that it supplied her with means to pay for Lizzie's early training. What memories, what fears, or what fanciful idea that Lizzie's future would be happier if she were brought up in the belief that Martha was her aunt instead of her mother, neither you nor I can guess. The web of the simplest life seems to me to be made up of tangled skeins, and one of the highest duties of life consists in kindly judgment of each other. Martha's life has been one of sacrifice, and what joy and comfort she has experienced in it have come from this girl, for whom I have a great esteem."

"I too, Felix; Lizzie is a good girl."

"It sounds strange that so simple a circumstance should induce my father to part with a woman who must have been wonderfully useful to him; but I think I am to blame for the severance of that connection."

"In what way?"

"My father knows of my movements, so Martha tells me; knows of my friendship for you and your grandchildren, and knows of the tie which binds Alfred to Lizzie. It is in some way to punish me that he has provoked this breach; but, indeed, it is no punishment to me, for I believe and hope that it will turn out for the good of all of us."

"Is there no hope of a reconciliation with your father, Felix?"

"None, Sir," replied Felix, firmly; "our natures are too wide apart. We shall never meet again: both he and I are too steadfast to our beliefs, and these are as the north and the south poles. It is wonderful by what roads men arrive at totally different estimates of things, and of the best things of life. My father will judge me harshly, perhaps, all the days of his life; but he is my father, and it will best become me to be silent as to his judgments and motives. I am but a young man, but it seems to me that my life is clear before me. I do not aspire to riches. I have one great hope, and if that is fulfilled, I shall be content to work with others of the world's workers, satisfied with moderate competence, proud if the track in which I work will enable me to leave a mark for good behind me. I have flown off at a tangent again, and must come back to Martha. Looking upon myself as the cause of her misfortunes, I purpose to set up some sort of a home, in which she can live in the same capacity as she has done in my father's house."

"What does she say to your plan, Felix?"

"She is delighted with it; but she will say nothing decisive until after she has talked to Lizzie about it, and till after the result of my visit here to-day is ascertained. Acting upon my advice, Martha is telling Lizzie the secret which she has kept all her life, and Lizzie probably knows by this time that she has a mother. Now, Sir, I come to my one great hope. My position seems to justify me in doing so, and I have waited until now, when not only that seems to be in some way assured, but when another matter which has caused you and Lily much anxiety—I refer to Alfred's connection with Mr. Sheldrake—looks less hopeless than it has done for some time past. If you guess what it is I am about to say, will you give me permission to speak more plainly?"

"Speak, my dear lad," said old Wheels, trembling with eagerness.

"It is about Lily—"

But the old man rose suddenly, and in a tone of deep agitation said,

"One moment, Felix."

It was joy at the prospect of his darling's happiness that compelled him to rise. He stood with averted head, silent for many moments; then turned, and said, with the tears running down his face,

"Go on, Felix; go on, my dear boy."

"I love Lily, Sir, and I ask your permission to tell her, and to ask her to be my wife."

Old Wheels grasped Felix's hand.

"God bless you, my dear lad!" he almost sobbed. "These are tears of joy that you see. How I have prayed for this! But I feared that some scruple of just feeling—some motive of honor and tenderness, for which I should not have esteemed you less, Felix; no, not one whit—I feared that something of this sort might have prevented you from speaking. The sad day that we met is the happiest of my life. God bless you, Felix! Go to my darling; go to her, and then come down to me together, that I may see my dearest desire accomplished."

Lily, very busy setting things to rights in the house, and very happy in her work, did not know that Felix had come until he stood close to her. She gave a little cry of surprise and pleasure, and then, seeing something in his face that she had never seen before, stood for an instant pale and trembling. But her heart was animated by the dawn of a tender hope. His nature was too earnest to dally at such a time. He held out his hand, and retaining hers, said,

"I have come straight from grandfather, Lily."

And then paused, as earnest lovers do who are about to play their great stake. She stood silent, her hand in his, waiting for him to speak.

"I have been telling him of some good fortune that has befallen me. I have obtained another London correspondenceship for a colonial paper, and I am growing rich. My income is quite three hundred pounds, and there is a fair prospect before me. I have schemes in my head. One of these fine days I may put the finishing lines to a book, and by good luck I may find a publisher who will publish it; or to a play, and by good luck I may find a manager who will produce it. Whichever it is may be successful, and another hundred pounds may come in my purse. If I do not do either, or if I am unsuccessful in the doing, my position is good enough, and I shall be happy and satisfied, even if it does not improve very much. But I want a home—a helpmate. And there is but one woman in the world who can be to me what my heart yearns for. Lily!" He had released her hand, and she stood before him with drooping head; the sun was shining behind the bright clouds. "Will you be my wife?"

Whether he took her into his arms or whether she crept into them neither knew; but she was there, with her head on his breast, and with such joy in her heart as seemed to make life too happy. A long silence followed, a silence that was like a prayer; their feelings were too deep for words, and when, after a long, long dream, they spoke, their voices were tremulous.

"Are you glad, Lily?"

She nestled closer to him.

"Lily, my dear, I devote my life to your happiness."

"And I to yours, Felix." She spoke the words softly and solemnly.

"So I have two objects in my life, and these will be sufficient—my wife and my work."

He repeated the words "My wife!" tenderly. She raised her bright face to his.

"And I have but one."

"That is—"

"Felix."

His pulses were charged with grateful music as he stooped and kissed her.

"Love and Labor would not be a bad motto, Lily, or a bad title for my book or play. Let us go down to grandfather."

"You perceive, Sir," said Felix to old Wheels a quarter of an hour afterward, "what my scheming has come to. The first time I saw Lily I thought to myself, There is my wife, and I schemed for the result. I have acted my part very well, I think. Now will you still dispute my proposition that every action in our lives is dictated by selfishness?"

Felix and Lily were sitting hand in hand.

"I am too happy, Felix," replied old Wheels, "to dispute any thing with you; you must have your own way. I have no doubt that Lily has made up her mind—as I have made up mine—that you are as heartless and selfish as it is possible for man to be."

But a little while after that Lily and Felix were speaking together more seriously. In the suddenness of her happiness, Lily had lost sight for a time of Alfred's troubles. Now they recurred to her, and brought with them the image of Mr. Sheldrake and the memory of his threats. Felix saw the change that came over her, and guessed the cause.

"You are thinking of Alfred," he said. "To-night, when he comes home, we will take him into our confidence, and coax him to confide freely in us. I know your love for him, Lily, and you know, my dear, that nothing that is in my power shall be left undone to release him from his anxieties."

Then, without being asked, Lily told Felix all that had passed between her and Mr. Sheldrake: she told him first of Mr. Sheldrake's confession of love for her, and how it terrified her; and then, going back, she told him of their meeting in Bushey Park, and of her seeing Lizzie for the first time on that day; of the story of Mr. Sheldrake's goodness that Alfred had related to her (Felix smiled gravely at this); of the persistent manner in which Mr. Sheldrake had impressed upon her that it was for her sake, and for her sake only, he was her brother's friend; of Mr. Sheldrake forcing a partnership upon her on that day, suggesting that they should enter into a compact to work together for Alfred's good; and of his saying that when Alfred was safely through his troubles, he would have no one but Lily to thank for his release.

"But since that day," continued Lily, "Alfred has been getting into deeper and deeper trouble, until a time came—only a little while ago, Felix—when I was afraid to think of what might occur to him—and to me," she added, in a dreamy tone. A moment after she had uttered the words a shudder came over her. Felix took her in his arms, and she clung to him for protection.

"I feel happy and safe with you, Felix."

"I understand your feelings toward Alfred, my dear," said Felix, encouragingly; "but I must have my treasure grow strong, and I must strive to wean her from her dreamy fancies. I shall watch my sensitive flower very jealously, and she must trust to my judgment wholly. You have doubts! Why, I have had them! and for a long time have been afraid to speak. So you see, little weakling, that I, strong as I am, have shared some of your anxieties with you. I saw you on the day you went to Hampton Court with Alfred."

"You, Felix!"

"Yes, my dear; I was there, watching over you even then, although I had not the right to do so that I have now."

"And you would not come to me and speak to me, Felix!"

"Dearest! I saw that you were happy, and I felt that I might have been the cause of disturbance, of which Mr. Sheldrake probably would have been glad to avail himself. So I kept myself in the background."

"And suffered," she said, wistfully and tenderly; "for you loved me then, Felix; I know it."

"Yes, darling, I loved you then. But love often shows itself in self-sacrifice."

She paused for a little while before she spoke again. "You said once, Felix, that there is a higher attribute than love—duty!"

"How do you know I said that, Lily?"

"Grandfather told me. Do you believe that duty is a higher quality than love? That supposing these two stand before us, duty on one side, love on the other, duty should be followed and love put aside?"

"Can you not take your answer, Lily, from what I hinted to you on the night you came from the theatre? Duty should be followed first: much that is bitter in life it makes sweet. But when love and duty clash, we should examine ourselves strictly, sternly perhaps, out of justice for others—"

"As you did, Felix," she interrupted, in loving tones, "when you restrained yourself from telling me your feelings until to-day. Ah, I know! Love has made me wise. We will not talk of this any more now: we shall have plenty of time by-and-by. How I have thought over every word you said to me that night, Felix!"

"Every word, Lily!"

"Yes, every word; you made me very happy."

"Darling! But you could not repeat to me what I said."

"One part I could."

"I am listening."

"You said, It is the dearest privilege of affection to share the troubles of those we love. If I were married (you said), the first consoling thought that would arise to my mind, should misfortune overtake me, would be, 'Thank God, I have one at home who will sympathize with me, and by her sympathy console me!'" She paused a while, and said, "This privilege is mine now, and love and duty can go together."

In this way she poured out her full heart to him. His duties called him away in the afternoon, and he left her, saying he would run down in the night, at about ten o'clock, for an hour.

"We will wait supper for you, Felix," said old Wheels.

Felix went his way to town, the happiest of the happy.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE GREAT PANJINE.

THE man of common-sense had nothing in the world but his common-sense.

Common-sense is a desirable property; but in the raw it is not edible, and our man was hungry.

Hunger is the hint by which nature drives men to work. Therefore the man of common-sense went to work. But when he had earned a little money he fancied that his talents were lying idle, and concluded to travel; and in the course of events he came to the palace of the great Panjine, and found every body in trouble.

For when the Panjine's only daughter was born he summoned all the wise men of his court and commanded them to study out and make a full report to him of all the accidents, diseases, and dangers common to children. What is the use, you see, of being the great Panjine, if one's daughter is to be treated like any other child?

On a certain day the wise men presented their reports. Number One had the true and melancholy account of all the children who had tumbled out of windows.

The great Panjine immediately ordered that there should be a man in waiting at every window in the palace, whose sole business should be to take care that the little Panjine did not fall out.

Number Two related how numbers had been seriously injured by falling over in chairs.

The great Panjine ordered that an attendant should always stand ready to hold fast the chairs in which the little Panjine should climb.

Number Three described dreadful accidents by fire.

The great Panjine sat horror-stricken, and for a moment thought seriously of abolishing fires altogether; but as that was manifestly impossible, he selected a corps of attendants whose sole business it should be to watch day and night, and save the little Panjine from catching fire or being scalded.

Number Four had ready a pleasing list of the diseases that result from imprudent eating.

The great Panjine sent for three doctors, who should examine and consult over every meal, and pronounce it perfectly healthy before the little Panjine could touch it.

Number Five showed a catalogue of children injured by falls from wagons and horses, or hurt in the gymnasium or at various childish plays.

"These," said the great Panjine, "were the result of carelessness. There shall be no carelessness with the little Panjine;" and he ordered a horse attendant, a boat attendant, a gymnasium attendant, and so on, one for every childish game, to watch the little Panjine every instant.

Number Six showed the miserable consequences of draughts.

The great Panjine at once abolished draughts throughout the kingdom.

Number Seven followed with a list of contagious diseases.

The great Panjine appointed a guard of three more learned doctors, who were never to lose sight of the little Panjine, and to keep at proper distance every body guilty of any thing contagious.

Number Eight read pitiful accounts of ill-used children.

The great Panjine ordained that the little Panjine should always be kept happy by three ladies of great wit and amiability, who should amuse, and three men of wonderful inventive genius, who should do nothing but invent new toys and games for her use.

Number Nine treated of education.

The great Panjine appointed six teachers.

Number Ten hinted at the dangers of overstudy.

The great Panjine ordered six monitors to keep the teachers in check, and make sure that the little Panjine's lessons should always be perfectly agreeable to her.

Surrounded by these precautions, with guards, attendants, doctors, teachers, inventors, on every side, whose sole object was to keep her safe, well, and happy, and make her wise, could the little Panjine be other than a world's wonder of happiness, health, grace, and virtue? And yet never was there a more unhappy princess. Continually fretting and dissatisfied, awkward, sickly, stupid, helpless—a torment to herself and those around her—she was forever wishing to die, while the great Panjine in despair offered vast rewards to any one who would cure the princess of her melancholy and ill health.

All this was poured into the ears of the man of common-sense, and every one he met had something new to tell about the endless vagaries and troubles of the little Panjine. The man of common-sense reflected. As the first result of his meditations, he hired a small dwelling close by the palace, and hung out a sign representing himself as a teacher of drawing by a new method. As the second, he procured a small spaniel, and after binding it in every conceivable way, so that it could by no possibility stir an inch, laid it near his threshold, where it could not fail to attract attention.

After a time students came to the man of common-sense, curious to learn his new method; but, alas! it was soon discovered that those who knew nothing had not advanced a step, and those who already knew something had lost what little knowledge and confidence they possessed. In a rage, they went to the Panjine to complain of the stranger who had cheated them out of their money, taking care to add that he also offended humanity by his cruelty in constantly keeping a small spaniel bound and moaning at his door, in spite of all remonstrances.

On hearing this the Panjine sent for the man of common-sense, and demanded the reasons for his singular behavior.

"Your Panjineship," replied the man of common-sense, "I did but follow that system of education with your subjects that you have pursued with the little Panjine, supposing that I could not go wrong in imitating such an illustrious example. Common children must learn the art of living, as common students do the art of drawing, by a series of experiments, discoveries, and inventions that keep every nerve and muscle and sense and thought in active exercise, and at the cost of many such failures as bumps, tumbles, tears, sulks, indigestions, disappointments, and the like. You avoid the possibility of these troubles and pains by having every operation performed for her, by gratifying every wish, by consecrating to her existence all the energy and the mental power of various other existences. Fired by your sublime example, I likewise devote my energy and experience, your Panjineship, to my pupils. I ask myself, What prevents perfect success in drawing? Why, the mistakes of the artist. I therefore explain to my pupils that they shall never make mistakes—that they shall be impossible, as I myself will hold the hand of each student, and direct every movement for him. My students declare that they learn nothing, and have lost all power over their hands, while the little Panjine, for whom you are constantly making happiness, is unhappy. There are critics who declare that true pleasure or true success must grow as a rose does; that as the seed must first die, so some ease and comfort and self-will must be sacrificed; that as the rose grows day by day by operations of its own within itself, so must a child's happiness and health; and that the little Panjine has not been permitted to be a rose, but has been forced to live like a sponge, through which filters all that affection and wit can invent, leaving no trace behind. I preferred to listen to your Panjineship's example rather than the fault-finding of these critics. For the dog, your Panjineship, I am still following your transcendent example. Lest the little Panjine should come to some harm, she is never allowed to ramble where she pleases—climb, run, frolic, play, as she likes. Her muscles, her senses, her inventive faculties, her thinking powers, all are tied up fast, and made of no use by the nurses, teachers, guards, doctors, attendants, that follow her every where like her shadow, and interfere constantly to do the work her own faculties were intended to perform. This unnatural cramp of all her powers makes her fretful, restless, and miserable, as his bonds do my dog. But what would you have? I love my dog; and just as the little Panjine might bruise or burn herself, or fall down, or be disappointed, or cry, so my dog might get into a fight with a larger dog, or be scratched by a cat, or lost, or drowned, or poisoned, or taught bad tricks, or infected with the mange, if I let him loose. And I think there is no one who will say that the reasoning and the treatment that are good enough for a great princess are not good enough for a dog."

Here the man of common-sense paused and looked about him. The great Panjine smiled in spite of himself.

"Papa," said the little Panjine, "send all the others away, and keep this man."

But all the courtiers whispered under their breath, "Oh, of course! as if any of us couldn't have told him that! But then a stranger must always come from some foreign country to teach us how to read the alphabet."

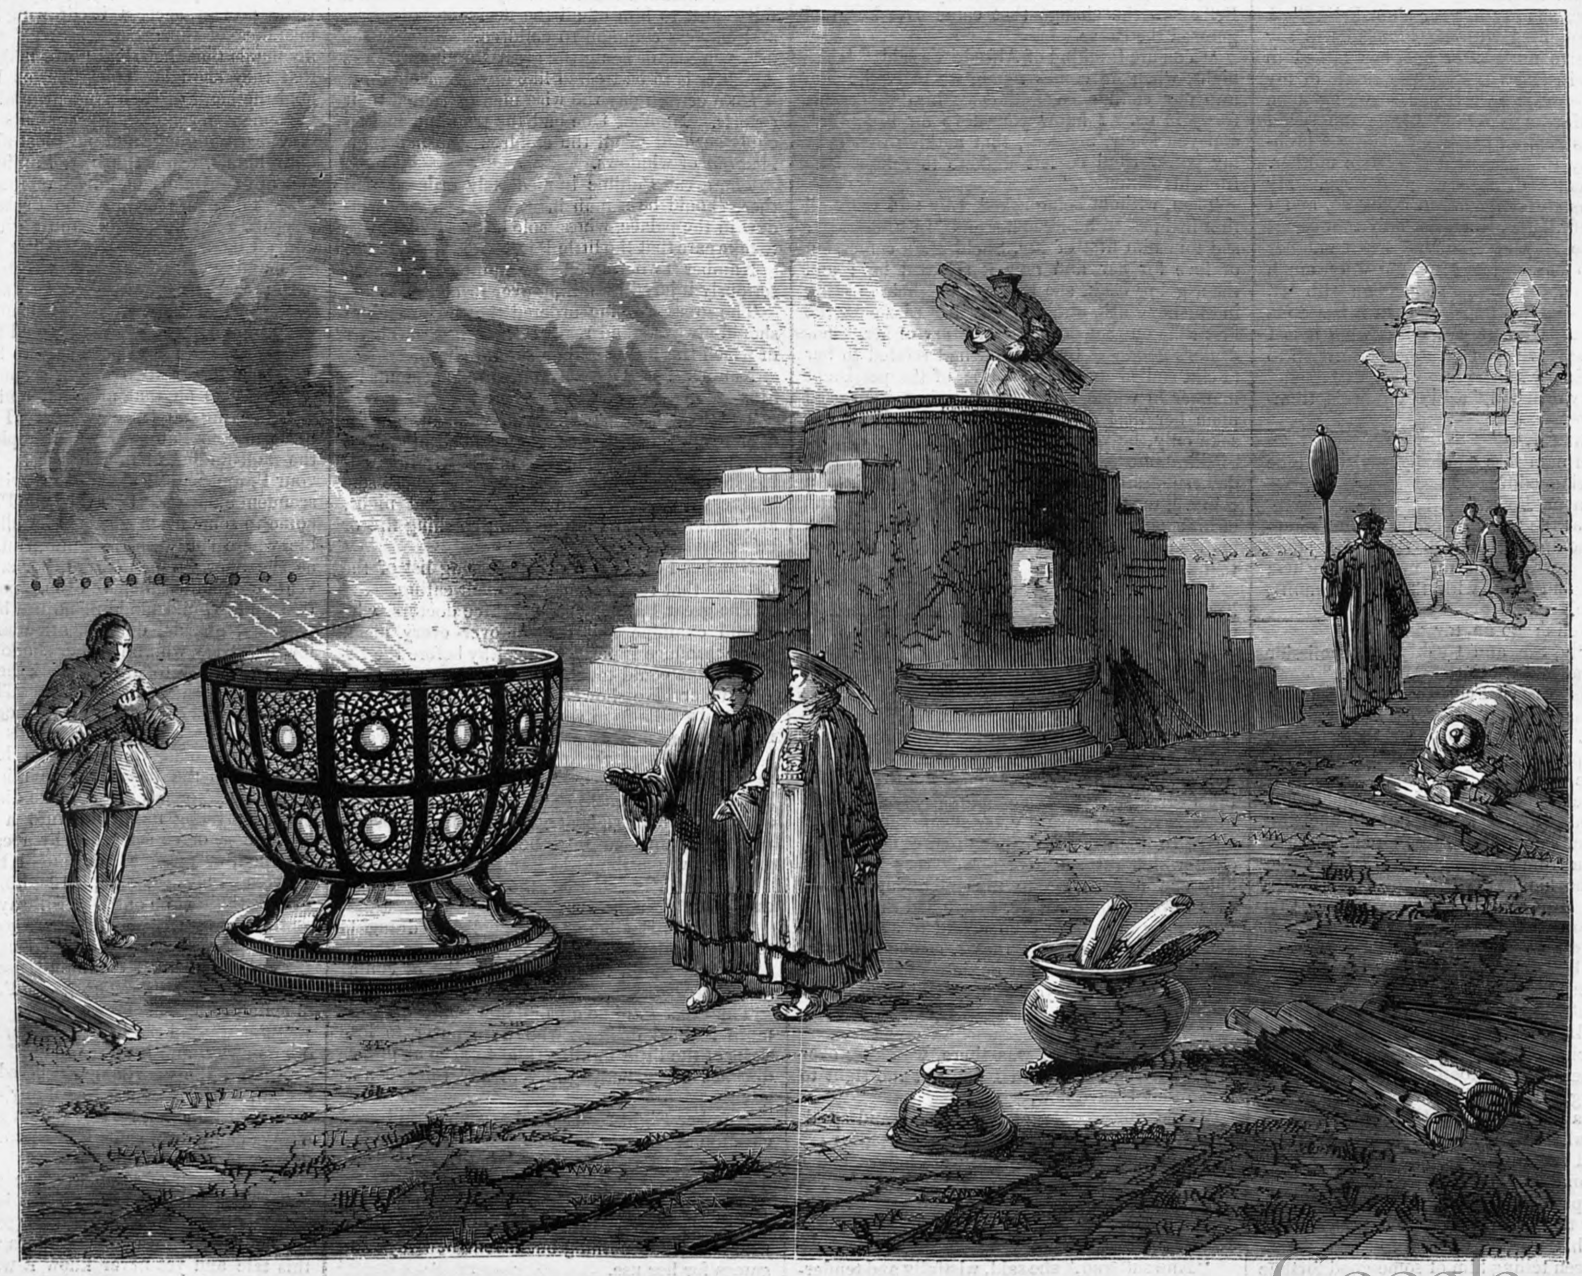
But the man of common-sense only smiled—and I wish I had his gift; for it is one thing to find out a matter, quite another to make others see it. There are many Panjines who will read this tale and yet never know it was written for them.

Hosted by Google

OLD MILL AT TY CROSS, NORTH WALES.

OLD MILL AT TY CROSS, NORTH WALES.

THIS pretty little picture is one of three exhibited by Mr. J. Orrock in last year's Royal Academy Exhibition, at London. Leaving our readers to criticise the picture, let us say a word about windmills. Mr. Orrock's, be it observed, is an old mill, for nobody ever sees a new windmill nowadays. The simple fact is that Æolus is too independent a servant to suit modern task-masters. When he goes to sleep no corn can be ground. The modern miller (he is generally neither jovial nor flour-bedusted in this degenerate age, but an anxious gentleman in conventional clothing)—the modern miller prefers an obedient slave like steam, which is always ready to do his bidding. But what an artistic loss it will be when all the ramshackle old windmills are cleared away! The white revolving sails formed such a pleasing feature in the rural landscape, and then they always set us a-thinking of Don Quixote and his immortal tilt. As soon as the British windmills are abolished the artist will have to emigrate to Holland, and take up his abode in some such town as Dordrecht, where windmills are as plentiful as tall chimneys are at Wigan or Preston.



ALTAR FOR BURNING THE SACRIFICIAL BULLOCK, TEMPLE OF HEAVEN, PEKIN.—[SEE PAGE 205.]

Hosted by Google

EVENING DRESS.

THIS elegant evening dress is of white satin, trimmed with scarlet poppies and cardinalis, with green leaves, and scarlet ribbon of the same shade. The trained skirt is bordered with a deep lace flounce, surmounted by a piping of scarlet ribbon set on in points. Two lace flounces with similar headings form the tablier, which is edged on each side with bows of scarlet ribbon. The low corsage has a white lace bertha, surmounted by the flower garniture. The hair is encircled with a bandeau of red coral, above which is set a scarlet poppy with golden heart, a golden poppy, and green leaves. Red coral necklace, ear-rings, brooch, and bracelets.

EVENING DRESS.

THE TEMPLE OF HEAVEN, PEKIN.

THE magnificent double-page engraving on pages 200 and 201 gives a graphic view of the great Temple of Heaven, at Pekin. It was here that the young Emperor of China performed the great sacrificial rite of the winter solstice on December 21, upon the occasion of his attaining the full age of manhood. The illustration on page 204 shows the altar where the sacrificial bullocks are offered up. A gentleman thus describes his visit to this marvelous edifice:

"Yesterday we went to see the Temple of Heaven. We went quickly through the large grounds of the British legation, through the Mongol Market, where were dromedaries by the dozen standing motionless, kneeling on the dusty ground, or led about by the wooden peg through their noses by fellows dressed in sheep-skin coats and hats, or in picturesque furs. We went a long way past what seemed miles of enormous walls, gates, and pagodas; then walked along a wall, so as to approach the gate of the temple unperceived, and then burst through. They saw that they were too late to stop us, so the gate-keepers and all laughed. One keeper we took as a guide, and gave him a little money afterward. The quantity of stone used for these buildings is enormous. There are many fine flights of steps, marble terraces and balustrades, fine old yew-trees, and oak groves, with bronze tripods, and ovens to burn sacrificial silk in. One stone platform is curiously meted out mathematically.—There is one large round stone in the centre, for his Imperial Majesty to stand upon when the bullocks and sheep are sacrificed on the great day; there are nine other stones surrounding it, eighteen more outside these, and twenty-seven again placed round those, forming radii of nine stones in length from the centre. In another part, from a lofty terrace commanding a grand view of the stately pagodas and the woods, rises the enormous triple pile of the gilded "Heaven's Palace," a part of the temple. Its shape is like three of our common low-crowned soft felt hats raised one a little above the other. It is all over gilt, and painted in brilliant colors; the gables are carved with quaint little stone dogs and rhinoceros heads. Inside the building the state of filth is impossible to describe. A large colony of bats flitted about under the roof. The pillars and beams are one mass of gilding, beautiful carving, and brilliant colors. It must be magnificent when cleaned and filled with admiring heathens in their gayest silk dresses. On the pillars are carved dragons, snakes, and other figures."

The whole "Temple of Heaven" includes both the North Altar and the South Altar, which is a quarter of a mile distant, and at which the great ceremony of offering the sacrificial bullock is performed. The circular pile at the North Altar is called Ti'en-Kung, or "Heaven's Palace," and is certainly a beautiful specimen of Chinese architecture.

There are said to be three different religions in China—the Tauist, the Confucian, and the Buddhist. But the worship which is performed at these temples at Pekin is entirely different from any of those forms of faith. The three forms of religion just mentioned are not ignored by the state, but this which is practiced at Pekin is the real state religion. At the same time, no other religion bears any resemblance to this, which is confined to the capital, and the Emperor is the only priest. It is an imperial worship, with a deified monarch at its head.

At the Temple of Heaven the Emperor worships Shang-Ti: this is the name under which the Supreme Lord of Heaven is acknowledged by the Chinese. He then worships at the tablets of his ancestors, the former Emperors of the present dynasty. There are now eight of them, and their altars are placed on each side and in front of the altar to the Lord of Heaven. Shang-Ti is the name, out of many, which the missionaries have adopted to render the word God. This is on account of its being the highest name for the Supreme Being in the Chinese language: and it will be seen from the above that the High Lord of Heaven only ranks above a dead Emperor. This is not done out of any disrespect or irreverence; it is done to give a sacred importance to the monarch. We have other instances in the history of the world of similar pretensions, but this is a good illustration of the theory, and in full working order at the present day. The assumption is that the Emperor of China and the Deity manage the affairs of the universe. A working partnership exists between the two. The firm might be called "Shang-Ti and Hwang-Ti, supreme rulers." The second of these names is the title used now by the Emperor, and the "Ti" forms the assumption on his part. Shang-Ti rules the regions above, and Hwang-Ti rules this world below. China, the "Celestial," or "Middle Kingdom," as it is called by the Chinese themselves, forms the principal portion of this nether world. There are some other nations besides, such as the Coreans, the Cochin-Chinese, the Formosians, and the various tribes represented by the princes of Mongolia. All these are known as "Tribute-Bearers" to Hwang-Ti, the tribute being payment for such ruling as is done for them.

With the exception of putting dead Emperors into the company of the Deity and the living Emperor into such active partnership with him, there would be nothing to object to about the Temple of Heaven. There are no images any where to suggest the slightest ideas of idolatry. So free is it from statues or pictures that a Mohammedan or a Presbyterian might use it as a place of worship. At the South Altar only the great yearly solstitial ceremony takes place, which is penitential and sacrificial in its character. The Emperor comes to the place the night before; he is drawn in a carriage by elephants, which are kept for this ceremony, and spends the night in the "Hall of Penitential Fasting," the name indicating the character of this part of the ceremony. Before dawn next morning he passes over to the great South Altar, where a bullock is sacrificed—the Emperor used, in former days, to kill the animal himself. This is burned whole in a furnace, and pieces of silk, as offerings, are also burned in smaller furnaces at the same place. Eating and drinking figure largely in all Chinese ceremonies, and they are not wanting at this. The Emperor has to eat the "Flesh of Happiness" in one part of the performance.

As this great solstitial ceremony takes place at the South Altar, it is the most important of all Chinese religious structures. To the eye of a European there is nothing about it to suggest its ecclesiastical character. It is more like one of the fanciful creations of gardener-artists, reminding you of the gardens at Versailles or the Crystal Palace. The circular space on the top looks as if intended for a band to play on, and has a pavement and balustrade of white marble. It stands on two other platforms, all formed of the same material, forming three terraces, each terrace being ascended by a flight of nine steps, or twenty-seven in all from the ground to the top of the altar. There are four ascents, one from each of the cardinal points. The whole is surrounded by a low wall, with open marble gateways on each side, facing the four ascents. This wall is square in plan, and in the southeast corner is the furnace or altar for burning the bullock, with eight other altars, smaller and of iron, where offerings to the eight deceased ancestors are also burned, the bullock being offered to Shang-Ti alone. The defunct Emperors being thus treated as retired members or as sleeping partners in the firm, they seem as if they had still an interest in the business, and get a share of the profits.

It is just at dawn when these furnaces are blazing, and the Emperor is on the upper circle offering incense and prayer to the tablets of Shang-Ti and his ancestors; music is heard, and dancing, a very ancient form of worship, is going on in some part of the place. All the nobility of the court are on the terrace steps behind the Emperor-Priest. The gray light of the morning may be so far advanced as to make it all visible, but the principal light on this scene will be the light of sacrifice. The name of the altar where the bullock is burned is from a word meaning "light-giving." With such a scene before one, we think that whatever might seem absurd or nonsensical in the ideas connected with the ceremony would be forgotten at the moment. Emperors, both dead and living, might be overlooked, and the Lord of Heaven alone would, under such circumstances, command all our feelings of respect and reverence.

The North Altar is more imposing to a visitor, from its having a permanent building on the top platform. The circular triple terrace of white marble is the same here as at the South Altar with the difference of eight ascents instead of four as in the other. In the centre on the top are three marble steps, and on this a circular wooden temple stands. The Emperor comes to this altar in the spring to sacrifice and pray for a good harvest.

Most of the imperial temples of Pekin have been constructed with reference to the relations of numbers, and this is particularly marked in the Temple of Heaven. The number nine figures very largely in it. The ascent to each terrace has nine steps, the whole ascent being $3\times9=27$. The pavement on the circular top is formed by nine circles of marble slabs. The central circle has nine slabs, the second is formed of eighteen, the third of twenty-seven, and so on, each circle being a multiple of nine, till at the outer circle it is $9\times9=81$, being a favorite number in Chinese philosophy.

There are a number of great imperial temples in Pekin—the Temple of Heaven, the Temple of the Earth, the Temple of Agriculture, and the Altars of the Sun and Moon. The principal ceremony at the Temple of the Earth takes place at the summer solstice. The ceremony at the Temple of Agriculture is in the spring, when the Emperor plows a piece of ground and sows in it the seeds of one or two kinds of grain. He does this as an example of husbandry and industry to all his subjects, and a very good and worthy example it is from a monarch to his people. The Chinese are certainly good agriculturists. We have heard them much praised in this respect; but whether their high efficiency is the result of following the model set by their Emperor or not we can not pretend to say. The Empress and ladies of her court have a yearly ceremony of feeding silk-worms. This is also done as an example of industry to the women of China, as that is supposed to be their special occupation. The Altar to the Earth is on the north side of the city. It contains shrines to the Spirits of Mountains and Seas. There are tablets placed in these shrines to five mountains in China, and to others in Manchooria and Tartary, also tablets to four seas and four lakes. The Altar to the Sun is on the east side of Pekin. The ceremony here is at the vernal equinox. The altar is surrounded, like the others, by a grove of trees. No companions are placed on the altar to share in the sacrifices with the sun. The ceremony at the Altar of the Moon takes place at the autumnal equinox. In conjunction with the moon there are the tablets of the seven stars of the Great Bear, the five planets—the later discoveries in the planetary sphere have not yet reached Pekin—the twenty-eight constellations, and other deifications in the stellar region.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. G. W. H.—Trim your black alpaca suit with bias bands of the same and side pleatings.

F. H. L.—A sage green, olive, or blue-gray poplin or cashmere, made with a redingote and kilt-pleated skirt, would be stylish and not very expensive for the present season.

ARGYLE.—A black silk suit is not too old for a girl of nineteen, and would be very appropriate for the intermediate season. Read answer above to "F. H. L."

VIRGINIA.—The Bazar Book of Decorum is a good authority on matters of etiquette.

MARY C.—Your sample is merino; cashmere is twilled on one side only. Make a skirt of the farmer's satin, trim it with cashmere pleatings, and then have a cashmere polonaise trimmed with yak lace.

INQUIRER.—For hints about your spring suit—for which we advise beaver mohair—consult New York Fashions of Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI. It is soon to make a white dress. Fine thin French nansook would suit your complexion, also the bishop's lawn, which is less expensive. Get pleated organdy, footing, and lace frills for your neck and wrists. China crape ties look well with a row of Malines or Valenciennes lace on the pointed ends headed by some transferred needle-work. Get China crape and twilled silk neck-ties already cut bias and hemmed. White, salmon, rose, and French blue are your shades. Linen batiste will wash.

M. W. S. W.—Only a few unsalable colors can now be had in Irish poplin at the prices quoted for the Christmas holidays. Two dollars is now the price of stylish colors. It is the usual width of silk. Fifteen yards will not make a basque, over-skirt, and lower skirt.

INITIALS.—Your brocade should be made up in a polonaise with ruffled skirt. If jauntily made, it will be very pretty for a young girl.

OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Your beautiful chêné silk will be very stylish if made short and worn with a brown silk sleeveless jacket, brown sash, and two skirts trimmed with folds and piping, or else alternate kilt pleats of brown and the dress silk. Consult New York Fashions of Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI. A little borax in tepid water will give black lace sufficient dressing, and restore its blackness.

D. W. A.—Read reply just given to "Old Subscriber."

M. L. B.—An entire dress of white alpaca would look best for your graduating dress, and would also answer for the reception. Invite your relatives who send you to school to attend the party.

LILLIAN.—Girls of fourteen should wear their hair in two long plaited tresses, as this promotes its growth and happens to be the fashion. Wear the Renaissance costume illustrated in Bazar No. 10, Vol. V.

F. L. M.—Your letter is one of several we have received on the same subject from shoe-makers in Ohio. Shoes shaped like the model you sent are not worn here, and if they were, the Bazar would not commend such instruments of torture. Low broad heels are the style here; high tapering French heels are out of use.

J. J. A.—As we have said repeatedly, we can not give addresses in this column.

EMMA M. G.—For the costumes you want, read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI.

E. M. T.—The Highland suit is appropriate for your boy of two years. It is illustrated in Bazar No. 39, Vol. V., and the cut paper pattern will be mailed you at this office on receipt of twenty-five cents.

JENNIE DEE.—Use the Double-breasted Redingote pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V.

FANNIE.—Make your gray linen suit by a description in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI. Trim with bias bands of blue linen, and make a blue linen sleeveless jacket to wear with it.

CAMEOS

THE bitterest enemies of jewelry and gems have never been able to reason themselves into the belief that Cameos are not works of art, but only "gauds" and "trinkets." The fine Cameo tells its own story, and, in the words of Emerson, is "its own excuse for being." The ancients, with whom in all things the human predominated, esteemed the Cameo and the Intaglio more than any gem of the mine or the ocean, not only because it was absolutely a work of human genius and skill, but also because it was a representation of human interests, feelings, or passions, whether in the persons of mortal actors, or of the deities of Olympus. The antique Cameos, when they are not the portraits of great men or the idealized images of the gods, invariably represent scenes and emotions of human life. These were wrought out with a patient accuracy and power, of which the microscope alone can afford us any fair idea. How were they made without its help? The modern Cameos, of which Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, 22 John St. (up stairs), possess unquestionably the best collection to be seen in this city, have been wrought with this aid, and yet they are certainly not superior to the antiques in the delicacy and precision of their finish, or the variety and force of expression which distinguish them.—[Com.]

FIFTEEN TO TWENTY DOLLARS SAVED.—Any one wishing a first-class sewing-machine can save from fifteen to twenty dollars by the simple strategy of choosing a Wilson Improved Under-Feed Machine, one of the most perfect and capable machines ever invented. It has every valuable improvement that can be named, and, as all its friends know, works with equal facility in all classes of work and on all kinds of goods. It is sold for the people's own price, and its proprietors do not belong to any combination organized for the purpose of keeping sewing-machines up to fancy prices. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WE ARE NOW OPENING

A MOST ATTRACTIVE STOCK OF

Ladies' Costumes and Wrappings

FOR SPRING AND SUMMER WEAR,

CONSISTING ENTIRELY OF

IMPORTED GOODS.

The stock will be VERY EXTENSIVE, embracing a much larger variety than at any previous time, and will be made up from the

NEWEST & MOST FASHIONABLE MATERIALS.

Our arrangements are such as to exhibit

THE LATEST NOVELTIES

at all times during the season, and on terms THE MOST FAVORABLE.

An examination of our stock is solicited.

THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO.,
391 BROADWAY, N. Y.

HAIR!!!

L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,

Between 4TH and GREAT JONES STS.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

Import and manufacture their own Goods, and RETAIL THEM AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, charges prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

HEMSTITCHING ATTACHMENT.

Price $2 00. Sent C. O. D. Address, giving name of machine, JOHN H. WILLSON, 91 Liberty St., N. Y.

TO THE LADIES!

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.

No lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.

B. F. BROWN & Co., Boston.

MADAME FOY'S CORSET SKIRT SUPPORTER,

For Health, Comfort, and Style,

Is acknowledged THE BEST ARTICLE of the kind ever made. Numerous Testimonials in its favor are being received from all parts of the United States.

LADY AGENTS WANTED.

HARMON, BALDWIN, & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers,
New Haven, Conn.
ARNOLD & BANNING, New York;
D. B. FISK & Co., Chicago, Agents.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

SEND FOR

SPRING CATALOGUE

TO

EHRICH'S TEMPLE OF FASHION,

287 & 289 EIGHTH AVENUE, N. Y.

20 Sheets of Choice Music, $1 00.

Why throw away money on high-priced Music when you can select from our Catalogue of 700 pieces? Any 20 Half-Dime, or 10 of Dime Series mailed on receipt of One Dollar. Sold by all booksellers, and can be ordered through any newsdealer. Send stamp for Catalogue. Address

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
439 THIRD AVENUE, NEW YORK.

LADIES' TROUSSEAU "B"

FOR $200.

6 Muslin Chemises	@	$2 25	$13 50
6 Linen "	@	4 75	28 50
1 Bridal Set (3 pieces)			12 00
6 Pairs Muslin Drawers	@	2 00	12 00
6 " Linen "	@	2 75	16 50
3 Plain Cotton Skirts	@	2 25	6 75
3 Tucked " "	@	3 00	9 00
3 Muslin Night Dresses	@	4 50	13 50
3 Tucked Cambric Night Dresses	@	5 00	15 00
3 Embr'd " " "	@	9 00	27 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	5 00	10 00
2 Corset Covers	@	3 75	7 50
1 " "			6 75
2 Dressing Sacques	@	3 50	7 00
1 Delaine Robe de Chambre			15 00
			$200 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Trousseau "A," for $150, and "C," for $250, sent by mail if desired.

LORD & TAYLOR,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN

FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,

NEW YORK, { Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

SPRING AND SUMMER DRESS GOODS,
&c., &c., &c.

We are offering the finest stock in the city of

STRIPED, FIGURED, AND PLAIN BATISTE,
STRIPED AND FIGURED GAZE CHAMBRAIS,
PLAIN AND STRIPED ALGERINES, GRENADINES,
PARIS PRINTED ORGANDIES AND LAWNS,
INDIA AND FRENCH SERGES,
FANCY COLORED SILKS,
FANCY, PLAIN, AND SERGE FOULARDS,
PLAIN COLORED SILKS,
BLACK SILKS, ALL QUALITIES AND MAKES,
RICH LACES, EMBROIDERIES, AND HDKFS.,
PARASOLS, UMBRELLAS, &c., &c.

INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

Have opened an elegant stock of OPEN CENTRE AND FILLED SQUARE SHAWLS, in unsurpassed quality, design, and coloring, suitable FOR SPRING WEAR, forming the finest assortment ever before offered.

A large collection of STRIPED INDIA LONG SHAWLS, in all the VARIOUS QUALITIES, AND AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Also, a complete stock of
FRENCH CASHMERE AND WOOL SHAWLS of every description, now open.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS!

A. T. STEWART & CO.

HAVE OPENED

250 PIECES BLACK GROUND and GRISAILLE STRIPED SILKS, at $1 per yard, cheap at $1 50.

150 PIECES PLAIN BLACK SILK, a heavy, excellent article,
$1 50 per yard, cheap at $2 00.

300 pieces ditto, for $1 75 to $4 50 in price, equally attractive.

An immense stock of PLAIN COLORED SILKS, in 100 NEW TINTS, from $2 25 upward.

The newest and choicest NOVELTIES in
DRESS GOODS,
AT EXTREMELY POPULAR PRICES.

Their MOURNING DEPARTMENT is replete with every desirable fabric.

COURTAULD'S ENGLISH CREPES, largely reduced.
An elegant collection of WATTEAU SASH RIBBON.
DOUBLE-FACED NECK RIBBONS, entirely new, together with an immense stock of PLAIN and FANCY HOSIERY, SILK and MERINO UNDERWEAR, &c.

DRESSMAKING DEPARTMENT,
Under superior management, in which orders for MOURNING as well as BALL, RECEPTION, CARRIAGE, AND PROMENADE DRESSES
Are executed in
ONE TO THREE DAYS' NOTICE, without disappointment. Warranted in style and elegance equal, if not superior, to any foreign production.
CHARGES EXTREMELY MODERATE.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

GRENADINES, GRENADINES.

WARRANTED PURE SILK & WOOL.
200 PIECES 2 YARDS WIDE, $1 25, $1 35, $1 50, $1 75, $2. FINEST IMPORTED, $2 50.
THE ABOVE are OFFERED JUST HALF PRICE.

JACKSON'S,
Cor. BROADWAY AND WAVERLEY PLACE.

FOR 10 Cts., a specimen No. PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL sent, first post, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

1873. NOTICE. 1873.

OUR

CELEBRATED

BUFFALO

AND

OTTER

TRADE MARK PAT'D.

BRANDS

BLACK ALPACAS,

AND

BEAVER BRAND.

SILK FINISHED

Black Pure Mohairs

ARE HANDSOMER THAN EVER FOR SPRING WEAR.

These Beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Dry-Goods Retailers throughout the United States.

☞ Purchasers will know these goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece, bearing a picture of the Buffalo, Otter, or Beaver.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 and 429 Broadway,
305 Canal and 47 Howard Sts.,
New York.
SOLE IMPORTERS.

PATENT KID-FITTING

SKELETON CORSET.

Recommended by Leading Physicians.

Should be worn by all ladies who value health and comfort. They have been greatly improved, and the fit is perfect.

They are delightful
For Summer Wear.

To be found at all
First-Class Retail Stores.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N. Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free).

Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

Write for Large Illustrated Descriptive Price-List to

PITTSBURGH, PA.

Double, Single, Muzzle and Breech-Loading Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, Pistols, &c., of every kind, for men or boys, at very low prices. Guns, $3–$300; Pistols, $1–$25.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

12 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS mailed for 50 cts., by C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.

RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.

Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,

Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only $3 00
24 " " " " " 3 50
26 " " " " " 4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.

Established 1843. { CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.

Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.

Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

Pratt's Patent Ladies' Brace and Skirt Supporter.

For sale by A. T. Stewart & Co., Porter Brothers & Co., H. B. Claflin & Co., Louis Schiele & Co., New York; Field, Leiter, & Co., Chicago; by all first-class dealers, and at Office of the Company, Cleaveland, Ohio.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER ..... No. 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers) ..... " 6
PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt ..... " 8
SLEEVELESS SACQUE AND CAPE, with French Blouse, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt ..... " 13
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt ..... " 20
VEST BASQUE, with Over-skirt and Kilt-pleated Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old) ..... " 21
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER .. " 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt ..... " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old) ..... " 25
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt ..... " 27
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT ..... " 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown) ..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old) ..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt ..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT .. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT ..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT ..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT .... " 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old) ..... " 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt ..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT ..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT ..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt ..... " 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT ..... " 51

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt ..... " 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE (Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, Sacque, and Bretelle Apron), for girl from 2 to 13 years old ..... " 13

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE

Manufactured by the Florence Sewing Mach. Co. The simplest, cheapest, and best in use! Has but one needle! A Child can run it. Agents wanted in every town. Send for Circular and Sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

A NEW TOMATO.

Early, Solid, and Enormously Productive. Originated by H. Dwight Smith, Esq., of Arlington, Va., and is a cross between the Early Smooth Red and Feejee. Fruit of perfect form, smooth, bright red color, very solid, having small seed cells, and no hard core at the centre, being of the same delicate texture and brilliant color throughout. Ripens with the earliest. Fruit often weighing 24 to 26 ounces, with ordinary field culture. Enormously productive, and of excellent flavor. Stands the drouth better than any other variety.

☞ Price 25 cents per packet; 5 packets for $1.

From L. J. TUTTLE, Assistant Treasurer United States, Washington, Jan., 1873.

I find the "Arlington" has in a remarkable degree all the requisites of a perfect Tomato. I know nothing that equals it. (Signed) L. J. TUTTLE.

From the President's Gardener, Washington, Jan., 1873.

The Arlington Tomato, tested under my supervision in the President's gardens, was superior to any other kind. (Signed) ALEXANDER McKERRICHER, Gardener at the White House.

The Nineteenth Annual Edition of our celebrated Seed Catalogue and Amateur's Guide to the Flower and Kitchen Garden is now ready for distribution, and will be mailed free to our customers of 1872, and to all applicants upon receipt of 25 cents; an edition elegantly bound in cloth, $1 00. This is without exception the largest and best Catalogue ever published in this or any other country. It contains 200 pages, including several hundred finely-executed engravings of favorite flowers and vegetables, and a beautifully colored chromo of a group of some of the most popular flowers in cultivation. Also a descriptive list of 2000 species and varieties of flower and vegetable seeds, including all the novelties of the past season, with full directions for culture. Address

P. O. Box 5,712. B. K. BLISS & SONS, 23 Park Place & 20 Murray St., N. Y. City.

TO THE LADIES.

BY A NEW AND WONDERFUL PROCESS, WE ARE

RENOVATING

SOILED & FADED DRESSES,

(Silk or Woolen) by dyeing them to perfection and applying on them, in all colors, the most exquisite patterns. Sprays, stars, and stripes have been selected for this season.

OUR COLORS ARE GUARANTEED INDESTRUCTIBLE.

Respectable agents wanted in every city in the United States. Apply at store,

No. 1193 BROADWAY,
WHERE SAMPLES CAN BE SEEN.

H. BONGRAND & CO.

$500,000 for Every body!

THIRD GRAND GIFT CONCERT in aid of Public Library of Ky., will be given in the great Hall of Library Building at Louisville, Ky., on Tuesday, April 8, 1873, at which time Ten Thousand Cash Gifts, amounting to a grand total of $500,000, all cash, will be distributed by lot to ticket holders. Only 100,000 tickets, and large proportion already sold or engaged. Two Concerts have been given with complete success and every gift promptly paid. Whole tickets $10, halves $5, quarters $2 50. For tickets or information, apply to Hon. Thos. E. Bramlette, Agent for Trustees Public Library of Ky., Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING

WITH A

NOVELTY PRESS,

The best ever made for the purpose.

Principal office 349-351 Federal, and 152 Kneeland Streets, Boston. Branch office, 543 Broadway and 88 Mercer Street, New York.

W. Y. EDWARDS is no longer Agent for me or the sale of my goods.

BENJ. O. WOODS,
Manufacturer of Novelty Presses, and dealer in every description of
PRINTING MATERIAL.

Send for NEW Illustrated Catalogue, with Agents addresses.

A GREAT OFFER FOR MARCH!!

Horace Waters & Son, 481 B'way, N. Y., will dispose of 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS of first-class makers, including Waters's, AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES FOR CASH, during THIS MONTH. New 7-octave PIANOS, modern improvements, for $250 and $275 cash. THE WATERS CONCERTO PARLOR ORGANS are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Prices at bargains for cash. Monthly installments received, running from one to three years. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

THE LADD PATENT STIFFENED

GOLD WATCH CASES,

For Movements of American Manufacture,

In Ladies' Gentlemen's, and Boys' Sizes, and in

MANSARD, DOME, & FLAT STYLES.

The most elegant, durable, popular, and the

BEST GOLD WATCH CASES

ever made for so little money. For sale by leading Jewelers throughout the United States and New Dominion. Descriptive Circulars sent on application by the manufacturers,

J. A. BROWN & CO.,
11 Maiden Lane, New York.

D. M. Ferry & Co's SEEDS 1873

Illustrated, Descriptive,
—AND—
PRICED CATALOGUE,
—OF—VEGETABLE
—AND—FLOWER

Will be mailed FREE to all applicants. This is one of the largest, most complete and instructive Seed Catalogues published. It is printed on beautifully tinted paper, contains about 200 pages and over 200 illustrations of Vegetables and Flowers, and is invaluable to Farmer, Gardener, and Florist.

Address, D. M. FERRY & CO.,
Seedsmen and Florists, DETROIT, MICH.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

SEYMOUR'S SHEARS & SCISSORS.

"The Best are the Cheapest."

Extra Quality. Crocus Polish.

Family Size, - - $1.50
Ladies' Scissors, - 1.00
By mail, prepaid. Send P. O. Order or Draft.

HENRY SEYMOUR & CO., 29 and 31 Rose St., N. Y.

WORKING CLASS, MALE OR FEMALE,

$60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Cortlandt St., N. Y.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, No. 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 532 B'dway, N. Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

$125 A WEEK! All expenses paid. Business new. NOVELTY CO., Saco, Me.

Sent Free! Catalogue of Jewelry, Books, Games, Nix-Nax, &c. Great inducements to Agents and purchasers. (Inclose no stamp.) Address P. O. VICKERY & CO., Augusta, Maine.

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.

SANTO DOMINGO, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti. By SAMUEL HAZARD. Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

2.

STUDENT'S HALLAM'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND. The Constitutional History of England, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II. By HENRY HALLAM, LL.D., F.R.A.S. Incorporating the Author's Latest Additions and Corrections, and adapted to the Use of Students. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D. 12mo, 747 pp., Cloth, $2 00.

3.

RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

4.

GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50. Popular Edition, 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

5.

HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

6.

ROBIN GRAY. A Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, "Author of "For the King," and "For Lack of Gold." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.

THE WANDERING HEIR. A Novel. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," "Foul Play," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.; Cloth, 60 cts.

8.

THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

This work embraces in one volume:

ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.

ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

It is a complete hand-book on this subject, and has also a permanent critical value to every ministerial student of the book.—Christian Intelligencer, N. Y.

9.

HARPER'S HOUSEHOLD DICKENS. With Original English and American Illustrations by Thomas Nast, W. L. Sheppard, Thomas Worth, C. S. Reinhart, J. Barnard, J. Mahoney, and others.

The following volumes are now ready or in preparation:

OLIVER TWIST. With 28 Illustrations by J. Mahoney. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00. (Ready.)

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT. With 59 Illustrations by J. Barnard. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. (Ready.)

THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP. With 54 Illustrations by Thomas Worth. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25. (Ready.)

DAVID COPPERFIELD. With Portrait of Author and 61 Illustrations by J. Barnard. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. (Ready.)

DOMBEY AND SON. With 52 Illustrations by W. L. Sheppard. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. (Ready.)

NICHOLAS NICKLEBY. With 52 Illustrations by C. S. Reinhart. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. (Ready.)

BLEAK HOUSE. With Illustrations by J. Barnard. (In Preparation.)

PICKWICK PAPERS. With Illustrations by Thomas Nast. (In Preparation.)

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

WOOD CARPETING,

942 BROADWAY.

Send Stamp for Designs.

TRICKS AND TRAPS OF AMERICA.

10,000 copies already sold. Near 100 pages, illustrated cover. Exposes Humbugs, Quacks, and Swindlers. Hundreds named and exposed. Mailed for only 25 cts. Address HUNTER & CO., Publishers, Hinsdale, N. H.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

IN one of the suburban schools a school inspector gave out the word "psalter" to a class for spelling. It was a poser to all till it reached the foot of the class, when a curly-headed little fellow spelled it correctly, but being asked to define it, he shouted out, "More salt."

Swift said the reason a certain university was a learned place was that most persons took some learning there, and few brought any away with them, so it accumulated.

Suppose a man owns a skiff; he fastens the skiff to the shore with a rope made of straw; along comes a cow; cow gets into the boat, turns round, and eats the rope; the skiff, thus let loose, with the cow on board, starts down stream, and on its passage is upset; the cow is drowned. Now has the man that owns the cow got to pay for the boat, or the man that owns the boat got to pay for the cow?

A lady who had made pretensions to the most refined feelings went to her butcher to remonstrate with him on his cruel practices.

"How can you be so barbarous as to put little innocent lambs to death?"

"Why, madam," said the butcher, "you surely wouldn't eat them alive, would you?"

Persons interested in things theatrical will be amused by the discovery of a Paris correspondent that a married woman on the stage exercises less magnetism over an audience than a single woman does. "At one time," he says, "there were offered in Paris what were called Christine Nilsson watches, which had a great sale, but when she took a husband their demand so sensibly diminished that the proprietor changed their name." This seems rather illogical, after the fair cantatrice had changed hers.

DEFINITION WANTED.

AUNT MARIA. "And so, Laury, you enjoyed yourself very much at the Browns' Party. And did you Flirt much?"
LAWRENCE. "Oh dear, no! On the contrary, Aunt, I Danced with the same Little Girl the whole evening!"

PERSIAN FABLES.

A dog having got upon the scent of a deer which a hunter had been dragging home, set off with extraordinary zeal. After measuring off a few leagues he paused.

"My running gear is all right," said he, "but I seem to have lost my voice."

Suddenly his ear was assailed by a succession of eager barks, as of another dog in pursuit of him. It then began to dawn upon him that he was a particularly rapid dog; instead of him having lost his voice, his voice had lost him, and was just now arriving. Full of his discovery, he sought his master, and struck for better food and more comfortable housing.

"Why, you miserable example of perverted powers!" said his master; "I never intended you for the chase, but for the road. You are to be a draught-dog—to pull baby about in a cart. You will perceive that speed is an objection. Sir, you must be toned down. You will be at once assigned to a house with modern conveniences, and will dine at a French restaurant. If that system does not reduce your own, I'm an 'Ebrew Jew!"

The journals next morning had racy and appetizing accounts of a canine suicide.

A famishing traveler who had run down a salamander made a fire and laid him alive upon the hot coals to cook. Wearied with the pursuit which had preceded his capture the animal at once composed himself, and fell into a refreshing sleep. At the end of half an hour the man stirred him with a fagot, remarking,

"I say! wake up and begin toasting, will you? How long do you mean to keep dinner waiting, eh?"

"Oh, I beg you will not wait for me," was the yawning reply. "If you are going to stand upon ceremony, every thing will get cold. Besides, I have dined. I wish, by-the-way, you would put on some more fuel; I think we shall have snow."

"Yes," said the man, "the weather is like yourself—raw and exasperatingly cool. Perhaps this will warm you." And he rolled a ponderous pine log atop of that provoking reptile, who flattened out and "handed in his checks."

The moral thus doth glibly run:
A cause its opposite may brew;
The sun-shade is unlike the sun,
The plum unlike the plumber, too;
A salamander underdone
His impudence may overdo.

A humming-bird invited a vulture to dine with her. He accepted, but took the precaution to have an emetic along with him; and immediately after dinner, which consisted mainly of dew, spices, honey, and similar slops, he swallowed his corrective, and tumbled the distasteful viands out. He then went away, and made a good wholesome meal with his friend the ghoul. He has been heard to remark that the taste for humming-bird fare is "too artificial for him." He says a simple and natural diet, with agreeable companions, cheerful surroundings, and a struggling moon, is best for the health, and most agreeable to the normal palate.

People with vitiated tastes may derive much profit from this opinion. Crede experto.

A gosling which had not yet begun to blanch was accosted by a chicken just out of the shell.

"Whither away so fast, fair maid?" inquired the chick.

"Wither away yourself," was the contemptuous reply; "you are already in the sere and yellow leaf, while I seem to have a green old age before me."

THOUGHTFUL.—"Poor dear!" sighed Mr. Smith, stirring up his roaring coals, and referring to the late lamented Mrs. S., "how she did enjoy a good fire! Ah, well, let us hope she's gone where they keep them."

When distance lent enchantment to the view, was it with an understanding that he was to have it back again?

AFFECTING VERSES.

The following pathetic lines we find in an exchange:

"The death angel smote Alexander M'Glue,
And gave him protracted repose;
He wore a checked shirt and a No. 9 shoe,
And he had a pink wart on his nose.
No doubt he is happier dwelling in space
Over there on the evergreen shore.
His friends are informed that his funeral takes place
Precisely at quarter past four!"

And the following, from the same paper, is equally touching and beautiful:

"Willie had a purple monkey climbing on a yellow stick,
And when he sucked the paint all off it made him deathly sick;
And in his last hours he clasped that monkey in his hand,
And bade good-by to earth and went into a better land.

"Oh! no more he'll shoot his sister with his little wooden gun,
And no more he'll twist the pussy's tail and make her yowl for fun;
The pussy's tail now stands out straight, the gun is laid aside,
The monkey doesn't jump around since little Willie died."

THE OBJECTIVE CASE.—A purblind contemporary mentions that the young ladies of Chicago have recently established a "Personal Beauty League," and then feebly adds, "the objects of the society are not stated." Can't he see that the society by its very nature excludes all "objects!"

Now that so many specialties have their own journals, there is talk of starting a paper in New York devoted to the records of the city murders that occur from day to day.

SOMETHING THAT DON'T MIND PINCHING—Snuff.

PROFITABLE TALK.

YOUNG BLOCKHEAD. "Can you play on the piano, Miss Brown?"

MISS BROWN. "No, I can't."

Y. B. "Have you ever tried?"

MISS B. "No, I have not."

Y. B. "Then how do you know you can't?"

[Awkward pause.

A suit took place the other day in which a printer named Kelvey was a witness. The case was an assault and battery that came off between two men named Brown and Henderson.

"Mr. Kelvey, did you witness the affair referred to?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Well, what have you to say about it?"

"That it was the best piece of punctuation I have seen for some time!"

"What do you mean by that?"

"Why, that Brown dotted one of Henderson's eyes, for which Henderson put a period on Brown's breathing for about half a minute."

The Court comprehended the matter at once, and fined the defendant ten dollars.

INCURABLE.—That must be a hopeless case of intemperance when a man takes castor-oil for the sake of the brandy which helps it down.

An Aberdeen gentleman, talking to an American tourist, and growing warm in his praise of the hospitalities and sociabilities of Scotland, amidst other instances referred to one of their punch-bowls, which, on the christening of a young marquis, was built so large that a small boat was actually set sailing upon it, in which a boy sat, who ladled out the liquor. "I guess," said the American tourist, "I've seen a bowl that ud beat that to eternal smash; for at my brother's christening the bowl was so deep that when we young uns said it warn't sweet enough father sent a man down in a diving-bell to stir up the sugar at the bottom."

THE TEMPTER.

FIRST REVELER (on being turned out of his club). "Come and tak a gless at my rooms."

SECOND REVELER. "Na, na, ah've had mair than eneuch!"

FIRST REVELER. "Hoots! Tak' anither, mun! D'ye no see ye're lettin' yer judgment get the better o' ye?"

The 1st of April has been very appropriately selected by the New England Millerites as the date of the world's ending.

Sea-captains should be good-natured: it would not be safe to have a can't-anchor-us man to command a ship.

The gardener who grafted a chestnut to a box tree found it only produced large trunks.

An old lady describes a genius as "a man what knows more'n he can find out, and spills vittals on his clothes."

A sorrowing friend, writing of the death of an estimable lady, said, "She has gone to her eternal rest." His dismay can only be faintly imagined when, upon a "proof" of his obituary notice being sent to him, he read, "She has gone to her eternal roast."

MILITARY QUERY.—When a general "pitches" an encampment, does he always have a "brush" with the enemy?

"My brudders," said a waggish colored man to a crowd, "in all affliction, in all ob your troubles, dar is one place you can always find sympathy."

"Whar? whar?" shouted several.

"In de dictionary," he replied, rolling his eyes skyward.

AMERICA AND GERMANY.

AMERICAN NIMROD (who has shot tigers in India and lions in South Africa). "The fact is, Herr Muller, that I don't care much for Sport unless it contains the Element of Danger."

GERMAN NIMROD. "Ach zo? You are vont of Taincher? Den you should gom ant Shood mit me! Vy, only de oder Tay I Shoodet my Broder-in-law in de Shdômag!"

OH THIM SARVINTS! WHAT A BLESSING!

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 14.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Ladies' Bridal and Walking Suits, Figs. 1–5.

Fig. 1.—WHITE GROS GRAIN BRIDAL DRESS. This white gros grain dress is trimmed with pleated ruffles of the material, white lace, and orange blossoms. The back breadths of the skirt are arranged in a puff. Wreath of orange blossoms. Silk tulle veil.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 7 TO 9 YEARS OLD. The skirt and sleeveless jacket of this suit are made of black velvet. The jacket is trimmed with grelots. The over-skirt and high waist of blue and white striped foulard are trimmed with pleated ruffles of the material and with bows of blue gros grain ribbon.

Fig. 3.—WHITE SATIN BRIDAL DRESS. This dress with long train and heart-shaped waist is made of white satin. The waist is trimmed with revers of point lace and satin folds. Point lace under-sleeves. Wreath and bouquet of natural orange blossoms. Silk tulle veil. For the waist cut of satin and silk lining two pieces each from Figs. 37 and 38, Supplement, two whole pieces from Fig. 41, and one whole piece from Fig. 39. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 40, observing the outline of the under part. Having basted the material on the lining, sew up the darts in the fronts, join the back, side forms, and fronts according to the corresponding figures, and furnish the waist with buttons and button-holes for closing. Face the bottom of the waist with a strip of the material seven-eighths of an inch wide, and cord the neck of the waist. Join the upper and under parts of the sleeves from 36 to 37 and from 38 to 39, set on the trimmed cuffs

Fig. 1.—WHITE GROS GRAIN BRIDAL DRESS.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 7 TO 9 YEARS OLD.

Fig. 3.—WHITE SATIN BRIDAL DRESS. For pattern see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 37-41.

Fig. 4.—WHITE FAILLE BRIDAL DRESS. For pattern see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 42-46.

Fig. 5.—LADY'S WALKING SUIT.

Digitized by Google

according to the corresponding figures and signs, and sew the sleeves into the corded armholes, bringing 39 on 39 on the fronts. White satin belt with bow.

Fig. 4.—WHITE FAILLE BRIDAL DRESS. This dress is made of white faille; the trimming consists of box-pleated ruffles and folds of the material. The folds and the sleeve epaulets are braided with fine white silk cord. The back breadths of the skirt are draped as shown by the illustration. Wreath with trailing vines of orange blossoms. Silk tulle veil. To make the waist cut of gros grain and lining two pieces each from Figs. 42–44 and 46, Supplement, and one piece from Fig. 45. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 40, No. IX., of the present Supplement. Having sewed up the darts in the fronts, face the right front with a strip of silk an inch and three-quarters wide, and furnish it with button-holes. Set the left front from the neck to the bottom of the waist into a double fly an inch and three-quarters wide, which is furnished with buttons. Join the back, side forms, and fronts according to the corresponding figures, cut a slit in the back along the double line to *, and face the bottom of the waist with a strip of silk an inch and three-quarters wide. Set the neck of the waist into a double standing collar seven-eighths of an inch wide. Sew on the trimming as shown by the illustration and partly indicated on the pattern. Having trimmed the sleeves, set them into the armholes, at the same time sewing in the trimmed epaulets according to the corresponding figures.

Fig. 5.—LADY'S WALKING SUIT. Gray gros grain dress with ruffles of the material. The Dolman of steel blue vigogne is trimmed with a braiding of soutache, silk fringe, cord loops, and passementerie agrafes. Velvet hat, trimmed with ribbon, feathers, and lace.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1873.

☞ WITH the next Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be published gratuitously an EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, containing a further installment of LORD LYTTON'S new and fascinating Novel,

"THE PARISIANS,"

a work which recalls the best days of the author of "The Caxtons" and "My Novel."

☞ A Cut Paper Pattern of a Sleeveless Jacket Walking Suit will be published with our next Number.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' and Children's Spring Suits; Confirmation and First Communion Dresses; Mantelets, Dolmans, Fichus, Fichu-Collars; Passementerie Trimmings for Dresses and Wrappings; Lingerie, etc., together with choice literary and pictorial attractions.

FAMILY MARKETING.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

II.

HOW TO CHOOSE LAMB.

THE different parts of lamb are called by the same names as the same parts of mutton. It is generally sold by quarters or halves. The fore-half, or fore-saddle, is often roasted, and makes an excellent and delicate dish. The breast makes a very good and handsome dish, called épigramme. The best lamb is known by the same indications as those described for mutton.

Lamb is considered best between three and twelve months old. It is called spring lamb when between five and thirteen weeks. Spring lamb is considered best when ten weeks old. It is found in the markets as early as April, but is not very good until the middle of May.

The lambs coming from the common breeds seem to be the best; those coming from animals having the finest wool are not as much praised—such as the merino breed.

Kid-lamb does not differ from lamb in tenderness, but it does in appearance and flavor. The leg of kid-lamb is elongated and flat at the larger end, while that of lamb is short and thick. Kid is liked by many, but the public will generally agree with a lady friend who once said to us, "I do not object to eating kid, but I object to paying lamb price for it."

PORK.

When good, the meat looks fresh and is soft; the lean has a reddish hue, and the fat is white. The rind is thin and tender. When spots or small lumps of a whitish-pinky hue are found in the meat it is unfit for use.

The roasting pieces of pork are the leg, the loin, the shoulder, the fore-quarter, and the chine, or ribs.

Chops and steaks are taken from the chine and loin pieces. The tenderloins are generally sold separately.

SUCKING PIG.

The best are generally very short and very fat. The fat is very tender.

POULTRY.

A dry-picked fowl is better than a scalded one. A spring chicken should never be scalded; it is spoiled thereby. Young chickens are called broilers—the hens until they are about ten months, or until they begin to lay; the roosters until they are six or eight months old, according to breed.

As soon as a young hen has laid, the opening under the rump is redder and more open than before. The fat of the best chickens has a pale yellowish hue, the flesh is white, and the feet are smooth and soft. The cock is known by its smooth and short spurs. A stiff rump is a sign of freshness. When not fresh the part immediately under the rump has a dark, bluish appearance.

Another way of ascertaining if a chicken is young is by pressing the rear end of the breast-bone inward; if it bends easily, the chicken is young. The legs and feet of old chickens are rough to the touch.

Every edible bird, domestic or wild, when young has the lower part of the legs, the feet, and even the under part of the feet, soft, which parts are invariably rough to the touch when the bird is old.

Capons are easily known by the long feathers on their necks, that are left on as a kind of certificate of identity. They are much more plump and fat than other fowls; the breast, especially, is very large and thick. The comb, which is cut when the bird is altered, turns pale and looks faded. The head is smaller than that of other fowls, but their spurs are shorter and rather soft, and their claws long.

Birds called slips are often sold to the uninitiated for capons. Although they are good fowls, still they are very inferior to capons.

It is more difficult to select fowls when in a frozen state, but with a little experience, and the above explanations, it will be found comparatively easy. As a general guide, inferior poultry, even when frozen, is slimy to the touch, and much more so when partly or wholly thawed.

We must remark that a short spur is not always a sign of tender age in cocks. Some farmers very innocently cut that leg ornament in such way that after a while, although the bird be four or five years old, the spur will look as if it were just beginning to grow.

TURKEYS.

A good and young turkey is known by the same indications as given for poultry. The legs of young turkeys are generally black. An old hen-turkey has the legs rough, and of a reddish hue; the cock has long spurs. The fattest, those with short necks, a broad, thick breast, and a white skin, are the best. When fresh, the legs are flexible enough, but they get stiff as the bird gets seasoned.

Saturday-evening turkeys are made with old hens and old roosters, and commonly sold to confident buyers in this way: two or more market boys take possession of a closed stand rather late on Saturday evenings; they have their goods in a basket or box, and each is holding a fowl that he shows for and calls a young turkey, holding the head in one hand and the legs in the other, crying loudly, "Young turkeys for ——— a pound" (stating the price), "head and legs off," with other remarks, such as, "We offer them at that low price because it is late," "because we want to close," etc.

Unsuspecting women, attracted by the low price they are offered at (head and legs not weighed), stop to look at them, and in less time than it takes to say it, the head and legs are chopped off, the bird is weighed, the whole price announced, and before the woman has had time to say a word the bird is in her basket. Half bewildered at the celerity with which the whole process has been gone through, and startled by the small sum she has to pay for a turkey, at least nine out of ten pay and move along, conscious of having made a good bargain.

DUCKS.

Domestic ducks are almost always better than wild ones, and, on an average, of a good flavor. Like other birds or animals, the fatter they are the better the meat.

Select them with a large, full breast. The lower part of the legs of young ducks is soft; so is the web. Holding the bird by the under bill, if very young, it will break; if it only bends, it is a little older, but just as good. The joints of the legs also break easily when the bird is young.

Amateurs of ducklings prefer them just when their wings begin to overlap when alive.

We shall speak of wild-ducks in future numbers.

GEESE.

Young and good geese are known by the same indications as explained for ducks. The younger they are the more down they have. In getting old the skin becomes white, and the legs, which were yellowish, turn to red. The legs remain flexible as long as they are fresh.

DISEASE OR DEMONS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

WE hear of illness around us every day. Nay, in some dim and distant past, some vague remote Egyptian antiquity, we seem to see a vision of scarlet fever and whooping-cough, of chicken-pox and measles, and vaccination and pennyroyal tea, and housing and petting, in which we ourselves have played a prominent part. But strong with inherited vigor and country air, and wholesome lack of training, and free, wild, generous living, you have grown up, dear friend, in robust, not to say defiant, health, and have carried all along your manhood or womanhood an indomitable, irrepressible physical force and activity which have, perhaps, even surged over upon your mental characteristics, and made you the least in the world arrogant, scornful, exacting, exultant, where you otherwise would have been, let us hope, the very pink of meekness and modesty.

Ah! good friend, exult no more. Even for you Nemesis waits. Even you are approaching your boundary lines, though you know it not, or ever were aware that for you existed limitations.

So you go plunging through the snows and paddling through the "slush" of our unrelenting winters, intent upon having all things ready for a grand Christmas, and a closing up for the winter, and never heed the obstacles. Obstacles are made not to be counted but surmounted. Each day has its visit, its business, its excursion, its engagement, and if the day come with blinding sleet, or whirling snow, or icy rain, so much the worse for rain and sleet and snow, but away you go. There has never occurred to you the possibility of being beaten in any contest whatever. What said General UPTON when the committee suggested that in his work on tactics were to be found no rules for the arrangement of a surrender? "That, Sir, is a thing which should never be provided for in an American army!" Bravo, General UPTON!

So comes the night before Christmas-eve, and your visits are all made, and your Christmas-tree is planted in its pot and hidden in the cellar, to await its surprise, and your pop-corn parceled in pink bags, and your candy in white ones, and your oranges are strung, ready for their final suspense, and your drawers and closets crammed with mysterious parcels wrapped in tissue-paper, and the Christmas turkey and pies and puddings are in an encouraging state of forwardness, and you go to bed with the delightful consciousness of being well "up to time," and in fifteen minutes are surprised that instead of finding it morning it is still the same day you went to bed, and you are, moreover, aware of your left shoulder. Unhappy! the only health is unconsciousness. Your intangible idea develops into a distinct ache in the top of that dreadful left shoulder, which no change of position, no determination to fix your mind on some other subject, will remove. You make Herculean efforts to forget that shoulder, but in vain. The ache resolves itself into a well-defined pain, and the pain becomes adventurous, and organizes exploring expeditions northward and southward, eastward and westward, and your time is beguiled by the lively interest you take in its progress and enterprises. Now your chest seems a great cave full of stalagmites and stalactites, and the stalagmites and stalactites are all luminous, brilliant, crystallized pain. Now it is a little imp alight on your shoulder, clutching it harder and harder, and a whole legion of little imps pour after him, and spin down your nerves, and follow along every avenue of sense and blood and breath, gnawing, gnawing, gnawing with monotonous persistence and ever-growing power. From force of habit you fall asleep, and are startled awake again, and still those imps are at it. It was amusing for a while, but it presently becomes tiresome, and then exasperating. There is a point beyond which even novelty ceases to interest, and the ice-cold night was never so mighty. It broods over you like a pall, discouraging, deadening. And the little imps have so possessed themselves of you that they have fairly driven you out of your strongholds. You dare not go down into your own lungs, but only hang on to breath by your eyelids, and every short, shallow gasp is a sharp pain. But you battle through the night with fitful sleep, and weary, wondering waking, thinking longingly of sunshine and the register, and promising yourself to give the imps a sweat if ever daylight comes. Daylight does come and sunshine, and the register and the blazing wood fire, and mustard and hot iron, and those little malignant fiends carry the day over them all, dancing and raving and raging through your astonished blood.

Till somebody suggests the doctor. The doctor! It is an absurd idea. A doctor is for sickness. Can a doctor cast out devils? Sickness is—well, you don't know exactly what, seeing you never had it, but certainly not this. This is a horde of minute, riotous evil spirits, reckless, spiteful, mocking morsels of demons, that have entered into you, and are holding high carnival. But they so occupy your time and attention that you make no effective opposition to any plans or proposals of the outside world, and so presently the doctor appears upon the scene, and the outside world somehow begins to buzz and darken into a dream, a twilight, a sea of unreality, over which the phantoms of familiar friends loom unreally, but whose doubtful expanse is broken by solid islands of mustard and poultice, and batting and bitterness, and across whose sombre silence shoot gleams of drollery and grotesque, demure, fantastic fun. And there is time no longer, nor any division of day and night, until a time, times, and the dividing of time.

And this is a "fit of sickness." You were never more amazed in your life. Out of the dark, doubtful sea you are dragged to the dry land of faint but real life, and behold the little imps are beaten off, shut and sealed in the caverns whence they swarmed, and there never were any imps, and their name was Pneumonia; and you see the light that it is good, and you can divide the light from the darkness, as in the beginning, and you call the light Day, and the darkness you call Night.

But to think that you, the unassailable, have had "a fit of sickness!" And that this is it! And that this strange, bewildering, absorbing, altogether unimaginable experience has been going on around you from the foundation of the world, and you had no more idea of it or what it was like than if you had been founded in another world!

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

WEDDING DRESSES.

"ORANGE blossom" faille, of the cream-tinted whiteness of the flower in its perfection, is the superb fabric of bridal dresses for the spring weddings that occur soon after Easter. French fancy rejects all elaborate laces for brides' dresses, and suggests as more congruous for this last dress of girlhood simple ruches and plissés of dainty Malines tulle, with many garlands of orange blossoms. For this dress of silk, tulle, and flowers the design is a trained skirt, with high basque, or else low Greek corsage. The dimensions of the skirt are two yards for its greatest length, and five and a half for its width at the foot. It may be left in plain soft richly flowing folds, or as elaborately trimmed as the wearer chooses, but all over-skirts, except the merest aprons, are now omitted, as the sash and veil form ample drapery. The basque corsage, edged with double cords, has a high Medici fraise of tulle around the pointed neck, and antique sleeves, tight to the elbow, with triple flounces of tulle below; an orange cluster is in the bosom, a vine droops from the left shoulder to the waist, and the sash is of double faille and tulle. A dress in French taste is of white Ottoman silk, with low corsage, deeply pointed, and a Grecian bertha of Malines tulle with silk folds. Around the train is a wide flounce, with a tulle ruche above and below it, headed by a garland, five yards long, made of orange flowers and pink-white roses with dark buds; narrow gathered flounces veiled with tulle and headed by garlands are arranged in curves on the front breadth, and a ruffle and garland sweep down from the waist on each side, and are met by bouquets with trailing sprays. The waist has a bouquet in front, and a long spray on the shoulder. The new coiffure is not a wreath, but a cluster, worn high on the left side, with a vine among the finger puffs, and a long spray drooping behind. Such "sets" of flowers, including garlands, cost from $75 to $100. The veil is also of Malines, three and a half yards wide, and this width forms the length of the veil. The price, completed, is about $15. For weddings in June, the month of roses, are poetic dresses of embroidered muslin, blanc mat, as the French say, imported for $50 the robe, and it may be prosaically added that these will serve afterward as over dresses for colored silk. Some lace, usually Valenciennes, must be used with these; the low round Josephine corsage is in keeping with its simplicity, and a white watered ribbon sash completes a dress that is within the reach of brides of limited means. The orange flowers necessary are merely a coiffure and corsage bouquet; very fine creamy blossom sets cost from $18 to $25; whiter sets, mostly of chalky buds, cost from $5 to $11; very pretty garlands of bud and blossom are $2 50 a yard. Lemon blossoms, bridal spiral, and the starry jasmine are mingled with orange flowers. Bride-maids' dresses are of Chambéry gauze or tulle, with garlands of different flowers on each dress, and sashes of two colors found in the flowers. A pretty garland for an apron front is pink roses with a fringe of bluebells; the sash is of palest blue, lined with rose-color.

The traveling dress added to spring trousseaux, and which serves usually for "second best" street suit, is a polonaise with simply trimmed skirt of camel's-hair serge, natural gray or brown, worth from $2 to $4 a yard; or else a silk skirt with a Sicilienne polonaise, in any of the stylish green shades, such as moss, souchong, olive, sage, or bronze. Where economy is an object, fine poplins are used in the colors just named, and in blue-gray associated with Napoleon blue almost as dark as plum-color. The bonnet is a Rabagas of the dress material, with silk folds, a rose cluster, and aigrette, or else a pretty Rubens round hat of black or white straw, with folded scarf of silk matching the dress, and a shaded ostrich plume. The veil is polka-dotted Brussels net with Spanish lace border, or else a gray grenadine finished with fringe around the edge, and fastened by a silver dagger. For church and visiting dresses are the Ophelia, réséda, blue-gray, and black silk costumes. The colored suits are of two shades, with sleeveless jackets, and with bonnets to match. Black silk suits have black cashmere mantillas rich with lace, insertion, and jet, and will be worn with a chip or straw bonnet almost covered with flowers.

Hosted by Google

For house dresses the princesse dress may be put on in the morning and worn deep into the afternoon. This is a graceful close-fitting Gabrielle with waist and skirt cut in one, is buttoned down before, sometimes has a vest added in front, has large square pockets, and is slightly trained. A pretty model is fine gray poplin with a vest and deep cuffs of lilac silk; also clusters of silk flounces that come up very high in front and recede on each side, coming to a point behind. Down the back is a row of large bows of silk arranged like a Watteau. A dinner dress for a bride is of two gray shades, pearl and mastic, with rose facings. The shapely basque with tight sleeves is trimmed with white duchesse lace. The demi-train has flounces, large revers on the sides, tablier ruffles, and a sash in which the three shades appear. An evening dress for a blonde bride, that would also suit a brunette, is of faded-rose silk trimmed with deeper rose. This has a square-necked basque with antique sleeves; two rows of Valenciennes trim the neck and sleeves, while the basque is stylishly edged with cords of the two shades. The train has an apron simply corded, and a panier puff held up by a sash. A dress worn at the wedding by the bride's mother is of violet brocade, with a flounce of black Chantilly lace.

Among other trousseau dresses in preparation for spring are the new foulards of dark gray, brown, and blue for house or street; and for midsummer are black grenadines, with batistes, linens, and soft-finished percales. Piqués are not liked as well as formerly, as they are thick, warm, and wash yellow; thinner white goods, book-muslin, bishop's lawn, nansook in cross-bars, and polka-dotted Swiss muslins, with other antiquated soft fabrics, are to be used instead.

SUMMER SUITS.

Correspondents who ask instructions for summer dresses to be made during the quiet of Lent will find their answers in this column. Among the wash suits imported thin batistes are seen in the greatest numbers. These are usually of flax gray or écru shades, and are made with a belted polonaise and flounced skirt; sometimes the polonaise has lace-like stripes, or else stripes of color, and is often in clouded figures like gauze; the skirt is of plain batiste trimmed with striped flounces. Ruffles and bands of batiste embroidered by machinery in brown, white, and black are much used for trimming; écru yak lace is used in abundance, and there is a caprice for trimming batiste with the peacock and Napoleon blues that come to the surface so conspicuously this season. Immense pearl buttons, dead gilt buttons, and pearl slides and buckles are on these suits. Darkest brown facings are again used with batistes. A charming suit of plain écru has a deep bias Spanish flounce edged with two narrow ruffles, one pleated, the other gathered, and headed by one ruffle. The polonaise with inch-wide lace-like stripes is loose and belted with a brown silk belt fastened by a bow on the left of the front, from which falls a looped sash on one side of the back. Two tiny pointed collars, the upper one of brown silk, the lower of batiste, trim the neck. Flowing sleeves tied up at the elbow by brown ribbons; and a cuff of many folds of batiste is inserted when it is necessary to wear closed sleeves. Large brown silk buttons, and a fraise of Swiss muslin edged with Valenciennes. Other batiste polonaises are wrought all over with white machine embroidery; Watteau bows and sashes of peacock blue ribbon and écru lace jabots complete them.

LINEN SUITS.

Thick gray linen suits have French blouse-waists and simple over-skirts, trimmed with bias bands piped with white or deep blue linen. A deep kilt pleating is on the lower skirt. A small fichu trimmed with folds is the wrap; large blue buttons fasten the blouse. Other linen suits have polonaises with simple basque backs, and fall open from the waist down to disclose the skirt, trimmed across the front with twelve bias bands two inches wide, piped on each side with a tiny fold of white linen; the same bias band extends down the front seams. On the back breadths is a plain side pleating, with a narrow gathered ruffle below.

TURKISH TOWELING SUITS.

Suits of gray and brown Turkish toweling stuff with rough sponge-like stripes have double-breasted polonaises, cut with low revers at the throat, and are to be worn over white habit shirts. Square pockets are on the front, and there are two rows of silver buttons down the front. The skirt has a deep Spanish flounce, with narrow gathered ruffle at the top and bottom. Russia leather belts with silver chatelaines are worn with these suits.

THE ROBESPIERRE CHEMISETTE.

A novelty for morning lingerie is the Robespierre chemisette, of striped percale. This is a double-breasted front with two rows of large pearl buttons, and an English collar turned over and low-throated in front, with a standing band behind. The under-sleeves have very flaring cuffs, fastened by four buttons. It is to serve as a habit shirt, and comes in stripes of blue, maroon, and cherry with white; also in Roman striped percales. For more dressy occasions are fichu-collars of soft turquoise silk folds and lace, with very high fraises of Valenciennes.

BREAKFAST CAPS AND SPANISH VEILS.

The most becoming breakfast caps for young matrons are long pointed crowns of Swiss muslin, finished with a pleated frill edged with Valenciennes. A cunning little bow with ends turned up is made of two shades of blue, réséda, rose, or olive ribbon, and perked up on the left side. These cost from $6 50 to $10, and are made in Paris. High Normandy crowns are on caps for short round faces. Lace coronets with ribbon loops and a wreath of fine flowers are shown for dressy caps for more elderly ladies. The lace is either blonde or fine Malines.

Spanish veils for carriage and opera coiffures are imported from Virot's and other French milliners. They are made of Spanish blonde edged with lace. This lace is first attached to a coronet of watered ribbon, in which a single rose is set. The veil then drapes the coiffure, falls low on the shoulders, and is fastened on the bosom by a rose, or else the ends are thrown over the shoulders and finished with white fleecy tassels. Price from $15 to $20.

NEW SASHES AND NECK-TIES.

New sashes of thin armure silk with brocaded ends and elaborate tassel fringe are imported, with neck-ties to match. These are in turquoise, peacock, soft rose, and other pale faded tints. Watered sash ribbons are in three lengthwise stripes, white centre, with a color on each side, or else in the Marseillaise cross-bars of blue and white. Roman sashes are in new combinations of color, and the faded Watteau contrasts appear again. Modistes are making sashes of doubled faille of two colors to wear with white or black dresses. Pale blue lined with rose, or blue with buff, is very stylish. They have a belt of four folds, and a cluster of long loops with ends directly behind, a smaller bunch of loops on the left, and one long swinging loop intended to hold up the puff of the dress. Price $20. They are also made of black velvet lined with satin, black or a color, and of black moiré with white faille lining.

MILLINERY VARIETIES.

The new mousseline ribbons with small reps are far better than gros grain ribbons, because they are entirely of the best quality of silk, instead of being filled in with inferior silk, as heavy reps are. They will tie in a bow without creasing, which gros grain ribbons never do, are double-faced, have satin edges instead of a cord, and are as cheap as a taffeta ribbon. Importations of these foretell a return to the old staple colors, the simple blues, pinks, green, and brown, that existed before the present mongrel hues came into vogue. A novelty this season is gros grain ribbon with double face, blue, rose, or green on one side and white on the other. This is very serviceable in trimming bonnets that require two shades.

New jet ornaments for bonnets are shaped precisely like the back of a high Spanish comb. They are to be draped with lace, and placed in the back of black lace bonnets.

There is a caprice just now for wearing a cluster of flowers falling very low on the back of the head, where the hair is combed up from the nape of the neck. This is sometimes the only bit of color seen on black bonnets, and even this is half concealed by the hanging drapery of Spanish veils.

There are large importations of filigree silver ornaments in medieval designs made from dies that are exact copies of ornaments worn in the fourteenth century. Among them are large brooches of dull silver, gleaming daggers with a chain around them, square and oval buckles beautifully carved, birds' heads, fern leaves, and thistle slides. They are placed upon bonnets, and used to pin veils, fasten belts, mantles, etc.

For information received thanks are due Miss SWITZER; Mrs. CONNELLY; and Messrs. JOHN SCHMAUDER; A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

CHARLES NORDHOFF writes from Honolulu to the Tribune that the new king, Prince BILL, is the most popular man in the Sandwich Islands, having been elected by an almost unanimous vote. He is a man of more than average intelligence and ability, a gentleman in manners, and able to transact business, to which he has given himself up since his accession. At one time he was somewhat addicted to toddies, and was tabooed by the late king; but he never had the del. trems., and is now quite free from all low dissipation. His Prime Minister is Mr. BISHOP, formerly of this city, and the principal banker on the islands. Another member of the cabinet is Mr. JUDD, a son of the first missionary there.

—The Duke of Richmond seems to appreciate the value of his house at Charing Cross, London, having set $2,500,000 as the value thereof, which stands in the way of proposed improvements.

—They live to be old in Switzerland, ANNA GIOVANOLI having just died in the Grisons at the age of one hundred and two. It is not at all uncommon to see men there between eighty and ninety doing their quiet game of billiards.

—The Khedive of Egypt is open to criticism as a spendthrift. He announces his intention of applying to London for another loan to pay off his personal debts. It is said that he spent over $10,000,000 on the marriage of his three sons.

—The Earl of Shaftesbury, one of the most religious and philanthropic noblemen of England, is building a new town for working-people a short distance from London, where laborers can live economically, and have fresh air, plenty of good water, and ample room.

—Several of the most eminent gentlemen of Boston—HILLARD, SARGENT, THAYER, COOLIDGE, THOMPSON, TYLER, etc.—have taken steps for raising a fund for the erection of a monument to the memory of the late General WILLIAM SCHOULER, one of the truest, ablest, and best men that ever lived in Massachusetts. He was the Adjutant-General and right arm of Governor ANDREW during the rebellion, and wrote two volumes of history of What Massachusetts did during the War that is alike honorable to the State and to the historian who so faithfully and ably recorded it.

—PAUL MORPHY, after having won the applause of two hemispheres by his skill at chess, now resides in New Orleans, earning scant subsistence by his profession as a lawyer. He steadily refuses to make any public exhibition of his chess powers, though once in a while he can be induced to show that his old power is only in abeyance. Recently at a private séance he beat simultaneously in two hours and three-quarters sixteen of the most accomplished amateurs in New Orleans. His strength has never been fully tested, and probably will never be fully developed. Since his retirement from the public arena Captain M'KENZIE, of this city, is reputed to occupy the first position in the United States as a player.

—A grand-nephew of WASHINGTON IRVING has been temporarily appointed to the professorship of rhetoric and the English language in the Michigan University.

—General SHERIDAN, it is said, contemplates giving to the public a volume containing his opinions about the tactics of the French and German armies during their late unpleasantness.

—Two members of Congress, at least, decline to take the extra pay voted at the close of the session—Mr. ROBERTS, of this city, and Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts. The former refuses outright. The latter takes the lucre, but gives it to the Worcester County Free Institute of Industrial Science, for the tuition of pupils from the Eighth Congressional District.

—Notwithstanding the recent increase of salaries voted to themselves by Congress, several of the members of both Houses are well-to-do in the world. Senator CHANDLER, of Michigan, has an income of $200,000; Senator BUCKINGHAM, of Connecticut, between $50,000 and $100,000; Senator CAMERON is a very wealthy man, as are Senators SPRAGUE, FRELINGHUYSEN, FENTON, and Congressmen FERNANDO WOOD, ROBERT B. ROOSEVELT, W. R. ROBERTS, S. S. COX, SAMUEL HOOPER, WILLIAM WILLIAMS, B. F. BUTLER, CLARKSON N. POTTER, Governor SWANN, and many of the Western members. The quite Southern Representatives do not "pan out" quite so satisfactorily.

—WILLIAM B. ASTOR will two years hence, at the expiration of the hotel lease, convert the Astor House into stores and offices. The present rental of that edifice is about $119,000, of which the hotel pays $56,000. Its close proximity to the new Post-office, United States courts, the new Telegraph-office, will make it a most desirable place for offices.

—The daughter of Dr. TIEDEMANN, of this city, who for six years has been studying music under Madame VIARDOT-GARCIA, will soon make her début here. She is known as Madame JENNY RALLY, which occasions an aspersive caitiff from the country to remark that she is generally known by that name.

—Marrying to lively music is coming in—has come in in Washington, where a few days ago a choral wedding took place between Mr. P. K. BOSWELL and Miss MARY P. SHEPHERD, the bridal party, preceded by a processional cross and four-and-twenty robed choristers, marching up the broad aisle singing a wedding hymn. After the ceremonial B. folded her in his embrace and kiss-ed her—quite the correct Shepherd's fold.

—The Boston papers of Tuesday, March 11, are warm in praise of the singing of Madame DE RYTHER, of this city, at a musical and dramatic entertainment given in Odd-fellows Hall. On the Sunday previous, says the Globe, "she won many hearts by exhibiting her glorious voice at Clarendon Street Church," and at the concert she was equally successful. Her full, rich, resonant voice is one of the most notable now known to the musical public of this city, and her singing at the Rev. Dr. CHAPIN'S church is the principal attraction of the vocal part of the services there.

—DAVID OCHTERLONG DYCE SOMBRE is the name of a gentleman who some years ago left India to reside in England. He was very rich, and consequently, though a colored man, got a seat in Parliament and a peer's daughter to wife, viz., the daughter of Viscount ST. VINCENT. Mr. DYCE SOMBRE died, and General FORESTER, son of Lord FORESTER, married the widow. But about the property a dispute arose, which had to be settled by the courts. It was a long affair, for there was a heavy sum in dispute. However, it came to an end at last, and a short time since there was paid to General FORESTER the noble sum of £159,000.

—Miss MARY E. ASHWIN, just arrived here from England, has been for fifteen years past the custodian of SHAKSPEARE'S birth-place at Stratford-on-Avon. She is the English lady of whom HAWTHORNE wrote as "the remarkably genteel English girl, daughter of the old gentleman who takes care of the house." Few persons have seen so many of the world's celebrities as she.

—Mr. LAUNT THOMPSON, one of the most gifted of American sculptors, is making a life-size statue of RECTOR PIERS, first president of Yale College. It is to be cast in bronze and erected in the college grounds.

—The family of the late Dr. LOWELL MASON, whose fame was for many years sung throughout the land, have presented to the Theological Department of Yale College the valuable library of the doctor.

—A notable man—the Rev. JOSEPH HARVEY—died recently in Michigan, at the age of eighty-six. It was he who first suggested the establishment of American missions in the Sandwich Islands. In 1809, while Mr. H. was a pastor at Goshen, Connecticut, a whaler brought to New Haven the first Sandwich Islander ever seen on this coast. He was placed in Mr. HARVEY'S family to be educated, and under the latter's teaching the islander embraced Christianity. The American Board, then just starting in Boston, took an interest in the case, and the result was the sending out of missionaries to the islands. Mr. HARVEY was thus spared to witness the grand consummation of his hopes in relation to that mission—an entire people converted to Christianity.

—Madame LUCCA evinces confidence in the perpetuity of our institutions. In view of the toppling condition of the effete monarchies of the Old World, she has announced her intention of becoming a citizeness of the United States, and to that end filed the necessary documents in court.

—Mr. J. R. THOMAS, whose beautiful ballads are so popular throughout the land, has given to the public another, The old Time; or, When you were Seventeen, and dedicated it to Mrs. MORRIS PHILLIPS, the wife of our clever contemporary of the Home Journal.

—While Professor PEARCE, of the Coast Survey, is one of the best mathematicians since the days of LEGENDRE, his son is one of the finest amateur readers of SHAKSPEARE in the country.

—Mr. J. KEENE, father of the young lady recently married to the Grand Shereef of Morocco, writes to the London Times that the Shereef has no other wives than his daughter, that the latter is to enjoy the same liberty as any European wife, and that her children, if any are born to her, are by special agreement to be educated in England.

—A son of Mr. WALTER, of the London Times, was recently married to a niece of the Earl of Lichfield.

—The court jeweler of Berlin is a man nearly eighty years old, worth a million of dollars, and lives in a shanty near the city.

—Fancy this style of man: a Russian, living at Nice, who has made many millions of rubles by railway speculations. He is uneducated, but passionately fond of music, and his one pleasure is to maintain an orchestra. He engages by the year the best musicians; in the morning they take up their position at one end of a salon in his villa, he sits down in his arm-chair at the other, and there he sits and they fiddle all the blessed livelong day.

—The most gigantic family in Europe are the O'NEALS, of Queen's County, Ireland. The father stood six feet, and weighed twenty-seven stone. The mother is forty-five years of age, stands five feet two inches in height, measures round her arm twenty-six inches, across her shoulders three feet, round her waist five feet six inches, and weighs the enormous weight of twenty-one stone. Her eldest son is twenty-five years of age, stands six feet two inches, weighs eighteen stone five pounds, and at the present time he is a Life-Guard. All the sons and daughters were of large dimensions. Miss ANN O'NEAL, the eldest daughter, is twenty years of age; she stands five feet six inches in height, and measures round the arm twenty-seven inches, across the shoulders one yard and a half, round her waist eight feet, and has the enormous weight of thirty-nine stone. Her youngest sister is eighteen years of age; she stands five feet two inches in height, measures round her arm twenty-five inches, across her shoulders three feet, round her waist six feet, and weighs twenty-three stone. The eldest daughter is, as may well be imagined, on account of her obesity, scarcely able to walk. She appears to be uneasy on her legs, and is compelled to lean up against the wall for support.

—This is not very new, but it's pretty good: JAMES HOGG, the Ettrick Shepherd, was first introduced to THOMAS CAMPBELL, the author of the Pleasures of Hope, at a literary party in Waterloo Place, in the year 1832. On the Shepherd being presented to the poet as Mr. CAMPBELL, he exclaimed, "There is only one CAMPBELL in the world, and that's TOM CAMPBELL." To which, in high glee, the latter responded, "And there's only one HOGG in the world, and that's JAMIE HOGG." Lest there should be some delusion as to names, it may be said that the E. Shepherd above alluded to is not a member of the book-publishing firm of L. & S., Boston, but another man.

—Bavaria's young king is about to wed the eldest daughter of the Prince of Anhalt-Dessau. It will be remembered that the wedding ceremonies between the King and the Princess of Bavaria, sister-in-law of the Emperor of Austria, were ruthlessly broken off for some reasons never thoroughly understood.

—President GRANT is a merry man on occasion. When he reached the platform on the terribly cold night of the Inauguration Ball, Governor COOKE informed him that the guests wished to shake his hand, whereupon the President remarked that not only his hand, but his whole body, had been shaking for some time.

—ALEXANDRE DUMAS and GEORGE SAND have jointly written a tragedy, entitled Brutus, which VICTOR HUGO says is superior to any tragedy ever written in modern times.

—In the Rev. Mr. FALCONER'S church in Denny, near Dundee, a ludicrous scene recently occurred on a Sunday. A candidate for the office of precentor at the first and second psalms was like to break down altogether. At the third psalm he selected a long-metre tune to a short-metre psalm, but got over the difficulty by tacking on two words of the next line, though he made a mess of it at the close of the verse. Exhausted by his efforts, he addressed the congregation thus: "Ladies and gentlemen, I confess that I am dead beat by the way in which the psalmody is conducted in this church." At the close of the sermon he again addressed the congregation with great volubility, and concluded by offering to bet a sovereign that he could thrash any man in Denny for musical talent. Whereupon the church-goers quickly ran away, leaving the artist speaking.

—That most opulent of all Scottish peers, the Marquis of Bute, is said to be seriously contemplating a visit to this country during the coming summer.

—Governor SPRAGUE, of Rhode Island (says the World), has a private telegraphic communication between his house at Narraganset and New York. Such things are not uncommon. The editors of the World, Tribune, and Herald have wires from their offices to their residences, and are in frequent communication. The instrument used is of the printing pattern, and is manipulated without difficulty. The DREXELS have a private wire from their office here to their office in Philadelphia, and that sort of thing is getting to be quite common with men of a high degree of bullion.

Hosted by Google

Newspaper Rack with Wood Painting.

THIS elegant newspaper rack is made of linden-wood. The upper part of the back, and the front, which is joined to the back with a soufflet of brown shagreen leather, are ornamented with sepia painting. Fig. 53, Supplement, gives the design for the front; the design for the back may be easily arranged from this design. The outer edge of the rack is furnished with a rich binding of light and dark brown inlaid leather, which is ornamented with round and oblong brass plates as shown by the illustration. In the middle, at the top of the back, this binding forms a medallion, on which is worked a monogram on brown silk with gold thread and brown silk. The front is finished at the top with a turned brown polished wooden bar trimmed with tassels. Two pieces of brown cord, furnished with brass rings and fastened on the back as shown by the illustration, serve to hang up the rack.

NEWSPAPER RACK WITH WOOD PAINTING.
For design see Supplement, No. XV., Fig. 53.

Crochet Tidy, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS tidy may be worked with knitting cotton or with twisted crochet cotton, according to the size desired. First work the requisite number of separate rosettes, beginning from the middle, and crocheting for each rosette six rounds, as follows: Work 1 ch. (chain stitch), form of the projecting end of thread a very small ring of several windings, work 1 sc. (single crochet) on the ring, and then work the 1st round.—10 ch.; in the first three of these, which count as first dc. (double crochet), crochet on the end of the working thread; five times alternately 1 dc. on the thread ring, 7 ch.; finally, 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the last of the 3 ch. which count as first dc., and 3 sl. on the following 3 ch. 2d round.—6 stc. (short treble crochet) separated each by 1 ch. on the middle st. (stitch) of each ch. scallop; instead of the first stc. at the beginning of the round, work 4 ch.; finally, 1 sl. on the last of these 4 ch. 3d round.—1 dc. on each ch. between the 6 stc. of each scallop, after each of the first four of these dc. always 3 ch.; instead of the first dc. at the beginning of the round work 1 sc. and 3 ch. At the end of the round work 1 sl. on the last of the 3 ch. which count as first dc., and 4 sl. on the next 4 st. 4th round.—* 4 ch., 2 dc. separated by 7 ch. on the middle dc. of the scallop, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the next dc., 5 ch., 1 sc. on the second dc. of the following scallop; repeat from *. After the last 5 ch. at the end of the round work 1 sc. on the last of the 4 sl. at the end of the preceding round. 5th round.—3 ch., which count as first dc., 8 dc. on the next 8 st., * 5 dc. on the following middle ch. of the point, 9 dc. on the next 9 st., 1 sc. on the middle of the next 5 ch., pass over the following 2 ch.; 9 dc. on the next 9 st., and repeat from *. At the end of the round work 1 sl. on the last of the 3 ch. which count as first dc. 6th round.—2 sl. on the next 2 st., twice alternately 7 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth following st., * 7 ch., 1 sc. on the second following st., twice alternately 7 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth following st., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third following dc. of the next point, 7 ch., fasten to the middle st. of the preceding scallop of 7 ch. (to do this drop the st. from the needle, insert the needle into the st. to which the fastening is to be done, and draw the dropped st. through from the under to the upper side), 7 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the last ch. scallop, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth following st. of the point, 7 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth following st., and repeat from . At the end of the round crochet after the last 3 ch. in the hollow between two points 3 sl. on the first 3 ch. of the first ch. scallop, then 3 ch., fasten to the middle st. of the preceding scallop of 7 ch., 7 ch. and 1 sc. on the same ch. on which the last sl. was worked. In working the 6th round of each following rosette fasten by means of the ch. scallops to the rosettes already finished, as shown by Fig. 2 on page 213, which gives a full-sized section of the tidy. Edge the finished rosette foundation with an edging consisting of the following four rounds: Begin at the hollow between two rosettes and crochet the 1st round.— 4 stc. separated each by 2 ch. on the middle st. of the next free ch. scallop of the next rosette, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the following ch. scallop, 2 ch., 4 stc. separated each by 2 ch. on the middle st. of each of the next 3 ch. scallops, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch. scallop, 2 ch., 4 stc. separated each by 2 ch. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop, and repeat from ; finally, 1 sl. on the first stc. of this round. 2d round.— 3 ch., 2 dc. separated by 5 ch. on each of the next 2 stc., 3 ch., 1 sc. before and 1 sc. after the next sc., 3 ch., 2 dc. separated by 5 ch. on each of the following 2 stc., 3 ch., + 1 sc. on the joining vein of the following 2 stc., 3 ch., 2 dc. separated by 5 ch. on each of the next 2 stc., 3 ch., repeat once more from +, 1 sc. before and 1 sc. after the next sc., 3 ch., 2 dc. separated by 5 ch. on each of the following 2 stc., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the joining vein between the next 2 stc., and repeat from . 3d round.— 1 sc. on the next scallop of 5 ch. (always insert the needle in the middle st. of the scallops of 5 ch.), 9 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch. scallop, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop, twice alternately 9 ch. and 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the following ch. scallop, then 9 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch. scallop, 9 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop. Work the 4th round in dc., ch., picots, and sc., as plainly shown by the illustration, Fig. 2.

Fig. 1.—MEDALLION IN COLORED EMBROIDERY FOR BLOTTING-PAD.—FULL SIZE.—[See Fig. 3, Page 213.]

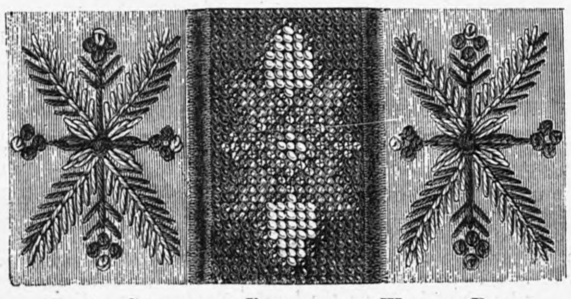

Fig. 1.—SECTION OF BORDER FOR WRITING-DESK. FULL SIZE.—[See Fig. 4, Page 213.]

Fig. 2.—MEDALLION IN COLORED EMBROIDERY FOR BLOTTING-PAD.—FULL SIZE.—[See Fig. 3, Page 213.]

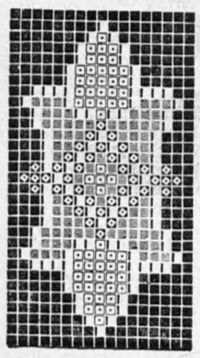

Fig. 2.—FOUNDATION FOR BORDER OF WRITING-DESK, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE. [See Fig. 4, Page 213.]

Description of Symbols: ⊡ Gold, ⫿ Steel, ⊡ Chalk, ■ Crystal, ■ Black Beads.

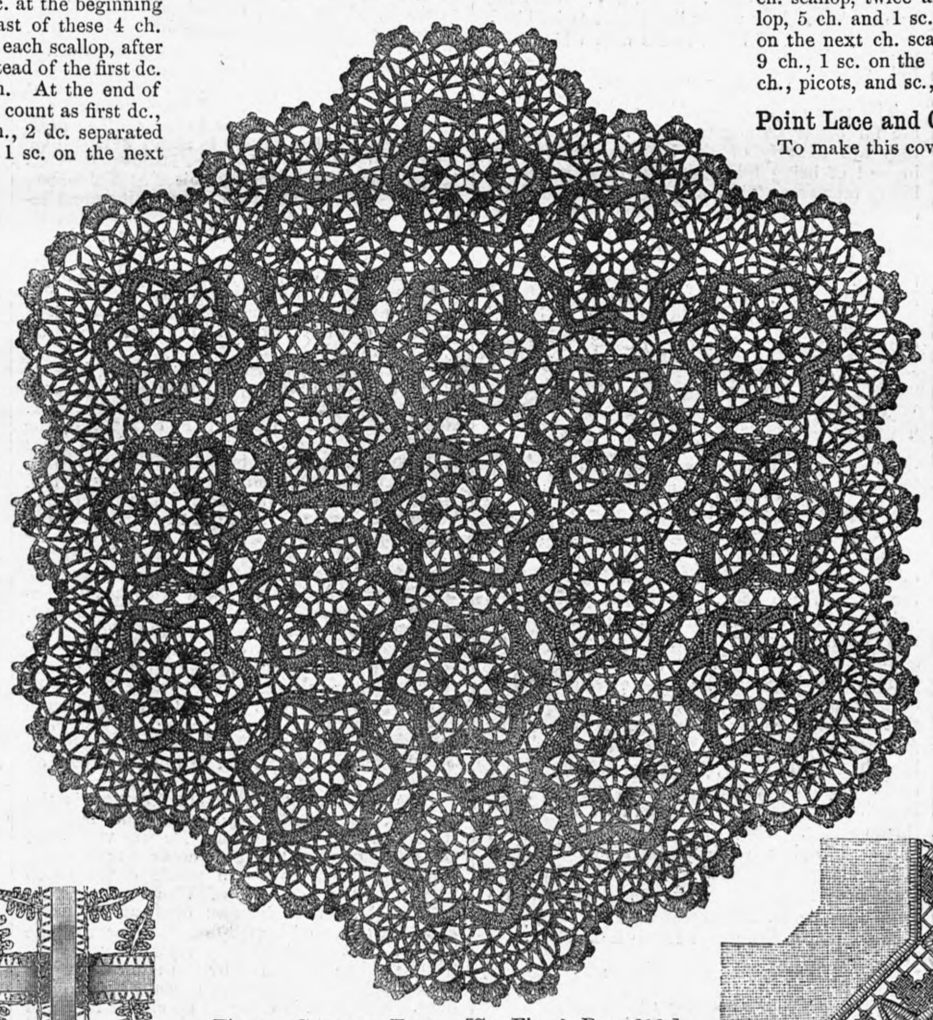

Fig. 1.—CROCHET TIDY.—[See Fig. 2, Page 213.]

Point Lace and Crochet Cover for Toilette Cushions, etc.

To make this cover, of which the illustration gives a quarter section in full size, first run the point lace braid on a foundation of paper or linen along the square lines indicated, and sew the braid together at the intersecting points without passing the needle through the foundation. Then separate the braid lattice-work thus formed from the foundation, and fill the open squares with crochet figures, which are worked with twisted cotton, No. 120, beginning from the middle, as follows: Make a foundation of 10 ch. (chain stitch), close these in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and crochet * 2 sc. (single crochet) on the ring, 4 ch., three times alternately 1 p. (picot—that is, 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), 1 ch., fasten to the edge of one of the point lace braids as shown by the illustration (to do this drop the last stitch from the needle, insert

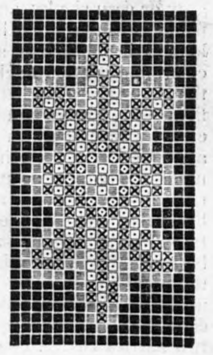

Fig. 3.—FOUNDATION IN BEAD EMBROIDERY FOR BORDER OF WRITING-DESK, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE. [See Fig. 4, Page 213.]

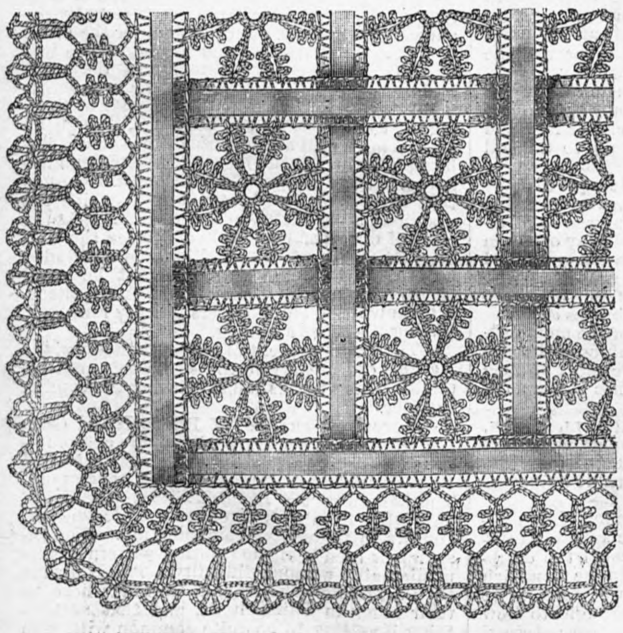
Description of Symbols: ⊠ Crystal, ■ Chalk, ⊡ Milk, ⊡ Steel, ■ Black Beads.



POINT LACE AND CROCHET COVER FOR TOILETTE CUSHIONS, ETC.—QUARTER SECTION.

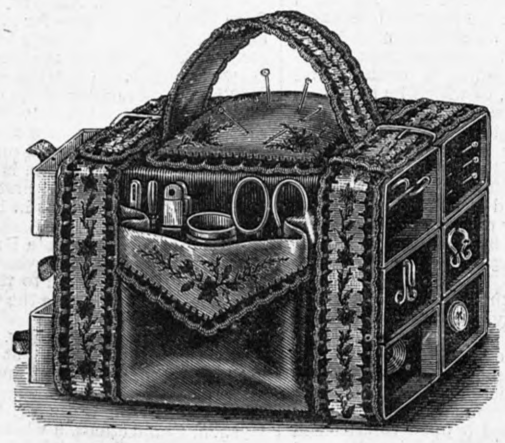


Fig. 1.—NÉCESSAIRE FOR SEWING UTENSILS. [See Fig. 2, Page 213.]

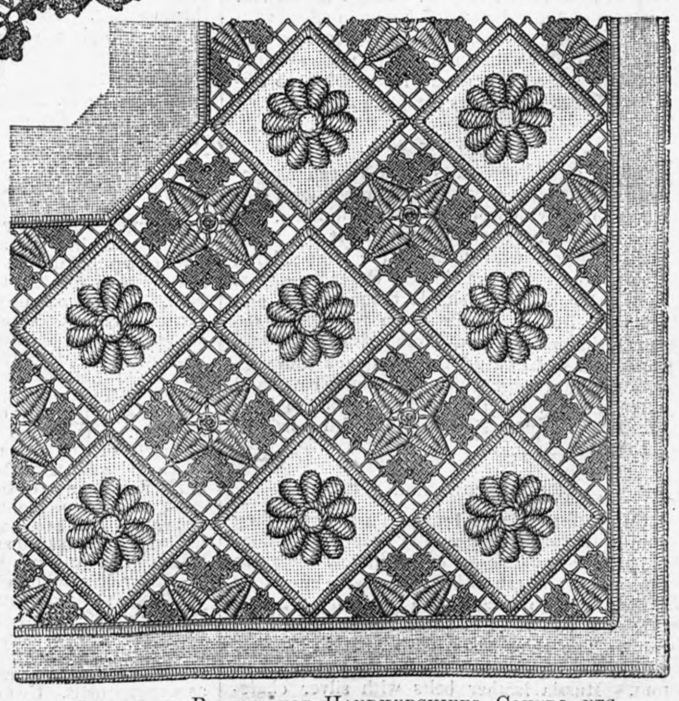

CORNER OF BORDER FOR HANDKERCHIEFS, COVERS, ETC. WHITE EMBROIDERY AND NETTED GUIPURE.

Hosted by Google

the needle in the edge of the braid, and draw through the dropped stitch); three times alternately 1 ch., 1 p., then 3 ch. and 2 sl. on the first 2 of the 4 ch., 1 sl. on the last of the 2 sc., observing the illustration, and repeat from ∗, always going forward. Having filled all the squares in this manner, border the crocheted part all along the outer edge with edging consisting of four rounds: 1st round.—∗ 1 sc. on the outer edge, 6 ch., 2 p. separated by 1 ch., 3 ch., 2 p. separated by 1 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the fifth of the preceding 6 ch., 4 ch., pass over a corresponding portion of the outer edge as shown by the illustration, and repeat from ∗. 2d round.—∗ 1 sc. on the middle ch. of the next p. loop in the preceding round, 2 ch., 1 p. turned downward (to do this crochet 5 ch., drop the last of these from the needle, insert the needle in the first of the 5 ch., and draw through the dropped stitch from the under toward the upper side), 8 ch., and repeat from ∗. 3d round.—∗ 3 treble crochets on the third of the 8 ch. of the next scallop, 5 ch., and repeat from ∗. 4th round.—Four short double crochets separated each by 3 ch. on the middle of every three treble crochets in the preceding round, and between the last and first of these four double crochets always 1 ch. If a tidy is desired in this style the braid of the lattice-work may be lengthened as much as is requisite, and the squares enlarged; of course the cotton used for the crochet figures should then be coarser.

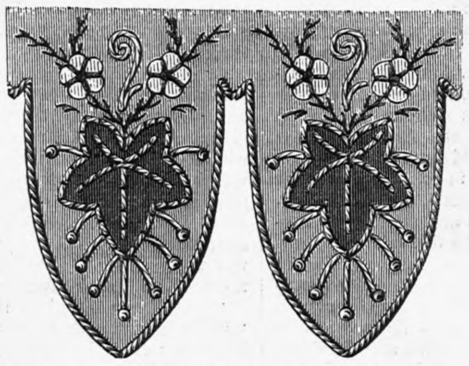

Fig. 2.—LAMBREQUIN IN POINT RUSSE EMBROIDERY FOR KNIFE-STAND.—FULL SIZE.

Blotting-Pad with Embroidered Leather Corners, Figs. 1-3.

THIS useful blotting-pad consists of several sheets of blotting-paper laid one over another, and held together, as shown by Fig. 3, with embroidered leather corners, which are drawn over them. These corners are fastened at the bottom on a piece of stiff card-board the size of the blotting-paper, which serves as a foundation for the whole, and keeps them in place. The soiled blotting-paper may thus be readily replaced by new sheets. For each of the corners cut of brown leather or enameled cloth two pieces of equal size from Fig. 21, Supplement, and in the upper piece cut out the middle part for underlaying the medallion, as indicated on the pattern. The embroidery for the medallion is worked on a foundation of brown silk, cut somewhat larger than the pattern indicates, with brown saddler's silk and gold cord in half-polka stitch, satin stitch, and in point Russe. Baste on the medallion underneath the corresponding piece of leather, and fasten on the latter by means of half-polka stitches and point Russe, as shown by Fig. 1, page 212, or with point Russe button-hole stitches, as shown by Fig. 2, page 212; the rims shown by both these illustrations are worked with brown saddler's silk in two shades. Work the embroidery all around the medallion on the leather with brown silk in chain stitch, as indicated on Fig. 21, Supplement; join both halves of the corners on the straight outer edge with long button-hole stitches of dark brown silk, and edge them with brown silk cord, which is button-hole stitched to the button-hole stitches first worked with silk of a lighter shade.

STAND WITH PINCUSHION.

Writing-Desk with Memorandum Slate, Figs. 1-4.

THIS writing-desk is of card-board covered with red Russia leather. A slab of silica slate, which serves for a tablet, is slipped into the upper part of the desk. The under part of the desk is furnished with a slide box divided into different sections for holding pens, postage stamps, etc. The rim of the desk is trimmed with an embroidered border edged with chenille, and worked partly on red Russia leather with maroon silk in point Russe, and partly on perforated board with beads.—Fig. 1, page 212, shows a full-sized section of the border. Figs. 2 and 3, page 212, give two designs for the bead embroidery with description of symbols. Fig. 4, on this page, shows the desk complete.

Fig. 3.—BLOTTING-PAD WITH EMBROIDERED LEATHER CORNERS.—[See Figs. 1 and 2, Page 212.]
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. VI., Fig. 21.

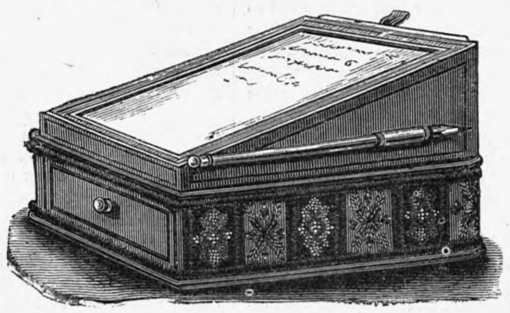

Fig. 4.—WRITING-DESK WITH MEMORANDUM SLATE.—[See Figs. 1–3, Page 212.]

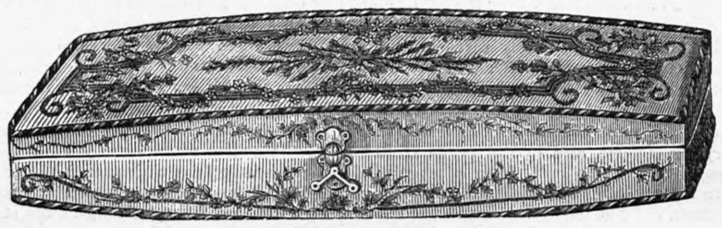

EMBROIDERED GLOVE-BOX.
For design see Supplement, No. XIV., Fig. 52.

Embroidered Glove-Box.

THIS glove-box is made of card-board, and is fourteen inches long, three inches and three-quarters wide, two inches and seven-eighths high in the middle, and two inches and a half high at each end. It is covered on the outside with light gray gros grain, which is ornamented with silk of various colors in satin, half-polka, and chain stitch, and in point Russe. The design for the lid is given by Fig. 52, Supplement. The inside of the box is lined with white silk thinly wadded and perfumed, and quilted in diamonds. The edge is bordered with fine variegated silk cord as shown by the illustration. The bottom is covered with white watered paper.

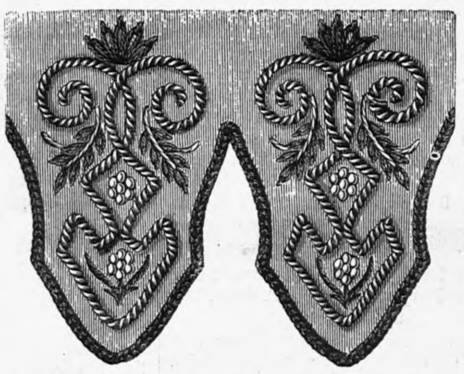

Fig. 3.—LAMBREQUIN IN POINT RUSSE EMBROIDERY FOR KNIFE-STAND.—FULL SIZE.

Stand with Pincushion.

THIS stand is made of carved wood, partly stained brown and partly polished black. The lower part of the stand, which is supported by three feet, is furnished with a high pincushion, which is covered with green silk and trimmed on the edge with points of green velvet. These points are ornamented with gold beads and point Russe stitches of gold thread, and are edged with gold cord, which forms a loop at the end of each point, and is fastened with button-hole stitches of black silk. The seam made by setting on the points is covered by twisted cord of black silk and gold. Above the cushion, connected with the middle bar of the stand, is a small plate of black polished wood, designed to hold loose pins, and edged with a lambrequin arranged similar to the points.

Stand for Fruit Knives, Figs. 1-4.

THIS stand is of black polished and brown stained wood, and is furnished at the top with a lambrequin of gray cloth, and at the foot with a border of gray cloth. Figs. 2 and 4 show full-sized sections of the lambrequin and border. The leaves and flowers of the lambrequin are applied in gray cloth; the veins and edges of the leaves and the binding of the points are formed by gold cord sewed on with fine cross stitches of black silk. The remainder of the embroidery is worked in point Russe and half-polka stitch with saddler's silk of various colors. The embroidery of the border is worked in a similar manner. The design, Fig. 3, may be used instead of the lambrequin, Fig. 2. The outlines of this design and the binding of the lambrequins are of fine silk gimp cord. The rest of the embroidery is worked in point Russe with colored saddler's silk and with beads. This stand will be found very convenient for nut-pickers, etc.

Fig. 1.—STAND FOR FRUIT KNIVES. [See Figs. 2–4.]

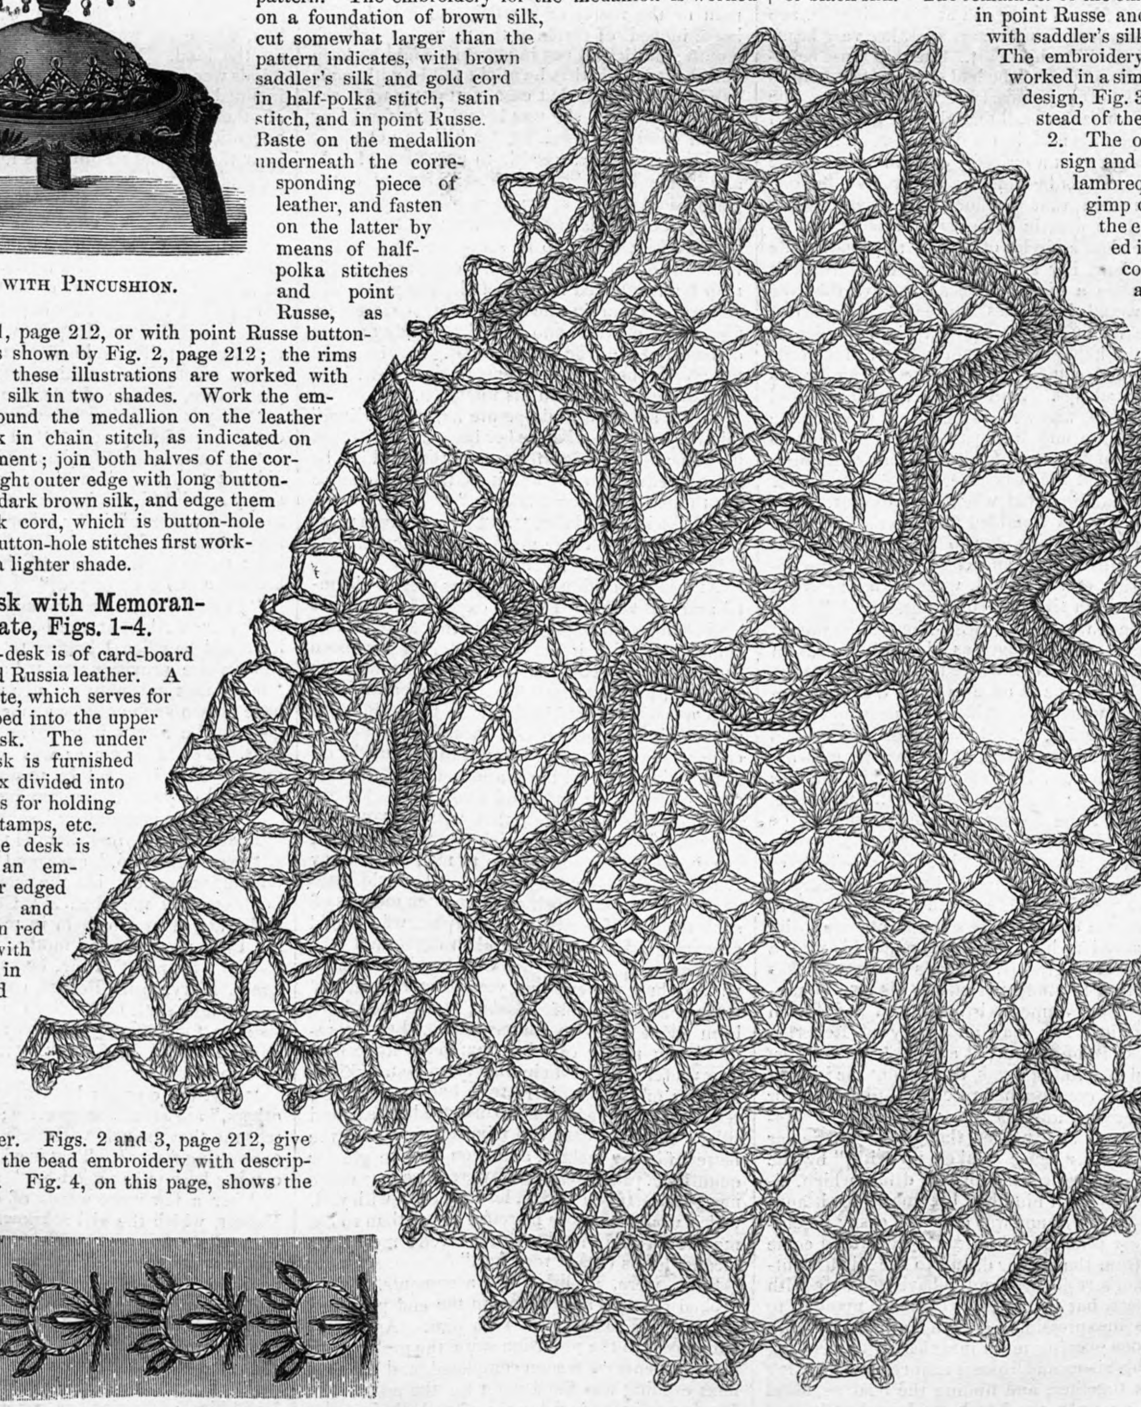

Fig. 2.—SIXTH SECTION OF CROCHET TIDY.—FULL SIZE. [See Fig. 1, Page 212.]

Nécessaire for Sewing Utensils, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustration on page 212.

THE foundation of this nécessaire consists of six oblong slide boxes of card-board, for which powder boxes, which can be obtained at any apothecary's, may be used. In the original the boxes are four inches and a half long each, an inch and a half wide, and an inch high, but the size may be arranged at pleasure. Cover these boxes with black velvet at each end. On the pieces of velvet designed for one end first fasten one of the articles which the box is to contain, such as a hook, an eye, a button, etc., as shown by the illustration; before covering the other end fasten on the middle of the card-board a ribbon loop, boring a hole through the card-board, and drawing the ends of the loop through the hole to the inside; paste on the ends of the ribbon there, and cover them by pasting on a piece of card-board. Of course this loop is also passed through the velvet to the outside. The boxes, covered in this manner, are then placed one above another as shown by the illustration. Cover the nécessaire smoothly with gray cloth, fasten crosswise on the middle of both sides several ribbon bands, which are designed for holding scissors, thimble, knife, etc., and set on a pocket of gray cloth, which is lined with red silk, and furnished on the upper edge with a revers of the material; the revers are ornamented with point Russe embroidery of gray silk, and edged on the outer edge with long button-hole stitches and with open-work button-hole stitch scallops of similar silk. For the scallops, first work one row of even button-hole stitches; then work a second row of close button-hole stitches on the horizontal part of these loops. On the upper surface of the nécessaire set a pincushion of red silk, ornamented in point Russe embroidery, and edged with button-hole stitch scallops, and a handle of gray cloth and red silk six inches long and seven-eighths of an inch wide. The handle is also ornamented in point Russe embroidery in the design shown by Fig. 2; the outer edge of the handle is bordered by button-hole stitch scallops. Two bands arranged similarly to the handle, and which are closed with small steel buckles, complete the cover of the nécessaire, as shown by the illustration.

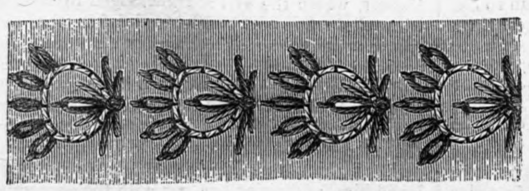

Fig. 4.—SECTION OF POINT RUSSE BORDER FOR KNIFE-STAND.—FULL SIZE.

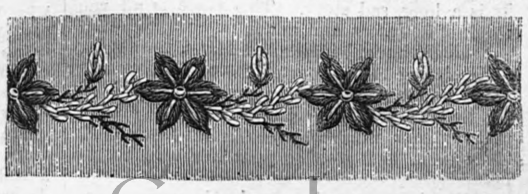

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF POINT RUSSE BORDER FOR SEWING NÉCESSAIRE.—FULL SIZE.—[See Fig. 1, Page 212.]

Digitized by Google

Corner of Border for Handkerchiefs, Covers, etc. White Embroidery and Netted Guipure.

See Illustration on page 212.

To make this border a foundation of fine woven netting is required. On this foundation work at regular intervals separate figures with fine thread in point de reprise and point de toile, and fill the centre of each figure with a wheel, as shown by the illustration. On the free spaces of the netting baste squares of straight Swiss muslin, in the centre of each of which a flower figure has first been worked in half-polka and satin stitch, as shown by the illustration: button-hole stitch the squares straight on the foundation, and cut away the projecting Swiss muslin on the right side of the foundation, and the netted foundation underneath the Swiss muslin squares, close to the button-hole stitches. Button-hole stitch the inner and outer edges of the border closely; the outer edge of the border may be finished with guipure lace.

NOT FOR LOVE.

EDITH was fair indeed, and I was free;
But that which had been was not so to be—
My heart awoke, and Edith smiled on me;
But not for love.
In winter deep I dreamed of summer shine,
And all my hopes were false as they were fine.

And I was happy then as I might be.
Warm spring had painted every field and tree;
And Edith sang sweet ditties unto me;
But not for love.
And I had looked upon her budded youth
As on a book of innocence and truth.

And knowing not of poison in the wine,
I said, "And may I link my life with thine?"
She whispered, "Yes," and placed her hand in mine;
But not for love.
And I lay in a sweet swoon of delight,
And thought it daytime in the depth of night.

'Twas coming soon, too soon, when I should keep
My days in darkness and my eyes from sleep;
When Edith, without sorrowing, should weep,
And not for love.
O that a maid should sigh upon her glove,
And mimic fondness where there is no love!

MURPHY'S MASTER.

BY JAMES PAYN,

Author of "A Woman's Vengeance," "Bred in the Bone," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," etc.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE EMBARKATION.

"I'M here!" observed a dogged voice, presently; not as a warning that there was a spectator of the fond pair's rapture (which, indeed, they already had in Mary), but as a hint that he had been overlooked.

"Oh, Jim, of course," said Robert, a little awkwardly, but shaking him all the more warmly by the hand, to make up for the neglect.

Jim was not improved in appearance since the old forest days. He had that slouching, defiant look which is acquired from habitual conflict with the law, and he looked dissatisfied besides. "This ain't much of a place," said he, "to come to, across the world, considering how you've cracked it up. There is not a tree as I can see, and where the game's to come from—"

"Oh, Jim! how can you," broke in Lizzy, tearfully, "after what your mother said!" She was not easily moved to tears, as Robert knew, but he had perceived that she was in deep mourning, and guessed the cause, which had prevented him from asking after her mother.

"Oh yes," continued Jim, "it's all very fine for you, who have your young man here, which is all you want. But what I want to know is, Why we're here? Why didn't we stay in Melbourne, where we should have been right enough, and Robert have joined us there, instead of—"

"I could not join you there," interposed Robert, gravely. "I wish I could have done so. It is a long, sad story. This place is all you think of it, James, and much, much worse—"

"Hush, hush!" interposed Mary, warningly, and pointing to the door of the other room that made up the cottage, and in which the rest of the Beamish family were asleep. "Tell him all that another time—not here: it is not safe. Take them both over to your house to breakfast."

"You have sense in your head, young woman," observed Jim, approvingly.

"And kindness in her heart, I am sure," added Lizzy, gratefully. "She has been so kind to me, Robert!"

"Don't speak of that, miss," said Mary. "It was only fortunate that I happened to have been asked to stay with some friends at the harbor for a few days, and so chanced to be there this morning when you arrived. I knew that my mother's roof, such as it is, would give you welcome, and I also knew that Mr. Chesney here would have gone mad if you did not come to New Town. —Both Maguire and Murphy, Sir" (turning to Robert), "looked very black at me, but, thanks to you, I have my own way with every body now."

And so it was. The Governor in no way molested her, but his craze of imagining her to be his consort made her much "looked up to" by the colony in general, while, after the lesson that Maguire had received, he scrupulously avoided her presence, though without doubt awaiting his own day of recompense.

A few hours put Robert in possession of all that had happened to Lizzy since he sailed to seek what he now felt to be indeed his ill-starred fortune. Her mother had succumbed to the illness of which she had written to him while at Liverpool, and that loss to the orphaned girl had been more deplorable, since it rendered her more subject to the hateful solicitations of John Rowland. Her brother, indeed, remained to her, but it was easy to see, though Lizzy strove to disguise it, that he had not played the part of guardian as he should have done. Perhaps he was too much in Rowland's power to do so; perhaps he was not unwilling to become allied by marriage with one who could not only screen his offenses, but offer him great opportunities for indulging in his favorite pursuit. At all events, it was plain that poor Lizzy had been greatly persecuted. Love alone could scarcely have accounted for the rapture which she now evinced in having found a home which, humble though it was, was subject to no intrusion, or for the happy confidence she showed in Robert's protecting arm. He had not the heart to fully disclose to her how weak that arm really was; and indeed it would have been hard to convince his hearers, fresh from the well-ordered glades of Windsor, of the abnormal and anarchic condition of things on Murphy's Island, and of the perils from a mad despot in the one case, from a revengeful traitor in the other, in which they stood. What he told them did but make Jim more than ever curse his fate in having quitted, first England, and then Melbourne, for "this cussed island"—a very natural, but at the same time an ungenerous expression of feeling, whereat Robert winced; while, on the other hand, it made Lizzy nestle in his arms the closer, whose dear embrace filled him with trembling fears. When he bethought him now that for his sake, and at his invitation, she had come to such a perilous spot, her very beauty sent a chill to his heart. She was more beautiful even than when he had seen her last, and as he had so often pictured her while absent. She was no longer the tall and slender girl that had hung upon his neck in passionate farewell but six months ago, but a graceful woman. Her simple mourning dress became her admirably; the one black ribbon that confined her plentiful soft brown hair was, in his eyes at least, more attractive than a circlet of pearls; the small white collar about her shapely throat embellished it better than a diamond necklace, save that the latter would have less concealed its charms. Her pearls and diamonds were in her eyes, in which the happy tears would gather at his words of love and comfort, to be kissed away by his long-stinted lips. And yet one of that reunited pair, at least, was well aware that it was no time for courtship and love passages; and how to escape from Murphy's Island was the one thought that occupied him whenever he dared to think. Notwithstanding that when she was out of his sight he always trembled for Lizzy's safety, he did not omit once a day to put to sea as usual in his little boat, and coast round to the opposite side of the island, where alone he could hope to catch sight of some passing sail. He would have taken Lizzy with him had he dared, but fraught with danger as his position was in any case, to have infringed Kavanagh's edict would, he felt, be at once to draw down on him —or, what was worse, on her—the pent-up vengeance of Maguire. That Kavanagh, if not won over by the latter, was, at all events, growing more and more unfavorable toward himself, was only too plain: not only was he still forbidden to approach the harbor, but the permission he had applied for to give up his own residence to Lizzy and her brother, had been coldly—perhaps cynically—denied to him, as being derogatory to Robert's position as Lieutenant-Governor. Under pretense of being his servant, however, Jim was allowed to have a lodging under his roof, a privilege only granted perhaps because it was known that it would not add to his own domestic comfort. James Alston indeed had shown himself little less than an enemy of Robert's. He spoke ill of him, or, at all events, in dissatisfied and grumbling terms, throughout the island; and was in consequence received into open favor with Murphy, and, as was whispered, by Maguire himself. Another, though less particular reason for his being "taken up with," by the former at least, was his love for drink, which, always manifest in him, had become on the island, where strong liquor was only too easily procurable, very pronounced indeed. He would come home from the harbor drunk to the Lieutenant-Governor's residence, and behave not only with disrespect, but in the most offensive manner, to Lizzy's inexpressible concern: at last, coming home one evening more intoxicated than usual, when his sister and Robert chanced to be taking a walk together, and finding the boat as usual drawn up upon the beach, he launched it, and paddled out to sea. Robert saw him from the shore, and hurried home, not daring to communicate to Lizzy the apprehensions that audacious act inspired within him; but the mischief had been done. Even if the fact of this contravention of the law could have been concealed through the good-nature of those who witnessed it—which was more than doubtful, since Jim had rendered himself far from popular in New Town —the culprit would have thrown away that chance, for he boasted openly of the deed, affirming in one breath that he was an Englishman, who owed no obedience to Kavanagh nor any other "Irish body," and in the next that Murphy and Maguire were hand and glove with him, and would see he did not come to harm.

The next morning he was seized under Chesney's roof, and carried off to the harbor, where the latter dared not follow him: the arrest itself might have been made, and very likely was so, with the very intention of thus getting the Lieutenant-Governor into the net of despotic law; and though he would have run the risk had he himself only stood in peril, he dared not do so with Lizzy dependent on him. Moreover, he did not anticipate any very severe sentence upon Alston, from the fact of his connection with Murphy. Lizzy, however, was beyond measure alarmed and solicitous upon her brother's account, and at once hastened over with Mary Beamish to Government House. With Kavanagh she was sternly denied an interview; but Maguire coolly informed her that if her brother's life was spared, it would be so, as Robert's had been, on the condition that he should make a disclosure of certain state secrets, and in the mean time he was to remain in prison. To Lizzy this was inexplicable, but Robert understood but too well what it meant: James Alston was to be kept in confinement, with the fear of death hanging over him, until he should confess to some treasonable words spoken by the Lieutenant-Governor; and indeed, when in company with his sister, he had heard Robert speak frankly enough, and needed no imagination to invent them. Whether he should have the baseness to betray them was at present doubtful; but the one thing certain, whether as regarded the prisoner's fate or his own, was that not a moment was to be lost in leaving the island. The state of affairs had become intolerable, and must be put an end to at all risks. He could now handle the little boat with ease, whether with sail or oar, and, small as she was, had acquired great confidence in her. So long as the sea was tolerably smooth—and it was now fair weather—he felt that she would float well enough; though any thing like a gale would without doubt sink her. He knew his course to Melbourne, and made up his mind to tempt the dangers of the deep, though it was but in a cockle-shell, rather than trust any longer to the caprice of a madman or the mercy of a villain. He had small hope, indeed, of reaching the main-land in such a craft; but it was not impossible, could he keep her above water, that he might fall in with some passing vessel: in that case, no matter what she was, nor whither she was bound, help for Lizzy would surely be obtained, for had he not about him the money wherewith to purchase it! At any moment he might be himself arrested, or the permission to enter the boat withdrawn from him, and even this last desperate plan be thereby entirely frustrated; so he set about his arrangements at once. His glass, his compass, and his map he disinterred from their hiding-place, and concealed them in the gig; he also stored an abundance of water and provisions ready to place on board of it at the last moment. But he could not go—he had not the heart to do so—without acquainting Lizzy with his intention.

"It is a wild and desperate hazard, darling," said he, having set before her both the perils that he was about to flee from, and those which he must needs incur; "but it is the last chance left to me, and I must take it."

"Take it," cried she, "and may Heaven prosper it; but if you love me, Robert, grant me one thing: take me with you!"

At this proposition Chesney was greatly alarmed and distressed. He had expected arguments against his own departure, but this sympathetic compliance with it embarrassed him far more than opposition could have done. The idea was hopeless, preposterous. To dare the ocean in so frail a bark himself he knew to be perilous in excess; but to permit one so delicate and precious to share that peril was not to be thought of. And yet she pleaded hard, and not without some show of argument and good sense.

"I could say, Robert, that without you, and knowing the dangers to which you were exposed, life would be here intolerable to me; I could say that, left without your protection, I would rather die than trust myself to the tender mercies of such men as Maguire and Murphy, who would at once guess that you had taken flight, and take vengeance upon poor me, who would alone be within their power; but you have thought of these things yourself, I know, though you have been silent on them for my sake. Let me remind you rather of what you have forgotten: how useful my poor help may be to you. I know nothing of the sea, it is true, but on the river, remember, I have learned to manage both sail and tiller; the little boat will trim no worse, but the better, for my weight, and even for the greater quantity of provisions that my presence may make necessary. If you perish, let me perish with you, which would be more merciful to me than to bid me live on; and if, through Heaven's mercy, we escape, let us escape together."

Such were, in brief, her arguments, which, backed by tears and kisses, in the end prevailed on her lover to carry her with him. As Robert had access to the provision store, the preliminary arrangements were soon completed, and the very next evening was fixed upon for the adventure. It was necessary to delay till after dusk, in order that they should elude the pinnace, which, without doubt, would instantly be sent after them. But with eight hours or so of clear start, Robert hoped that he would elude pursuit; once out of sight of the island, he would be safe: not even Maguire was capable of shaping his course to Melbourne without the aid of a compass, and, fortunately enough, there was none such on the island save that which Robert possessed. The date of the fugitive's escape was delayed by a curious circumstance. Robert, who had purposely avoided Lizzy's company for some hours, in order to avoid suspicion, was alone in his house, making a few final preparations, when suddenly a violent report shook the frail tenement, so that the glass fell from the windows, and every thing on the shelves was thrown to the ground. The whole population of the village were in the street in an instant to seek the explanation of the phenomenon, which they deemed as before to proceed from the explosion of some gigantic piece of ordnance; for the sky was without a cloud, and no indication of thunder was to be felt in the atmosphere, which was serene and cool. Lizzy herself, accompanied by Mary Beamish, ran across to Robert's house, and, with joyful cries, averred that some ship of war was nearing the harbor. He met them at the door, with an excited but unjoyful face.

"The sentry is still on the hill-top," said he, "which shows that he has seen no ship. My belief is that it is"—before he could say "an earthquake" another shock took place, even more violent than before, and accompanied by a strange appearance in the sea; the waves were rising and roaring upon the shore like water that is about to boil.

"The boat, the boat!" cried he, and rushed down to the spot where it was beached, a little remote from the village, followed by the two young women. With their assistance he was able to drag it up far higher on the shore; but they were only just in time. The waves, gathering strength and volume every moment, swept over the very place where it had lain in a few minutes, and one even, the sixth and largest, caught themselves as they fled up hill before it; they escaped, however, with a thorough wetting, and the boat being laden, was too heavy to be dragged down by its recoil. After the sixth wave, the sea went back again to its usual limits, but continued greatly disturbed. The houses in New Town were all more or less damaged, and one or two swept away: though there were no lives lost, the people were in a state of great perplexity and alarm, which Robert in vain attempted to allay by assuring them that the earthquake was over. He could convince none except Lizzy and Mary, who had been greatly impressed by his sagacity in respect to the danger that menaced the boat; although he was solely indebted for his knowledge to a narrative he had somewhere read of the great earthquake at Lisbon, where the waves had risen and swallowed up the land. Now was the time, when men's minds were occupied with vague terrors, and disinclined to concern themselves with the affairs of others, for the fugitives to put their plan into execution: at night-fall, accordingly, by which hour the sea had resumed its former calm, Robert and Lizzy stole out to where they had left the boat, and proceeded to push it down the hill. As they were thus employed a hand was laid upon Robert's arm, and his blood ran cold within him. To be served with a writ of ne exeat regno at such a momentous crisis would have gone nigh to kill him, and he expected no less than to see Maguire or Murphy, with help to back them, come to forbid his departure. To his immense relief, however, his eyes only met Mary's pretty face, with a sad sweet smile upon it.

"So you are going away—you two—without even a good-by to me," sighed she.

"We are, dear Mary," answered Lizzy: "we did not tell you of our intention only in order that you might be in ignorance when taxed with the knowledge of it by others. Besides, in a few weeks at farthest, with Heaven's aid, we hope to be back again with help for my poor brother and for all of you."

"I knew Mr. Chesney was going," said Mary, softly. "I felt that the boat was heavier than it should be when I helped to beach it to-day. 'There are provisions in it,' said I to myself, 'under that tarpauling;' nor would he, I felt, have shown such anxiety about the safety of the gig, had he meant it to serve only as a fishing boat. Yes, I knew he was going, and even guessed that it would be to-night; but I never dreamed of your accompanying him, Lizzy."

"Will you come also?" said Lizzy, tenderly. "There is room, and there is food."

"No, dear, no," answered Mary. "The temptation is great, but the people here will have no friend but me when Mr. Chesney has gone, and I am of use to them in many ways: above all, I can not leave my mother."

"In a fortnight's time, be sure we shall meet again, Mary," said Robert, consolingly. "Not one instant shall be lost by me in procuring assistance for you all—for you above all, Mary," and he kissed her cheek, "to whom we both owe so much."

"You will do your best, as you always do for others," answered she, gravely; "but something tells me that the help will come too late—that we are parting forever. That is why I could not help coming here to say good-by."

After a few more words of consolation from Robert, which the girl acknowledged in silence, with the same sad smile, and after the two young women had affectionately embraced, the boat was launched, Mary running into the waves, and pushing it off with her own hands. Robert watched her standing on the shore until her form faded away into the dusk, every stroke of his oars sounding in his ears like a muffled funeral bell. I think that Lizzy also knew that Mary loved him, and pitied her, not with the contemptuous pity that some who have won the wealth for which they toiled have for the poor, and that some women have for their unsuccessful rivals, but with true and genuine tenderness.

Digitized by Google

"Since it can not now be seen from the island," said Robert, breaking the long silence, "we can put up the sail;" and he did so.

CHAPTER XX.

THE END OF THE ISLAND.

THEY sailed all night, the sea being tolerably tranquil, in what Robert judged to be the right direction; but the clouds gathered heavily and hid the stars, so that he could make use neither of them nor of the compass. Lizzy was very helpful to him in the management of the boat, and he allowed her to do more than was necessary, in order to distract her thoughts. As for sleep, anxiety forbade her even to close her eyes. At sunrise, which in these latitudes occurs at once, without the streaks of dawn that herald it at home, they looked anxiously about them, and beheld the island still lying at a great distance. The wind had unfortunately changed in the night, and their course with it. They lowered their sail at once, in hopes to have escaped observation, and Robert took to the oars, and pulled his best. But either the sail had already attracted the notice of those on land, or the gig itself was discernible by means of the telescope. Before half an hour had elapsed their worst apprehensions were confirmed by seeing the pinnace leave the harbor, and, with a favorable breeze, bear directly down upon them. Robert once more put up the little sail, and rowed as before with all his might, while Lizzy steered; but it was evident that his exertions were useless.

"We are lost," he murmured, "and I have been her destruction." He felt sure that Kavanagh, urged by Maguire, would condemn Lizzy to death for disobeying his edict, probably without permitting him to speak in her defense: nay, if permitted, what would his words avail!

Lizzy awaited her fate in silence, keeping her loving eyes fixed on her companion's face; there were no tears in them now: English born and English bred, she was not one easily to give up hope, nor, indeed, was she so deeply impressed as Robert was with Kavanagh's despotic power. "He would surely never put her brother to death, though he might frighten him, far less herself or Robert."

She was soon fated to be undeceived. The pinnace came up to them very rapidly, and on her deck they could perceive Murphy himself, with three of the most devoted of his adherents. The former leveled a revolver at Robert's head as she came alongside, and bade him and "the deserter" come on board. There was nothing for it but to obey. The unhappy fugitives were transferred to the pinnace, which immediately put about for the island—clumsily enough, for Murphy knew little of seamanship, and his men less—with the gig fastened by a rope in tow. Robert was bound hand and foot, and thrown into the bows. Only one sentence more was vouchsafed by Murphy. "It is lucky for you, traitor," said he to his prisoner, "that Maguire was not in my place. He would have shot you down like a dog. There is now, however, twelve hours of life before you, since you will die at sunset. As for this girl, she will not be hung, since I have taken a fancy to her myself;" and he looked toward Lizzy with sullen approval.

"Fool, idiot, that I was!" thought Robert, his helpless frame trembling with fury. He had a pistol in his pocket, and might have settled accounts at least with this miscreant at the moment when he was overtaken, but he had forborne to do it upon Lizzy's account, and lest the other men, who were also armed, might in revenge have killed her on the spot. Now, for her sake, he regretted that he had not done so. The poor girl was sitting in the stern, with her eyes fixed on the sea, and her face pale as death—the death which Robert knew that she was meditating. After Murphy's words she had made up her mind not to be carried ashore alive. Presently the sea became extraordinarily agitated, and the vessel, guided as it was by such unskillful hands, began to be unmanageable.

"If you will loose my limbs," said Robert, "I will save the ship: otherwise you will all four go to the bottom sooner than you expected."

The three men looked at Murphy, as much as to say, "There's something in that."

"The Governor's orders were that he was to be bound hand and foot," mused Murphy; "but then, on the other hand, he was to be brought back; and if we sink, that can't be done." On the whole, he thought his master's orders—and he thought of nothing else—justified him in cutting Robert's bonds, and handing him the tiller, not, however, without this caution, "If you do not steer direct for the island, I will blow your brains out."

"I must steer as the sea will let me," answered Robert, coolly. A grim calmness had settled down upon him: the thought that he could kill Murphy at any moment was a very considerable comfort, and whenever he looked toward Lizzy he longed to do so. The sea still continued very rough, notwithstanding that there was scarcely any wind, and a cloudless sky. A wave would sometimes sweep the deck from end to end, and the blinding spray dashed over the bows like a fountain.

"You are not steering for the harbor!" roared Murphy presently, and fingering the butt of his revolver.

"The spray flies so high and thick that I can not even see the island," was Robert's quiet reply. "Where is it?"

Ay, where was it? It had been seen a minute ago about half a league to the southwest, and now it was not visible.

Murphy and his men looked out for it with eager eyes; Lizzy lifted up her head, and languidly looked about her, though the question had little interest for her, since she never meant to set foot upon the shore. Robert, who knew the very place where it ought to be, could see nothing, though his gaze was prolonged and fixed. This was the more extraordinary, for at this time the waves began sensibly to abate, and the spray with them. The sea, and nothing else, was to be beheld on all sides. Incredible as the fact seemed, there could be no doubt about it: the island was gone.

They sailed on in the direct course in which it ought to lie; but as though it had been a floating island, with power of rapid locomotion, it eluded them.

"There is some witchcraft in this," exclaimed Murphy, turning furiously toward Lizzy. "It is you who have done it, you fair-faced devil."

Robert took out his pistol, cocked it, and placed it on the seat behind him. One of the crew, however, stepped between the girl and Murphy.

"That is nonsense, Dick," said he. "There has been murder done enough already, and who knows but on that very account this thing has happened! Remember Pat Doolan!"

"But the young masther!" ejaculated Murphy, with a groan of agony. "What can have become of him? Oh, Sir" (here he burst into tears, and turned to Robert with outstretched hands and suppliant voice), "I have done you wrong, and meant you worse; but you loved the young masther once yourself—I know it, for that was why I hated you—I pray you, then, for his sake, tell me what has happened! You know so much, while I—I only know that I have lost him!" With that he groveled on the deck, and would have clasped Robert's knees had he permitted it. "Are you sure, are you quite sure, that this is where the island was?"

"I am quite sure of that," answered Robert, gravely; "and what has become of it I think I can also tell you. I have no more experience of such matters than yourself, but I have read that islands are sometimes cast up in the sea, and there remain for many months and years, and then again are swallowed up with shocks as of an earthquake as quickly as they came; and such, as I believe, has been the fate of this one: at all events, it is beyond a doubt that underneath us now is the grave of all your friends, and some of mine."

Lizzy, notwithstanding the miracle, as it seemed, that had been wrought for her deliverance, was weeping bitterly for the fate of her ill-starred brother. Robert, too, hung his head, thinking of the self-sacrificing hands that had pushed his boat off but a few hours ago from what was then land, and were now tossing unlife-like beneath the wave with shingle and with shell. The men, too, were deeply affected, and gazed down into the blue depths, as though it were possible to descry within them the forms of their lost friends—wives, children, comrades. Perhaps, poor fellows, they were simple enough to suppose that the island might presently reappear again, with nobody much the worse. Murphy still knelt in the boat, with his clasped hands before his face—a piteous spectacle. No word was spoken for several minutes, passed in unutterable thoughts, till Robert again broke silence: "There is no use in our remaining here, Murphy;" said he, firmly; "I shall now steer for Melbourne."

"You will do as you please, Sir," answered the other, in broken tones, "and these men will obey you. The masther said that if any thing happened to him, you were to be his successor."

These words were spoken with a certain reverential humility, as though Chesney had actually become invested with a portion of that authority which, with Murphy, stood in the place of all others—human or divine. All at once he sprang to his feet, and stood in the attitude of one who listens attentively.

"What do you hear?" asked Robert, anxiously. It was just possible that another volcanic shock, such as had doubtless submerged the island, had given warning of its approach, though to his own ear nothing was apparent but the soft splash of the wave and the flutter of the sail, for the boat was almost stationary.

"I hear his voice," cried Murphy. "'Dick, Dick!' he says, soft and low, just as he used to whisper when I was down with the fever, and he was minding me. I'm coming, I'm coming, masther!"

And before any one could interfere, the faithful, foolish fellow had placed his foot upon the gunwale, and with tight-folded arms had leaped into the sea. He was a strong and active swimmer, as all well knew, but he never rose again. Robert would have given much to see him do so, for in that act of fidelity—dog-like or madman-like though it might be, but inexpressibly touching—all the wrongs done or intended to him or his were forgotten; but they watched for him in vain: Murphy had gone to join his master. After half an hour of fruitless waiting the pinnace was put about, and sailed for Melbourne. They would have had to endure much privation on the way, even had they reached it at all, since the store of provisions in the gig was very insufficient for five persons; but on the second day they fell in with a vessel bound for England, which took them all on board. The terrible and unlooked-for destruction that had overwhelmed their friends—though at the same time it had preserved themselves—for some time overshadowed the lovers. For Mary they both mourned; Lizzy bewailed her brother, for whose fate Robert could not be expected to feel poignant grief; while, on the other hand, Kavanagh's loss appeared far otherwise to him than to Lizzy, or than it had done to himself at the moment of their own deliverance. The acts of violence committed by the "young masther" from first to last, and inclusive of his brother's murder, he honestly ascribed to madness, to which, indeed, they were doubtless due: how far that madness had been induced by passion and want of moral control, and finally by drink, was a question into which he dared not look. What he strove to remember now was only the drowned man's tenderness and trust. Louis had perished without leaving any heirs, so that the bequest of the three thousand pounds—with the deduction of that large proportion of it which he did not forget to bestow on the three survivors from Murphy's Island, in accordance with Kavanagh's wishes—might fairly be considered to be his own. The first sum which he expended out of it on arriving in England went to the purchase of a marriage-ring; and during the time which the cruelty of the law interposed between him and wedded bliss, he placed his Lizzy under the care of Mistress Mulvaney. To the former's surprise, and indeed not a little to her scandal, the widow welcomed him with a hearty embrace. "I never thought to see you again, my brave boy," cried she, "nor to hear any thing of you, save that you had come to grief; far less such good news as this;" and here she kissed Lizzy. "You went away from my house, lad, in very indifferent company: as to one of them, I ask no question, for ever since what happened at Falston Hall I washed my hands of him. But how is that ne'er-do-well, Dick?"

Robert's face told her before he could reply in words. The widow plumped down on the little sofa—it was in the old smoke-room that the interview took place—and burst into tears.

"Heaven forgive me for speaking ill of the dead!" cried she; "and he such a broth of a boy! But tell me all about it."

Robert did not tell her all, or perhaps she would once more have altered her opinions; but he told her what he could of good about him, and especially concerning his end.

"I never thought Dick would overlive his master," was the widow's quiet comment when she had recovered herself. "Do you remember what you wrote about him to your pretty sweetheart here, comparing his fidelity to that of a dog? He got hold of that letter, and made me read it to him in this very room; and when I got to that part of it, the poor fellow only said, 'Well, that's true enough,' as though he was proud of it."

With his remaining two thousand pounds or so Robert purchased a little business in the cabinet-making line, for which he had always had a taste; and being not only diligent himself, but having a diligent wife—which always doubles a poor man's gains—he soon became prosperous enough. The first article of any elaboration that he turned out with his own hands was a tea-caddy, which now forms the admiration of the patrons of Mulvaney's. The outside has succumbed to the all-pervading influence of the place, but the inside—and this Mrs. Mulvaney persists in ascribing to its excellent workmanship rather than to its contents—has up to this time successfully resisted the flavor of onions. Robert has one son, named after himself. He would have called him "Frank," after his benefactor, but Lizzy opposed it. "Mr. Kavanagh was very good to us," pleaded she, "I own; but I do not wish my boy to remind me in any way, even in name, of a mur—I mean, of Murphy's master." In graceful return for this compliance, when a little girl arrived to make their home complete in its domestic furniture, her mother named her Mary. As for the other Mary—Mary Becher—so strangely and unwittingly mingled with their fortunes, nothing could be heard of her, though Robert did his best to find her out. He felt that the least they could do was to share with her, should she need it, the abundance with which they had been dowered by him she had known and loved as Wilson. It is probable, however, that he had amply provided for her before he quitted England.

The Chesneys lead a happy, quiet life, and they desire no other. The love of adventure with which Robert was one possessed has been fully satisfied, and he is very reticent concerning his past experience. As a customer of his of some standing, and admitted in some sort to his familiarity, as being an amateur cabinet-maker who has a turning-lathe of his own, I gained possession of the foregoing facts; but I should not have done so had I not, in addition to those pretensions, happened to disclose the circumstance that I had been witness to a certain scene at a turnpike gate near Windsor Forest on one stormy winter night, which was, as it turned out, the prologue to his own eventful history. I, too, although but for a few moments, had seen both Murphy and Murphy's master, and therefore seemed entitled to be told their story.

To assert its truth would seem to be to protest too much; but as a satisfaction to that considerable class of the community who "only believe what they read in the newspapers," I may add that its most singular feature—the sinking of a populated island—was recorded in the columns of the Times within the last three years.

THE END.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

I HAVE always insisted that fashion in France was the faithful echo of politics, and that to those who knew how to discern the mysterious connection between these two seemingly so different powers the analogy was striking; only, for these coincidences to be interesting to the observer, he must take the trouble to reflect, to compare, and to discover the data from which to draw his conclusions.

While the middle classes, who represent the majority of our people, repress the gratification of their tastes in the presence of the necessity of earning their daily bread, the women thereof also adopt the statu quo in respect to fashions, and insist that things shall remain as they are; the slightest modification makes them dread a revolution, and declare that since there was nothing new so long ago as the days of Solomon, we have no reason for desiring a change. It is hard to foresee whether or not they will prevail. For some weeks past the dress-makers have been announcing the fall of the polonaise, the abandonment of the over-skirt, the disgrace of the pouf, and the throwing off of the sash; but there is many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip, and at present the people seem resolved to keep both the over-skirt and the polonaise. Whether they will yet burn what they once adored, and adore what they once burned, remains to be seen.

On the other hand, the upper classes, the fine ladies—the fashionables, in short—desire the change, the transformation, against which the middle classes rebel. And here again the analogy between fashions and politics may be discerned. As there are many parties, so are there many fashions. Fashion is no longer one and indivisible. While our fine ladies wear in their drawing-rooms and their carriages long flowing robes, pleated perpendicularly with marquises' vests and habits of skillfully combined colors—while they copy one day the portraits of the time of Louis XIII., the next those of his successor, and so on down to the Directory, without excepting even those of the Revolution, the middle classes—that is, the great majority who can not show themselves in the streets in historic costumes, or go to their work or to visit their friends on foot in long flowing robes—intrepidly keep the suit that we have long known, more or less rich, according to their means, of velvet, silk, or wool, but nevertheless the suit, with its convenient polonaise or graceful over-skirt. Now in our democratic age the will of the majority rules even in fashion; and that this is so is proved by the fact that when the aristocracy leaves its drawing-rooms and carriages, and goes on foot in the streets, it lays aside its drapery and appears in the suit, the uniform of pedestrians.

And now which fashions shall I describe, those of the many or those of the few? But each woman of the latter class has her own particular fashion, chosen from among the different historic epochs, that is best suited to her style of beauty, and which is quite unlike that of her mother, sister, or friend. The few, or at least some of this few, have returned to very long dresses, draped in a pouf behind, and worn without an over-skirt. The many, on the other hand, think it bad economy to buy long dresses only to loop them up, and to crease and spoil the material by sitting down on bunches of folds. They adopt the long dress, but only for evenings, when it is not necessary to loop it, and wear the short suit in the street. It is evident, therefore, that it is hard to tell what the fashion is. At this moment any thing can be affirmed or denied with equal truth. It may be said that polonaises are not worn and that they are, that chignons are not worn and that they are, that crinoline is no longer seen and that it still prevails, and so on to the end of the chapter.

The few—that is the fashionables—dress in a more and more flowing style. As an example, I will describe a dress that I saw at a very elegant wedding. Demi-trained skirt of very light écru poult de soie, pleated perpendicularly, without any other trimming, and supported by no crinoline or stiff skirt whatsoever, except a very voluminous tournure; over-skirt of very light brown poult de soie, edged with a thick rouleau of blue satin, and draped in such a manner as to show the blue satin lining here and there. This lining, between ourselves, was not as complete as it seemed, but was only set on around the bottom of the skirt. Corsage like the over-skirt, with blue satin revers on the basques. Blue satin vest. Long, wide sash of blue satin, beginning at a blue bow set at the opening of the heart-shaped corsage, passing under the right basque, and falling backward. High chemisette, with embroidered plastron inside of the corsage. Marquise sleeves, with blue revers, and full under-sleeves of wide lace. Toque of light brown faille, with turned-up rim, lined with blue; écru aigrette and blue feather.

This is a specimen of the toilettes worn by the few. It is needless to dwell on the impossibility of walking on the street in such a dress. Now, as the great majority do walk on the street, the great majority will continue to wear short skirts of black or dark silk, cashmere, or other fabrics, according to their purse, with basques and over-skirts or polonaises of the same materials.

It is precisely because people will not take the pains to make this distinction that so many mistakes are made in describing the fashions. Even the young lady with the écru and blue toilette, who calls to mind a noble lady of the Fronde as she alights from her carriage, should she go on foot to a shop or to visit a friend, would lay aside her historic costume, and array herself in a pretty short suit of black, bottle green, or raisin de Corinthe, to avoid raising a mob about her, and to pass unperceived.

For evening parties where full dress is not desired, or for ceremonious carriage visits, voluminous fraises, or standing frills, are much worn. These are composed of three strips of white tulle, about two inches wide, and simply hemmed, and are very vaporous and becoming. A velvet or silk ribbon of the color of the dress and its trimmings, and supporting a huge medallion, a large emblematical cross, such as Alsace-Lorraine or Chambord, or else of plain black or colored enamel, is placed at the opening of the dress, where the fraise comes together. Fancy jewelry is much worn in the street, contrary to former custom, which proscribed this as bad taste. Gloves are very long, to cover the arms under the flowing lace under-sleeves. Nevertheless, this kind of lingerie is adopted only by the few; the many remain faithful to plain linen collars, or at least with a little embroidery, and cuffs like those of the gentlemen of our time.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

Hosted by Google

Figs. 1–3.—BRIDAL COIFFURES.—[For description see Supplement.]

Fig. 1.—PONGEE HOUSE DRESS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1–4.

Fig. 2.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—VELVET AND VIGOGNE WALKING SUIT WITH SLEEVELESS JACKET.
For pattern of Sleeveless Jacket and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 5–7.

Fig. 4.—LADY'S BROWN GROS GRAIN WALKING SUIT WITH DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET.
For pattern of Double-breasted Jacket and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 8–11.

Hosted by Google

SACRED BIRDS.

EXTRAORDINARY honors were paid to the goose in ancient times, and it is still held in great veneration by some of the Eastern nations. The figure that occurs so frequently in Buddhist monuments is the Brahmanee goose. The ancient Britons, according to Cæsar, held it impious to eat the flesh of geese.

The ibis was another bird held in the highest sanctity by the old Egyptians. There are still numerous pits containing ibis mummies in that country. The largest of them, a little to the westward of the Pyramid of Abou-Sir, is about twenty feet deep. The floor of this pit, for probably a depth of many feet, is covered with heaps on heaps and layers on layers of coarse earthen jars, the lids cemented down, containing each the body of an ibis, preserved with bitumen, and inclosed in numerous folds of narrow cloth bandages.

The Mohammedans have a great veneration and esteem for the stork. It is almost as sacred with them as the ibis was with the Egyptians, and they would look upon a person as profane who should kill or even harm one. So precious were these birds held in Thessaly, which country they are said to have cleared of serpents, that the slayer of a stork was punished with death. They were thought much of at Rome, for when a person, from a freak of luxury, ordered one to be placed on his dinner-table, he drew upon himself the direful obloquy of the whole city.

The robin is considered in several countries a sacred bird, and to kill one is little less than sacrilege, and its eggs are free from the hand of the bird's-nester. It is asserted that the respect shown to it by man is joined in by the animals of the wood. The weasel and wild-cat, it is said, will neither molest it nor eat it when killed. One cause for the veneration in which it is held may be the superstition which represents it as the medium through which mankind are warned of approaching death. Before the decease of a person a robin is believed, in many instances, to tap thrice at the window of the room in which the sick person is lying. Grimm says that the peculiar veneration with which this bird is treated has been shown by the whole German race from remote times; and he refers to the bird's color and its name as evidences that it was sacred to Thor, the god of lightning.

The swallow, too, in Germany is every where deemed a sacred bird. Like the stork, it preserves the house on which it builds its nest from fire and lightning. The Spanish peasants have a tradition that it was a swallow that tried to pluck the thorns out of the crown of Christ as he hung upon the cross; hence they have a great reverence for this bird, and will never destroy it.

In France, in the Pays de Caux, the wren is a sacred bird. To kill it, or rob its nest, is deemed an atrocity which will bring down the lightning on the culprit's dwelling. Such an act was also regarded with horror in Scotland. Robert Chambers mentions the following popular malediction upon those who rob the nest of the wren:

"Malisons, malisons mair than ten,
That harry the lodge of Heaven's hen."

The whydah-bird and the water-wagtail are held sacred by the natives of several parts of Africa. Among the Mandan Indians of North America the dove is held

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR BOY FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD. BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 12-18.

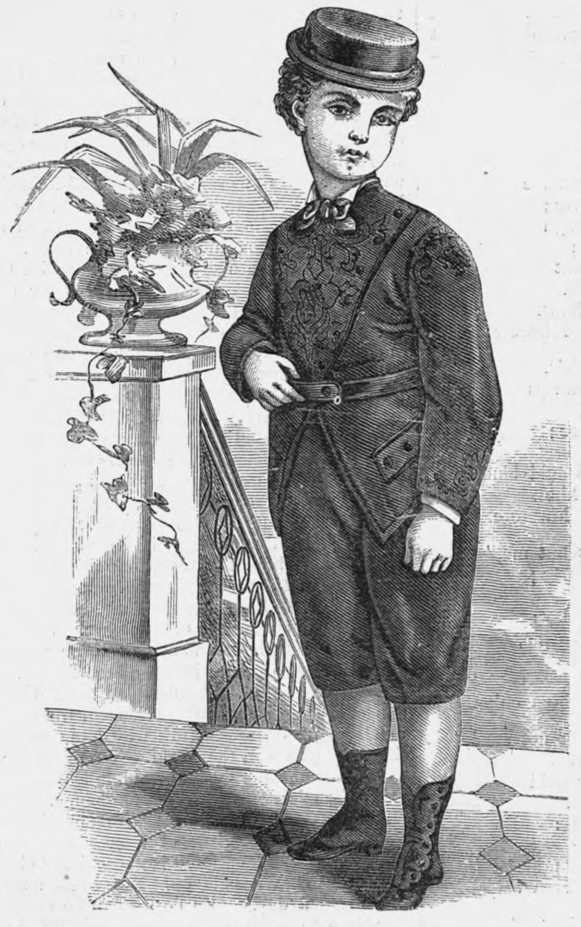

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR BOY FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD. FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]
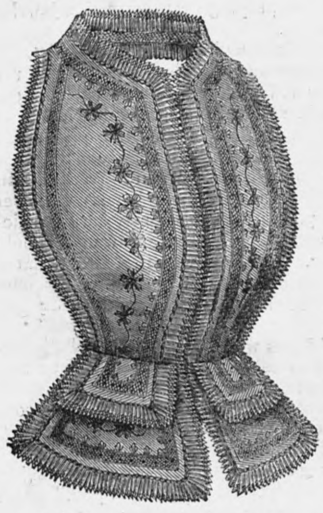
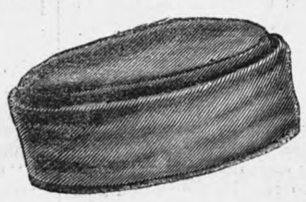
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 12-18.

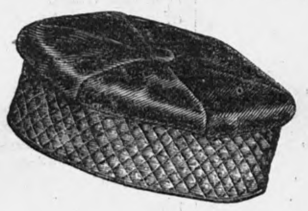


GROS GRAIN VEST WITH SATIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.
For pattern, design, and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 47 and 48.

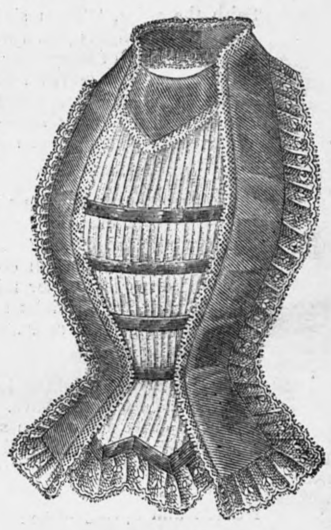


BERET FOR BOY FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

SCOTCH CAP FOR BOY FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 49 and 50.



BERET FOR BOY FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Fig. 51.



POULT DE SOIE, CRÊPE LISSE, AND LACE VEST.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 1.—BLACK SILK AND CASHMERE WALKING SUIT.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 22-31.

Fig. 2.—BLACK SILK AND CASHMERE WALKING SUIT.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 22-31.

Hosted by Google

so sacred that neither man, woman, nor child will injure it; indeed, the Mandans declare that even their dogs, ferocious as they are, instinctively respect that bird.

A LENTEN SERVICE.

FRETTED roof and shadowy nave
Spanned in gloomy architrave;
All the shadows sifted through
By a rare and radiant hue;
Broken rainbows, falling faint
From the aureole of a saint,
And the organ drops its plaint,
Miserere.

In the tender hush she kneels,
While the dimness half conceals
Royal head in lowly grace,
Bending form and lifted face;
And the devotee behind,
Who his Lenten thoughts would bind,
Finds them of a wayward kind.
Miserere.

"Thou shalt have no gods but me,"
And the "Amen" floateth free;
But the heart's responses say,
"Ah! his heaven is far to-day;
Saints must seek a higher shrine,
But that lifted smile of thine
To a sinner seems divine."
Mea culpa.

Saith the voice, "Thou shalt not steal,"
And the half-lights just reveal
One long curl of deepening gold
On her mantle's murky fold.
Soft respond her lover's eyes:
I would steal it as it lies—
Worth long penance, such a prize!
Mea culpa.

"Shalt not covet house or lands."
"Nay, I covet clinging hands;
Pure young lips, whose soft caress
Love's own longing shall confess;
Woman's eyes to answer mine—
Blessed eyes, whose violet shine
Keeps love's solemn seal and sign."
Mea culpa.

"As thyself thy neighbor love;"
Far the echoes float above.
"Now I crave indulgence sweet,
For my love is found complete;
And thy heaven grows more dear
When through some Beloved near Heaven and Spring are opening here."
Jubilate.

LIVING IN GERMANY.

WHAT IT COSTS.

TO the question, often asked, "How much will it cost a family to live in Germany?" it is not easy to give a definite answer. The standard of living varies so much that it is obviously impossible to satisfy exactly each questioner without being acquainted with his special requirements. In regard to living in Germany, however, it is less difficult to make such an approximate general calculation of its cost as may be satisfactory to most inquirers than in the United States. There is in our country a vague and ever-fluctuating notion of respectability which, with its more or less influence upon the modes of living, gives an endless variety to its expenses. Some American families deem it fatal to their social standing to live in a house less than three stories high; some are ashamed to enter a door that does not open from a brown stone or marble front; and others refuse to look out of a window which is not darkened by opposing summits of the Mansard-roofs of a Madison or Fifth avenue. Our people spend far less money for living well than for appearing to live grandly. They pay enormously for redundant ornament, spaciousness, unnecessary piles of stone and marble, fashionable conspicuousness of position, and opportunity of showing off their means of doing so.

This perverse idea of respectability, which is the source of much of the wasteful expenditure of families in the United States, is comparatively rare in Germany. The Germans, for the most part, especially in such centres of refined culture as Heidelberg, though by no means insensible to the graces as well as the comforts of living, adapt its appliances to their own assured sense of need, and not to the uncertain opinion of neighbors and strangers.

If the American fixing his residence in a German town follow the example of the natives, he will choose a domicile adapted to the size of his family and its necessities. If he should, without requiring its space, take a big house merely because of its bigness, as he might have done in his own land of expansive ideas, he would be stared and laughed at, very much as the child who walks about with his little head lost in the capacious hat of a man. The German, in the choice of his house, as regards size, structure, position, and all its appurtenances, is guided by his own taste and convenience, from which he is seldom diverted by fashionable caprice or any indefinite notion of respectability. We would advise all Americans to do likewise, if they desire fully to appreciate the advantages of living in Germany.

Supposing that our countrymen shall adopt the judicious taste and prudence of the German in his unostentatious but substantial mode of living, it will not be difficult to answer with tolerable precision the question, "What will it cost a family to live in Germany?" In Heidelberg few of the professors and professional men, and they may be regarded in that university town as the leaders of its society, spend over two thousand dollars a year; and that this is sufficient for comfort, and even a certain luxury of life, may be inferred from the cost of rent, food, and education, already stated. An American, living with his wife and three children of the ages of fourteen, nine, and six years, informed us that the sum of two thousand dollars a year was ample for all the expenses of his household, which seemed to us a model of tasteful comfort. In New York, where he lived previously, he could barely satisfy the requirements of himself and family for six thousand dollars per annum. He had the good sense so far to comply with German habits as to make no sacrifices for mere show. He lived, indeed, in the finest quarter of the city, sent his children to the best schools, and kept a daily table at which he was always prepared to entertain a friend generously. His apartments, however, were not on the bel étage, as the second story is called, but on the third, which only differed in name and height of position from that below it. His wife did, perhaps, more than the usual share of household duty, but declared that with her single German servant in Heidelberg she was more effectually aided than by her three "helps" in New York. The whole establishment being on one floor rendered the household service far less arduous than in the tall, tower-like houses of the United States, with their endless winding of staircase. Servants' wages are hardly the fourth of those with us. Three dollars a month is considered liberal, and the service is good. Accustomed to hard labor, and of a singularly robust strength, the women in Germany do more work with less complaint than any where in the world. They are, moreover, constant and faithful, seldom leaving their places for mere caprice or love of change. Economy, too, and contentment with simplicity of living are characteristic of them. All service required by the household is exceedingly cheap. A char-woman is paid only thirty-seven and a half cents a day, and a porter can be found at any time to carry a parcel or trunk for six or ten cents.

The usual social entertainments are of the simplest and least expensive character. Charming reunions, where the most cheerful and intellectual of groups gather for mutual entertainment and culture, seldom cost the host or hostess more than a few kuchen and extra cups of coffee. The concerts and theatres, which are excellent, abound every where, and the prices of admission are exceedingly low. These public as well as private entertainments have in common the good feature of opening and closing at early hours. They ordinarily begin at six and terminate at nine o'clock. Thus fatigue is saved to those who go, and weariness to those who wait at home. Amusement seldom leads, as too often with us, to dissipation and disorder.

"ONLY AN OLD BONE."

AGES and ages ago this world of ours was not like what it is now. Where we have land, hard, firm, and rocky, there were seas; and again, where we now have seas there was land. In fact, it was all so different that had you lived then, as I did, and survived till now, you could tell strange stories of the changes you had witnessed.

My first introduction to life was in the huge jaws of a megatherium; for I was one of its teeth. I had many brothers and sisters; we were a very united, loving family. Now we are all dispersed. I do not even know whether they are living or dead. You wonder, perhaps, that I can speak so calmly on the subject, but if you had lived ages, as I have, you would know that one can not mourn forever.

A wild, merry life we led in those days. I should not like to return to it now, but I enjoyed it then. The world was at that time a muddy, marshy place; even the firm land was not very stable. What else could you expect? Those iron rocks you see now were very young then, and just forming, and a fierce battle they had to wage for their existence, what between the fire and the water. There were no men at that time, nothing but animals, huge trees, and plants; and a fine time they had of it.

My master was a sociable creature. He was the eldest of a large family of Theriums; his brothers were called Ano, Anthraco, Paleo, and Dino. They all roamed over the ground together, seeking food, and lots of acquaintances we made in our wanderings. There was the family of Dons—Masto, Smilo, and Glypto; but they were small creatures, and we rather looked down on them, though they were agreeable enough in their way. Much more interesting were the Sauri, whom we came to know on the shores of a huge lake. They were called Ichthy, Plesio, Megalo, and Ido. The only objection to them was that they were rather inclined to conceit, for they would insist that their family was older than ours. As if that made them a whit better!

Ah! if you had known all those fine creatures, I am sure you would only pity their puny successors now living in the world. With their nice names, too! It seems to me such a pity those good old cognomens are gone out of fashion.

As I said, it was a curious living world then—giant reptiles trailed their bodies on the sand, hideous winged creatures darkened the sky, and our colossal selves and friends stalked through magnificent forests of pine and ferns.

Well, I suppose, nothing can last forever: I have found it so, at least, in my experience of life. So our free, joyous existence came to an end too.

There was a grand upset of the whole world; the sea rushed over the land, the ground heaved and tottered; in fact, it was a convulsion of the system, and all then living on the globe perished. What became of my master I do not know, for I was dashed out of his mouth. I was tossed hither and thither for a very long time, during which I witnessed several more of these revolutions, being now upheaved, now buried. Wherever I was thrown I met with general contempt. I was named "An Old Bone," and no one paid me the slightest attention.

At first I was inclined to resent this treatment, and to despise all those persons I came in contact with, for the days when my master had stalked the forest were still green in my memory, and I forgot that I was no longer in the same position. A tooth under his mighty protection and a solitary tooth cast by itself upon the world are quite different things. So I am afraid I made myself very disagreeable, and if any stone, plant, or insect was kind enough to speak to me, doubtless taking pity on my miserable existence, I would turn from it with contempt, saying that such small creatures were quite beneath my notice. If they had known the days I had, and seen my master and his friends, they would not have dared to address even one of his remains.

No wonder that they soon gave up speaking to me, seeing how I despised them. Ah! I have grown humbler since then—much humbler. I learned many a severe lesson as the centuries rolled on! and if I had my life to live again, I do not say but what I would live it very differently. I got my pride taken down, however, as I say; but it was sharp, painful work, and if I had been wise, and recognized my changed position at once, I might have saved myself a world of suffering. Now I know that each state of the world is the best for the time being; but I shut my mind to that truth then.

Meanwhile, as I was changing in character, so also was the earth—for it was consolidating and hardening. The whole mass was becoming packed together, and there was so much material to be disposed of that there were tight squeezes in places—so tight that sometimes fractious rocks broke out in fire and flames, and declared they could not and would not stand it, that they would have room to expand as they chose. Of course in this general squeezing I got much crushed, and wherever I was pushed I met with insult. Even the little room I took up was grudged me.

Finally, I got thrown in with a company of minerals, who held themselves immeasurably my superiors.

"It's a shame," I often heard them declare, "that that bit of old bone should be in our way."

So they rubbed and knocked against me, pushed and jostled, till they did succeed in fretting me to less than half my original size; and even when every thing had subsided, and I had found a tiny corner to rest in, they often cast jealous eyes upon it. They were not pleasant companions; but I bore all their unkindness in silence. I remembered how disagreeable I had made myself to others, and felt that I was paying a just penalty.

If I could have gone away, and left them the space they so unwillingly awarded me, how gladly would I have done so! But there was no possibility of my escaping, buried as I was deep in the earth. So I lived on, sunk in my little hole, as far out of sight as I could, quiet and unobtrusive, never speaking unless I were addressed, which did not happen twice in all the ages. My whole existence was a deprecation for my unwelcome presence.

I think they might have been kinder when they saw how humble I was. However, they were not: and perhaps it was as well, for I was only a scrap of old bone, I kept repeating to myself—only a fragment of a once mighty monster; but such a poor fragment that I very inadequately represented him. It was better I should leave it alone than attempt it, for I should only have met with ridicule and incredulity.

Of course I knew nothing of the flight of time; I only know that it was centuries I lived down there, an old bone, among those aristocratic minerals. And, as the years rolled on, I think they grew to despise me more and more. If I could have done any thing to make them improve their opinion of me, I would have done it. But I could only remain quiet, and think back on the grand old days when we had led such a free, wild life, my master and I.

I don't know why the minerals thought worse of me as time passed. I think it must have been because they had nothing to do, and it was a little amusement to them to abuse me. Anyway, they often called out to me, in injurious tones, that I had lost my only beauty—my fine white complexion; and they wondered I was not ashamed to show my ugly, changed face in their circle. I bore it all in silence; what should I have gained by replying? And if I had lost my complexion, how could I help it, I thought; we none of us improve by age, I suppose, and if they were indestructible and unalterable, I was not conceited enough to think I was.

You see, it was not a happy life I led down there, but it, too, came to an end, as I say I have found all things do in this world, if we only wait long enough.

Great disturbances occurred about us after our long quiet. I, accustomed to such matters, thought they foreboded another convulsion, and, as my position in life could but be improved, I hailed the sounds gladly, rejoicing at the thought of release from my neighbors. I was somewhat mistaken. The disturbances and noises I heard were caused by men, those beings who were at that time strangers to me, though now they are familiar friends.

A shaft was being sunk in the ground; for the place of our abode had been pronounced a valuable mine, likely to produce copper. Daily the intruders came nearer our dwelling. I could hear them hammering, breaking, and rending. My neighbors grew alarmed; they had not wished to be disturbed out of their even, peaceful existence.

At last one day the men penetrated to us. With curious eyes I looked upon them. They seemed so tiny to me after the living beings I had been accustomed to, and I thought how one tread of my master's heel would have crushed them to atoms. But they were well-looking, well-formed animals, and I took rather a fancy to them from the first.

How relentlessly they tore away mass after mass of ore! I really felt quite sorry for the minerals, unfriendly though they had been; they seemed to feel the separation so much, and resisted the instruments as long as their strength would allow. The mass in which I had nestled was torn off too, and we were all conveyed into the outer air. Here we were handed over for inspection to a man who divided worthless pieces from valuable, and I was fully prepared when my turn came to be thrown away as a useless piece of old bone. How could I know that time had wrought a transformation in me?

Judge, then, of my intense surprise when, having examined me closely and turned me over and over in his hand, the man called out,

"We have indeed a find here. See this splendid turquoise I have discovered imbedded in a piece of copper. How beautiful it is! what a lovely blue!"

It really took me some moments before I could realize that I was the object of these praises.

There was no doubt about it, however, for I was handed from one to another, and ardently admired, till at last the finder, folding me carefully in a piece of soft linen, placed me in his waistcoat pocket, saying he would ask a jeweler about my worth.

I was as curious as he about the verdict. I could not understand what had happened to my poor, humble old self, and how I, so long despised, should suddenly have assumed value in every one's eyes. I did wish the copper could have seen my triumph, and witnessed in what estimation men held me. Then the recollection that, after all, I was only an old bone rushed over me; I was perhaps unconsciously acting a delusive part, and when the jeweler saw me I should be found out. For how was it possible that I could have become a costly thing, unless men prized old bones? and that I could hardly imagine.

How glad I was when we arrived at the jeweler's, and I was taken out of my envelope and shown to him!

He was a wizened-looking old man, who wore a pair of spectacles, and seemed to look me through and through.

"A very good turquoise indeed," he said; "very. I shall be glad to buy it of you." And he named a sum for my purchase. It was not immediately agreed to; some little bargaining occurred, but it ended in my becoming his property.

"But do tell me," asked he who had found me, "how came the turquoise among the copper?"

"Turquoises," replied the other, "are bits of old bone, nothing more. By contact with the copper they obtain their exquisite cerulean blue. The ore this has lain among has changed it to a jewel. Who knows as what it began life?"

I was grown more astonished than ever. This was too marvelous truly, that the copper, the mineral that had so despised me, whose taunts and insults I had borne patiently so long, had been the means of changing my whole being into something most precious. It was too curious! It took me days to recover from my astonishment! I had led a despised life so long, I could not grasp that I was suddenly of importance; but I was; there could be no doubt about it.

The old jeweler polished me lovingly, praising me more and more as I increased in beauty under his hands. Then he set me in a golden ring, and finally exhibited me in his shop window, naming a large sum for my purchase.

"And I have been only an old bone," I kept repeating to myself, again and again.

One thing I determined, that returning prosperity should not make me proud again; I had learned too thorough a lesson for that, and I resolved to love, and to do all in my power to serve, those mortals who had raised me from the lowest depths of degradation to such a height of value and esteem.

I was soon able to become more actively useful in their behalf; for I had not been long in the jeweler's window ere I was purchased. I passed into the hands of a lovely young girl, who presented me as a souvenir to her lover on his leaving the country for a time. He kissed the slender hand that had slipped me and my golden band upon his finger.

"I shall think of you, and your blue eyes, sweet," he said, "whenever I look on this azure stone."

Then they parted.

We roamed through many a foreign land, my new master and I. We visited the regions of everlasting cold, the zones of perpetual heat. We slept under the palms of the desert, the hut of the Esquimau, in the junk of the Chinaman, the palaces of Europe, the Indian bungalow. I saw all the changes on the globe with amazement; the world had altered indeed from the place I had known it. We passed through many dangers, too, escaped many accidents. Several times my master, whom I learned to love dearly, lay stricken with sore sickness, and I grieved for him lest he should die, and the sweet blue-eyed beauty, whose gift I was, should see him no more. Folk said I grew pale when he was ill, and only regained my beauty with his health. I can not vouch for the truth of that statement.

The time at length arrived when my master was able to return home. Why he had been so long absent I know not. He spoke of business and imperative necessity that kept him far from her he loved, and I know it could be no slight cause that detained him from her side.

How joyfully he turned his steps homeward!

Hosted by Google

It was a pleasure to me to see his gleeful, happy face. He would often gaze upon me as a memento of his sweet Isabelle, and once or twice on our homeward journey he exclaimed that I had grown more beautiful than ever.

The last stage of his traveling he undertook on horseback. He was cantering along, singing, out of the very joy of his heart, Uhland's charming couplet:

"O brich nicht, Steg, du zitterst sehr!
O stürz nicht, Fels, du dräuest schwer!
Welt, geh' nicht unter, Himmel, fall nicht ein,
Eh' ich mag bei der Liebsten sein!"

Suddenly the horse stumbled, and my master was violently thrown.

"He must not be hurt, he can not be killed," I cried, in my agony of heart. Then a sharp pain thrilled through my frame, I became unconscious of what followed.

When next I regained my senses I felt the warm touch of Isabelle; she was clasping my master's hand.

"Oh, George," she sobbed, "what a happy thing that you escaped unhurt! If you had been killed at the last, after all your perilous wanderings were safely over, I could not have borne it."

"Comfort yourself, sweetheart," he said, "I am alive and well. That I escaped is truly a marvel; I can not comprehend it yet."

"See!" she exclaimed, suddenly, as she released her grasp, and her gaze fell upon me. "Why, George, what has happened to your turquoise? You never told me it was cracked."

"Cracked!" he repeated, in astonishment. "That can not be; only this very morning I was admiring its increased loveliness. But indeed it is," he said, as he examined me more closely. "I must have broken it in my fall. Alas for my beautiful treasured stone, the companion and friend of my wanderings!"

A sudden flash of light passed over the girl's face.

"George, that faithful turquoise has saved your life. I see it all. It took upon itself the consequences of your fall, and has restored you unharmed to me. I read once that turquoises possessed this saving virtue for those they loved."

She was right; it had truly been so. My cry of agony as we fell had wrought his salvation. How happy I was that I had been the means of their joy! how much happier yet I grew in it! What mattered it that my market value had gone from me? for I had obtained increased worth in the eyes of the happy pair.

George wore me upon his finger unto his dying day, and Isabelle, an aged dame, showed me to her great-grandchildren but three days ago as the most precious thing in her possession, which she should hand down to them and to their children's children as their most treasured relic and the tenderest momento of their ancestors.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The first Night of a new Play.—French Crime and English Roguery.—The Aristocrat and the Plasterer.—Edwin James's Appeal.

ON Saturday last, February 22, was brought out, at the Prince of Wales Theatre, Mr. Wilkie Collins's play of Man and Wife, dramatized from his novel of that name. The first night of a new piece in London is always a spectacle that attracts a good house; but on this occasion the reputation of the author, and the fact that his drama was sure to receive skillful treatment from the players, they being by far the best acting company in England, produced a most distinguished audience. Of course all the critics were there (confound them!), blasés, imperturbable, smooth—"those who have failed in literature and art," as Disraeli calls them—but also novelists, dramatists, painters, who have not failed, all came to give their willing hands to their brother artist. If you had been by my side, Mr. Editor, I should have been able to point out to you most of the celebrities of literary London: Charles Reade, with his patient, quiet face; Palgrave Simpson, wearing his seventy winters as if they were fifty summers; Shirley Brooks, editor of Punch, and author of the charming but comparatively unappreciated Miss Violet and her Offers, with his fine massive face and abundant locks of gray; Burnand, his funny collaborateur, who has given us so many Happy Thoughts; Holman Hunt, the great Pre-Raphaelite painter; Val Princep, the little ditto; and Frith, of the Railway Station and the Derby-Day; the Lord Chief Justice of England (Cockburn), also listening with great intentness to the arguments of the lawyer in the piece (which, like the novel, turns upon the Scotch marriage law), and manifestly disagreeing with him through his gold spectacles. In the centre of the stalls was a family circle, which would have had, perhaps, a greater attraction for you than all: Charles Collins, author of that most charming of books of travel, A Cruise upon Wheels, and younger brother of the hero of the night, with his wife and her two brothers, the sons of dead Charles Dickens.

Of the play I say nothing, for though not in what the begging-letter writers call "affluent circumstances," I have never been in such reduced ones as to write dramatic criticisms. In London, alas! it is not possible, you know, to be "poor and honest" and yet do that. But it was a very pleasant night, I promise you, altogether. When, at the close of it, in answer to repeated calls for "Collins! Collins!"—we all knew him too well to call him "Author! author!"—and the big-browed star of the evening came upon the stage, there was what the ultra-classical people call a bovation—an ovation, as a writer in the Saturday Review, or the Pall Mall, or some such high-flying journal, was lately so good as to tell us, being only a lesser triumph, at which ovis, a sheep, was sacrificed; whereas bos, bovis, an ox, was the animal that graced the greater ones. Similarly, I suppose, an asination (from asinus, a jackass) would best describe the triumph of this erudite person, in the unlikely case of his ever gaining one.

Talking of assignations, was any thing ever so terrible as the late disclosures concerning the Black Band of Lyons! Any pair of youthful lovers who ventured to meet without that city, it seems, for a few hours of Arcadian happiness, have been liable to be seized upon by a gang of ruffians, by whom the swain was murdered and the nymph ill-treated. This, we are told, has happened in five hundred instances. In England, when a boy throws a stone at a shop window and gets away scot-free, we exclaim, indignantly, "Where are the police?" But what should we say if such outrages as these had gone on, say at Birmingham, for four years! The scoundrels have been caught at last, however; and the jury finding, of course, "extenuating circumstances"—because, I suppose, the Black Band was composed of young men (one of them in "the customs," too)—they have only been sentenced to short terms of imprisonment. At the same time a similar association has been discovered in Paris, the eldest member of which is but twenty-seven, and the captain of the band but fourteen and a half! "his unnatural aptitude for vice and cynical indifference to detection" having procured him that bad eminence. In this case also two of these miscreants and murderers are "assistant-clerks in the Ministry of Finance." After such hideous revelations in real life the panting sensation novelist toils in vain: no imagination of his could compass them, let him sup on pork-chops ever so unwholesomely.

Thank Heaven, we have no Black Band in England, where our rogues and ruffians act, for the most part, independently; they have no hideous cement of "sentiment" to keep them together, and are, therefore, not so formidable. Sometimes a single act of roguery is conceived so cleverly as almost to extort our admiration.

A friend of mine, well known in sporting circles, a rapid calculator of odds, and not quite the sort of person that I should choose to experimentalize upon if I took to swindling, was very nearly taken in the other day by a new device. He was walking down Regent Street at noonday, when an old gentleman, respectably dressed, suddenly accosted him, in broken accents. "Young man," pleaded he, with his trembling hand pressed to his heart, "I find myself suddenly taken very ill: might I ask you to call a cab for me, since I can hardly breathe, and far less raise my voice."

There are lots of cabs at all times passing along Regent Street, and my friend supported the old gentleman, who really looked deadly ill, until one of them came within hail. Then with great difficulty he essayed to get him into the vehicle.

"One moment," gasped the invalid, while one foot rested on the step, and he gathered strength for a final effort: "I have still another favor to ask of you. I find that when I changed my waistcoat on leaving home I forgot to take my purse out of my pocket. Would you kindly lend me half a crown to pay the cab?"

"Nay, Sir," returned my astute acquaintance. "You are going home to your waistcoat, and therefore to your money; and however distant that home may be, I will see you a great deal farther before I lend you so much as a fourpenny piece."

The old gentleman, perceiving that he had got hold of the wrong man, thereupon paid the cabman sixpence for calling him from the cab stand for nothing, and walked away at a brisk pace to try his invalid stratagem upon some person less accustomed to calculate probabilities.

I forgot to tell you in my last "Gossip" that John Bright's son has been making his début in the provinces as a public speaker. He did not give promise of being an orator, yet spoke well and to the point, and showed himself to be of the same honest mind as his father with respect to politics. On the other hand, the Hon. Auberon Herbert, the radical brother of the conservative Lord Caernarvon, and the only one who went into the same lobby with Sir Charles Dilke on the famous question of royal expenditure, has retired from political life. Whether his democratic ideas were genuine or not, I do not know, but there is an anecdote afloat about him which would seem to show that they really were so. When in lodgings in Bond Street there happened to be a plasterer employed about the house, and, since the man showed intelligence, the Hon. Auberon asked him to breakfast with him one morning. The invitation was accepted (whether with diffidence or not is not stated), and the entertainment came off. But the same day the landlady gave notice to Mr. Herbert to quit the house. "She would not have plasterers," she said, "in her sitting-rooms." In vain did this young aristocrat expound his social theories, and especially debate upon the intelligence of the plasterer, which should put him on a level with the kings of the earth.

"I don't care how clever he may be. He may be as wise as the Pope," she answered; "but he shall never sit in one of my best chairs again." And he never did.

Mr. Edwin James's appeal to the Benchers of the Temple to be allowed to practice as a barrister has been rejected. The sitting was held in private, "with closed doors," but it has oozed out that the following fact was fatal to him: He had induced Lord Worsley when only twenty-two years of age to become surety for him to the extent of £5000, for which he expressed his pain and regret to that nobleman's father; and yet he seems to have evidenced that regret by increasing the young man's liabilities upon his account within nine months to upward of £20,000.

From gossip about barristers the descent is easy to attorneys. If you should chance to hear the good news that "there are to be no more attorneys in England," do not believe it. It is only so far true that henceforth the title of "attorney" is to be merged in that of "solicitor." The polecat is equally objectionable in our northern counties as elsewhere, though in the former locality it is called the mart.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THOUSANDS of true lovers of science, and not a few who would not venture to class themselves in any way among the scientific, were charmed by the peculiar fascination of Professor Tyndall's lectures on Light, as delivered in various cities of the United States. The large audiences that every where greeted the learned professor indicated a keen if not a complete appreciation on the part of the community of his valuable researches. It was currently reported some months ago that Professor Tyndall intended to devote the surplus funds derived from his lectures in this country to the good of science. Lectures were delivered in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston, Washington, Baltimore, and New Haven. The sum of $13,000—the surplus above expenses—has been conveyed, in trust, to a committee consisting of Professor Joseph Henry, General Hector Tyndale, and Professor E. L. Youmans, who are authorized to expend the interest "in aid of students who devote themselves to original researches." This gift to science, coming through the liberality of Professor Tyndall, should be made the nucleus of a large and permanent fund to advance science in America.

It should be remembered, by-the-way, that scientific lectures involve far more preliminary expense than lectures on ordinary subjects. Costly apparatus and assistants are necessary, and special preparation for experiments often demands possession of the lecturing hall a day or two previous to each lecture.

Rumor says that the problem of the coeducation of the sexes is to be solved by a Pennsylvania college, which just now is rather modest about divulging its name. The process is simply this: a department of cookery is to be established, a great kitchen to be built as an adjunct to the college, and the young lady students, after learning their lessons in Greek, Latin, mathematics, etc., are expected to prepare dinner for the whole establishment. This is the penalty they are to pay for enjoying the educational privileges of the institution! We suppose that each year the best cooks will receive the degree of F.F.W. (Fit for Wives).

Mirrors are frequently spoiled by being hung where the sun will shine upon them. It does not seem to be generally understood that the amalgam of tin-foil with mercury, which is spread on glass plates to make mirrors, is readily crystallized by solar rays, causing a granulated appearance in the looking-glass. Neither should mirrors be hung near a stove or fire-place, nor too near a gas jet, as the heat will often bring about the same injurious crystallization.

Work is progressing well on the St. Gothard Tunnel. At each extremity of the tunnel there is an available fall of water, which will be utilized in carrying forward the machine piercing. On one side the boring has been through hard granite; on the other softer descriptions of stone have been encountered.

There is nothing so pleasant as to see the young and beautiful intelligently informed in regard to the affairs of our country. Apropos the following incident, which came to the knowledge of the Washington correspondent of the Independent as she watched the doings of the House during one of its last sessions before the 4th of March. "Is Mr. Ames a member of Congress?" inquired a lovely and elegantly attired blonde of her near-standing neighbor, a young New England woman, of about her own age. "Oh yes," said New England, with a sudden glance of astonishment. "Well, I supposed so," said lovely maiden Washington. "I knew Mr. Brooks was" (with the air of imparting information). "He is the man who had the difficulty with Sumner some years ago."

Duluth, on Lake Superior, in Minnesota, has grown from a population of fifty in 1870 to a population of five thousand. As the present terminus of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and the head of Western lake navigation, it has become an important town, which has sprung up, as it were, in a day.

The Vendôme Column has been brought before the French Chamber—not bodily, but the propriety of re-erecting it has been thoroughly discussed, and the majority think it should be set up again.

The foreign mails last week brought what was something of a curiosity to our eyes—namely, a copy of the Fiji Times and of the Fiji Gazette. Not very recent publications were they, to be sure, as they bore the dates of October 5 and October 23, 1872. They are published in Levuka, on the Island of Ovalau—one of the most beautiful of the Fiji Islands, or, as perhaps Americans would write it, the Feejee Islands. These are English publications, and really seem to give no impression of any very barbarous state of society! Advertisements take a prominent place in these papers; but there is also scientific news, commercial information, and much miscellaneous matter. The political condition of the islands is the subject of several editorials, and annexation to Great Britain strongly urged. The Times remarks:

"Our soil is of the richest and best, and can produce sugar, cotton, coffee, spices, and many other articles, for which we can command a ready sale in the best marts of the world. But to develop our resources we require an influx of immigration and capital, and in order to do that there must be a sense of security. The Fiji government has now been in existence since June last year, yet there is an absence of that sense of security which would invite enterprise and capital to our shores."

We notice that it is proposed by the Gazette to issue an occasional sheet in the Fijian language. Evidently, from the tenor of both papers, there is room for immigrants in the Fiji Islands! It is a curious fact that there are several advertisements for persons to fill government positions, giving cheering proof that there is one place in the world where office-seekers are few. N.B.—As these offices are probably filled by this time, we would not advise enterprising sons of our soil to set out in hopes of obtaining them.

The London Times tells a wonderful story of six Communist prisoners who escaped from the fortress of Port Louis, on the coast of Brittany. By incessant labor for three months—so it is said—they contrived to sink a shaft thirteen feet in depth, and then excavated a tunnel, by which they escaped on to the rocks at low water, having ascertained the times of the tides. Three hundred prisoners were in the fortress, and all were aware of what was going on, but the secret was never betrayed.

A San Francisco paper tells a curious rat tale. A young lady, who was the owner of a beautiful pet sheep, noticed one day that the wool, of which the animal had a luxuriant coat, was twisted and knotted into a hump on one side of the neck. Upon examination she found that a rat had made a nest in the wool of the sheep, and when she pulled the place it stuck its head out and looked at her complacently. The rat was so tame that it was easily caught and dispatched. In the evening, when the sheep was put back in the stable, it went all around, looking into the corners and nosing about as though it were in search of something, showing that a friendly relationship existed between the rat and sheep.

The treasures from Cyprus, commonly known as the Cesnola Collection, are now being unpacked preparatory to the long and laborious process of sorting, labeling, and preparing them for public exhibition. The officers of the Metropolitan Art Museum have obtained a fine large building in Fourteenth Street, which will be temporarily used until the Central Park Museum is built, and there these archæological curiosities will be opened to public inspection. Some time, however, must elapse before they will be ready. It is no small undertaking to prepare more than ten thousand specimens of ancient art for public exhibition.

Orel is a fertile grain-producing province of Russia. Near a village of this section a lady was stopped not long since by a man in a sleigh, who demanded her money. In great alarm she hastened to comply with his request, but while doing so a ten-ruble note blew away. The man sprang after it, but the lady jumped into the sleigh, lashed the horses, and was soon at her own door. When the handsome sleigh was searched by the police a purse was found containing six thousand rubles. Nobody appeared to claim sleigh or purse.

One bright but bitter cold Sunday in February a young gentleman and lady living near Dubuque resolved, like good Christians, to go to church. A sleigh ride of a few miles was not disagreeable in prospect, provided they could keep warm. So, in addition to abundant wrappings, they heated a good-sized "chunk" of wood, put it into the bottom of the sleigh, and drove off in fine spirits. The horses sped over the smooth road, the bells jingled in the frosty air, and they had gone over half their distance, when a scent of something burning began to fill the air. Presently a column of smoke issued from behind the seat. "Fire!" shouted both, jumping from the sleigh, when it was discovered that Mr. A was on fire, Miss B was on fire, and the sleigh on fire. The gentleman snowballed himself out, and then rolled the lady in the snow until she was quenched. What became of the sleigh, history recordeth not.

"Old Government Java," so highly prized by coffee drinkers, is not a special variety of the berry, but only Java coffee that has been kept several years. It then assumes a brown color, and loses by evaporation that chemical principle which imparts the harsh, bitter, and astringent taste to new coffee. Mocha coffee is not always grown in Mocha; but much which bears the name is sent from the East Indies and certain parts of Africa to Mocha, where it is subjected to a peculiar method of curing, in which whatever excellence it possesses chiefly consists.

"English, French, German, Italian and Spanish spoken here," is the announcement which often beguiles travelers into unknown hotels on the Continent. An Englishman recently entered a French hotel on the strength of such a notice. Finding no waiter possessing even the most rudimentary acquaintance with the English language, he asked for the interpreter, and being told that there was none, demanded an explanation.

"By whom then," he inquired, "are English, German, Italian, and Spanish spoken?"

"By the travelers, Sir, who come to the hotel," was the reply.

A foreign journal relates the following remarkable instance of presence of mind: "A Madame Bonneau, living in the Rue Descartes, was sitting in her parlor awaiting her husband's return to dinner, when a man of wild and haggard appearance entered, and, seating himself opposite to her, addressed her in the following terms: 'I am a great doctor. I can effectually cure all headaches. I have heard that you suffer from that cause, and I am come to cure you.' The lady, perceiving that she had to deal with a madman, prudently seemed to fall into his humor, and asked his method of treatment. 'Simple enough, madame,' said he, drawing a razor from his pocket; 'I cut off the head, and then, after having well cleaned it, I replace it upon the shoulders.' Upon this he prepared to suit the action to his words. Madame Bonneau, with great coolness, professed her readiness to submit to the operation, but suggested that she should fetch a towel from the next room to prevent her dress being stained. Her visitor assented to the reasonableness of this suggestion, and she left the room, locking the door behind her. Upon her return with some police officers they found that the unfortunate maniac had cut his own throat, but not fatally. It was ascertained that he had escaped from a lunatic asylum at Clermont les Prés."

Digitized by Google

LIFE IN CHINA.

A MANDARIN RECEIVING A VISITOR.

THE time and mode of paying official visits, and every particular relating to the ceremonial etiquette of such visits, are fixed by the Board of Rites and Ceremonies in Pekin.

Members of the civil service must, when visiting, proceed in chairs or on foot, while military officers are permitted to visit on horseback, but not in the sedan. Again, the rank of the visitor is denoted by the number of his followers, and by the ornamental details of his dress, while the mode of salutation is regulated with the utmost precision, according to the rank of the visitor. There are eight modes of salutation. The first consists of simply joining the hands and raising them before the breast. The last, or most perfect mode of obeisance, requires the individual to ko-tow nine times—that is, in the kneeling posture to knock the ground with the forehead nine times. This last form of homage is only exacted for the Emperor of China and Son of Heaven. The Emperor being the Son of Heaven, he, as a matter of course, is entitled to the same degree of adoration. This is the great barrier to a final settlement of the Chinese audience question. The Chinese can not see why a nation of barbarians, whose origin dates from but yesterday, should send their embassadors, or, as they style them, "tribute bearers," to the Imperial court, and there demand the right of audience with the Celestial ruler; why they should insist upon standing on their dignity, using their jointless limbs to support them in the most sacred presence; why, in the name of all that is ancient, classical, and therefore right, these pale-faced strangers, who come from obscure petty states to learn the civilized usages of the Central Flowery Land, should so persistently refuse to prostrate themselves and lick the dust nine times in presence of the Heavenly Emperor.

The illustration represents a high mandarin receiving a private visit from an inferior officer. The visitor, when he reached the outer gate of the Yamun, or palace, had to wait in his sedan while he sent in his card, which consists of a strip of red paper bearing his name, more like a handbill than the tiny cards in use with us. An interview is granted, he is borne into the inner court, alights from his chair, and proceeds to the reception hall, where he is met by his superior. Had the visitor been a man of equal rank, he would have been received by the host at the outer gate, but being inferior in rank, he has had to make his way to the inner reception hall, where he bows low with joined hands, while his superior receives him with a slight inclination of the body. Seats are next taken according to rank, unless the visitor be a personal friend, when much of the strict formality of etiquette is set aside, and the visit rendered agreeable by lively conversation, pipes, and tea. Under the most favorable circumstances, however, there is a show of conventional polish and good-breeding which is never altogether dispensed with, and which is observed even by the lower orders of society in China.

LIFE IN CHINA—A MANDARIN RECEIVING A VISITOR.

Hosted by Google

Cashmere Mantelet, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS mantelet is made of gray cashmere, lined with lustring, and trimmed with folds, loops, and bows of black velvet. The hood is lined with pleated gray gros grain as shown by Fig. 1. To make the mantelet cut of cashmere and lustring lining two pieces each from Figs. 32 and 33, Supplement, and one piece each from Figs. 34–36, having first joined on the pieces turned down in Supplement on Figs. 32 and 35. Cut a slit in the back from the under edge to *, sew up the darts in the fronts, join the back, side forms, and fronts according to the corresponding figures, and run the material and lining together along the outer edge, excepting the neck, at the same time fastening in a fly ten inches long and furnished with eyes on the left front from the neck. Sew the corresponding hooks on the wrong side of the right front. Set on the trimming as shown by the illustration. Cut a slit in the cape along the double line, sew up the shoulder pleats, trim as shown by the illustration, and arrange the cape in pleats, fastening the ×'s on the ●'s marked with the same letters. Baste the cape on the neck of the mantelet according to the corresponding figures, and set a velvet bow at the bottom of the waist in the back. Having faced the hood on the outside from the neck to the dotted line with pleated gros grain, sew up the seam from 27 to 28, fold the hood on the outside along the dotted line so that 29 comes on 29, and furnish it with trimming. Baste the hood on the neck of the mantelet, and set the latter on a standing collar. A pleated frill of batiste or Swiss muslin is basted inside the latter as a finish for the neck.

Fig. 1.—CASHMERE SPRING HOOD.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 19 and 20.

BARATHEA SPRING HOOD.
For description see Supplement.

CRÊPE DE CHINE AND FAILLE CRAVAT BOW.
For description see Supplement.

the open air, either on foot, donkey-back, horseback, or in a carriage. The atmosphere is not subject to any sudden change, nor is there danger of vicissitudes of temperature such as are experienced in many places in the south of Europe, nor cold cutting winds such as frequently prevail during winter and spring at Nice and Naples. The complete change, too, from the habits and customs of Western Europe to those of an Eastern city like Cairo is, we are convinced, of immense importance to valetudinarians, for impressions made upon the mind react upon the body, and the novelty of the new style of life in Egypt gradually weans one from a too frequent thought of self. Who could think of dyspepsia or hypochondriasis while beholding the lovely sunrises and glorious sunsets, or while contemplating, as at Thebes, the ruins of a civilization that existed long before Athens and Rome were thought of, or the history of Greece had even been begun?

The pleasantest months in the year for a residence at Cairo are December, January, February, and March. The inundations of the Nile, having subsided, leave the fields in November covered with a fresh layer of rich deposit; then the lands are put under cultivation; and during our winter months, which are, in fact, the spring months in Egypt, the Delta, as well as the valley of the Nile, looks like a delightful garden, teeming with verdure and beautiful with the blossoms of trees and plants. It very seldom rains at Cairo, probably not more than three or four times in the year.

Fig. 2.—CASHMERE SPRING HOOD.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 19 and 20.

WINTERING IN EGYPT.

THE long sea passage has hitherto deterred many persons from visiting Egypt; but now that the journey from Brindisi to Alexandria can be made in three days and a half, the superiority of Lower Egypt over the south of France or Italy as a winter residence will become better known and appreciated. Cairo is, par excellence, the most perfect Arab city of the present day, and one in which its inhabitants have, perhaps, attained to a higher degree of civilization than in any other city in the East. The climate of Egypt is salubrious during the greater part of the year, and, in Alexandria, even the heat of summer is seldom oppressive, being tempered by a fresh northerly breeze. The Khamseen, or hot south wind, however, which prevails in April and May, is at times unpleasant, and the inundations from the Nile render the latter part of the autumn less healthy than the summer and winter. In summer the village of Ramléh, four miles from Alexandria, is a charming residence, while Cairo, from its clear dry atmosphere and equable temperature, is now admitted to be one of the most desirable winter resorts for invalids in the world. The Khedive, too, who, from his immense wealth, his splendid hospitality, and liberal patronage of art, is justly entitled to be called the Haroun-al-Raschid of modern times, is fast rendering his capital as luxurious as it is interesting.

One of the principal advantages which invalids derive from a winter's residence in a favorable climate is that they are enabled to take daily and efficient exercise in the open air. At Cairo the invalid or tourist can be constantly in

Fig. 1.—CASHMERE MANTELET.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 32–36.

Fig. 2.—CASHMERE MANTELET.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 32–36.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALDINE.—Visiting-cards used by married ladies bear their husband's name, with the title Mrs. before it—as "Mrs. John Smith." The cards are large plain white Bristol-board, with script letters.

MRS. F. W.—Both gold and steel bowed spectacles are used.

MRS. JAMES C.—See descriptions of trimming for dress skirts in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI.; also of polonaises.

A. L. L.—To change the shirt patterns lap the hems of the front, and open the yoke in the middle of the back, and fasten it by two buttons.

P. H. C.—Get gray or plum-colored cashmere or soft French gray flannel for your studying gown.

LUCILE.—To freshen your black iron grenadine dampen it by sponging with tepid water in which a little borax has been dissolved.

TABITHA.—Wear your black Cashmere shawl three-cornered in the old-fashioned way.

C. M. A.—Read description of girls' piqué dresses in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 10, Vol. VI.

A SIMPLETON.—To remodel your blue silk get a sleeveless jacket and an over-skirt of a deeper blue shade. See description in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI.

C. H. B.—Stitch bias bands of the percale piped with white on your percale skirt.

MRS. J. P. D.—Use bias bands, or else passementerie, for heading lace.

SUBSCRIBER.—Your brown silk needs only a sleeveless basque, square cuffs, and over-skirt of silk of another shade. Use a lighter brown, and put bands of the same on the skirt. The pongee suit might have an over-skirt—merely an apron—made of pieces of the polonaise, and the remaining parts, paletot, round waist, and plain skirt, would answer if trimmed with bias black velvet and écru lace. Put lengthwise velvet folds on the skirt, and have a sash of black velvet, knotted on the side. Use large ivory (or else old silver) buttons and buckles. This suit would also look well trimmed with olive brown silk, but would be similar to the brown silk dress just mentioned.

WIDOW.—Your visiting-cards should now have "Mrs. Mary Jones," written in script, not "Mrs. John Jones."

M. O.—Your sample of gray vigogne is very suitable for a stylish traveling dress. Make by the Double-breasted Redingote pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V.; or else make an over-skirt and Dolman. Pleated silk ruffles are often made straight instead of bias.

INEXPERIENCED ONES.—You will find illustrations and descriptions of an infant's wardrobe in Bazar No. 35, Vol. V. Twenty-five cents will buy the entire set of cut paper patterns.

H. A. B.—The poplins have advanced to $2.

MRS. W. M. R.—The term "crossed" in knitting signifies that the stitch referred to should be twisted in knitting it off; to do this, insert the needle in the stitch from the back toward the front, instead of in the usual manner.

EUGENIE.—A vest-polonaise with Dolman sleeves would look well made of black cashmere, trimmed with guipure lace and insertion. Cut out the cashmere under the insertion. Princesse and Gabrielle dresses are both worn by girls of five years.

DOLLY DIMPLE.—Moiré antique is not as fashionable as plain repped silk. It is said to be coming into vogue again, but at present is used more for trimming cuffs, vests, and various parts of costumes. Brides married in white wear pearls or diamonds. Duchesse lace is like Honiton, very open and fine. A flounce would cost from $20 a yard upward.

PAINTINGS.

THE ancient and exquisite art of making enamels for ornaments has not indeed wholly disappeared from Europe. But no such work is now done in that kind as Limoges of old produced, and still less as we have caught glimpses of in the treasures of Chinese and Japanese manufacture. But the employment of painting in jewelry, though it was carried to a high pitch of fashion and of success in the age of Louis XV. and Louis XVI. in France has never been more admirably practiced than it now is. Nor can any thing be imagined more delicate and gracious. Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, 22 John St. (up stairs), true Athenians of their calling, ever on the watch for some new thing, were sure not to overlook this development of European art. Some of their brooches, bracelets, ear-rings of this kind are absolutely winning. In little dainty frames of chased or chiselled gold, the airiest little Pucks and Cupids dance and float, wanton and laugh. They seem small refugees from some one of Albano's Arcadian canvases, as arch, as full of life, as quaint, as captivating as his most chubby and most darling imps. Festoons of flowers are woven about them. Grapes and the leaves of the vine overhang and entwine with them. Any thing more apt or charming to be worn by young girls in the first flush of their budding womanhood it would be hard to devise and not easy to dream of.—[Com.]

A MOST USEFUL ARTICLE in every household is a sewing-machine. The Wilson Under-Feed Sewing-Machine combines in every degree the most perfect machine yet invented. It is elegant in finish, simple to learn, runs smoothly and quietly, and, what is more important, is the cheapest. The Wilson Machine has received the highest praise from all who have used it, and stands at the head of all sewing-machines. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

TAKE YOUR DYEING AND CLEANING to the New York Dyeing and Printing Establisement, Staten Island; 98 Duane St., 752 Broadway, and 610 Sixth Ave., New York; 164 and 166 Pierrepont St., Brooklyn; 40 North Eighth St., Phila.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

20 Sheets of Choice Music, $1 00.

Why throw away money on high-priced Music when you can select from our Catalogue of 700 pieces? Any 20 Half-Dime, or 10 of Dime Series mailed on receipt of One Dollar. Sold by all booksellers, and can be ordered through any newsdealer. Send stamp for Catalogue. Address

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
439 THIRD AVENUE, NEW YORK.

FOR
MOTH PATCHES,
Freckles, & Tan,
USE
PERRY'S MOTH & FRECKLE LOTION.

It is reliable and harmless.

Depot, 49 Bond St., NEW YORK.

Sold by Druggists everywhere.

HAIR!!!

L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,
Between 4TH and GREAT JONES STS.
The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.
Import and manufacture their own Goods, and RETAIL THEM AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.
Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, charges prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.

FOR 10 Cts., a specimen No. PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL sent, first post, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

WALTHAM WATCHES FOR LADIES.

We continue to sell these favorite Watches on the most liberal terms; that is, we send them by Express with the bill to collect on delivery, and allow the purchaser to open the package and examine the watch before paying the bill. The prices are extremely low.

SOLID GOLD Hunting-Case Watches FROM $55.

ALL WATCHES WARRANTED BY SPECIAL CERTIFICATE.

Every one who intends to buy a watch this year should write for our Descriptive Price-List, and it will be sent free and postpaid by return mail. It gives full particulars, with prices, and much information, and will interest you whether you want to buy a watch or not. When you write please mention HARPER'S BAZAR. Address

HOWARD & CO.,
No. 865 Broadway, New York.

THE NEW STEM-WINDING WATCH FOR LADIES IS NOW READY.

TO THE LADIES!

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.

No lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.

B. F. BROWN & Co., Boston.

FASHION'S Triple FAVORITE, "Le Plus Nouvelle."

MAGIC COSTUME.—This is the Acme of Paris ingenuity!!!! This engraving represents two views of it. And there is still another, viz.: a draped apron front. THREE Entirely different Costumes in one! It can be changed from a Polonaise to a Redingote or Waterproof in less than one minute, by simply adjusting one button. The original is made in dark blue ladies' cloth, trimmed with Hercules braid.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1873, by A. Burdette Smith, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington, D. C.

As a Polonaise. As a Waterproof.

This pattern is Particularly desirable for wash goods, because when unbottoned it falls into a beautifully shaped Wrapper without pleat or gather, making it easy to laundry. The Traveler, especially the Voyager, will find it an indispensable convenience. It is very simple and easy to make. Complete instructions are printed upon each pattern, besides a Cloth Model. (See below.) Requires five yards Waterproof. All Sizes. Price of pattern and cloth model, One Dollar. See Premium below.

We furnish it "READY MADE" in Linen or Batiste, from $5 to $15; in Waterproof, $10 to $20; in any color of ladies' cloth, handsomely trimmed, $25. SEND STAMP for our CATALOGUE of STYLES.

We give a CLOTH MODEL with each pattern, which SHOWS every seam, pleat, gather, loop, etc., how to put the garment together by the pattern, and how it will look when completed. By the use of our Cloth Models any person who can sew can FINISH the most difficult garment as easy as the plainest. They are PERFECT GUIDES.

SUBSCRIBE NOW FOR

SMITH'S ILLUSTRATED PATTERN BAZAAR—ONLY One Dollar a Year!

Sample copy mailed for 25 cents.—BEST AND CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD!!!!

PREMIUM, FREE. Every subscriber is entitled to select Patterns to the value of ONE DOLLAR, you will be made a YEARLY SUBSCRIBER, and the pattern of the above engraving, with a Cloth Model, will be mailed to you FREE! OR, if you prefer to select your premium after you receive the Bazaar, he will mail to you a receipt for your subscription, and a "PREMIUM COUPON," which will entitle you to select patterns to the value of ONE dollar FREE at any time. When you send your subscription, please state which you prefer.

Address, A. BURDETTE SMITH,
P. O. Box 5055. Smith's Pattern Bazaar, 914 BROADWAY, N. Y.

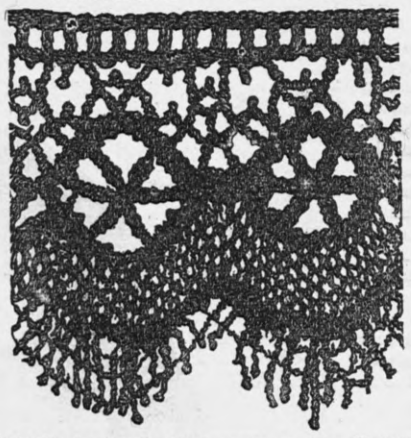
REAL LACES.



Embroideries, Muslin Undergarments, &c. Cheapest in the country. Every C. O. D. package subject to examination before acceptance. Send for Spring Catalogue. SAMPLES and PRICE-LISTS mailed free from

EHRICH'S TEMPLE of FASHION,
287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, N. Y.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

CHENEY BRO'S
American Gros-Grain Silks,
IN BLACK STRIPES,
AND ELEGANT FALL COLORS,
Of Shades especially adapted for Suitings.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 353 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

MADAME FOY'S CORSET SKIRT SUPPORTER,

For Health, Comfort, and Style,
Is acknowledged THE BEST ARTICLE of the kind ever made. Numerous Testimonials in its favor are being received from all parts of the United States.
LADY AGENTS WANTED.
HARMON, BALDWIN, & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers,
New Haven, Conn.
ARNOLD & BANNING, New York;
D. B. FISK & Co., Chicago, Agents.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N. Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

A PAIR OF BEST TWO-BUTTON KID GLOVES sent postpaid for $1 00. Three pair for $2 75; Twelve pair for $10 00. Every color and size. Real Laces, samples of Sash Ribbons and Dress Trimmings sent free on application.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 Eighth Ave., Bet. 27th and 28th Sts., New York.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, No. 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

VERBENA SEEDS! We have another fine stock of seeds of this beautiful flower, saved from our large collection of more than 100 varieties; 25 cts per pkt., 5 pkts. $1. J. T. SMITH & SONS, Brentwood, N. H.

1873. NOTICE. 1873.

OUR CELEBRATED BUFFALO

AND OTTER

TRADE MARK PAT'D.

BRANDS
BLACK ALPACAS,
AND
BEAVER BRAND.

TRADE MARK PAT'D.

SILK FINISHED
Black Pure Mohairs
ARE HANDSOMER THAN EVER FOR SPRING WEAR.

These Beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Dry-Goods Retailers throughout the United States.

☞ Purchasers will know these goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece, bearing a picture of the Buffalo, Otter, or Beaver.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 and 429 Broadway,
305 Canal and 47 Howard Sts.,
New York.
SOLE IMPORTERS.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

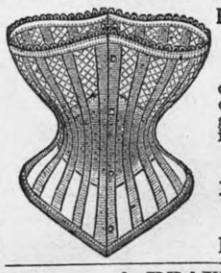
4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

PATENT KID-FITTING
SKELETON CORSET.



Recommended by Leading Physicians.

Should be worn by all ladies who value health and comfort. They have been greatly improved, and the fit is perfect.

They are delightful
For Summer Wear.

To be found at all
First-Class Retail Stores.

A BRAVE BOOK,
"WHAT WOMAN SHOULD KNOW."
A Woman's Book about Women, by a Woman (Mrs. E. B. DUFFEY).

The ONLY work of the kind ever written BY A WOMAN; is a necessity in every household; its entire novelty and eminent PRACTICALNESS will create an IMMENSE DEMAND. Notwithstanding the delicate subjects necessarily treated, it is written in such BRAVE, PURE style as will not offend the most fastidious. LADY agents never have had such an opportunity to make money and do good. Terms and sample sheets mailed free on immediate application. J. M. STODDART & CO., Philadelphia.

TRUE TIME FOR $1. 50,000 SOLD.
Magnetic Time-Keeper, Compass, and Indicator. A perfect GEM for the pocket of every traveler, trader, boy, farmer, and for EVERY BODY desiring a reliable timekeeper, and also a superior compass. Usual watch-size, steel works, glass crystal, all in a neat OROIDE case. WARRANTED to denote correct time and to keep in order—if fairly used—for two years. Nothing like it! This perfect triumph of mechanism will be sent in a neat case, prepaid to any address, for only $1; 3 for $2. Circulars sent free. Try one. Order from the manufacturers' Agents. Eureka Manufacturing Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

Hosted by Google

INFANT'S WARDROBE "C"
FOR $125.

2 Flannel Bands	@	$0 62½	$1 25
2 Barrow Coats	@	2 50	5 00
3 Flannel Skirts, Embroidered	@	5 00	15 00
2 Cambric "	@	2 00	4 00
2 " "	@	3 00	6 00
6 Linen Shirts	@	1 00	6 00
6 Night Dresses	@	2 25	13 50
2 Day Dresses	@	5 50	11 00
6 Slips	@	3 00	18 00
1 Calico Wrapper			1 50
1 Robe			9 00
1 Basket, completely Furnished			10 00
6 Pairs Knitted Shoes	@	0 75	4 50
1 Embroidered Merino Shawl			6 50
1 Val. Lace Cap			7 50
1 Eureka Diaper			1 00
Set of Linen Diapers			2 50
1 Rubber Bib			0 50
3 Quilted Bibs	@	0 75	2 25
			$125 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Wardrobe "A," for $75, and "B," for $100, sent by mail if desired.

LORD & TAYLOR,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN
FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,
NEW YORK, (Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
ARE OFFERING
EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS
AS TO PRICES, QUALITIES, AND STYLES OF GOODS IN ALL THE DEPARTMENTS OF THEIR RETAIL STORE.
Each Department will exhibit
ELEGANT NOVELTIES SUITABLE FOR EARLY SPRING WEAR.
Special attention is requested to their
GRISAILLE STRIPED SILKS,
$1 per yard, cheap at $1 50.
BLACK AND COLORED SILK SUITS,
Made in the highest styles, only $50 each.
MOHAIR AND POPLIN SUITS,
Entirely new, only $14.
AN IMMENSE STOCK OF
REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS,
$25 each upward.
LACE GOODS, TRIMMINGS, LACES, LLAMA SACQUES, POINTS, EMBROIDERIES, &c.

DRESSMAKING DEPARTMENT,
Under superior management, in which orders for MOURNING as well as BALL, RECEPTION, CARRIAGE, AND PROMENADE DRESSES
Are executed in
ONE TO THREE DAYS' NOTICE, without disappointment. Warranted in style and elegance equal, if not superior, to any foreign production.
CHARGES EXTREMELY MODERATE.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.,
Are constantly receiving all the BEST MAKES and NEWEST STYLES of
FRENCH, ENGLISH, AND AMERICAN CARPETINGS,
To which they invite the attention of their Customers, and purchasers generally.

HOTELS AND STEAM-BOATS
CARPETED AND UPHOLSTERED
In the best manner and on the most favorable terms, by
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

MOURNING DEPARTMENT.
Have now opened their
SPRING AND SUMMER ASSORTMENT OF MOURNING DRESS GOODS,
IN EVERY VARIETY SUITABLE FOR DEEP AND LIGHT MOURNING.
ALSO,
TRIMMING CREPES, VEILS, COLLARS AND SLEEVES, HDKFS., &c., &c.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

GRENADINES, GRENADINES.
WARRANTED PURE SILK & WOOL.
200 PIECES 2 YARDS WIDE, $1 25, $1 35, $1 50, $1 75, $2 00, and $2 50.
BLACK SILKS,
$1 25, $1 50, $1 75, $2 00, $2 25, $2 50, $2 75, $3; good bargains. CANNELL-STRIPE SILKS, $1 25, worth $1 75.
JACKSON'S,
Cor. BROADWAY AND WAVERLEY PLACE.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

12 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS mailed for 50 cts., by C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

COLGATE & COMPANY'S
EXTRACT CASHMERE BOUQUET,
FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.
"CASHMERE BOUQUET."
COLGATE & CO'S
CASHMERE BOUQUET SOAP,
FOR THE TOILET.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS
IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER..No. 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)..... " 25
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt..... " 27
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)..... " 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT..... " 51

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)..... " 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT.... " 15

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

NOVELTY
PRINTING-PRESSES.
The Best yet Invented FOR AMATEUR & BUSINESS PURPOSES, And Unsurpassed for General Job Printers.
OVER 8000 IN USE.
BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer,
And Dealer in Every Description of
PRINTING MATERIAL,
349-351 Federal & 152 Kneeland Sts., Boston; Branch Store, 543 Broadway & 88 Mercer St., N. Y. Agents, Kelly, Howell, & Ludwig, Philadelphia; J. F. Edwards, St. Louis, Mo.; A. C. Kellogg, Chicago, Ill. Send for Pamphlet.

A GREAT OFFER FOR MARCH!!
Horace Waters & Son, 481 B'way, N. Y., will dispose of 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS of first-class makers, including Waters's, at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES FOR CASH, during THIS MONTH. New 7-octave PIANOS, modern improvements, for $250 and $275 cash. THE WATERS CONCERTO PARLOR ORGANS are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Prices at bargains for cash. Monthly installments received, running from one to three years. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

For Cleansing the Teeth.

WORKING CLASS, MALE OR FEMALE, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Cortlandt St., N. Y.

THE AMERICAN CARD PRINTER.—The best, neatest, quickest, and most durable article for printing visiting cards that has ever been on the market. With it an agent can travel from town to town printing visiting cards in various styles; a business at which Card Writers are now making from $10 to $20 per day; and have done so for years past, and now not beginning to supply the demand, as only the best writers can do the work, but with the above printer a boy 12 years of age can do work better and more accurate than the most experienced Card Writers. 50 well printed cards with your name, as samples, post paid 50cts. BOND, MARTIN & CO., SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

$125 A WEEK! All expenses paid. Business new. NOVELTY CO., Saco, Me.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

THE LADD PATENT STIFFENED
GOLD WATCH CASES,
For Movements of American Manufacture,
In Ladies' Gentlemen's, and Boys' Sizes, and in
MANSARD, DOME, & FLAT STYLES.
The most elegant, durable, popular, and the
BEST GOLD WATCH CASES
ever made for so little money. For sale by leading Jewelers throughout the United States and New Dominion. Descriptive Circulars sent on application by the manufacturers,
J. A. BROWN & CO., 11 Maiden Lane, New York.

TRY IT.
The STIGER Patent
SKIRT, DRAWERS, AND STOCKING SUPPORTER And SKELETON WAIST
COMBINED.
Ask your Merchants for it. If you cannot get it, we will send single one, prepaid, for Children, on receipt of $1. For Misses and Ladies, on receipt of $1.25.
In ordering for Children, give the age—for Misses and Ladies, the height.
Agents Wanted
Send price for samples. Solicit orders, and make money.
A liberal discount to Agents & Merchants.
Cut this out and keep it. Address
Stiger Mfg. Co.
60 WARREN ST.
P.O. Box 4391. N.Y.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE
Manufactured by the Florence Sewing Mach. Co. The simplest, cheapest, and best in use! Has but one needle! A Child can run it. Agents wanted in every town. Send for Circular and Sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.
DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

THE NEW BOOKS
OF
THE SEASON
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.
SANTO DOMINGO, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti. By SAMUEL HAZARD. Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

2.
STUDENT'S HALLAM'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND. The Constitutional History of England, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II. By HENRY HALLAM, LL.D., F.R.A.S. Incorporating the Author's Latest Additions and Corrections, and adapted to the Use of Students. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D. 12mo, 747 pp., Cloth, $2 00.

3.
RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.
Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

4.
GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50. Popular Edition, 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

5.
HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

6.
ROBIN GRAY. A Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, "Author of "For the King," and "For Lack of Gold." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.
THE WANDERING HEIR. A Novel. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," "Foul Play," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.; Cloth, 60 cts.

8.
THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.
This work embraces in one volume:
ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.
ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.
CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

9.
THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF A PHAETON. A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "In Silk Attire," "The Monarch of Mincing-Lane," "Kilmeny," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.

10.
A PASSION IN TATTERS. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Maud Mohan," "Denis Donne," "False Colors," "Played Out," "The Dower House," "Theo Leigh," "Only Herself," "Playing for High Stakes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.
U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

PARQUET FLOORS.
The National Wood M'f'g Co.,
MANUFACTUREES OF
WOOD CARPETING,
942 BROADWAY.
Send Stamp for Designs.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

SEYMOUR'S SHEARS & SCISSORS.
"The Best are the Cheapest."
Extra Quality. Crocus Polish.

Family Size, - - $1.50
Ladies' Scissors, - 1.00
By mail, prepaid. Send P. O. Order or Draft.
HENRY SEYMOUR & CO., 29 and 31 Rose St., N. Y.

Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 539 B'dway, N.Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See goods of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

EVIDENT GENIUS.

EMMY (mamma's volunteer secretary). "How is this to be answered, Kitty? I don't know what to say!" (Reads) "'Mrs. Fitzmode at Home on the 30th inst. from Four to Six o'Clock.'"

KITTY. "Well, I should write and say Mamma did not know Mrs. Fitzmode had been away, but wonders she should return to stop only Two Hours!"

FACETIÆ.

AT a school examination, where words were "given out" for subjects in composition, a "mute, inglorious Milton" produced at sight this sentence on the word "panegyric:" "A few drops of panegyric, given on a large lump of sugar, is often best for an infant with the stomach-ache."

A LOAFER'S LOGIC.

WORTHY PASTOR. "My boy, learn to be contented; mouths are never sent without the bread to feed them."

PRACTICAL BOY. "Oh, ah! but the mouths is sent to our house and the bread to yourn!"

There is a story of a doctor who went to settle in a village out West, and on the first night of his arrival was sent for to attend a sick child. He looked at the little sufferer very attentively, and then delivered this oracular opinion: "This hyar babe's got the small-pox, and I ain't posted up on pustules. We must approach this case by circular treatment. You give the little cuss this draught. That 'll send him into fits. Then send for me. I graduated on fits."

A jolly member of the Exchange, who has a habit of winking every time he speaks, has been christened "the eye stutterer."

Our bilious contributor writes to tell us that his doctor informs him that he has liver enough for three people. He adds that this seems so selfish that if we can indicate any deserving cases of destitution in that particular, he will be happy to hear of them.

A country minister of "limited capacity" recently married for a second wife a widow of some property. Being an ardent servant of Mammon, a former neighbor asked him if he did not do well by the second marriage. "Oh yes, indeed," he said, with animation; and then, as an expression of reverent awe stole into his face, he added, "and what is very remarkable, the clothes of my wife's first husband just fit me."

A mosquito taper is a Pittsburg invention. It creates such a smell when burning that the mosquitoes ask to be excused. It drives human beings out-doors also—which is its only defect.

ADVICE TO YOUNG MEN.—Love not, love not! the thing you love may dye.

WINTRY RHYMES.

I don't much care for summer,
For autumn, or for spring;
But oh, the latest comer
I hate like—any thing!
Of phrases more aggressive
I fain would be the minter,
If they'd but be expressive
Of hatred for the winter.

Such seasonable weather
Some folks consider "prime;"
But I do altogether
Detest the bitter time:
It may suit those who run,
But I am not a sprinter,
And can not see the fun
Of this confounded winter.

With steaming "goes" of grog
(Your only comfort-giver)
One battles with the fog,
But damages one's liver.
The doctor proves, alas!
Of all one's drink a stinter:
Without the cheerful glass
How desolate is winter!

Some fancy frost is nice,
And talk of jolly skating;
Except in summer, ice
I hold a thing for hating.
My curse be on the lot,
From iceberg down to splinter;
I like my weather hot,
And can not bear the winter!

The spring I can endure,
If not too cold and showery;
The summer can allure
My praise for beauty flowery;
And autumn, when fruit's ripe,
I like, but—Master Printer,
Please put in larger type—
I DO DETEST THE WINTER!

THE MOST WELCOME SERIAL JUST NOW—"A simple ton."

NOT ALTOGETHER GALLANT.—The proprietor of a large provincial menagerie has posted up the following notice: "Ladies are requested not to remain stationary in front of the cages. It tires the monkeys."

A DENT IN HIM.

YOUNG CADSON (with genuine surprise). "What a strange thing, Miss, your Dog don't seem to like me!"
MISS SNOBLEIGH (guilelessly). "Per-haps it's because you hev them Dog-skin Gloves on."

[And perhaps that WAS the reason.

A MATTER OF TASTE.

(Never said, but thought of as we lit the cigar to go home.)

"Do you like Browning?" asked a reading man of a young lady whom he had taken down to dinner.

The fair creature by his side (who was no bookworm) answered, "Yes. That is, I like crackling."

A curious discipline is enforced at revival meetings, where the reverend preachers notify to the speakers in the beginning, "If any man attempts to make a long speech, he will be sung down on the spot."

A teacher at a public school recently asked a boy which is the highest dignitary of the church. After looking up and down, north, east, south, and west, the boy innocently replied, "The weather-cock."

"How did you manage to win her affections so quickly, Dan? The recipe's worth knowing."

"Oh, that was simple enough," replied he. "The first night that I arrived at the lodging-house in Auckland I found myself sitting next to a young woman at supper, who, I soon found, was one of the newly arrived immigrants. I looked her over, and saw she was a round, strong, cheery-looking lass, with a laughing face, and thought she'd do. I didn't know how to go foolin' around her to find a soft place (as you would have done, Sir—no offense to you), but just spoke a word or two with her, and when we came out into the passage gave her a squeeze and a kiss. Says she, 'How dare you?' Says I, 'I wants to marry you, my dear.' 'Marry me?' cries she, laughing; 'why, I don't know you.' 'No more do I you, my dear,' says I; 'so that makes it all fair and equal.' She didn't know how to put a clapper on that, so she only laughed and said she couldn't think of it. 'Not think of it,' says I, artful like, 'not when you've come all these thousands of miles for the purpose?' 'What do you mean?' says she, staring. 'Come, now,' says I, 'don't tell me. I knows what's what. When a man immigrationizes it's to get work; when a woman immigrationizes it's to get married. You may as well do it at once.' Well, she giggled a bit, and we were spliced two days afterward."

A boy carried enterprise to the very last of earth the other day by circulating advertising sheets along a funeral procession of forty-seven sleighs. He stood by the road-side, assiduously handing in his bills, and didn't miss any body in the ranks outside the hearse.

AN OLD "SAW" RE-SET.

MOTTO FOR AMATEUR VIOLINISTS — Bowing and Scraping.

In Galloway large craigs are met with having ancient writings on them. One on the farm of Knockieby has, cut deep on the upper side,

"Lift me up, and I'll tell you more."

A number of people gathered to this craig and succeeded in lifting it up, in hopes of being well repaid; but instead of finding any gold, they found written on it,

"Lay me down as I was before."

The local wit who propounded this "sell," fortunately for himself, died some years since.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.—Illegible writers are undesirable acquaintances—their "characters" are bad.

The defense of a gentleman who had deprived his neighbor of his turkey and roasted it was that he found it on his fence, and seized it in payment for rent of the fence.

It is whispered in literary circles that Mr. Carlyle's works will shortly be translated into English.

Mr. St. H—— had a capital stud groom who came with him from England. The first foal born in the colony of Wellington was from a mare of Mr. St. H——'s. Some officers and friends were admiring the pretty little creature, and one of the ladies asked the groom what his name would be.

"Harribogene," answered the groom, pat enough.

"What? I never heard such a word before!"

"Didn't you, now, miss? Well, it's a wonder, too; it's what they call them Maories as is born in the place!"

"Harribogene" was the name of the horse to his dying day.

A leading lecturer classifies his audience as follows: The "still-attentives," the "quick-responsives," the "hard-to-lifts," the "won't-applauds," and the "get-up-and-go-outs."

DRAMATIC CON.—What were the "palmy" days of the drama?—When they were first-rate hands at acting.

THE PASSAGE OF BROADWAY.

WHAT ARE THESE BIG MEN WAITING BEHIND THIS YOUNG LADY FOR? TO ROB HER? NO! TO INSULT HER? NO! THEY ARE ONLY WAITING TILL A POLICEMAN COMES TO ESCORT HER ACROSS THE STREET, AND THEN THEY CAN SLIP OVER SAFELY IN HER WAKE.

"Come, Em'ly dear, let's wait for a Car somewhere else, for I do believe a horrid good-for-nothing Fellow is taking a Bath in the Window behind us."

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 15.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

LADIES' WALKING SUITS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Fig. 1.—SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN).

Fig. 2.—WALKING SUIT.

[Cut Paper Patterns of the Sleeveless Jacket Walking Suit, Fig. 1, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Hosted by Google

THY ROSES.

THE splendor of thy roses fills
The silence of my lonely room;
But something in their beauty thrills
More than the brightness of their bloom.
'Tis this: thy dear hand gathered them,
And grouped their loveliness for me.
In every rose whose leaves I kiss,
The wonder of thy love I see.

Two, rising fair above the rest,
Together seem to breathe apart,
And one of these, supremely blest,
Lies on the other's royal heart.
Oh, thus it is with thee and me:
From all the crowded world apart,
My all of life—love's ecstasy—
I only know it through thy heart.

My rose of men, the lesser flower
Cast not from out thy larger heart;
Enough if in her waning hour,
She may but perish where thou art.

Ladies' Walking Suits, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustration on first page.

Fig. 1.—SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). The sleeveless jacket of this pretty suit is destined to be one of the most popular wrappings of the spring and summer. It is a sleeveless basque cut with stylish square front and pockets, and can be made of any material, whether woolen, silk, or muslin. It may be worn over a plain basque of a lighter shade, or may be used as the only corsage, with the lighter sleeves sewed in permanently. A pattern of the coat sleeve seen in the illustration, with a cuff like the jacket, is furnished. The skirt and sleeves should always be of a lighter or a contrasting shade, and the trimmings of the same color as the jacket. In the original the suit is made of two shades of brown poplin. The stylish round over-skirt is gracefully looped on the sides, and a sash, made of loops and slanting ends, falls on the left. A bias band of the darker shade, bordering the upper and under skirts, is used instead of flounces.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises three garments—sleeveless jacket, apron-front over-skirt, and walking skirt.

SLEEVELESS JACKET.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, side back, back, and pocket. A pattern of the coat sleeve seen in the illustration is also furnished. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting them together. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulder and under the arms, to take up the darts and cross basque seam, and to place the pockets. The front is neatly fitted by two darts and a cross basque seam on each side. The back is adjusted to the figure by centre and side backs. An extra fullness is cut on at the waist line in each side back seam, and laid in a large box-pleat on the under side. Cut the front with the longest straight edge laid on the edge of the goods. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back for the hem. Cut the back with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the cloth to avoid making a seam. All the other parts are cut lengthwise of the goods. Baste the seams, and try on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. Face the front with the material, and close it the entire length with buttons and button-holes. The neck and armholes are corded with heavy silk. The close-fitting coat sleeve given with this pattern is finished at the wrist with a deep square cuff; three buttons decorate the outer edge. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulder and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 2 yards.
Extra for sleeves, 1¼ yards.

APRON-FRONT OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in three pieces—front gore, side breadth, and back breadth. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting them together. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper. Close the seams according to the notches, gather the top of the back breadths, and sew the skirt to the belt. A wide sash is tacked at the waist line on the right side, and tied in a bow with two long flowing ends. Drape the skirt at the side under the bow. A long sash is pleated at one end and fastened to the front gore on the left side, carried under the skirt, and fastened at the belt, thus forming the drapery for the left side. Allowance for quarter-inch seams is made in this pattern.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 4 yards.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, two side gores, and straight breadth for the back. Cut the front gore and straight breadth with the longest straight edges laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut two pieces each of the pattern given for the side gores. Put the pattern together by the notches, paying no attention to the grain of the paper.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards.

Fig. 2.—WALKING SUIT. This suit is of dark blue silk, with a black cashmere mantilla embroidered with India colors and edged with fringe. The silk skirt has a wide pleated flounce trimmed with velvet ribbon laid in vandykes and clusters of loops. Over-skirt edged with loops and two velvet bands. Pleated linen under-sleeves and fraise. Rabagas bonnet of black China crape, faced with blue faille. Loops and ends of blue ribbon, with a trailing tea-rose vine.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1873.

☞ WITH the next Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be published gratuitously an EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, containing a third installment of LORD LYTTON'S new and fascinating Novel,

"THE PARISIANS,"

commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for March 29. This work is received with extraordinary favor by the reading public, and promises to be one of the most popular of LORD LYTTON'S novels.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the Elegant Sleeveless Jacket Walking Suit, illustrated on the first page of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents. For a Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement in last Bazar.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' and Children's Spring Suits; Confirmation and First Communion Dresses; Mantelets, Dolmans, Fichus, Fichu-Collars; Passementerie Trimmings for Dresses and Wrappings; Lingerie, etc., together with choice literary and pictorial attractions.

APRIL FARE.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

IN the following lists will be found the articles of food that are in season during the month of April. Some of them may not be in the markets before the end of the month, according to the state of the weather, such as Bermuda potatoes, dandelion, dock, rhubarb, radishes, etc. Shad also makes its appearance earlier or later during this month.

FISH.

Cod, conger-eel, frost-fish, haddock, halibut, herring, lamprey, mullet, perch (sea and white), plaice, salmon, shad, trout (brook and sea).

SHELL-FISH.

Clams, mussels, lobsters, oysters, prawns, and crawfish.

MEAT.

Beef, veal, mutton, spring lamb, pork.

POULTRY.

Chickens, capons, ducks, and turkeys.

GAME.

Brant-goose, ducks (red-head, black, and squaw), canvas-back ducks, lap-wing, brown lark, plover, rail, English snipe.

VEGETABLES.

Bermuda potatoes, Bermuda pease, dock, dandelion, cucumbers, parsnips, pepper-grass, red radishes, rhubarb, sprouts, squashes, string-beans, water-cress, wild chiccory, and sorrel.

FRUITS.

Apples, bananas, Brazil-nuts, oranges, pine-apples, and strawberries.

Besides the above articles of food, there are several others that can be found at any season of the year, such as eggs, hominy, oatmeal, rice, starch, macaroni, tapioca, beans, Limas, pease, carrots, and turnips. Also smoked, salt, dry, and pickled fish, corned beef, salt pork, bacon, hams, tongues, sausages, etc.

Soups, during this month, can be made with vermicelli, macaroni, beans, lobsters, rice, sago, semoule, etc.

Such fruits as apples, pears, bananas, nuts, cranberries, and many others, can be had at fruit stores and in the markets at any season of the year.

In blanching the vermicelli to make soup a little salt is necessary, and ten minutes' boiling is enough. The vermicelli is then turned into a colander, and immediately put in cold water and stirred therein for about half a minute, and drained.

Beef broth is then set on the fire, and at the first boil the vermicelli is put in. A few minutes' boiling and the soup is made. There is nothing to add but salt and pepper to suit the taste. This soup is as easily made as it is good.

Other soups are made with macaroni and Italian pastes in the same way. Cheese may be added to a macaroni soup if liked. It is grated, and put in the soup tureen just before turning the soup into it.

A bread soup is made by merely putting in the soup tureen some slices of toasted bread, pouring boiling broth over them, and covering it for two or three minutes. A poached egg for each person may be added.

Pea soup requires a little more care to make. The pease are washed in lukewarm water first, and then set on the fire with a little more cold water than is necessary to cover them. The seasonings are onions, carrots, turnips, and celery, all cut in pieces; also bay leaf, thyme, pepper-corns, and cloves, tied inside of a rag or linen bag made for the purpose. A piece of raw ham is also put in. The whole is then simmered until the pease are thoroughly cooked. The pease, carrots, turnips, onions, and celery are turned into a colander, and are rubbed through by means of a potato masher, a little of the juice being added now and then to help mashing. The other seasonings are thrown away, and the ham is kept for breakfast. Two or three slices of bread are cut in dice, fried in butter, and put in the soup tureen; beef broth is added to the vegetables, one boil is given, they are turned into the tureen, and the soup is made.

Although lobsters can be had at any season of the year, still they are best in the spring and summer months. The heavier a lobster is for its size the better. The best size is from one to five pounds in weight. When larger they are old, and the flesh is apt to be tough and not juicy.

Lobsters are served in several ways, but there is only one way to cook them. To be good, a lobster must be fully alive. If it is not lively, it is sick or nearly dead, and is not fit to be eaten.

Put the lobster in a fish-kettle, with just enough cold water to cover it, and a handful of salt. Have a brisk fire, cover the kettle, and put it over. If the lobster be small, it will take about twenty minutes to cook; if it be three pounds or thereabouts, it will take half an hour. When done, it is broken in two between the body and tail, and both pieces are allowed to drain. There is a dark bluish vein running along the back immediately under the shell that must be removed either before or after it is cooked. By pulling off the middle fin of the fan it may come out, but if it breaks it is removed when the fish is cooked.

When drained, the shell of the tail part is removed by cutting it lengthwise on the back with a sharp-pointed knife. The other half is divided by pulling the part to which the claws are attached one way and the back shell the other way. All the inside is good except the stomach, which is small for the size of the fish, and is found immediately under the head and eyes. The liver, or tom-alley, which turns green in cooking, is as good as the rest, and makes a good sauce for the lobster, mixed with the white or creamy substance found around the shell, the two being again mixed with oil, vinegar, salt, pepper, chopped parsley, and mustard. Lobsters also make an excellent soup, called bisque.

Other fish may be served in the following ways: Cod, boiled, egg or oyster sauce; conger-eel, roasted, ravigote sauce; frost-fish, baked, Robert sauce; haddock, boiled, caper sauce; halibut, boiled, Béchamel sauce; herring, broiled, maître d'hôtel; lamprey, Tartar sauce; mullet, fried, tomato sauce; perch, broiled or boiled, anchovy sauce or in matelote; plaice, boiled, lobster sauce; salmon, boiled, Hollandaise sauce; shad, au gratin; trout, fried or boiled, fines herbes.

There are several other ways to prepare the above fish, of which we shall speak in future. A shad, for instance, may be broiled, baked, sauté, or roasted and served with different sauces.

Game is scarce during spring and summer; still, the lovers of it will find plenty to gratify their taste with such delicate birds as plover, snipe, red-head and black ducks, rails, etc.

Some green vegetables also make their appearance during April, and are heartily welcomed. We have only to follow the dictates of nature by partaking freely of greens in the spring to avoid much indisposition, and even sickness.

No vegetables are more healthy than dandelion, sorrel, rhubarb, and water-cress.

The South sends us strawberries and pine-apples, which are refreshing. Pine-apple fritters are certainly not surpassed by any other in flavor.

Potatoes are getting rather poor at this season of the year, but the Bermudas come to replace them, together with Bermuda pease, Southern cucumbers, string-beans, and tomatoes.

HOW TO BROIL FISH.

In the first place, the fish must be fresh, the fire sharp, and the draught good. When thoroughly cleaned and washed, dry the fish with a towel; rub it inside and outside with a little butter, and salt and pepper it on both sides also. Set on the fire, turn over now and then in order to prevent the charring of any part of the fish. It does not matter how many times it is turned over, provided the fire is sharp enough to broil quickly. As soon as done place the fish on a warm dish, the inside up, spread butter mixed with chopped parsley all over, and sprinkle lemon juice all over also. Serve quickly.

Let our readers bear in mind that vinegar is no substitute for lemon juice in this case.

Many amateur fishermen believe that they can cook fish better than any cook, because they relish it better when on a fishing excursion. They have two advantages over the cook; the first is the freshness of the fish, and the other is a sauce that no cook can make—hunger.

The old saying about cooking fish is, to be good, fish must go from the water to the pan, and from the pan to the mouth.

The American Indians say, As soon as caught, bleed it; as soon as bled, clean it; as soon as cleaned, cook it; as soon as cooked, eat it.

THE PLEASURE OF SICKNESS FOR A SEASON.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

I SUSPECT there is a great deal of dread and sympathy wasted on illness. Health is well enough for the habit of life, but sickness, too, has its sunny side. I am inclined to think it is the friends and attendants of sick people who have the worst of it, and not the sick people themselves. This is certainly the case in some forms of illness. When you are in the depths, you don't know it. When you can not breathe, other people are alarmed, and forecast possibilities; for yourself, you think neither of past nor future, but only of breathing. I have heard of people who in moments of great danger had great thoughts, as if the soul bloomed in the sudden eternal light to wondrous power. I must confess to only the most commonplace experiences. Once I was thrown from a carriage directly under the horse. I heard —I might almost say felt—his fierce pawing close to my head, and all that my stupid soul could say to itself was, "He has not hit me this time, but perhaps he will the next, and it will kill me. Nor this time either." I wonder sometimes if the final transit may not be in itself as commonplace, as little momentous. In spite of all the terrors of the theologies and the mysteries of the metaphysics, death is as natural as birth. Who can tell that we do not pass through the one as through the other, all unaware? Life opens before the little one bright and beautiful, wrapped around with love and tenderness, but whence and how he came he knows as little as the pink-petaled rose-bud opening to the June sun. So may it not be that Death clasps close the parting soul in dreamless natural repose, leaving to the living all the pain, while the dead, forever alive, wakes wonderingly to the glory that shall be?

But if you do not die, why, then comes the weary waiting of convalescence, the impatience to be up and about, the hunger that may not be appeased. Not a bit of it. That is the way people talk, but it is not so. Convalescence is a delightful border-land between death and life, a Beulah in which you love to linger, whose grapes go down sweetly. It is a condition in which a perfect consciousness of existence is combined with an absolute negation of duties. You know that you are a nuisance, a cumberer of the ground,

> "Whom none can love, whom none can thank, > Creation's blot, creation's blank," and you do not care. The furnace fires may go out, the wine-cellar run dry, the tank overflow, the barrel of meal waste, and the cruse of oil fail; but you are certain that your thermometer will be cared for, that your sherry-glass will never be empty, and you lie in a fine though feeble disdain for all these carking cares. People can not find things: let them hunt. The draymen are swearing outside, but it is no business of yours to show them how to get the coal into the cellar. The world is going on, and you have no responsibility whatever about the order of its going. This is the true joy of convalescence. This is the way to make illness a means of grace. If you go caring for other people, you might as well be well. But to lie in tranquil and luxurious inertia, absolutely devoid of energy, without purpose, without conscience, without thought, wholly selfish, and unpricked in your selfishness—it is no mean paradise. Life is so full that it is an exquisite satisfaction for once, and for a time, to find it empty. The hours and the days lapse languidly, and you have had a fortnight of bliss in the process and blank in the memory, and by that time, ten to one, your soul is astir again—but the pause was delicious.

Hungry, did you say? There are terrible traditions of fever-parched lips which ignorance forbade to moisten, and fever-wasted frames which food might not upbuild. Who has not his story to tell of some convalescent ancestor who escaped his keeper and devoured clandestinely, but with impunity, a whole mince-pie before he was discovered by horror-smitten friends? But we have changed all that. The doctors nowadays are a friendly folk, and prophesy smooth things. Water? Yes, indeed, as much as you like. Milk? The more the better. Eat whatever you wish, and whenever you choose, and as long as you can. The Old School Presbytery stand around astonished; but, strong in the law, you eat steadfastly on with mild convalescent defiance, and climb steadily back to strength. Against such proof there is no law. And the neighbors send in their best canned strawberries and apple jellies and currant wine, and you swallow them all with only moderate gratitude, not to say placid indifference. So far from being in a hurry to go back into the world again, you want nothing but to be let alone. The turmoil, the eagerness, the busy-ness seem to you so aimless. A and B and C go by every day regularly to meet the morning trains. What folly! as if it made any difference whether they met the train or not. But your exclamation-point is a very small one. You are not to be disturbed by deep emotions of any sort. The din of the outside world comes softly to your ears. Since the din is not unmusical, very well; but the world might as wisely be silent. Why should you get up? It is easier to stay in bed. But who wants to be strong? It is just as comfortable to be weak.

Hosted by Google

"Far or forgot to me is near;
Shadow and sunlight are the same;
The vanished gods to me appear;
And one to me are shame and fame."

Ah! Providence has wisely ordered it. Sickness is too luxurious a thing to last. Canned strawberries forever would eat the life out of immortality itself. Peace and tranquillity and unruffled seas are not of this world. For this world, whatever come hereafter, activity and endeavor, research and doubt, and balancing and adjusting, house-guiding and money-earning, social service, dress-coats, and a thousand narrow ruffles to be lined and bound with the same in a different shade. Why, here you are, clean out of dry-dock, under full head of steam, plowing mid-ocean through the surf and spray of sundered metaphors as aforetime, and all that past of silence and serenity, and grass-grown streets and mossy walls, is already as a dream when one awaketh.

Mr. Bachelor—the Chevalier Bayard of our age, as one foolishly and fondly saith; but that I must disallow: I have a private Bayard or two of my own who must not be discrowned. All the honors of the indefinite article I freely grant, nay, gladly pay you. In a republic of Bayards you shall hold high place, or, if a kingdom there must be, you shall salute with royal grace messieurs mes frères!

Chevalier Bayard, you have been ill, say the newspapers in curt itemic phrase. A brother in unity reaches forth to you the right hand of fellowship in that goodly and gracious experience. You are just beginning to sit up, they report, and mean thereby only a symptom. But I know how the foundations of the world drop away beneath your feet under that first feeble rising. Courage, my brother, I do not say. I rather counsel cowardice! Be weak, if you would quit yourself like a man! Your great prototype, no doubt, in typhoid fever called for drink like a sick girl. Do not control yourself. Let the well people do that. Be petulant, be querulous, be imperious and exacting. It is a sign that you will recover. And above all things, do not hurry matters. You may never be ill again as long as you live. It is your one chance for leisure and luxury and absolute despotism. Be wise to-day, 'tis madness to defer. If they force you from the friendly couch, cling to the almost as friendly lounge. Battle then for the reclining-chair. Make a stand on dressing-gown and slippers. Go not out-doors till the last gun is fired. Who breathes the outside air is lost to all the privileges and immunities of illness. Onewhohasbeenthereatura te salutat!

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SLEEVELESS JACKET SUIT.

THE Sleeveless Jacket Suit illustrated on our first page, and of which a cut paper pattern will be furnished, is an excellent model for making dresses of two shades, and for modernizing partly worn dresses. Its attractive feature, the sleeveless jacket, is a plain trimly shaped basque, made of the darkest shade in the suit; it may be worn over a light waist, with light coat sleeves and dark cuff, or else will itself form the waist of the dress, and the sleeves may be sewed to it permanently; the latter plan is preferred for summer suits. Two thick cords covered with silk or the dress material finish the edge more stylishly than any elaborate trimming; tiny square pockets are in the front, and it is buttoned up closely. The skirts are of simple shape, made of the lighter shade, trimmed with a bias border of the darker stuff. If preferred, the upper skirt may be dark, like the jacket, or else the lower skirt, so apt to be soiled by contact with the ground, may be dark and the upper skirt light; indeed, the arrangement may be varied according to the material and the taste of the wearer. The sash on the left side is of the darkest shade of the material, made double, pressed flat, and is arranged in long uneven loops, with two standing ends. For spring dresses of tamise cloth, poplin, and the single-width cashmeres this design is very popular; handsome foulards and failles are made in the same way, but have more elaborate trimming on the lower skirt. Correspondents who ask for hints about simple linen suits that can be easily laundried are advised to use this model. Furnishing houses supply linen suits of two shades of gray or brown made by this design for $20. French suits of gray linen have sleeveless jackets of the new dark blue linen.

SPRING FABRICS.

Quaintly hued soft woolen stuffs for spring costumes make an attractive display at the retail stores. The materials prescribed for the soft draperies of over dresses are loosely woven rough-surfaced woolens, utterly limp and lustreless; hence smooth, finely twilled French cashmere is gradually giving place to fleecy India camel's-hair and vigogne. Summer camel's-hair of light quality, fifty inches wide, costs $4 or $5 a yard; from three and a half to four yards are required for a polonaise. Natural brown and gray shades are the refined choice, to be worn over black velvet or silk skirts; réséda and peacock hues have a dyed, tawdry look. The most stylish camel's-hair polonaises have a velvet sash, cuffs, and large buttons, without other trimming, and cost, ready-made, at the furnishing stores, $60; with yak lace they are $80, and less handsome; and clumsy wool embroidery, making them very heavy, and destroying their characteristic plain richness, and the price is $125. A novelty this season is honeycomb camel's-hair, a soft, dull, light fabric, having honey-comb stripes woven on the plain camel's-hair surface. Fifty inches wide, it is worth $3 50 a yard. Vigogne is cashmere twilled on both sides, and differs from merino in having long twills like serge; it is supple and light enough for spring and summer suits, is in clear steel gray and brown shades, comes in double fold, cashmere width, and costs $2 a yard. This goods, and the striped de baize that are found only in the natural colors of the fleece, are chosen for traveling and sea-side suits. A vigogne polonaise with black silk sash and silvered buttons costs from $35 to $45.

For inexpensive suits there is nothing preferable to tamise cloth, which is merely fine, firm, closely woven delaine like that of years ago. It is in all the tinted gray, olive, and peacock shades, is three-fourths wide, and costs from 55 cents to 75 cents. Twenty yards are sold for a suit; the trimming is folds and flounces of the material piped and faced with silk of the same shade.

The newest fabric for polonaises is raw silk with raised rough surface like Turkish toweling. It comes in dark shades for street suits, but is more distinguished-looking on pure white for the summer polonaises of watering-place toilettes; it has also écru and batiste stripes alternating with white, and Algerian stripes of color with threads of tinsel. A yard and a half wide, it costs from $3 50 to $5 a yard.

The open-worked lace stripes that render woolen goods less weighty were noted early in the season. They are finding favor for over dresses with lovers of variety; but, after all has been said, plain goods are more stylish than stripes or figures, and are the safest purchase for ladies who do not get new garments every season. The lace stripe is prettily introduced in soft repped Sicilienne that is sold for $2 50 a yard in single width, and in a lower quality for $1 50; crape cloth with lace stripes is a fine light fabric in stylish tints, worth $1 25 in three-quarter width. Cheaper lace-striped goods of mixed wool and linen or cotton in excellent shades are shown for 60 cents a yard.

Thin, light serges of prime quality and delicate colors, with shaded satin stripes, are $1 10 a yard, and twenty-seven inches in width. English twill is the name given the best-appearing mixture of cotton and wool, so closely twilled that it will not fray, and as flexible as cashmere: price 60 to 75 cents. A suit ready-made, with basque and over-skirt, is $35. English armure, a similar mixture without twills, is cooler than all-wool goods, costs but 50 cents a yard, and with care will wear well. The most desirable cheap goods, the best for service, and neat-looking whether in fashion or out, are English glacé mohairs that do not shrink or show soil, come in lustrous browns and gray, and cost from 50 to 80 cents a yard. French cashmeres of the old shades, and in narrow three-quarter widths, are 90 cents a yard; in new, quaint tints, $1 25 is the price.

For those serviceable black suits that most ladies purchase in the spring, wear upon occasions all the year long, and, despite newer fabrics, replace by a similar dress, dainty and fresh, the long-tried materials are jet black alpacas of the buffalo and otter brands, worth from 75 cents to $1 25 for choice qualities. If a more lustrous goods is preferred, the silk-finished beaver mohair is used, and is lighter for summer wear. This is a light and glossy fabric, and makes one of the prettiest and most serviceable suits that can be worn in the warm season by the many who prefer black to any other color, and wish something less expensive than silk. The Turkish brilliantine is also a very beautiful stuff, rather heavier than the beaver mohair, but equally lustrous in finish. The so-called national machine-made trimmings of these different fabrics, more or less elaborately puffed and fluted, trim them handsomely, and greatly lessen the dress-maker's bill.

UMBRELLAS.

Twilled silk umbrellas, with thick, short "club" sticks of light Malacca or bamboo, mounted with knobs and crosses of ivory, oxidized silver, gilt, or shell, and furnished with a chain to attach them to the chatelaine, will be carried both as sun umbrellas and as protection from April showers. En tout cas is the French phrase for these. The walking-stick umbrellas, so useful and convenient, will probably be superseded by this clumsy novelty. Blue and plum will be the stylish colors. The size is eighteen inches down the gore, and the price from $6 50 to $9. Changeable Venetian silk, a softly twilled serge, showing two shades, black and blue, green and black, or purple and black, are extremely popular, and are very tastefully mounted. If this changeable silk is once thoroughly wetted it will not be injured, but if merely sprinkled, the spots will show. Price from $7 50 to $18. Dressy large black parasols lined with a color, or else a color with white lining, are in deep canopy shape, and bordered by a double fringe showing the two colors: price $10. The choice for fastidious tastes is a large English umbrella, twenty-two inches down the gore, with canopy of dark thick silk, and slender stick mounted with shell or ivory, and provided with chatelaine ring and silver shield for monogram: price $15 to $18. Small silk umbrellas with cross handles of imitation ivory are $5. Carriage parasols for visiting and driving in open landaus have small canopies of white or light silk covered with lace and mounted on yellow ivory sticks. The sticks alone, when artistically carved, are $20; plain massive sticks cost from $6 to $10.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & Co.

PERSONAL.

GENERAL MYER, Chief of the Signal Service Department, has secured the services of Professor TYNDALL to superintend the device and construction of the electrical instruments to be used at the signal stations of the army for making regular simultaneous observations of the electrical conditions of the atmosphere. It is hoped and believed that the experiments will prove of the highest practical value.

—A white marble statue of Queen VICTORIA, weighing seven tons, has arrived at Windsor Castle. The Queen is represented sitting on a chair, with a dog lying by her side. The statue is to be placed in the vestibule of the state apartments.

—At a recent visit of Kaiser WILLIAM to a needle factory a workman, whose duty it was to bore out the eyes of needles, asked for a hair from the monarch's head. It was given, and placed at once under the boring machine, a hole turned in it with the greatest care, a thread inserted, and then the hairy needle handed back to royalty.

—The oldest man now known to be living in the world is JOSEPH MARTINI COUTHINO, a resident of Cape Frios, in the province of Rio Janeiro, Brazil. He was born May 20, 1694, and is therefore nearly one hundred and seventy-nine years old.

—Ex-King AMADEUS has resumed his Italian citizenship, and the King has appointed him a lieutenant-general in the Italian army.

—Visitors to the State Library at Richmond, Virginia, may often see there a white-haired gentleman, apparently sixty-five or seventy years old, quietly reading a book or paper. It is Mr. CHARLES TAPPAN, of Boston, brother of ARTHUR TAPPAN, the famous abolitionist. The old gentleman, now in his ninetieth year, spends his winters in Richmond. Last year his carriage was as firm and erect as a young man's.

—The ladies should take heart. In a recent examination for promotions in the Internal Revenue Department, under the civil service rules, one lady secured a fourth-class clerkship ($1800), another a third-class ($1600), while of ten other persons appointed to second-class clerkships ($1400), six are women. Miss SEAVEY, who secured the fourth-class clerkship, has been employed in the office for over ten years, and for several years has had exclusive charge and direction of the copying division.

—After all, it pays to be an artist like MEISSONNIER, who recently completed a picture for the Vienna Exhibition, but sold it as soon as finished to a London dealer, who instantly sold it to a "swell" member of Parliament at a considerable advance. It is one of his largest works, being twenty by twenty-four inches (which gave him about $1000 an inch), and represents a village sign-painter, who has just given the finishing touches to an ale-house Bacchus, showing his handiwork to mine host.

—The daughters of the late GEORGE CATLIN offer to the United States government, for $65,000, seven hundred and fifty pictures of Indian subjects painted by him. Most Indians are unclean and disagreeable Indians, and lead one to conclude, with General PHIL SHERIDAN, that "the only good Indian is a dead Indian."

—They endeavored to prevent the marriage of the Duchess de Persigny to M. LEMOYNE. The family of the duchess was so violently opposed to it as to induce them to apply for a legal order to confine her in a maison de santé. The court rejected the application, and, armed with the judicial decision, the duchess and M. LEMOYNE presented themselves to a civil officer, who straightway married them. Three days afterward the religious marriage was celebrated.

—FROUDE, MAX MÜLLER, and CHARLES KINGSLEY are brothers-in-law, having married the three daughters of a wealthy London merchant.

—The late N. P. WILLIS called the late Bishop M'ILVAINE the handsomest man in the world. He was rather above the medium size of man, erect and firm, even at seventy-four years, and with a face upon which education, thought, and all the refinements and most desirable associations of a long life of purity and usefulness had stamped an expression that challenged the attention and admiration of even the most superficial observer. His high position in this country was recognized by all; and in England, which country he frequently visited, he was always shown the greatest attention by the highest people of the land, both of the clergy and the laity. He never asked an audience of the Queen in vain, even when other foreigners were denied, for her Majesty never forgot that he had always had a warm friend in her mother, the Duchess of Kent, even when she (the Queen) was but a child. It was regarded as one of Mr. SEWARD'S cleverest bits of diplomacy in sending Bishop M'ILVAINE to England in the darkest days of 1862-63 on a special mission; and the influence he exerted with the bishops, clergy, and nobility is known to have been productive of auspicious results.

—Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER had another pleasant gathering in his church a few evenings since. All hands came to listen to an "old folks'" concert, prepared under his auspices, the receipts being for the benefit of the Brooklyn Orphan Asylum. "Ye concert consisted of a number of sacred hymns and likewise worldly songs, certain of which were sung in ye year of our Lord 1773, all ye characters being dressed to represent ye most Puritan of all Puritan ladyes and elders."

—The venerable Dr. TODD, of Pittsfield, Massachusetts, in speaking of the Rev. MOSES STUART, says: "Professor STUART was a decided dyspeptic, and I now can see that he was injudicious as to the amount and the violence of his exercise, and also in the time of day when he took it. I have no doubt that he and the good Dr. PAYSON often mistook the miseries of a weak digestion for the hiding of God's face, and that they uttered many groans of agony over their sins, which groans were really the results of a morbid state of the stomach."

—A new and wonderful beauty has dawned upon Rome—an Austrian Princess FURSTEMBURG, a large, dark woman, with man-like hair, huge coiffure, great black eyes, rich skin, heroic features, and a Venus of Milo form. Her laugh and words can be heard three houses distant.

—It seems to be the general belief that a marriage will soon be announced to take place between the Duke of Edinburgh and the daughter of the Emperor of Russia. At all events, in the London clubs, and in the lobbies of the Houses of Parliament, it is the topic of common conversation.

—A Washington correspondent of the Evening Post thinks it belongs to the "truth of history" to acknowledge that the Senate of the United States is not as a body composed of great orators and great statesmen, or even of men of rare culture. As a mere scholar, Mr. SUMNER stands at the head. As a mere writer of speeches, without profound thought, or solidity of judgment, or comprehensive knowledge, Mr. SCHURZ ranks among the first. As a vigorous thinker, and the best party leader, Mr. MORTON has no equal. But as a general debater, as an elegant scholar, as a graceful rhetorician, as a statesman of large and comprehensive views, who adds to the dignity of the Senator the graceful courtesy of the accomplished gentleman, Mr. ROSCOE CONKLING stands at the head. As a man of common-sense, always trustworthy and upright, Senator BUCKINGHAM stands very high; educated in the school of practical wisdom, he is one of the most valuable of all our public men. Mr. SHERMAN is another hard-working, useful man, who shapes and fashions legislation. As a lawyer, the colleague of Mr. SHERMAN, Senator THURMAN, is perhaps the first in the Chamber. He is thoroughly trained, and his opinions carry great influence. His strong party prejudices, however, sometimes give color even to his legal opinions. He is the strong man on his side of the Senate.

—The youngest of the ex-Lord Chancellors of England is Lord CAIRNS. Four years ago, when he reached the woolsack, he was forty-nine years of age. He is likely again to occupy that position.

—Mr. TOM TAYLOR, author of many of the best acting plays of the time, has resigned his position as secretary of the Public Health Board of London, to which he was appointed in 1854, at a salary of $5000 a year, having for four years previously been assistant secretary. He now retires, at the age of fifty-five, with a pension of $3250 a year. TOM TAYLOR is the author of nearly one hundred plays, ten only of which are adaptations from the French. He took first classical honors at Cambridge, and was elected a fellow of Trinity. Afterward he was for two years Professor of English Literature at University College, London. His most successful plays are, Still Waters Run Deep, An Unequal Match, the Overland Route, and the Ticket-of-leave Man, the latter having become a specialty with Mr. WILLIAM J. FLORENCE.

—HANDEL is to be strangely but beautifully remembered at Constantinople. The success of the British Choral Union has stimulated the Armenians. The young ladies of the Agabian School are about to give a public performance of the Messiah, assisted by some gentlemen from the Choral Union.

—A literary curiosity, The Poems of Mary Queen of Scots, is in preparation. The verses of this queen, collected from original and obscure sources, will be prefaced with an introduction by Mr. JULIAN SHARMAN.

—Mrs. COBDEN is about to contribute to the biography of the time a work that can not fail to have great interest—the letters of her late husband. Of the self-made men of modern England, Mr. COBDEN was the one who impressed himself most upon her history.

—It conduced to the longevity of Mistress M'GRATH to emigrate from Ireland thirty-three years ago, and come to this good city of New York, where it has since been her happiness to reside, and where, on the 14th of March, she died at the age of one hundred years.

—WILLIAM SHAKSPEARE again steps forth, and attracts the attention of musical circles in London. The young gentleman is described as having already won high honors at the Royal Academy, and at a late Crystal Palace concert produced an overture in two movements, which commands the favorable comments of the critics.

—Colonel FORNEY, of the Philadelphia Press, in speaking of his energetic and great-hearted contemporary, GEORGE W. CHILDS, says:

"When I carried letters from him to Europe in 1867 his name was a talisman, and it was pleasant to see how noblemen like the Duke of Buckingham honored the indorsement of an American who, thirty years ago, walked the streets of Philadelphia without a friend or a dollar. He coins fortune like a magician, and spends it like a man of heart. He likes society, and lives like a gentleman. He is as temperate as ever HORACE GREELEY was, and yet he never denies his friends a generous glass of wine. His habits are as simple as ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S, and yet his residence is a gem bright with exquisite decoration and rich in every variety of art."

—Speaking of prelates and high sacerdotal effects, a New York correspondent of a Boston paper says that the most popular preachers of this city, except a few sensation men, can not entice their people to hear a second sermon. On Murray Hill there stands a very fashionable church. It has a chime of bells, boys' choir, with full choral service, and a bishop for a rector. The morning congregation is large. One Sunday afternoon the bishop was present in full canonicals; so were the choir, all surpliced. The service was carried through entire, chants, choral singing, sermon, and all. The chancel end was very much the heaviest. The entire congregation consisted of two persons.

Hosted by Google

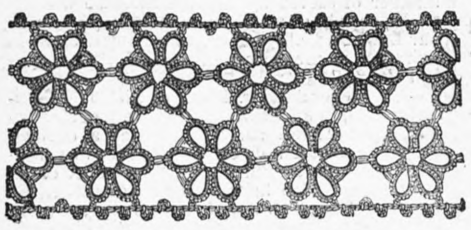

Fig. 1.—TATTED INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Tatted Insertions, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE insertions are suitable for trimming lingerie, linen, etc., and are worked with tatting cotton, No. 100.

For the insertion Fig. 1 work, first, two rows of tatted figures, each of which consists of six leaflets or rings, and is worked separately, as follows: Work with one thread one ring of 6 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., 1 p., 6 ds.; close to this work five similar rings, which are fastened together, however, by means of the first and last p.; tie the ends of the working thread together and fasten them. The following figures, worked in a similar manner, are fastened together as shown by the illustration. For the outer edge of the insertion work on both sides of the figures, observing the illustration, one round each of single crochet, chain stitches, and picots. For the p. turned upward always work 5 ch. (chain stitch) and 1 sc. (single crochet) on the first of these, and for the p. turned downward crochet 5 ch., drop the last st. (stitch) from the needle, insert the needle in the first of the 5 ch., and draw through the dropped st.

The insertion Fig. 2 consists of 4 rounds; it is worked from the middle alternately with two threads and with one thread—the scallops always with two, and the rings always with one thread. 1st round.—* One ring of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., t. (turn the work), one scallop of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., t., one ring like the preceding, but instead of forming the middle p., fasten to the p. of the preceding ring, and repeat from *. 2d round.—One ring of 4 ds., fasten to the joining p. of two rings in the preceding round, 4 ds., * t., one scallop of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., t., one ring of 4 ds., fasten to the joining p. of the next two rings, 4 ds., and repeat from *. This completes one-half of the insertion. Work the other half in exactly the same manner, observing the illustration. Of course this insertion may be worked wider by repeating the two rounds just described, and may be edged on both sides with a crocheted round in the manner shown by the illustration.

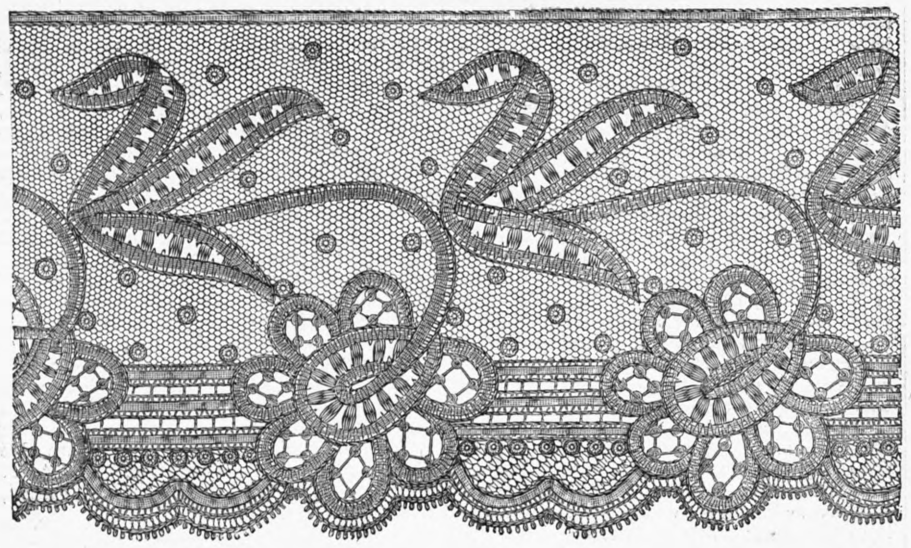

Fig. 1.—EDGING IN POINT LACE EMBROIDERY ON TULLE.—IMITATION OF REAL POINT LACE.—[See Fig. 2.]

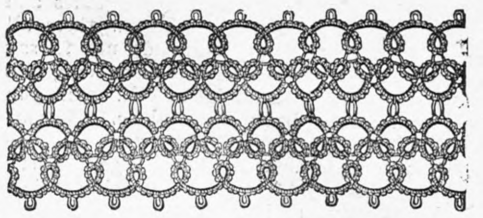

Fig. 2.—TATTED INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

at the points and the curves. The intersecting and joining points of the braid are sewed together, letting the stitches show as little as possible, and without passing the needle through the foundation. Button-hole stitch the small eyelet-holes of the foundation, observing the illustration. Work the wheels and lace stitches, and border the lace shown by Fig. 1 on the upper edge with narrow braid, and on the under edge with woven picots.

Slipper for Bridal Toilette, Figs. 1–3.

THIS slipper is made of white gros grain. The upper edge is trimmed with white lace. On the front is a bow of lace and white gros grain.

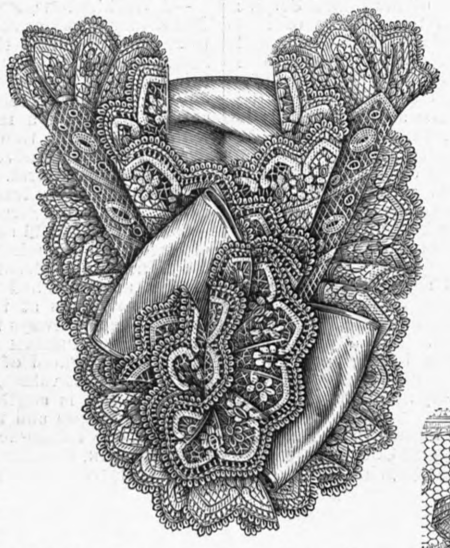

Fig. 2.—LACE AND GROS GRAIN BOW FOR SLIPPER.

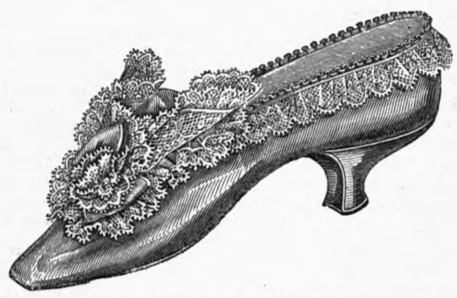

Fig. 1.—WHITE SLIPPER FOR BRIDAL TOILETTE.

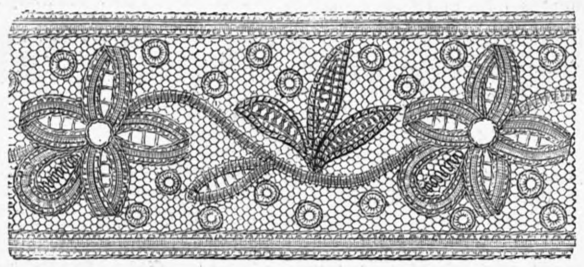

Fig. 2.—INSERTION IN POINT LACE EMBROIDERY ON TULLE.—IMITATION OF REAL POINT LACE.—[See Fig. 1.]

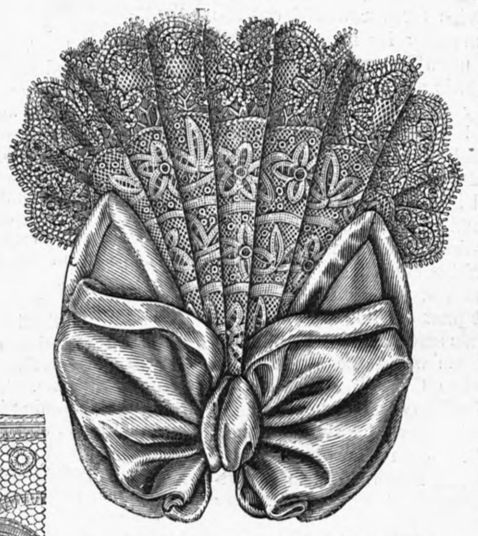

Fig. 3.—LACE AND SATIN BOW FOR SLIPPER.

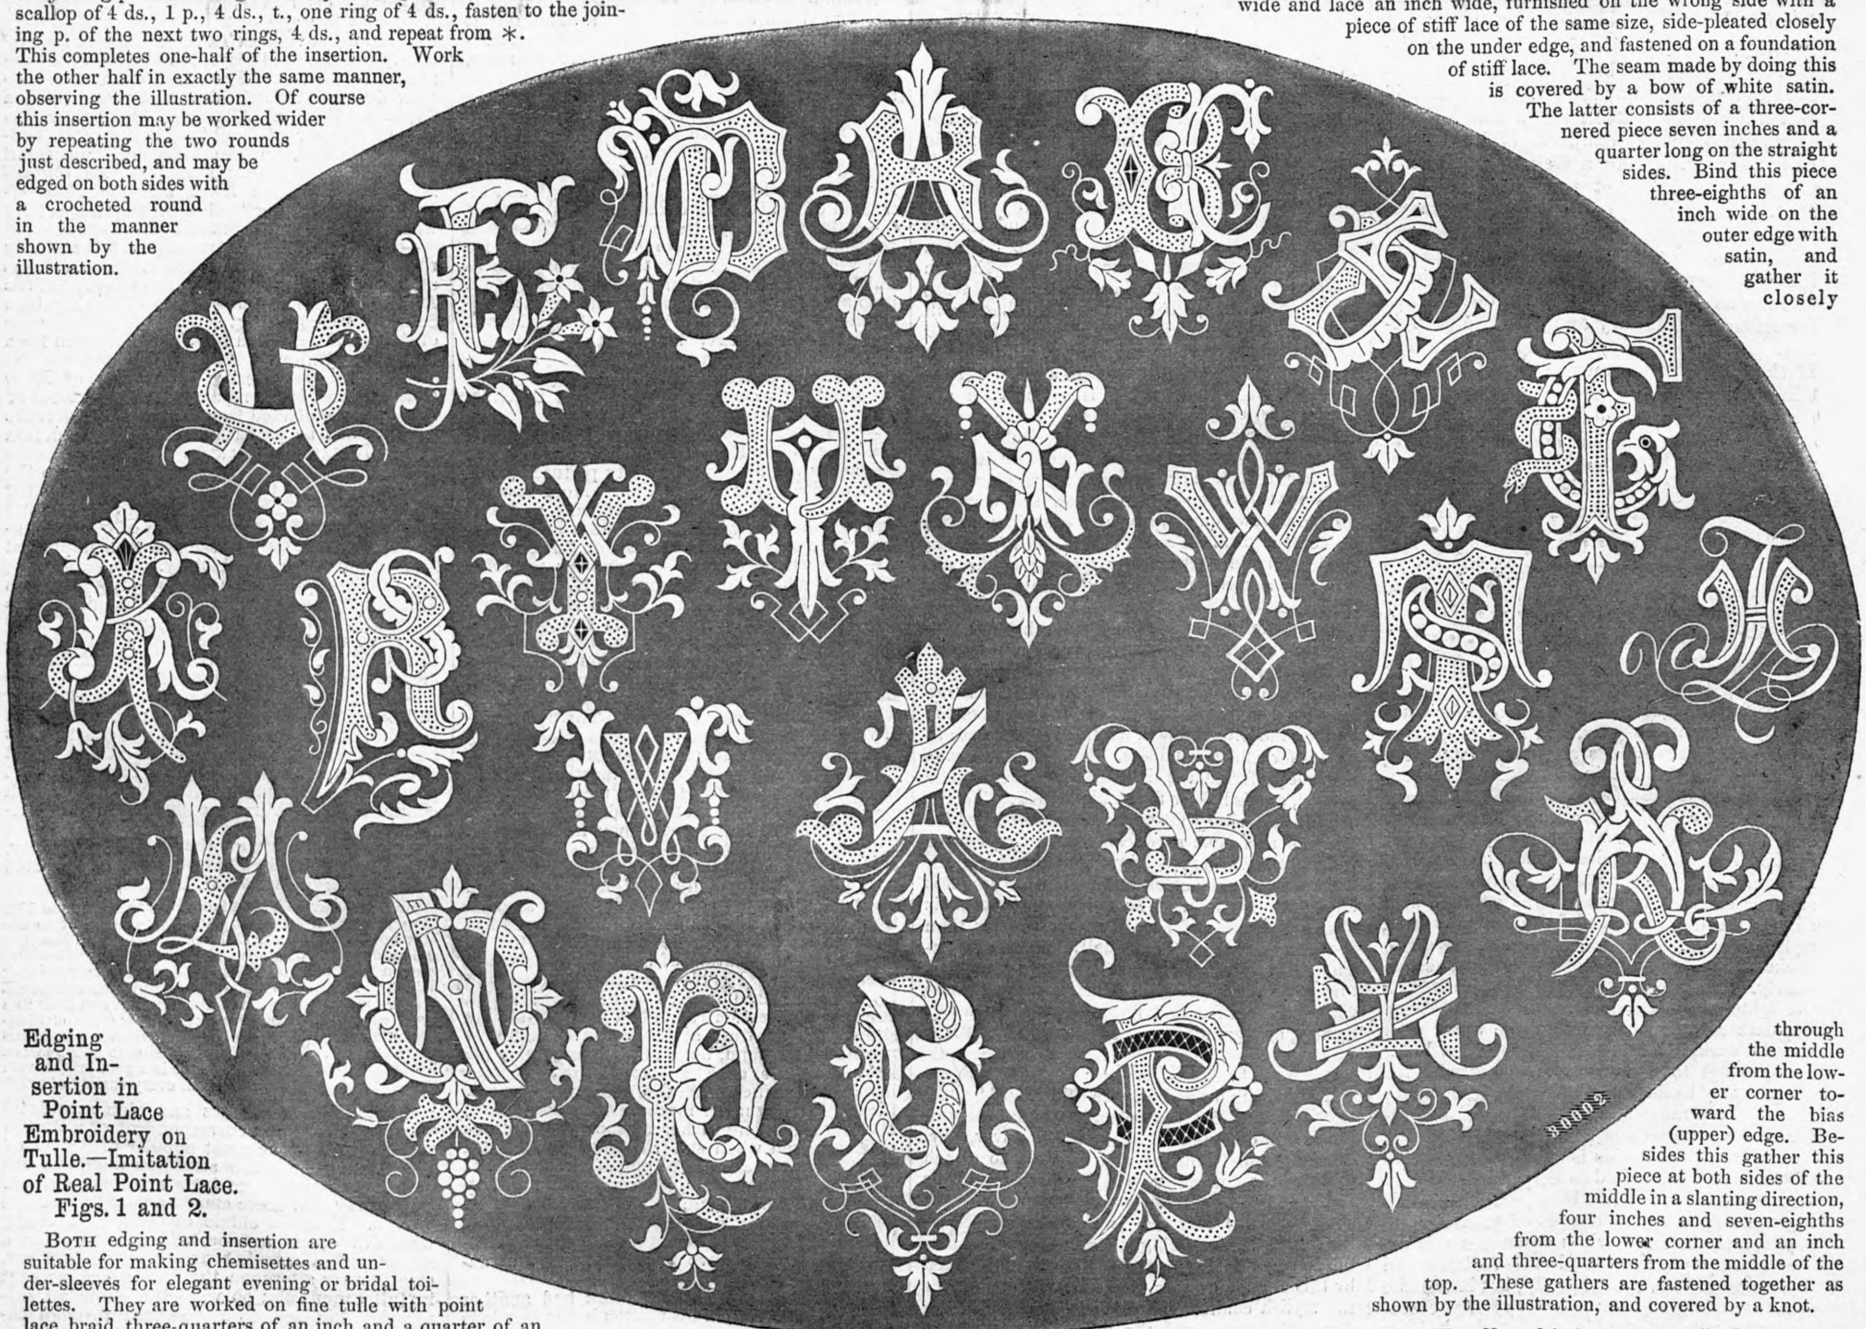
Figs. 2 and 3 show different styles of bows for bridal or ball slippers. They are made of silk, gros grain, or satin, in the color of the slipper, and of lace. The bow Fig. 2 is made of lace insertion seven-eighths of an inch wide, lace an inch wide, and loops of white gros grain an inch and seven-eighths wide. The loops are bound a quarter of an inch wide on the sides. To make the bow cut of insertion two straight pieces each two inches and a half wide and four inches and a half long, which are sloped off on one end so that they are only two inches and a half long on one side. Trim these pieces on the outer edge, excepting the sloped end, with gathered lace, pleat the sloped end, and fasten it on a stiff lace foundation. Set on the gros grain loops and remainder of the lace as shown by the illustration.

The fan-shaped part of the bow Fig. 3, which is four inches and a quarter long, is made of lace insertion seven-eighths of an inch wide and lace an inch wide, furnished on the wrong side with a piece of stiff lace of the same size, side-pleated closely on the under edge, and fastened on a foundation of stiff lace. The seam made by doing this is covered by a bow of white satin. The latter consists of a three-cornered piece seven inches and a quarter long on the straight sides. Bind this piece three-eighths of an inch wide on the outer edge with satin, and gather it closely through the middle from the lower corner toward the bias (upper) edge. Besides this gather this piece at both sides of the middle in a slanting direction, four inches and seven-eighths from the lower corner and an inch and three-quarters from the middle of the top. These gathers are fastened together as shown by the illustration, and covered by a knot.



MONOGRAMS FOR HANDKERCHIEFS, TOILETTE CUSHIONS, ETC.—WHITE EMBROIDERY.

Edging and Insertion in Point Lace Embroidery on Tulle.—Imitation of Real Point Lace. Figs. 1 and 2.

BOTH edging and insertion are suitable for making chemisettes and under-sleeves for elegant evening or bridal toilettes. They are worked on fine tulle with point lace braid three-quarters of an inch and a quarter of an inch wide, and with lace stitches of fine thread. Having drawn the outlines of the design figures on linen, run on the point lace braid as shown by the illustration, in doing which pleat or gather the braid

Monograms for Handkerchiefs, Toilette Cushions, etc.

THE illustration shows a variety of monograms in different styles. They are worked with fine embroidery cotton or else with colored silk. One of the two letters is worked raised in divided satin stitch, or else overcast all around and ornamented in lace stitch, as in the monogram O P; the other letter is overcast, and filled with small back stitches, or else small dots may be worked in satin stitch. The arabesques and leaves of the monograms are worked in straight satin and half-polka stitch and in back stitch.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—VELVET JACKET.—FRONT.

Fig. 2.—VELVET JACKET.—BACK.

Black Velvet Jacket, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS black velvet jacket is lined with lustring, and scalloped on the under edge. The trimming consists of scalloped bias strips of the material, which are bound with black gros grain, and of lace, the seam of which is covered with narrow gros grain rolls.

Design for Netted Guipure Cover.

THIS very pretty design is intended for darning a netted foundation. If worked on coarse netting with large holes, it is suitable for a table-cloth. When worked on finer netting, it is used for coverings of cushions, etc. The parts of the design which are all white in the illustration are darned closely with coarse loose cotton called twist, and the dotted parts are worked with thread in point de toile.

DESIGN FOR NETTED GUIPURE COVER.

SERPENT-WORSHIP.

SERPENTS in all ages have been the objects of the peculiar hatred and disgust of mankind. Among many nations they have been the symbol of the evil principle; and when their abject fears have led men to worship what they dreaded, serpents have been adored as deities. In Hindostan, where nearly fifty species of these abhorred reptiles lie in wait for the destruction of man, a coiled serpent forms the couch of the god Vishnu, and is the frequent attendant on others of their deities. But the boa, which sometimes reaches the length of thirty feet and upward, is dignified with divine attributes, consulted as an oracle, and worshiped as a god. An English gentleman, while traveling in Ladak, came to a spot sacred to all the gods in the Hindoo calendar. After a good deal of prostration, praying, and offering up of handfuls of flour, lumps of sugar, and ghee, by his servants, the divinity at last vouchsafed to make his appearance "in the shape of a little serpent, about two and a half feet long, who wriggled about playfully in the sunshine, which had probably more to do with his leaving his snug hole in the rock than the genuflexions of our followers. Their delight, not unmixed with awe, at the reptile's appearance was unmistakably genuine; their credulity was no feigned feeling." The native servants told him that sometimes as many as twenty or thirty of these snakes appear in this spot to the faithful. The legend runs that when the gods fled before the might of the Rakis (the Titans of Hindoo mythology) they took refuge for a time in the snows of the Himalayas, and the serpents were placed to guard all the roads to their abode. This was one of the principal outposts of the serpent army, and probably from mere force of habit their descendants continue to keep up the routine of guard-mounting, etc. The legend goes on to say that the gods, invigorated by the bracing alpine air, again took the field, utterly routed the Rakis, and slew them all. The fossils so plentifully strewed over the Sewalik, or lowest ranges of the Himalayas, are the bones of the slain Titans.

The worship of the serpent was one of the principles of primitive Druidism. Pliny has given us a curious account of the anguinum, or serpent's egg, which was worn as their distinguishing badge by the Druids. Marvels of all kinds were told of this article. It was said to be formed at first by a great number of serpents twined together, whose hissing at last raised it into the air, when it was to be caught, ere it fell to the ground, in a clean white cloth, by a person mounted on a swift horse, who had immediately to ride off at full speed, the enraged serpents pursuing him until they were stopped by a running stream. It has been conjectured that the great druidical temples of Avebury, Stonehenge, Carnac in Brittany, and most of the others which remain both in Britain and Gaul, were dedicated to the united worship of the sun and the serpent.

One of the early races which inhabited Ceylon, the Nagas, worshiped the cobra as an emblem of the destroying power. So numerous were the followers of this gloomy idolatry at that time that they gave the name of Nagadipo, the Island of Serpents, to the portion of the country which they held, in the same manner that Rhodes and Cyprus severally acquired the ancient designation of Ophiusa, from the fact of their being the residence of the Ophites, who introduced serpent-worship into Greece. In Ceylon traces of this kind of worship are to the present time perceptible among the inhabitants, who, rather than put a cobra to death, inclose the reptile in a wicker cage, and set it adrift on the nearest stream. In the island of Nainativoe, to the southwest of Jaffa, there was till recently a little temple, dedicated to the goddess Naya Tambiran, in which consecrated serpents were tenderly reared, and daily fed at the expense of the worshipers.

Hosted by Google

Serpent-worship is one of the oldest forms of idolatry, if not the oldest. It preceded Buddhism in India, and we have seen that it is still a reality in some parts of the world. If we desire to see it in all its hideous savagery, we shall discover it in Dahomey.

LADY LUNE.

THE golden day was over—
A glorious day in June—
And up from the shimmering ocean
Slow rose the lady moon.

And the wavelets on the shingle
Rippled a slumbrous tune,
Whilst an angel's voice was singing
A lay to "la belle lune!"

An angel, yes, though earth-born.
The sheen of those violet eyes
I knew were but reflections
Of hues from Paradise.

Those tresses bathed in moonlight,
That vestment's classic fold,
Seemed an angel's snowy mantle
And radiant crown of gold.

And I almost feared to see her
Join "sister spirits" fair,
And ascend to the asphodel meadows
Up yonder silver stair.

So I drew her closer to me,
And her hand more tightly pressed;
And lovingly her beauteous head
She pillowed on my breast.

She was mine, she vowed, mine only,
While moons should wax or wane:
She longed to give her virgin troth
To me in holy fane.

She sought not rank or honors;
She spurned the thought of gold;
The love I proffered to her
Was more than wealth untold.

She would share my name and fortunes,
It could not be too soon:
She invoked, to witness that maiden vow,
The changeable lady moon.

And I kissed, and rebaptized her,
To those wavelets' slumbrous tune,
By, alas! the ominous title
Of beautiful Lady Lune.

* * * * * *

She deserved it. Next November
She married a big dragoon;
She shares his wealth. She owns his name.
She is now his Lady—Loon!

(Continued from No. 13, page 203.)

LONDON'S HEART.

BY B. L. FARJEON,

AUTHOR OF "BLADE-O'-GRASS," "GRIF," AND "JOSHUA MARVEL."

CHAPTER XLIII.

MR. SHELDRAKE MAKES A BOLD MOVE.

TEA was over, and Lily and her grandfather were sitting by the fire. The night without was chilly, although it was now the middle of spring, and a raw, cold wind was blowing. But the room was warm and cozy, and the occupants were thoroughly happy. Lizzie and Martha Day had been to see them in the afternoon, and had spent an hour or two with them. When Lizzie came in she said, simply, "Lily, this is my mother;" and both received a warm welcome from old Wheels and his darling child. Martha's pale face had a flush of happiness in it, and the sombre effect of her black dress had been lightened by Lizzie, who had insisted on her mother's wearing one or two pieces of bright ribbon. Yet notwithstanding the joy which the disclosure of their nearer and dearer relationship must have brought to both Lizzie and Martha Day, uneasy shades of expression rested occasionally on their features. The cause of this uneasiness in Lizzie seemed to be entirely within herself, and to be in no way connected with any person present in the room; but with Martha it was different. It was evident that her uneasiness was caused in a direct way by something that she saw in her daughter; and every now and then her eyes would rest on Lizzie's face with a look of wistful pain. They were not long in the society of their friends before the news of the engagement between Felix and Lily was told them; and Lizzie, forgetting for a few moments the great anxiety which pressed upon her, danced about the room in delight.

"Next to Alfred," she said, "I love Felix. There is only one other thing wanting now to complete our happiness."

She was pressed to tell what that "other thing" was; but she refused in as light a manner as she could command. That "other thing" was that Alfred might be lucky that day, and that he might get out of Mr. Sheldrake's toils. It was hard for her to show a bright face when, as it seemed to her, Alfred's fate and hers were being decided. Strangely enough, she also dwelt superstitiously in her thoughts upon the three times seven kisses Alfred had given her when he parted from her in the morning. "They will be sure to bring him luck," she had said to herself a dozen times during the day. She thought of them hopefully now, and murmured, "To-night all our sad troubles will be over." A happy future indeed was spread before them if fortune smiled upon Alfred. How she longed for night to come, and Alfred with the glad tidings!

"We'll all live together," she said, aloud.

And Lily nodded and laughed. It was like a bright dream, where every thing that was good in nature was around and about her. The woods were beautiful with various greens; sweet breezes were stirring the leaves, and stealing their secrets from them; flowers were blushing; birds were singing; there was not a dark cloud in the sky. The two girls crept into a corner, and with their arms around each other's neck whispered confidences to each other. One thing—her most precious secret—Lizzie was burning to tell her friend; but she restrained herself. She had solemnly promised not to speak of it until Alfred gave her permission. In the evening, when she and her mother were at home again, she said she was tired, and she went to her room to lie down for half an hour. Thither, after a time, Martha crept, and sat by her daughter's side. Lizzie was murmuring in her sleep, and although her tones and every word she murmured were charged with love and tenderness, the sorrowful tears ran down Martha's face as she heard.

"Is this a judgment upon me for my neglect and deceit?" she asked of herself, between her sobs. "I should have looked after her better! I should have looked after her better!" But when Lizzie awoke, Martha was careful that her daughter should not see any traces of agitation. "I will wait until Alfred comes home," she thought, "and then I will tax him and discover the truth." Every thing seemed to depend upon Alfred's return.

And now it was night, and old Wheels and Lily were together in their room. Old Wheels was reading aloud, and Lily was working. There was no one else in the house. Mrs. Podmore and little Polly had gone to London for some bits of clothing which friends had gathered together for them; they were expected to return by train at about ten o'clock. Every now and then old Wheels paused in his reading, and made a remark. Lily understood very little of the story the old man was reading; she was thinking. Scarcely any thing but Felix was in her mind.

"Mrs. Podmore will be delighted to hear the news," said old Wheels, in one of the intervals; "although she has been hinting at it mysteriously from the very first day we saw Felix—when he drove us home in the wagonette. That's eight o'clock striking. Alfred ought to be home before now."

"It's nine o'clock sometimes before he comes home," said Lily; "but I wish he was here. I want to tell him."

Old Wheels read and Lily worked for another half hour, and at the end of that time the old man laid his book aside.

"I shall have to read all this over again," he said, with pretended petulance; "I am sure you have not been attending to me."

"I haven't," she replied, with a happy light in her eyes; "I have been thinking all the while of Felix."

"So I've been reading nothing but Felix, Felix, Felix; and you've heard nothing but Felix, Felix, Felix. Well, well, my darling; I am more than satisfied. Now, then," he said, merrily, "come to the window, and look out. It is blowing quite cold, dear child. Let me keep you warm in my arms. Ah, Lily, Lily, now I can die happy when my time comes. But what am I thinking of? To speak of such a subject at such a time! Talk of dying, indeed! I intend to live and see my darling's happiness. Ah, God is good!" Then, after a pause, he said, slyly, "But really this is serious—if it's to be nothing but Felix, Felix, Felix! Look along the road—what do you see?"

"Felix," she replied, entering into his humor, and to dispel his sadness; "he is a long way off, though, for he'll not be here for an hour and a half. But I see him coming."

"Of course you do. Now look up at the ceiling—what do you see?"

"Felix."

"And into the lamp—what do you see?"

"Felix."

"And into the fire—what do you see?"

"Felix."

"Ah, child!" he said, touching her eyelids gently, "Felix is not on the road, nor in the room; he is here."

"No," she replied, in the tenderest of tones, taking his hand and placing it on her heart; "he is here."

She was on her knees before the fire, looking into it, and remained so for many minutes, the old man standing quietly by her side, with his hand on her shoulder, looking down upon her. "A happier fate awaits her, thank God!" he thought, "than fell to her mother's lot."

He sat down in his chair at the thought, and mused on the time gone by, and thought of Lily's father too, and wondered as to his fate.

"Strange," he mused, "that one so unstable as he should have been so faithful to his written promise. Strange that I have never heard of him since that dreadful time! If he is living now, would it not be a good thing that he should witness his daughter's happiness? But if the old vice is in him still!—No, it would be impossible to find him, and it is better as it is. This is a happy turning-tide for all of us."

Nine o'clock struck. Lily started up.

"I wish Alfred was home," she said, impatiently. "I do so want him to know."

"Perhaps he's at Lizzie's," said the old man. "Shall I run round and see?"

"Yes, yes," cried Lily, "and tell him to come at once. Let Lizzie come too, and Mr. Musgrave. Mr. Musgrave is very fond of me, grandfather, and I like him very much. But I want Alfred most."

She was tying a muffler round the old man's throat, when she suddenly exclaimed, "It's a shame to let you go; I'll run round, grandfather."

"No, child. You will catch cold. And think," he added, gayly, "Felix may come in any moment. I shall not be gone long."

She listened to his footsteps and to the slamming of the street-door, and then knelt before the fire again. What a day had this been! never to be forgotten—the white day of her life. In an hour her hero would be with her. She rehearsed the scene that had taken place between them again and again. "I want a home—a helpmate. And there is but one woman in the world who can be to me what my heart yearns for. Lily—will you be my wife?" His wife! Why, if all the world were before her to choose from—if she could fix her own lot, her own destiny—that is what she would choose to be. Ah, how happy she would try to make him! A thought of Alfred crept in. Felix would be a good friend to him, a true friend. How much happier Alfred had been these last few days! his troubles seemed to be over. His smiling face, as she had seen it this very morning when he ran back and kissed her, appeared in the fire among her other fancies that she conjured up there. Alfred and Lizzie married—herself and Felix in their little home— She saw every room in it, and saw them all smiling at one another in the fire before which she was kneeling. But why was not Alfred here now? Swiftly she thought, "He can not be with Lizzie; for the first thing Lizzie would tell him would be about Felix and me, and Alfred would have run home to me at once." She started to her feet, and ran nervously to the window, and as she looked out into the dark roadway a knock came at the street-door. "That is Alfred!" she cried, and ran down stairs; but when she was in the dark passage she remembered that the knock was not Alfred's. Alfred always knocked at the door with a flourish; this that she had heard was a single knock. It could not be her grandfather, either, for he had a latch-key. Perhaps it was Mrs. Podmore. The knock came again, and she mustered up sufficient courage to go to the street-door, and ask who was there. A strange voice answered her. Did Mr. Wheels live there? it asked. Yes, she answered.

"Is his granddaughter at home?"

"Yes."

"I want to see her."

"What for?"

These questions were asked and answered through the closed door: Lily was alone in the house, and was frightened to draw the lock.

"What for?" she inquired again, faintly.

"I can't say unless I see her."

"She is speaking to you now; I am she."

"Is any body with you?"

Almost overcome by fear, Lily answered, "No; what do you want me for?"

"To give you a letter."

Lily hesitated still: the voice was that of a stranger, the locality was somewhat of a lonely one, and her grandfather had warned her not to open the door at night to any person she did not know, if there were no man in the house.

"Wait," she said, "until my grandfather returns. He will be here presently, and then I will take the letter."

"Then I can't give it to you, miss," the voice said. "My instructions are to give it into your hand, and into your hand only when there is no one near."

"Why? What is the letter about?" she asked, in an agony of terror, and murmuring inly, "Oh, why doesn't grandfather return!"

"I don't know what's in the letter. But the gentleman who gave it to me told me to say, if any thing like this occurred, that it was a matter of life or death to some one that you loved."

Life or death to some one whom she loved! She hesitated no longer, but tore open the door, panting. A man, who looked like a common laboring man, stood in the dusk.

"I am only carrying out my instructions, miss," he said, touching his cap. "Here is the letter, and I am to wait for an answer. You can shut the door while you read it, if you're afraid. I'll wait outside."

She closed the door, and running like a deer up stairs into the light, opened the letter. It was as follows:

"MY DEAR MISS LILY,—You must read this letter by yourself, and no other person must see it or know of it. I would come instead of writing, but my appearance and the circumstance of our conversing privately in your grandfather's house might excite suspicions. Your brother can not come home, and it is probable that his life hangs upon your prompt action; his safety certainly depends upon your secrecy. He is in the greatest danger. If you love him and wish to save him, come and see me immediately. I am waiting at the end of the road, at the corner of the True Blue public-house. The messenger who brings this will take your message, or will accompany you to where I am waiting for you. You must decide without one moment's delay. If you resolve not to come—a contingency I can not contemplate, knowing you—you may never see your brother again. In any case, believe me to be your faithful friend,

"DAVID SHELDRAKE."

There was so much in the note of hidden and terrible danger to the brother she loved so dearly that, without considering, she ran to her room for her hat and mantle, and hurried into the street. The messenger was waiting.

"Do you know where the gentleman is who gave you this letter?" she asked, breathlessly, as she tied the ribbons of her hat.

"Yes, miss; he's waiting at the True Blue, and told me to bring you to him if you asked me."

"I will come with you. Walk as quick as you can; I'll keep up with you."

The messenger, without answering, walked at once at a rapid pace in the direction of the True Blue, and Lily followed him. The road was long, and was but dimly lighted. When they arrived at the meeting-place Lily was completely out of breath, and her heart beat so violently that she reeled and would have fallen but for a friendly arm held out for her support. She clung to it instinctively, and looking up the next moment, saw that it was Mr. Sheldrake who had come to her assistance. He waited in a considerate and respectful attitude until she had recovered herself, and when she withdrew herself from his support, did not press his attentions upon her.

"I am glad you have come," he then said: she was about to speak, but he anticipated her; "it is a great relief to me. Alfred was not mistaken in you, nor am I."

"Where is he?" she asked, in an agitated tone. "What is the matter? Has any accident happened to him?"

"No accident has happened to him," replied Mr. Sheldrake, gravely. "But we can scarcely talk here; it is dangerous; the very walls have ears. There is a private room in this public-house in which we can talk for a few minutes undisturbed. Nay," he said, in a sad tone, "do not hesitate at such a time. When we can talk without being observed, I will instantly convince you that I am not worthy of being suspected."

"Why can not we talk here?"

He looked round cautiously, and lowered his voice. "Because, if any person overheard us, your brother would be lost. It would be out of your power then to save him."

Lily thought of Felix, and hastily glanced through the partially open door of the public-house. There was a clock hanging up, and she saw that it was half past nine. A comfortable-looking woman was standing within the bar, and her husband, with his shirt sleeves tucked up, was busy serving the customers.

"There is a private room behind the bar," said Mr. Sheldrake; "that little parlor with the door open. You can ask for the use of it yourself, if you like. But I warn you not to delay. Time is precious."

He spoke in a cold tone, and as if his feelings were deeply wounded by her suspicions of him. Lily walked into the public-house, followed by Mr. Sheldrake, and beckoned the landlady aside.

"Can I have the use of your parlor," she asked, "for a very few moments, undisturbed, to speak with this gentleman?"

"Yes, miss," answered the landlady. She knew Lily, and was surprised at her appearance there. "You can come round this way, and no one shall disturb you."

Lily and Mr. Sheldrake walked into the little room, and the landlady closed the door of communication between it and the bar. Lily, standing near this door, waited in painful suspense for Mr. Sheldrake to speak. He had noticed that when she entered the room she had moved timorously toward the door as if for protection, and he experienced a feeling of mingled anger and mortification, any outward exhibition of which, however, he successfully repressed. When he spoke he spoke slowly, and as if studying his words.

"Your behavior toward me is ungenerous to a degree. At any other time, and under any other circumstances, I might be disposed to wash my hands of this affair at once. Notwithstanding the feelings I entertain for you—do not be alarmed; I am not going to speak of them—I owe to myself a certain amount of self-respect, and I stand in danger of forfeiting this, and of placing myself in a false light, by silent submission to your distrust in me. But"—and here his voice grew less restrained, and his words were expressed with more warmth—"I can afford even this renunciation of self-defense, simple as it is, and unsupported except by my consistent behavior toward yourself and your brother, in the consciousness that what I am doing is done out of pure disinterested friendship and esteem."

"For mercy's sake," she implored, "speak more plainly, and tell me for what purpose you have brought me here."

"For no purpose of my own; for your brother's sake. It is a matter of life or death to him."

She clasped her hands, and could not find words to speak for her agony. She had never appeared more fascinating in his eyes than she appeared to him now, as she stood before him in pleading attitude. But although he was under the spell of this fascination, and although he knew that she was at his mercy, he was instinctively conscious, bold and unscrupulous as he was, that he held no power for ill over her. Her innocence and trustfulness were a stronger armor than any which cunning and artifice could supply. As he gazed at her in admiration, he thought how proud he should be of her if she were his, and thought, too—taking credit for the generosity of the sentiment—that if the worst came to the worst he would marry her.

"Where is the note that I wrote to you?" he asked.

"Here it is."

"Had you not better be seated?" he said, as he took the note from her hand. "You will want all your strength."

She sank into the chair he handed her, and he, glancing at the note carelessly, put it into the fire.

"There must be no chance," he said, when this evidence against himself was destroyed, "of

Hosted by Google

this falling into strange hands. For your brother's sake."

"You said in it," she said, in exquisite distress, "that his life—his life! hangs upon my action."

"And upon mine: we two can save him. The compact we entered into for his good can now be carried out. I am ready to perform my part; are you ready to perform yours?"

"I will do any thing for my brother—any thing. But I do not understand your meaning."

"Your brother must see you immediately; he will tell you in what way you are able to save him."

"I am ready to see him!" she cried; "I want to see him! Where is he? Oh, Mr. Sheldrake, if you respect me, let me see him at once."

"That is my wish, and the reason why I am here. You know that I respect you—you know that I—" The shudder that seized her warned him of the indiscretion he was about to commit. "But this is no time to speak of any thing but Alfred. Every moment's delay now may be fatal to him. What is done must be done at once."

"Bring him to me, then; I will wait. Bring him to me, but do not torture me with suspense! Have pity on me!"

She held out her hands imploringly to him, and he took them in his, and looked steadily into the pale, agitated face.

"I do sincerely pity you, Lily; my heart bleeds for you. But it is in your power to avert all this misery. Listen to me calmly. I can not bring Alfred to you; he is in hiding, and dare not show himself. I can take you to him. I have a cab at the door. Come."

She withdrew her hands from his grasp, and retreated a step or two nearer to the door of communication with the bar. He smiled bitterly.

"Still distrustful!" he exclaimed, with a frown. "Well, be it as you will. To-morrow, when shame and disgrace are at your door—shame and disgrace which, by the simplest of acts, you could have averted—to-morrow, when you learn the miserable fate that has befallen the brother that loved you so fondly—you may repent what you have done. But, unjust and cruel as you are in this, do me then at least the justice of acknowledging that I did my best—more, I believe, by Heaven! than any other man in my position would have done—to save both him and you. Good-night."

He had acted well, and as he turned from her his heart beat exultantly at her next words.

"Stay, for pity's sake! There is no sacrifice that I would not make for Alfred's sake. He knows it—he knows it!"

"He believed it, firmly; and he in his turn would be ready to make any sacrifice for you. I have heard him say so dozens of times."

"I know, I know. He has been so good to me! But all this is so sudden and terrible, and I am so much in the dark—with no one to advise me—" She could not proceed for her tears.

"I did not think," said Mr. Sheldrake, gently, and with a touch of pride, "when I sent for you that any persuasion would be necessary to induce you to act as your heart must surely prompt. I wished my disinterested conduct to speak for itself. Knowing my own motives and the more than good-will to yourself which prompted them, I wished you to depend upon me, and to trust in me, as you may do implicitly, believe me. I have in my pocket proof of my sincerity and faithfulness, but I did not intend to use it. I almost despise myself now for doing so, but I do it out of pity for you—out of a warmer feeling which you know I entertain for you."

He took from his pocket-book the paper which Alfred had written at his dictation on Epsom Downs.

"Read this, and decide; for I can not stop one minute longer."

Lily read the paper with difficulty; the words were blurred in her sight:

"I am in great trouble and danger. My friend, Mr. Sheldrake, is the only man I can trust, and the only man who can save me. Put full faith and trust in him. ALFRED."

"Will that satisfy you?" asked Mr. Sheldrake, almost tenderly. "You know Alfred's handwriting. Will you come and see him now?"

"Forgive me for my suspicions," said Lily, almost distracted by conflicting doubts. "I will come with you. But I must send a line to my grandfather first, explaining my absence."

"Not explaining," said Mr. Sheldrake, placing writing materials before her: "no mention must be made of Alfred or me."

Lily wrote hurriedly,

"DEAR, DEAR GRANDFATHER,—I am compelled to go away suddenly for a little while. Do not be anxious about me. I will return soon, and you will know that I have done right. Tell Felix this; I dare not explain now.

"Your loving child, LILY."

"The messenger who brought my note to you can take it," said Mr. Sheldrake. "If you can contrive to look less sad—if you could even smile—as we go out, it might avert suspicion, should any one have been on the watch."

They went out of the public-house together, and Lily called a sad smile to her lips, although her heart was fainting within her at the prospect of Alfred's danger. The messenger who had brought Mr. Sheldrake's note was outside, talking to his companions. She hurried to him, and giving him the paper she had written to her grandfather, asked him to deliver it, putting sixpence into his hand at the same time. The next moment she was in the cab.

"One moment," Mr. Sheldrake said to her, hurriedly; "I want to settle with the landlady."

He had seen the messenger who was to deliver Lily's note to her grandfather go into the public-house; Mr. Sheldrake followed.

"The young lady has changed her mind," he said to the man; "give me the letter back. Here is a shilling from her."

The man delivered up the letter, glad to dispose of it on such good terms, and Mr. Sheldrake, throwing half a crown on the bar, said, "Give your customers some beer, landlady;" and departed amidst a chorus of "Thank'ee, Sir," from the men standing about inside.

"Perhaps you'll prefer sitting by yourself," said Mr. Sheldrake to Lily; "I'll get up outside, and sit by the driver. Keep up your courage."

This act of delicacy on his part seemed to assure her. "Thank you," she said, hurriedly and nervously. "Shall we be long?"

"No; I'll tell the driver to drive quick."

He was on the box, and the driver had started, when he saw a number of men running along the road with alarm on their faces.

"What's the matter?" he called out to them.

"An accident on the line," they called out, in answer, as they ran past toward the railway station. Mr. Sheldrake did not stop to ascertain its nature, and the cab drove quickly off.

Meantime old Wheels made his way to Mr. Musgrave's house. He was surprised to find, when he arrived there, that all within was dark. He knocked at the door more than once, and obtaining no reply, walked round the house, endeavoring to find an explanation for the cause of the strange desertion. He saw no person, however, and he returned to the front-door. As he stood there irresolutely the same thought came to his mind that had occurred to Lily: that Lizzie would have been certain to tell Alfred of the engagement between Felix and Lily, and that Alfred would have come home immediately to hear all the news concerning it. "Alfred could not have passed me on the way," he mused; "I should have been certain to see him. Nor did Lizzie." He could arrive at no clear understanding of the circumstances, and he was about to retrace his steps uneasily when a voice said,

"Have you knocked, Mr. Wheels?"

It was Martha Day who spoke.

"Yes," the old man replied; "but I have received no reply. I have been here for nearly ten minutes, but I have been unable to make any one hear."

"Perhaps Lizzie is asleep. I have been away nearly three hours, looking after my boxes. I did not intend to come back to-night, but I could not rest away from my darling. Come round the back way, Mr. Wheels. Lizzie has shown me where she leaves the key of the back-door sometimes."

They went to the rear of the house, and Martha found the key.

"Yes, here it is. I suppose my girl has gone out for a walk. With Alfred, perhaps."

"I can scarcely think that," the old man said, "the night is so cheerless."

"It is cold and dreary out-of-doors," assented Martha.

"I came round to see if Alfred was here. Lily is uneasy because he has not come home, and she wants him to hear the news about her and Felix."

Martha, groping about in the dark for matches, seemed to find something strange in this, for she said, in an uneasy tone,

"Alfred not come home, and Lizzie not here!"

"But perhaps she is asleep, as you said," suggested old Wheels.

"I'll see," said Martha, feeling her way to Lizzie's room. "You won't mind stopping here in the dark a bit."

As Martha felt her way along the passage and up the stairs, she called, softly, "Lizzie! Lizzie!" But no voice answered her. She went into Lizzie's bedroom, and felt the bed. Lizzie was not there. She began to be alarmed. She glided quickly down the stairs again, and going to the parlor, found the matches, and lit the lamp. Then she called to the old man.

"I can not understand it," she said, as if communing with herself. "Can Lizzie have been frightened because of what I said to her this afternoon? Oh, Lizzie! Lizzie! Oh, my darling child!"

She sat on a chair, and rocked herself to and fro in her distress.

"Because of what you said to her this afternoon?" questioned old Wheels, sharing Martha's distress. "We are all closely connected by affectionate ties, Mrs. Day. May I ask what you said to her that causes you to be alarmed now?"

"No, no!" cried Martha, covering her face with her hands. "You are his grandfather, and I dare not tell you. But a mother's eyes can see! a mother's eyes can see!"

A sudden paleness stole into the old man's face, and his lips trembled.

"Is it something connected with Alfred? Nay, answer me; I am an old man, and I love Lizzie."

"It would have been better for her," sobbed the unhappy woman, "if she had never seen him. He has brought shame upon her, and I only am to blame! I should have watched over her; I should not have left her alone! Oh, Lizzie, my darling! come back to me!"

"If I understand you aright," said the old man, with an aching heart, "and I am afraid that I do, a new grief is brought upon us by the unhappy boy—a grief which I never dreamed of, never suspected. I thought our troubles were coming to an end, and that this day, until now so bright and so full of hope, was the beginning of a happier life for all of us. Alas for the errors of youth! God knows I have striven to do my best, and my duty."

He was overwhelmed with sorrow, but the thought of Lily waiting at home for him aroused him to action.

"I must get home to my darling," he said, gazing sadly at the bowed figure of the unhappy mother; "she is alone in the house. Will you come with me?"

He took her unresisting hand, and she accompanied him to the street-door, but she paused there, and said, with a despairing look around,

"No, I must go and seek Lizzie—I can not come."

"Do you know where she is likely to be?" he asked, pityingly.

"No," she replied, helplessly; "I don't know which way to turn. I'll wait here; perhaps she will return soon. It will be best for me to wait."

He did not urge her farther, but saying he would see her again before the night was over, he hurried away, leaving her alone with her grief. His own heart was pierced with keenest sorrow, and he scarcely dare trust himself to think.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

PRESENTLY there will come the great spring rush to Europe. This year it will be greater than usual, because of the additional attraction of the Vienna Exhibition. In itself Vienna is a bright, cheerful city, one of the pleasantest in Germany. It really consists of two cities—the new, or inner city, circular, compact, and about a mile in diameter, and the outer city, or suburbs. The growth of Vienna has been marvelously rapid of late years. Since there has been a measure of religious and civil liberty in Austria, industry and enterprise have taken a fresh start, and the Austrians have become a progressive people. The Exhibition will, of course, attract a crowd of idle gazers, but this is not its object. The Austrians are eager to learn from other nations, as well as willing the world should know what progress they have made themselves; and the Exhibition will serve these purposes, for all countries will be represented there. Government vessels have been sent from this country loaded with all conceivable manufactures and productions of American industry. The Exhibition opens May 1, and Vienna will be thronged. Lodgings are high in Vienna as compared with most German cities, but hotels and restaurants are numerous, and the food furnished generally excellent. The bread has the reputation of being the best in the world.

Every body knows that March is the city boy's kite-flying season. Torn and shapeless fragments hang from every tree and telegraph wire, waving frantically in the breeze, to the infinite delight of small boys who have been fortunate enough to hold on to their own kite strings. It is the top season also; and pedestrians have to move out of the way of noisy crowds who are vigorously whipping their spinning toys. Well, we are all glad enough that at length, after so many months of snow and mud, the children can have some comfort in out-door exercise.

An American visiting Hayti went one day to his hotel bar and ordered a beverage. Having swallowed the mixture, he inquired the price. "Thirty dollars!" Stupefied for a moment, the stranger takes a firm resolution: he will not be swindled. So he produces a silver dime and lays it on the counter. "I haven't the change, Sir," says the bar-keeper. A little later he discovered that $1 in gold was equivalent to $400 in Haytian currency.

How like Americans are the people of Smyrna! Every body in Smyrna knew that a certain café and concert-hall, built on piles, running out into the sea, was unsafe. The authorities of the city knew it, the residents knew it; yet one evening 250 persons gathered in the doomed building, which suddenly disappeared in the sea. There was one loud crash, one long wail, and then deep silence, which was soon broken by fearful screams. About one hundred lives were lost.

Police statistics show that every night in the year there are on the average 260 men and women sheltered in the various police stations of New York city. Perhaps twenty-five per cent. of these are honest and deserving, strangers in the city, waiting employment or help. The rest need surveillance to keep them from committing depredations or doing some mischief.

A tremendous "slide" of snow from a roof in a Maine village completely buried a man who happened to be passing by. The good people of the place went to work and dug him out. They found him unhurt, but in tears. He said he was a Swiss, and had not felt so happy for years—that it reminded him of days gone by, in his native mountains.

Our American eagle keeps up its reputation in California. One recently attacked a flock of sheep, broke the head of one, put out the eye of another, and finally carried off a good-sized lamb.

An exchange is of opinion that the reason St. Patrick lived to the advanced age of one hundred and twenty-one years was that his life was not shortened by the anxieties of preaching in a "fire-proof" sanctuary.

The mortuary chapel which the Empress Eugénie intends to build for the reception of the remains of the Emperor Napoleon III. will be in the medieval style, and twenty-four feet long by twelve wide.

When we remember that it has been the custom of Japan to surround the persons of the sovereigns of that country in impenetrable mystery, and that death has been the punishment of any infraction of the law respecting this, we can realize how significant an event was the recent reception of the wives of the ministers of the United States and Russia by the Mikado and his Empress. The written invitation was sent by the Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs. The visitors were admitted through a private entrance to the royal palace at Jeddo, and were received by officials of high rank. When the ladies were conducted into the Throne-Room, the Mikado and the Empress were found standing to welcome them. The royal pair shook hands with their guests, sat down with them, and carried on a long conversation by means of interpreters.

It would scarcely be possible to mention, even by their classes, all the specimens of American industry which have been sent to the Vienna Exhibition. Among them are a great variety of agricultural implements, sewing-machines, mechanics' tools, musical and surgical instruments, books, charts, photographs, and all manner of school apparatus, minerals and vegetables, ornamental wood-work, and many kinds of fancy wares. Cotton, sugar, fibres, mosses, and salt are the chief contributions from the South.

A San Francisco physician was recently attempting to remove the cork from a bottle of concentrated ammonia—supposing it to be aqua ammonia—when the cork was thrown out violently, and a quantity of ammonia entered his left eye. He plunged his face into water immediately, and applied antidotes as soon as possible, but the eye was hopelessly injured.

The grand ball-room erected in Judiciary Square for the inaugural festivities in Washington is to remain intact for some time for a series of grand promenade concerts.

Russia appears, by a new railway and telegraph chart of the Russian empire just published, to possess railways and telegraph lines actually in operation of which the outside world had no suspicion. There is a complete system of strategical railways, radiating from the principal lines uniting in St. Petersburg, Moscow, and Kief, and extending even to the Asiatic frontier in no less than ten lines. All the military centres, even Novoi Tcherkask, the head-quarters of the Don Cossacks, are accessible by rail; and in a short time, if not at this moment, Russia can move large bodies of troops and concentrate them within a few days at any desired spot. These facts seem to alarm the Germans.

According to statistics recently published by a Southern writer, who seems to have studied the subject, the winters in the Gulf States are growing more severe. This is referred, in part, to the clearing away of the vast pine forests, by which channels for the cold winds from the plains east of the Rocky Mountains have been opened. And the rapid and wide-spread progress of emigration throughout the Northwest doubtless makes a smoother plane over which mountain winds may descend upon the Gulf States.

The compensation of government officers, as settled by Congress just before its adjournment, is as follows:

The President	$50,000
The Vice-President	10,000
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court	10,500
Justices of the Supreme Court, each	10,000
Cabinet officers	10,000
Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, State, and Interior	6,000
Speaker of the House, after the Forty-second Congress	10,000
Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, including the Forty-second Congress	7,500

First reports of any accident or calamity are usually exaggerated, although in a few cases careful after-investigation reveals increased horrors. The Governor of Minnesota has recently sent a special message to the State Legislature which indicates that the loss of life from the severe snow-storm last January was not as great as was at first supposed. A special commission was sent by Governor Austin to those sections of the State where the storm was most severe to collect and report facts, as well as to give relief to the needy. As the result of information gathered by this and by other means the following statement is made:

Frozen to death, and bodies found	61
Missing, and supposed to be frozen to death	7
Died, within a short period, of amputation	2
Total fatal results	70
Injured by reason of entire or partial loss of hands or feet	31
Total casualties	101

This account is severe enough, especially when we consider the suffering resulting from loss of cattle and many other deprivations.

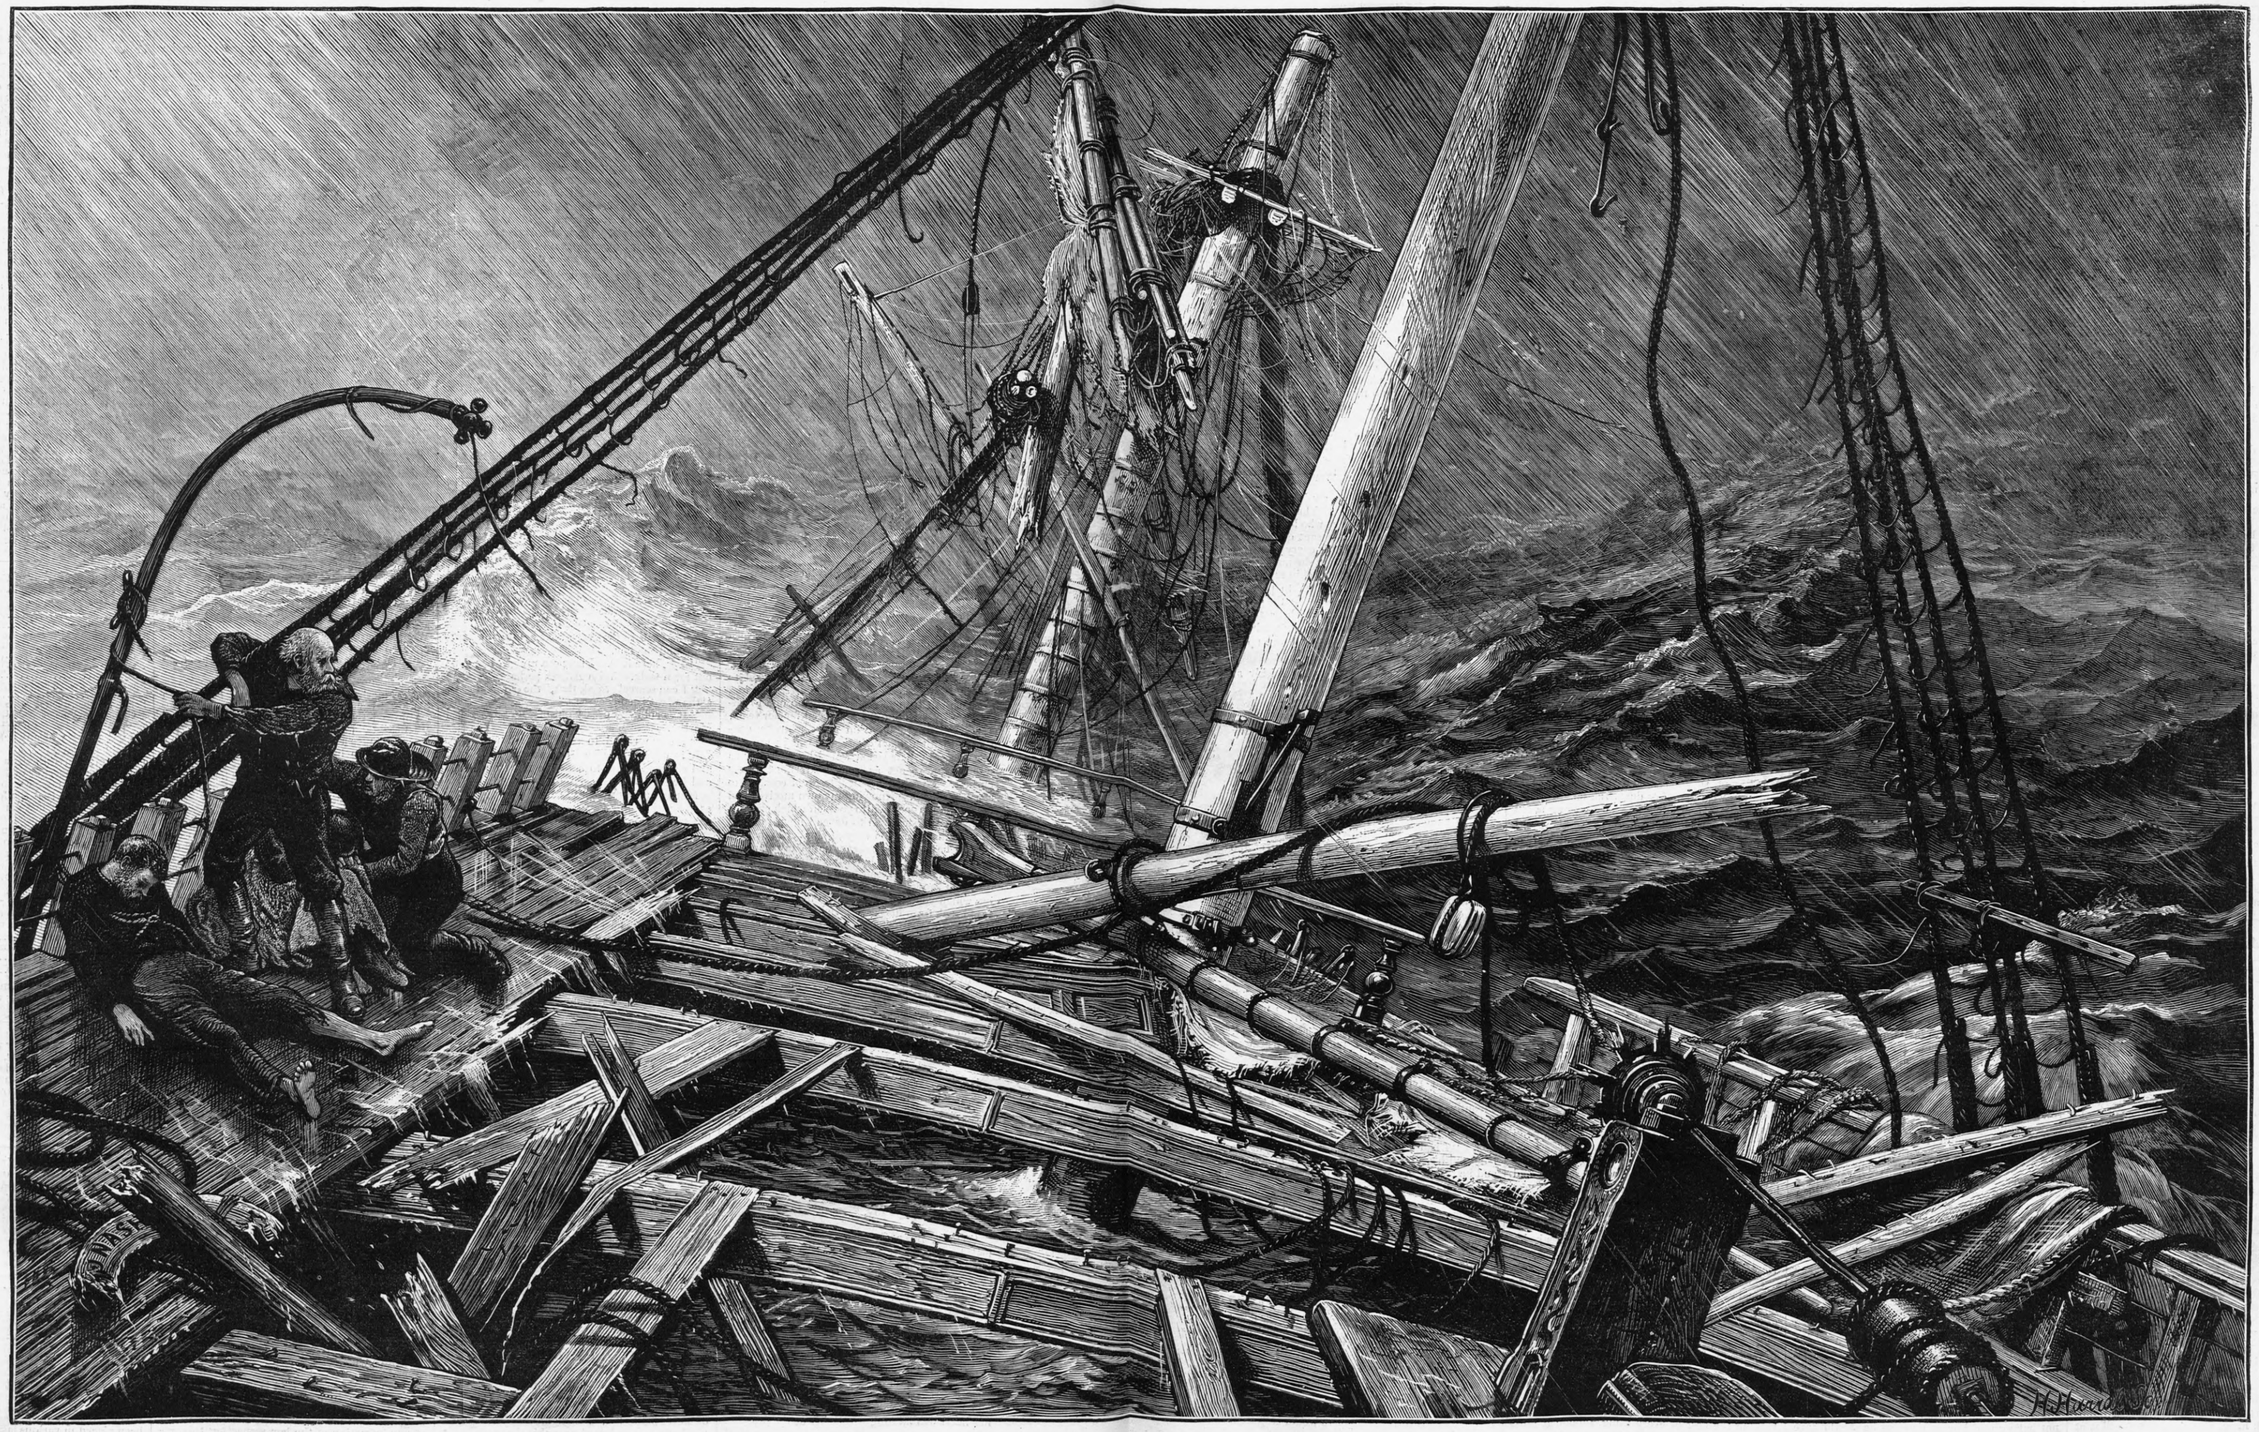
There is more truth than fun, we think, in the following statement of "what an old-fashioned winter means:" Doctor, chilblains, red nose, cold in the head, frosted potatoes, aggravation of the misery of rising in the morning, slippery pavements, falls, fractures, coals up, horses down, melting snow, impassable streets, wet feet, pump frozen, pipes burst, plumber, subscriptions, and unfavorable returns by registrars-general.

Medical students passing through the ordeal of examination for diplomas may take a hint from the course pursued by a certain French student. He was being examined by a celebrated physician, who described to the puzzled youth a disease culminating in most dangerous symptoms, and then asked, "What would you do in such a case?" The student unhesitatingly replied, "I should instantly send for you;" and he got his diploma.

Less than twenty-five years ago the first court was held in Minnesota. It would be puzzling to tell the amount of law business and the number of lawyers embodied in that State to-day.

If shad and salmon are not plentiful before long, it will not be the fault of the Commissioners of Fishery in the State of New York. During the past year 7,498,000 young shad, having been successfully produced in the State hatching house, were turned loose in the Hudson River. Nineteen thousand salmon-trout have been placed in various lakes and ponds throughout the State under the direction of the Commissioners, not to mention many other thousands which have been taken from the hatching house by private parties to be placed in public and private streams and lakes. Brook trout have also been placed in numerous streams, from which they had been driven by ignorance or carelessness. So we are likely to be abundantly supplied with delicious fish at a low cost.

Hosted by Google



A WATER-LOGGED TIMBER SHIP.—[See Page 234.]

Hosted by Google

A WATER-LOGGED TIMBER SHIP.

See illustration on double page.

THIS fine picture, which so strikingly portrays the dangers to which those are exposed who go down to the sea in ships, is no fancy sketch, but was faithfully executed from the wreck of the Louisa, a vessel bound from Quebec to London with timber. She was exposed to one of the many terrible gales of the recent winter, and was, during the night, struck by a squall, and turned completely bottom up. Some of the crew were drowned; the remainder contrived to crawl on to the keel, where they held on until the mainmast and topmasts washed out of her, when she righted, and they got on board again. She was then in the state shown in the drawing. The seamen continued on the wreck for (we think) two days and three nights without food, during which time some of them died. The survivors were taken off by a vessel, and landed at Plymouth, England. The abandoned ship knocked about for three weeks in the British Channel, when she was picked up off the coast of Guernsey, and taken into St. Peter-le-Port. It is difficult to realize the peculiar nature of the hardships undergone by sailors, especially on board small merchant vessels, unless from personal experience, or at least from eye-witness.

TO-MORROW!

WHEN the lanes were white with roses—
Little roses, golden-hearted—
In the fragrant, misty twilight,
Two happy lovers parted.

No kisses brake the silence,
No word of love or sorrow,
But clasping hands we said, "Good-by!
Good-by until to-morrow!"

At the open door we parted,
Where the honeysuckle covers
Half the porch with blushing sweetness:
We knew not we were lovers.

Late sunshine smote my darling,
Round her head a glory making,
As it kissed her dainty dimples,
In mellow laughter waking.

Her eyes were dark as pansies,
With a dreamy splendor glowing;
She was fair as white wood violets
In sheltered crannies growing.

Still I see the sweet, dim picture
As it echoes back, "To-morrow;"
But mine eyes are changed with weeping:
I have tasted love and sorrow.

The little hand that fluttered
Within my sudden clasping
Before the night was over
Strong Death himself was grasping.

He entered by the porch-way
That the honeysuckle covers,
And only when my darling died
I knew that we were lovers.

It was long ago we parted,
With a merry, quick leave-taking,
When the roses, golden-hearted,
In leafy lanes were waking.

But the breath of honeysuckle
Greets me still with sudden sorrow:
It seems to sigh, "Dear heart, good-by!
We meet again to-morrow!"

PARIS GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

AS I have mentioned one of the tricks which foreigners are likely to have played on them when they settle down in a house of their own in Paris, I may as well show up a few others. The moment a tenant is domiciled in his own furniture, dans les meubles, as they call it, he becomes a target for all the trades-people of the neighborhood, and often of remote neighborhoods, to fire at. One of the first delights of his installation is the volleys of prospectuses of schools, lists of goods, and enumeration of services to be rendered by agents, which come pouring in on him in bewildering profusion. But this is all fair play. As long as tradesmen have a shop or an office where they show themselves and their wares to the public notice, inviting custom and challenging criticism openly and honestly, they have a right to puff their goods, their honesty, etc., by all legitimate ways and means. Their officious offers of service may be a bore, but they are no worse. The vendors against whom I would warn my American friends are those who come to their houses with boxfuls of bargains in the shape of table-linen, Chantilly lace, India muslin, etc., or who pretend to give them the benefit of some unparalleled invention for the polishing and preserving of furniture, or some such device, whose sole use and object is to draw money out of their unsophisticated pockets. There is one individual among the species who has for many years driven a thriving trade in this peddler line, and been a standing persecution to families in Paris. He hawks about great quantities of damask linen, and professes to sell it at huge loss. He comes with another man, who carries the heaviest box, and helps to show off the bargains, and the two talk till they are, not tired (that, apparently, is a crisis beyond possibility), but until their victim is deaf—deaf with bewilderment and vexation, and, to get rid of the clatter, buys something and sends them away. They tell you that they are from Alsace—Mulhouse, I think, that being the head-quarters of damask manufacturing in France; now, they are probably raising their own and their goods' value by doing a little patriotism into the flourishing declarations of the linen being the finest manufactured in Europe, and, owing to the misfortune of the manufacturer having to sell off at an immense loss, the cheapest ever sold. The chief spokesman is a remarkably respectable-looking man, tall, middle-aged, dressed with perfect propriety and neatness, and full of plausible discourse. He has articles to suit every conceivable want in a table, no matter how large or how small—dozens of very fine damask, tied with fascinating blue ribbons, and dozens and even half dozens of common, coarse ones to suit common, coarse farers. His table-cloths are legion in their variety of lengths and breadths and the diverse qualities of their texture. He will assure you, moreover, with a solemnity which very few uninitiated strangers would have the strength of mind to withstand, that they are the greatest bargains ever seen upon the earth. Ten to one he persuades you to take a set, perhaps more. If you are not sure of being strong enough to hold out to the end, your best plan, if you can not make your escape out of the room at once, would be to invest in a short set of towels or something equally cheap, for if you remain long enough to let the bulk of the boxes be emptied out on the tables and the carpet, nothing short of a miracle can save you from being fleeced to a point that you will remember all your days. The exhibition is so large, and the trouble, civility, and assurances of its being of no consequence whatever, when you mildly protest against any further untying of packages, so abundant, that, in common decency, you feel compelled to reward so much disinterested labor and polite desire "just to let monsieur—or, more likely, madame—see our little stock, in case it should contain any thing that he would like," etc., by investing in something more expensive than you want, even supposing the investment to be a good one. Even suppose, I say, for there is the rub. The bargains are, of course, no bargains at all. They are cheats and impositions. Who the peddlers are and whence they came no one, to the writer's knowledge, has ever found out. They never give their address. If, as I once saw it happen, a benighted stranger asks to have a set completed, or wants some article which they happen not to have with them, they offer to bring it next day, and if you say you will call for it, or that you would like to have the address to go and look at other patterns, the answer will be that they are at such a distance they could not possibly allow madame to take the trouble; if you persist that as you have a carriage, and it will be the same to you to drive there as well as any where else, then they confess that business of importance takes them to Brussels that very night; they can not fix the day of their return, but as soon as they are back, they will precipitate themselves to execute the commands of madame. Should you further urge as a plea for driving at once to their dépôt that you leave town that very evening, they will be in despair, but they will let you leave without the sheets or table-cloths, or whatever it may be, rather than reveal their hiding-place, for such it evidently is. Whether the goods be stolen goods or otherwise illicitly procured is a mystery I do not pretend to solve, but of a certainty they are very bad goods, judging from the specimens I have seen. They will go to pieces after a few washings, as if they were spun with burned material, or they may be full of holes already, if you look at the light through them. At any rate, they are no bargains, for you pay just as much, even after beating down the peddler from his upset price, as you would pay in any shop. But the real annoyance of these particular peddlers is that you can not get rid of them, once you let them into the house. I knew one poor American lady whom they frightened almost into an illness by their obstinate refusal to go until she had bought as much as they chose to sell her. Her husband was in the drawing-room when the men were shown in, and, husband-like, he at once retreated on hearing the word bargains, followed by an invitation from his wife to come and look at them. The peddlers knew, consequently, that she was alone to defend herself, and as it was a woman who opened the door, they concluded there was no other man in the house. She foolishly allowed them to open every thing, not really wanting a single article, but lured by the feminine love of just looking at bargains, and then she bought a small number of napkins. But this would not satisfy the peddlers. They urged, argued, besought, and at last, by their tone and looks, they half threatened. Mrs. X—— began to feel nervous, and failing to induce them to leave the room, she rang the bell beside her for the servant to open the door, and passed into her bedroom. She sat there for nearly an hour, reading, and then came back to the salon, where, to her dismay, she beheld the two men still standing in the midst of their scattered wares. They burst out at once into expostulations at having had so much trouble for so little profit, and were growing more and more insolent, when a ring at the hall door brought relief to Mrs. X—— and a change in the manner of her persecutors. They were pouring out a profusion of apologies when the drawing-room door opened and the master of the house walked in. The lady was too thankful for her release to say any thing to rouse his suspicions, but when the men were gone she told the story. Her husband was very angry at her not having told him at once, as he should have called for police out of the window, and have had the peddlers and their goods at once taken into custody. He spoke of the affair in every direction, warning his country men and women against the peddlers, but he was never able to catch them, though he ascertained that they had gone to many persons of his acquaintance the same winter, and sold a great deal of rubbish to them. The only way to guard against visits of this description is to give strict orders that no persons hawking wares in boxes or bundles are to be let in unless they come by order. If they persist that they are there by order, they must give their card, bearing name and address, which the servant will take to the lady of the house, and then she can receive them or not as she pleases. Americans should make a rule of taking this simple precaution, not only for their own sakes, but on the principle of discouraging swindlers and thieves. There is a woman who goes about with India muslin, which, by-the-way, never saw the sun of India in its life, and says she comes from the English Embassy when her point of attack is an English family, and from the American Legation when she has to do with Americans. She is a hoax and a bore, but no worse. With ordinary firmness you can get rid of her. Then there is a man who sells Chantilly and Brussels lace. It is very dubious in quality, some glaringly false, and not a bit cheaper than you buy real lace in the shops. This enterprising individual also has heard your name in some distinguished or fashionable salon, where you may or may not be known. If he has hit right, as these people generally do, being well informed on such matters, you don't like to be uncivil to Madame or Lady So-and-So, who has "particularly requested that you would patronize this worthy person, who is a protégé of hers," etc., and you are let in for some foolish piece of expense. If he has hit outside the mark, he says he has evidently made a mistake, looks over his list of recommendations, and is sure your name was given him by some very distinguished person. Another character in this line is a woman who comes into your salon and flies at the legs of the piano, polishes them frantically with some red grease out of a little pot she carries in her bag, and begs you to buy a pot that all your furniture may shine with equal splendor. It won't shine any brighter for this than for being rubbed with butter.

Now do, dear Americans, take my hints, and give orders that those swindlers are never allowed into your presence. COMET.

MISS DOLLY CORNERED.

"I SHOULDN'T be surprised any day, Dolly, to see David Wiggin tying his horse at your gate," said Mr. Blount, roguishly, gathering up the reins.

"Nonsense, brother! any thing the matter with his own hitching-post?" retorted Miss Dolly, turning in the doorway.

Mr. Blount laughed. Every body felt bound to laugh at Miss Dolly's crisp sayings. She had kept her friends in good humor these forty years.

"And when David does call on you," pursued Mr. Blount, more seriously, "I do hope, Dolly, you'll give him a chance to do his errand. That 'll be no more'n fair, and the man won't be easy till he has freed his mind."

"What mischief are you the forerunner of now, James Blount?" cried Miss Dolly, facing about like a soldier on drill. "What upon earth have I to do with David's errands?"

"Well, his wife's been dead a year or so," said Mr. Blount, suggestively, shutting one eye, and squinting with the other down the length of his whip-stock, "and lately he's been asking about you. You can put that and that together to suit yourself."

"Fiddle-sticks!" said Miss Dolly, energetically.

"I sha'n't say have him, or don't have him—though there isn't a likelier man living than David—but I do say, Dolly, you ought to give him a hearing." And having convinced himself beyond a reasonable doubt that the whip was all right, Mr. Blount tickled his sleepy horse with it, and drove away.

"Oh, my sorrows!" ejaculated Miss Dolly, closing the door with an afflicted countenance, and sitting down so quietly for once that a photographer might have copied her then and there.

Not that he could have done her justice, for her expression was too quick and varied to be caught by any trick of chemicals, and without it Miss Dolly's physiognomy would have been rather characterless but for her prominent Roman nose. This organ gave tone to her face. By which I would not be understood literally, as saying that she talked through it in a nasal whine. I mean simply that in a metaphorical sense this bold feature spoke loudly of energy. And Miss Dolly had always had abundant need of energy—else why the nose?

Every two years during her childhood she had been tip-toed into the east bedroom to see a new baby, till, at her mother's death, five little brothers fell to her charge to be coaxed and scolded into manhood.

"You can't bring up them boys," croaked a dolorous aunt. "They'll run square over you, Dorothy Almeda."

Dorothy Almeda was Miss Dolly's baptismal name, but it was so manifestly too big for her that most of her friends would as soon have thought of labeling a tiny homeopathic vial with a quack-medicine advertisement as of calling her by it.

"Let 'em run over me, so long as it doesn't hurt 'em!" laughed Miss Dolly, skewering her flaxen hair with a goose-quill, and tying a tow apron over her calico long-short, preparatory to "bringing up" said youths.

From that day forward she went cheerily on, making the best of every thing, though it must be confessed she often had odds and ends to work with, as people usually do have who are born with a faculty. Somehow she found time for all her duties excepting matrimony. If that were a duty, it was one she couldn't and wouldn't attend to while her father and the children needed her. Divers young men thought this a great pity, among them David Wiggin.

"Don't be silly, David!" said Dolly, when he hinted as much to her, whereupon David went off straightway and married Olive Searle, the plainest girl in the parish. This happened thirty years ago, and now David was again wifeless, and again the current of his thoughts turned toward Miss Dolly, who still lived at the old homestead near the foot of Bryant's Falls. Her father had died some months before. Of the boys, James and Ezekiel had settled on neighboring farms, and the remaining three were in the West. David's benevolent heart warmed with compassion as he remembered Dolly's lonely condition, and he felt that it would be exceedingly kind in him to offer her a home, especially as he owned as good a place as you'd find on the river, while the Blount cottage was fast falling to decay. He wouldn't let her former refusal of him tell against her, for, now he looked back, he really didn't see how she could have married any body at that period. She ought to be rewarded for the devotion she had shown to the family, and, for his part, he felt magnanimous enough to give her a second chance to accept him. Such was the worthy widower's state of mind when he asked James Blount, with mock humility, whether it would be of any use for him to try to make a bargain with Dolly.

"That's more'n I can tell," Mr. Blount had answered; "Dolly's a puzzle. You'll have to find out for yourself."

Mr. Wiggin smiled, in complacent anticipation of acceptance. Indeed, if it might not seem like a reproach to the memory of his lost Olive, I should say that the kind-hearted man rejoiced in this opportunity of making Miss Dolly's happiness.

Benevolence was in his face, benevolence was in his spirit, as he sallied forth at an early day to acquaint her with her good fortune. The broken harrow which he had strapped into the wagon to give the neighbors a plausible reason for his trip to the Falls was by no means typical of mental laceration in its owner. His feeling as he approached Miss Dolly's moss-grown cottage was purely one of thankfulness that it was in his power to provide her a better home. Not that he was grateful to his dead wife for leaving a vacancy there. Mr. Wiggin had mourned faithfully for Olive a year and a day.

Miss Dolly was out in the garden gathering catnip. She never used it herself, but there were nervous old ladies in the village who looked upon this herb as the substance pleasant dreams are made of, and Miss Dolly dried it every year, and often left little bundles of it when she made visits of consolation. She had built a chip fire under the tea-kettle, and then whisked off to pick an apronful of the pungent leaves while the water was boiling. There she was, stooping beneath the eaves of a log-cabin sun-bonnet, and humming a lively fugue tune, when Mr. Wiggin drove up.

"'Come, my beloved, haste away,'" piped Miss Dolly, cheerily, snapping briskly at the stalks.

"'Cut short the hours of thy delay;
Fly like a youthful—'"

"'Fly like a youthful—'" struck in a wheezy bass.

The sun-bonnet tipped back like a cart body.

"Sakes alive!" cried Miss Dolly, not in the words of the hymn, as Mr. Wiggin strode toward her on his slightly rheumatic legs.

"I didn't mean to put you out," laughed he, shaking hands heartily, "but it seemed kind o' nateral to take a part with you in Invitation."

"You always had a way of falling in at the most unheard-of time, I remember," retorted Miss Dolly, saucily, recovering herself, and going on gathering catnip. She was fifty years old now, and hoped she had her wits about her.

"You used to say I kept good time, only too much of it," pursued Mr. Wiggin, with a sudden inspiration; "but I tell you what, Dolly, time never dragged with me then as it does these days!"

"It is a dull season," said Miss Dolly, with exasperating simplicity. "I suppose the grasshoppers have eaten most of your wheat, haven't they, so it 'll hardly pay for reaping?"

"Just so," assented Mr. Wiggin, discomfited. He had not traveled five miles in the heat to discuss the state of the crops.

"Walk in and sit down, won't you?" said Miss Dolly, with reluctant hospitality. Her apron was crammed at last to its utmost capacity. She devoutly wished it had been larger.

"Well, yes, I don't care if I do," answered Mr. Wiggin, after a hypocritical show of hesitation. "I had a little business further on, at the blacksmith's. No hurry, though, as I know of," and he turned to let down the bars for Miss Dolly, who meanwhile slipped nimbly through the fence, catnip and all.

"Bless my heart! I don't see but what you're as spry as ever you was," said he, admiringly, as he puffed along in her wake. "Still you must be getting into years, Dolly, as well as I—no offense, I hope—and I was wondering whether or no it wasn't lonesome for you living alone here; a woman, so?"

"Oh, I never was one of the lonesome kind," responded Miss Dolly, briskly, seating her guest in the patchwork-cushioned rocking-chair; "and, for that matter, hardly a day passes without some of James's folks running in."

"Yes, I know; but if you was to change your situation, wouldn't you enjoy life better, think?"

Miss Dolly fidgeted at the green paper curtains, and intimated that her present happiness would be complete if the grasshoppers would stop feeding on her garden sauce.

"That's just it," continued Mr. Wiggin, eagerly; "you do seem to need a man to look out for your farming interests, now don't you, Dolly? a man that 'll be ready and willing to do for you, and make you comfortable?"

"I don't know," said Miss Dolly, dryly. "The year before father died I did have Silas Potter, and he is the most faithful creature living; but what with the extra cooking and washing I had to do for him, my work was about doubled, and when mud-time came I was glad enough to send him off, and hire by the day. I about made up my mind that men folks round the house cost more'n they come to."

Hosted by Google

"I guess we don't understand one another," said Mr. Wiggin, slightly disconcerted by this unflattering view of his sex. "I wasn't speaking of hired help, Dolly. Naterally you would get tried with that; it's worryin' to a woman. But if you was to have a companion, now—one that could give you a good home, with wood and water under cover—"

"Shoo! shoo!" cried Miss Dolly, flying out after an inquiring chicken on the door-step.

Mr. Wiggin drew his red pocket-handkerchief from his hat to wipe his glowing face. Certainly he hadn't felt the heat so all through haying.

"How's your health nowadays?" asked Miss Dolly, frisking back with a look of resolute unconsciousness.

"Very good; remarkably good! I don't know where you'll find a man, Dolly, with a tougher constitution than I've got."

"Ah!" Miss Dolly blushed like a sumac in October.

"Yes, I'm well," pursued Mr. Wiggin, perseveringly, "and I'm tolerably well-to-do, with nothing to hinder my marrying again, provided I can see a woman to my mind."

"There's the deacon's widow," suggested Miss Dolly, officiously; "she's a pious, economical—"

"She's left with means enough to carry her through handsomely," interrupted Mr. Wiggin, quickly. "Now I'd rather have a wife to provide for—one that needed a home. In fact, Dolly, I have my eye on the little woman I want this minute!"

He had both eyes on her, for that matter, and Miss Dolly was forced to recognize the situation, whether she accepted it or not.

"I've managed to sugar my tea so far, David, without calling upon my neighbors," chirruped she, stooping to lay straight the braided mat, "and I might as well keep on. I don't feel it a tax, as some folks would. But there's Martha Dunning, she's having a hard time to get along. Why don't you take her, David? She'd appreciate such a nice house as yours."

"It would seem as if 'most any woman might," said Mr. Wiggin, in an injured tone, "all finished off complete, painted outside and in—"

"She'd be delighted with it, I am sure of it!" broke in Miss Dolly, with an air of conviction, as she darted into the kitchen to lift the boiling kettle from the crane.

"But you don't mean that you won't marry me, Dolly?" pleaded Mr. Wiggin, anxiously, following to the door. "I've been lottin' on seein' you at the head of things in my house."

"Martha is a grand manager," said Miss Dolly, coolly. "David needn't think he can buy me with a set of new buildings!" added she mentally, snapping down the lid of the pug-nosed teapot. "I never did have the name of being cropping!"

"I tell you, Dolly, I won't have Martha; I don't like her turn!" cried Mr. Wiggin, testily, balancing himself on the threshold, yet not daring to step over it.

Miss Dolly gave her undivided attention to winging the hearth.

"You know you was always the woman of my choice, Dolly," pursued Mr. Wiggin, as tenderly as he could consistently with the distance between them. "And we were both young—"

"Pshaw!" snapped Miss Dolly, scorching her wing; "that's beyond the memory of man!"

Mr. Wiggin's position was becoming painful. He grasped a door-post in either hand, looking wretched enough to slay himself on the spot, after the fashion of Samson. Evidently he had not touched the right chord as yet. Miss Dolly was not to be won by the attractions of wealth and position, nor even by tender allusions to the past. He would appeal to her kindness of heart.

"I used to believe you had some feelin', Dolly," said he, tremulously; "but you don't seem to have any for me. Here I am left alone in the world; children all paired off 'thout's Matilda, and she'll go before the snow flies; house empty—"

"I suppose you can have a home with any one of your boys, and welcome," put in Miss Dolly, faintly, still fluttering about the chimney like a swallow.

"Yes, if worse comes to worst, I suppose I can," assented Mr. Wiggin, mournfully, any thing but consoled by this reflection. "It would break me down terribly, though, you may depend, to give up my place that I set so much by, and crowd myself onto my children."

No response save the clattering of the tongs.

"And it's dreadful melancholy business for a man at my time of life to drag along without a partner. I'm getting to be old, Dolly." Mr. Wiggin brushed his sleeve across his eyes as a feruled school-boy might have done. "Yes, I'm getting to be old, Dolly," he repeated, brokenly; "and it stands to reason that I haven't many years to live; but I did hope we might go down hill together, Dolly, you chirkin' me up with that spry way of yourn that I always took to, and I carryin' the heft of—"

Here Miss Dolly gave a little sniff, nothing worth mentioning only for the effect it produced on Mr. Wiggin. Indeed, had his ears been as old as he pretended, he would not have suspected her of being affected by any thing more serious than a cold in the head.

"Can't you make up your mind to have me, Dolly?" pleaded he, crossing the threshold in his hopeful eagerness. "I don't see how I'm going to stand it if you can't."

"Then Martha wouldn't suit?" said Miss Dolly, archly, making a great pretense of wiping a cinder from her eye. "What a shame, now, when she needs the property so much!"

"Hang the property! I'd mortgage the whole of it rather than not get you, Dolly!" cried Mr. Wiggin, with a vehemence that quite closed her mouth.

And so at last he had Miss Dolly cornered.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

How the Old Lady in Threadneedle Street was jilted.—Folks too clever by half.—A Volunteer's Suicide.

THERE are very few circumstances under which one can congratulate one's self upon not being a rich man, but there are undoubtedly some. When a panic has seized the City I repair thither (in a twopenny 'bus) to contemplate it with interest, and with all the serenity with which the visitor at Naples who has no investment in the crops in the vicinity regards an eruption of Mount Vesuvius. When a bank breaks, I remember with pleasure that my balance is but small, or that what there is is on the wrong side of the account, and rather enjoy the commercial catastrophe. Again, to hear of frauds and forgeries on a gigantic scale titillates my fancy, since they do not affect my purse-strings, and I read the details in my penny newspaper with malicious avidity.

An ingenious fellow-countryman of yours, Mr. Editor, whose real name is as yet unknown to fame, but was understood until lately to be Horton, has been absorbing my attention—I had almost said my sympathies—by robbing the Bank of England.

A man who kills another man is a murderer; a man who contrives to destroy ten thousand others is a hero. A fellow who forges a check for £5 on a country bank is little better than a common thief; but one who defrauds the Bank of England of £100,000, and is not satisfied, but meditates a coup of far greater magnitude, in the midst of which he collapses—that genius extorts my admiration. The old lady in Threadneedle Street, as you have doubtless heard, is not easily taken in by any body; she requires vouchers before you can open an account with her, and even then regards any bill you require to have discounted with suspicious attention. Since the days of Old Patch and Fauntleroy I don't think she has been hoodwinked or robbed of her savings by a single individual. But she has a connection in the fashionable world—a branch establishment at the West End, for the convenience of her aristocratic customers—who, it seems, is by no means so astute. She, light-hearted, frivolous creature, has nothing to do with bills and discounting, or had not until recently, and seems to have been rather flattered when Mr. Horton, of New York and elsewhere—much concerned in the manufacture of Pullman cars to run between Vienna and Paris during the coming Exhibition; yes, Sir—proposed to do business with her in that line. He was introduced by a customer of ten years' standing, and for a long time discounted only genuine bills; moreover, he made quite a friend of the manager, and in his little notes respecting pecuniary "operations," threw in such personal inquiries, and statements of the condition of his own health, as without doubt helped to throw off suspicion by establishing a sort of social relation. At last he began to present his forged bills. These are described as "masterpieces of ingenuity." Many of the firms on which they purported to be drawn use a peculiar kind of paper, with certain water-marks, besides printed matter. All these were imitated to perfection; and then came the forgeries of the signatures of the acceptors, of which there were sometimes half a dozen to each bill. The money was obtained, and it seemed as if during the three months which this gentleman had, in commercial phrase, "to turn about in"—before, that is, the bills became due, when, of course, all must be exposed—that he might have realized a colossal fortune. A trivial omission, however, which, where all else was so admirably planned, seems inexplicable, wrecked these golden hopes. In two of the bills the date of acceptance did not appear, a clerk was sent across to the house on which one of them was drawn to have this rectified, when "This is none of ours" was the reply, and the whole net-work fell to pieces like "a cat's-cradle" at that pull of the string. How much was absolutely cleared in the mean time is doubtful, but it is supposed to be over £100,000. And there is nobody so much "wanted," to use the language of the police, in all London as Mr. Frederic Albert Warren.

Beside this gigantic effort all other attempts to rob the public must needs seem insignificant; yet, as an instance of what presence of mind can effect, I will relate the following: A young lady was seized with a fit in Fleet Street yesterday, and after being tended with much solicitude by an elderly lady, who appeared to be her companion, she was placed in a cab, still insensible, to be taken to her own home. A policeman, however, got up behind the cab, and presently pounced upon the elderly lady getting out of the same with the watch and money of the invalid transferred to her own pockets. She had been no more the young lady's companion than I was—which, upon my word, I was not—but seeing her opportunity, she had taken charge of the interesting case upon the spot. I asked the policeman how he had ever come to suspect this benevolent old lady.

"Suspect? Why, it's a regular dodge, Sir, to look out for persons with fits and such-like, and then to pretend to be their friends. I can remember, in old days, a poor man falling down dead in that very same street. He was but a beggarman, and nothing, as you would suppose, to be got out of him; but a young fellow immediately drops on his knees beside him, and cries out that he was now without a friend in the world, and 'How shall I ever decently bury you, my dear old father?' So the tender-hearted people as had crowded round gives their pennies and their sixpences, and the young man thanks Heaven and them that his parent will not now have a pauper's funeral, and, half drowned in tears, off he drives with the body in a cab. Where does he drive to? Why, to a surgeon's, of course. And what for? Why, to sell the old gent for ten pounds for dissecting purposes. It was called 'the dutiful-son dodge,' and was very popular at the time, though it's now gone out of date." Thus, you see, the Good Samaritan, were he to exercise his vocation in London streets, would expose himself to no little suspicion. It is, however, a satisfaction to reflect that the ingenuity of rogues is rarely of use to them in the long-run. They do not die "in the purple," for all their wits, but usually in jail, and always in poverty. A wealthy farmer recently pleaded his own illegitimacy, and with success, against supporting his own mother, who had consequently to go to the work-house. But this sagacious gentleman thus drew attention to the fact that, upon inheriting his uncle's property, he had paid legacy duty as his nephew, and not as a stranger in blood, which he ought to have done, being illegitimate. The Treasury has, therefore, come down upon him for the difference between the three per cent. paid as nephew and the ten per cent. he ought to have paid, and also demands compound interest on the years from 1856, when the uncle died, to the present date! This is the most beautiful instance of "poetic justice" which the annals of the law have hitherto exhibited, and for once every body is in love with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

You will think my "gossip" to-day a little like a police report; but, after all (and strictly between ourselves), what is more interesting than a police report, except a coroner's inquest? There has been one this week of a most singular kind. Some volunteers were practicing at sighting their rifles, merely presenting empty ones at one another, and snapping the caps. One of them, Alfred Roberts, presently hands a rifle to a companion, and says, "Aim at my breast." He did so, and, to his horror, there was a loud report, and Roberts fell dead. Crumpled up in the dead man's hand is found this note, the contents of which were thus italicized: "I am very glad you have saved me the trouble of shooting myself. I know you are anxious to become a marksman in the corps" (what a ghastly joker must this poor wretch have been!). "Perhaps I will be of service to you by making a target of myself. Wishing success to your first shot, I remain, yours respectfully, Alfred Roberts." Addressed to Mr. Tom Walter.

The victim had smuggled in the ball-cartridge unobserved. R. KEMBLE, of London.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

WILL the correspondent in Milwaukee who wrote about discolored veins in the face kindly write once more to the person addressed before?

A FRIEND.—Get gray cashmere or else gray vigogne for a bride's traveling dress for April. Make with polonaise and plain skirt. A suit of olive brown or résédа silk, or a black silk suit, will be more serviceable than a poplin, because it can be worn all summer, fall, and winter. Read styles of making in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI.

V. H.—Directions for fern impression work are in Bazar No. 34, Vol. I.

LITTLE WOMAN.—As your pocket is slender, get a black cashmere sleeveless sacque, instead of velvet, to wear with your black silk, as it will be comfortable far into the summer. Trim with yak or guipure lace and steel or silver or jet buttons. Read about these in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI. This jacket with an over-skirt will answer with your Russia leather red silk.

SHIRLEY W. M.—We can not answer inquiries by mail, whether postage is inclosed or not, nor can we give addresses in this column. The postage on a half-ounce letter from any part of the United States to France is ten cents.

A CONTRIBUTOR.—Harper & Brothers publish all of Charles Reade's works, and nearly all of Wilkie Collins's and Miss Edwards's, including The Moonstone, Put Yourself in his Place, and Debenham's Vow. They also publish all of George Eliot's works, all of which, except Middlemarch, are illustrated. They have no cheap edition of Longfellow's works. A catalogue will be sent you on application.

WANDERING HEIR.—What do you call good food? Kentucky cooks are too liberal of fat in their pies, biscuit, and gravies to benefit the complexion. Try a diet of coarse flour bread, cracked wheat, broiled meats, and vegetables for six weeks, with a daily soap and water bath, using the carbolic lotion, and see how many pimples are left on your face.

L. M. H.—You can tie a silk thread round the neck of the mole, tightening it every day till the mole comes off. We think, however, that you would do well to consult a physician, as there is always some danger in tampering with things of this sort.

A CONSTANT READER.—We can not repeat directions in this column.

TWO LITTLE GREEN GIRLS.—Tight braiding injures the hair, but a firm braid keeps every hair in place, prevents its breaking, and so helps to secure a good suit of hair. The "Ugly Girl" papers, past and future, will give directions for improving the hair and complexion. Exercise and warm bathing are the best cure for nervousness. To improve the memory write what you wish to remember two or three times, consulting the original as little as you can each time after the first. To remember errands, write them down to fix them in the mind, then destroy the memoranda and depend on the memory. To remove corns, shield them with a bit of leather having a hole cut in the centre the size of the corn, and touch the latter with turpentine or a strong mixture of glycerine and carbolic acid.

CAMILLE.—A bran poultice protects and moistens the skin, allowing the old cuticle to dissolve while the new one forms tender and delicate.

EMMA P.—There are fourteen "Ugly Girl" papers in as many numbers of the Bazar, which cost ten cents a copy, and one cent each for postage.—Mask is the same as moth or morphew. The cosmetic gloves are made at home by pouring melted cold cream into an old pair of kid gloves.

MAY WYCHE.—To prevent your hair from falling out, bathe the head daily in warm water with hartshorn in it, one tea-spoonful of strong spirits of the latter in a pint of water.

C. L., BROOKLYN.—Frank and others will receive answers to their questions in one of the "Ugly Girl" papers of an early date.

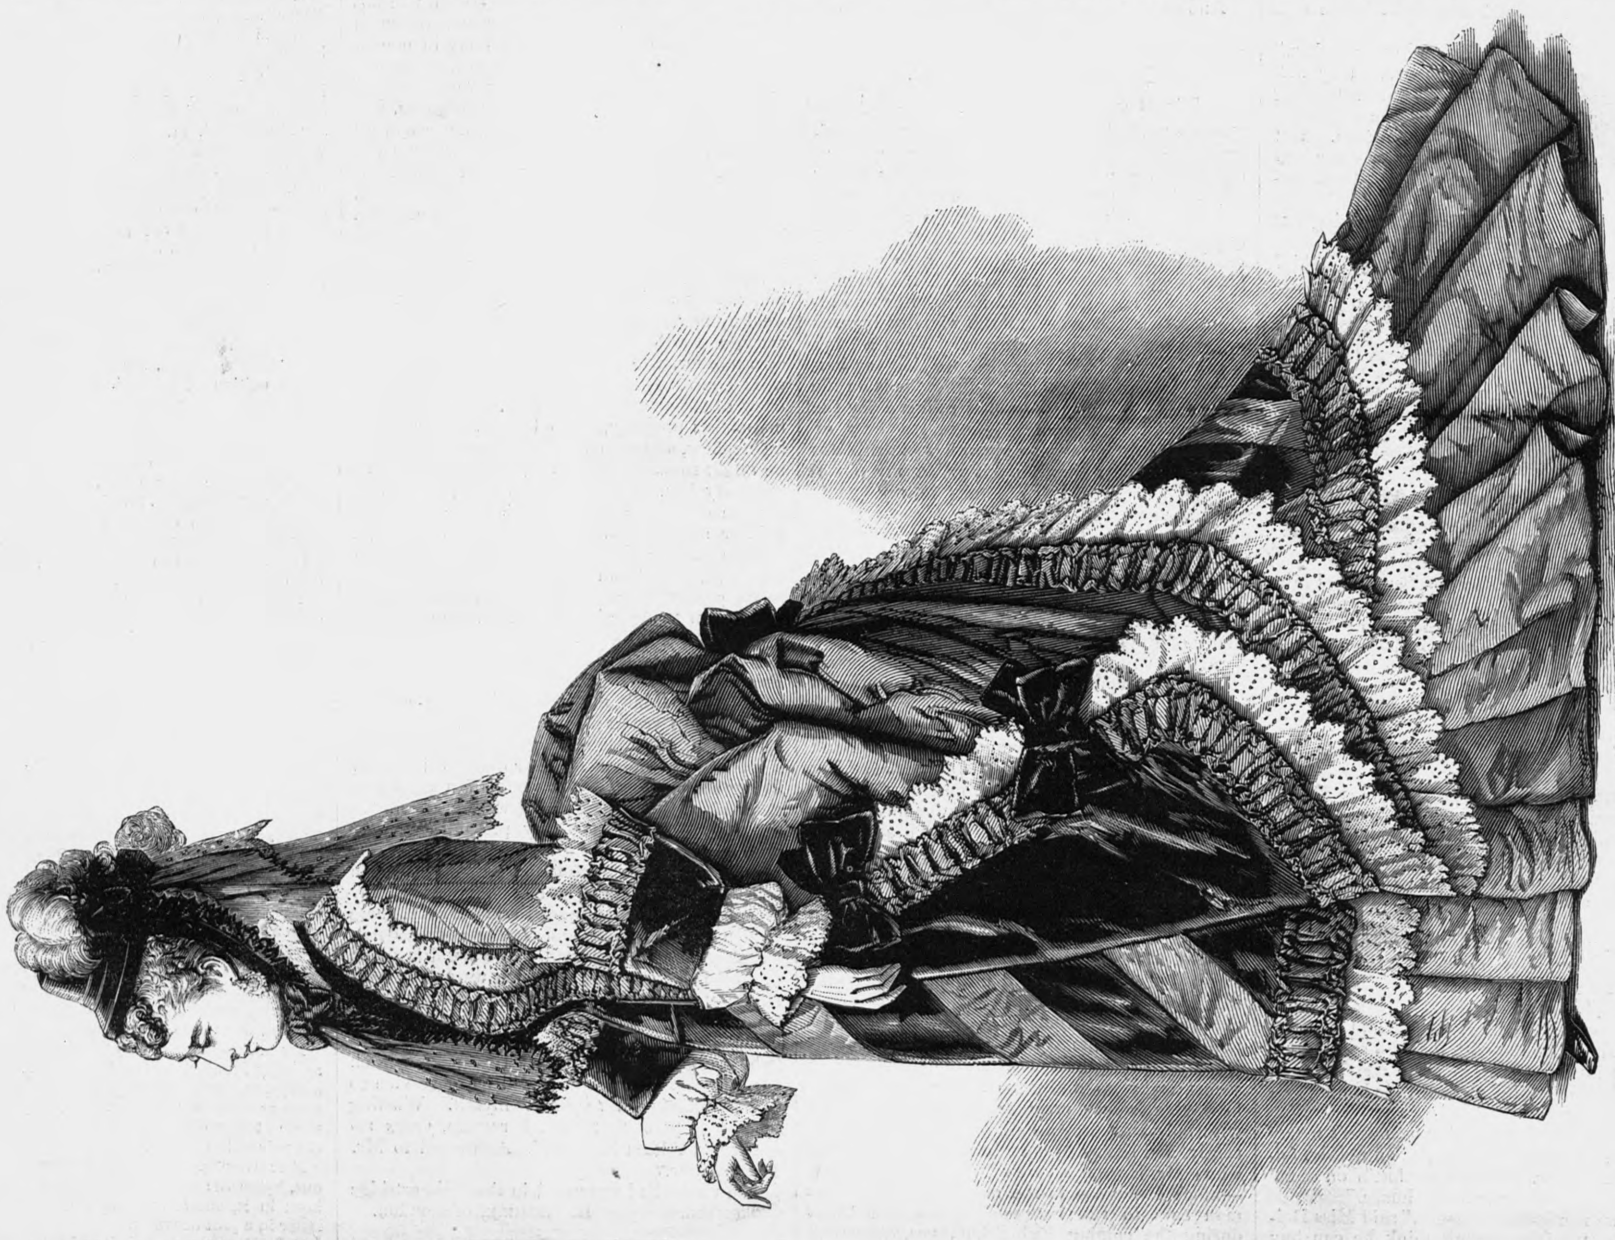
A SUBSCRIBER.—Get gray vigogne for a spring traveling suit.—We prefer not to give recipe for bleaching the hair, as it is a dangerous and useless thing to do. Charcoal in finest powder will whiten the teeth. Eat much coarse wheat flour, which supplies the substance for sound white teeth.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR REMOVING SPOTS.

WE give below a table of the mode of treating the principal kinds of stains and clothing, copied from Rigter's Manual of Domestic Economy.

NATURE OF THE SPOTS OR STAINS.	ON WHITE GOODS.	ON COLORED COTTON GOODS.	ON COLORED WOOLEN GOODS.	ON SILK GOODS.
Mechanically attached particles	Beating, brushing, and allowing water to fall from an elevation upon the wrong side of the goods.
Mucilage, mucus, sugar, jelly	Washing out with lukewarm water.
Fats	Washing out with soap or lye.	Washing out with lukewarm soap and water.	Washing out with lukewarm water and soap or spirits of hartshorn.	Benzine, ether, spirits of hartshorn, magnesia, chalk, clay, yolk of eggs.
Oil colors, varnish, resin	Oil of turpentine, alcohol, benzine, and then soap.			Benzine, ether, and soap, very carefully and in a very weak solution.
Stearine	Strong, pure alcohol.
Vegetable colors, red wine, fruits, red ink	Sulphurous vapor or hot chlorine water.	Washing out with lukewarm water and soap, or spirits of hartshorn.		As with the preceding articles, but very cautiously.
Alizarine inks	Tartaric acid—the older the spot the more concentrated.	If the color permits, dilute tartaric acid.		As before, but with great precaution.
Blood and albuminous spots	Simply washing out with lukewarm water.
Rust, and spots of ink made of nut-galls	Hot oxalic acid, dilute hydrochloric acid, and then tin filings.	In genuine colored goods, citric acid to be tried.	Citric acid to be tried; or, in non-colored woolen goods, dilute chloric acid.	Nothing can be done without increasing the evil.
Lime, lye, and alkalies in general	Simply washing.	Much-diluted citric acid, drop for drop upon the moistened spot, to be spread around by the finger.
Acids, vinegar, sour wine, must, acid fruits, etc.	Simply washing; in the case of fruit, also with hot chlorine water.	According to the delicacy of the material and the color, more or less diluted spirits of hartshorn, to be spread around on the spot moistened, drop for drop, with the tip of the finger.
Tannin substances, fruit or green nutshells, leather	Bleaching lye, hot chlorine water, concentrated tartaric acid.	Chlorine water, diluted according to the delicacy and color of the material, applied with a rag, and drop for drop on the spot moistened, alternately applied and then rinsed off.
Tar, wagon grease, as also fat, resin, carbonaceous particles, and wood vinegar	Soap, with oil of turpentine, varied with the action of falling water.	Hog's lard to be rubbed on, then soaped and allowed to remain quietly, then washed alternately with water and oil of turpentine.		As in the preceding, but more carefully, and instead of turpentine, benzine and a continued current of water falling from a height, and only upon the reversed side of the spot.
Superficial loss of substance by scorching	Rub over thoroughly with a pad dipped in hot chlorine water.	Whenever possible, coloring over, or raising up the nap.		Nothing can be done.

Hosted by Google



RECEPTION COSTUME.—[SEE PAGE 237.]

VISITING COSTUME.—[SEE PAGE 237.]

Hosted by Google

Visiting Costume.

See illustration on page 236.

This visiting costume of light Ophelia brown silk is trimmed with mordoré (golden brown) velvet and white yak lace. Its new feature is the diagonal bands of velvet on the skirt. A pleated circular flounce of silk widening on the train is also a stylish caprice at present. The heading is a marquise puff of silk and yak lace. The vest-polonaise is caught up behind in a panier puff, and has vest, revers, cuffs, and bows of mordore velvet; lace and a puff for border. Mordoré velvet bonnet, with blue ostrich plume; strings and streamers of black lace. Puffed under-sleeves. Pale cream-colored gloves.

Fig. 1.—Rabagas Hat.

Reception Costume.

See illustration on page 236.

Reception costume of sage green silk. This dress shows the old-fashioned chatelaine corsage now revived in Paris, and the slashed Spanish sleeves with cavalier cuff and lace frill. The plain skirt trains slightly, and is almost concealed by the over-skirt. The front of the over-skirt is gathered into side revers, and bordered with side pleating. A bias band and fringe edge the back breadths. Chatelaine sashes very narrow and fringed hang down on the front seams, and rosettes are in the middle of the front and on the revers. Swinging cords trim the bodice front. The large empress collar is of point lace. Round hat of Leghorn, with sage green bows, pink roses, and a lace streamer.

Ladies' Spring Hats and Bonnets, Figs. 1-10.

Fig. 1.—Rabagas Hat. This hat is made of black lace. The rim with double revers is covered with light blue faille. On the crown of the hat are set loops and ends of gros grain ribbon and a scarf of black tulle edged with lace. On the right side is a feather aigrette.

Fig. 2.—Rubens Hat. This hat of black silk gauze has a broad rim turned up at one side and bound with light blue faille. The trimming consists of black lace, blue faille ribbon, black feathers tipped with blue, and a bunch of pink flowers with grayish-green foliage. Black silk tulle scarf.

Figs. 3, 4, and 5.—Spanish Gypsy Hat. This hat, of which Fig. 5 gives the frame, is made of black Brussels net, and bound on the edge with light blue faille. The revers is covered with dark olive green faille. Wide faille ribbon of the same color surrounds the crown of the hat. In the middle of the back, underneath the rim, is set two scarfs of olive green faille, which are looped as shown by the illustrations, and above the rim, is a bunch of bows of light blue and olive faille. The trimming consists of a blue and olive feather and a bunch of roses of different colors. Strings of olive green faille.

Figs. 6, 7, and 8.—Josephine Bonnet. Fig. 8 shows the frame of this bonnet. The high three-cornered revers at both sides is covered with black lace. The front of the bonnet is trimmed with three folds of black faille, which are edged on both sides with a double piping of faille and velvet; a similar fold also trims the revers. The remainder of the trimming consists of bows and ends of black faille, a steel buckle, and a spray of flowers with maroon foliage. Black faille strings.

Fig. 9.—Hortense Bonnet. This bonnet is of black silk gauze; the revers is covered with brown silk. Feathers and faille ribbon in two shades of brown and a feather aigrette trim the bonnet as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 10.—Gray Neapolitan Cottage Bonnet. This bonnet is covered on the outer edge with a puff of pale pink silk gauze. Bows and strings of pink faille. The trimming consists of a bunch of black lace and pink flowers with grayish-green foliage. Veil of black silk tulle and lace.

Fig. 3.—Spanish Gypsy Hat. Front.—[See Figs. 4 and 5.]

Fig. 2.—Rubens Hat.

Fig. 4.—Spanish Gypsy Hat.—Back. [See Figs. 3 and 5.]

Fig. 6.—Josephine Bonnet.—Back. [See Figs. 7 and 8.]

Fig. 7.—Josephine Bonnet.—Front.—[See Figs. 6 and 8.]

Fig. 9.—Hortense Bonnet.

Fig. 8.—Frame for Josephine Bonnet, Figs. 6 and 7.

Fig. 5.—Frame for Spanish Gypsy Hat, Figs. 3 and 4.

Fig. 10.—Gray Neapolitan Cottage Bonnet.

AN ECCENTRIC SURGEON.

THE most famous surgeon in Edinburgh toward the close of last century was certainly Mr. Alexander Wood, member of the Incorporation of Chirurgeons, or what is now called the Royal College of Surgeons. In those good old times his contemporaries, and the mob who worshiped him, knew him by no other name than Lang Sandy Wood (or "Wud," as it was pronounced). It was not only his supreme skill, but his kindliness of heart and his eccentricity, that won the popular favor. The latter peculiarity is one which has caused his name to even now be traditionally remembered in Edinburgh. All his life long this peculiarity distinguished him. When proposing to his future wife's father for his daughter, the old gentleman coolly said, "Weel, Sandy, lad, I've naething again' ye, but what have ye to support a wife on?" Truly a most pertinent question, considering that in those days his income was of the most limited description. Sandy's reply was to pull a case of lancets out of his pocket with the remark, "These!" It was nothing uncommon for him, while about to perform an operation, to pull a pistol out of his pocket and threaten to shoot the servants through the head if they attempted to make the least noise. This precaution was more necessary than now, when we remember that this was before the days of chloroform. He had the most eccentric ways of curing people. One of his patients, the Honorable Mrs. ——, took it into her head that she was a hen, and that her mission in life was to hatch eggs. So firmly did this delusion take possession of her mind, that by-and-by she found it impossible to rise off her seat, lest the eggs should get cold. Sandy encouraged her mania, and requested that he might have the pleasure of taking a "dish of tea" with her that evening, and that she would have the very best china on the table. She cordially agreed to this, and when her guest arrived in the evening he found the tea-tray covered with some very valuable crockery, which did not belie its name, for it had really been imported from China by a relative of the lady, an East India nabob. The surgeon made a few remarks about the closeness of the room, asked permission to raise the window, and then watching an opportunity when the hostess's eye was on him, he seized the tray-ful of fragile ware and feigned to throw them out of the window. The lady screamed, and forgetful in her fright of her supposed inability to rise, she rushed from her seat to arrest the arm of the Vandal. The task was not a hard one, for the eccentric old surgeon laughed as he replaced the tray on the table, and escorted his patient to her seat. The spell had been broken, and nothing more was ever heard of the egg-hatching mania.

Hosted by Google

Another lady patient of his had a tumor in her throat, which threatened her death if it did not burst. She entirely lost her voice, and all his efforts to reach the seat of the malady were unavailing. As a last resort, he quietly placed the poker in the fire, and after in vain attempting to get his patient to scream, so as to burst the tumor, he asked her to open her mouth, and then, seizing the now red-hot poker, he made a rush with it at her throat. The result was a yell of terror from the thoroughly frightened patient, which effected what he had long desired—the breaking of the tumor, and her recovery.

"MARRIED IN MASK," a new story by MANSFIELD TRACY WALWORTH, Author of "Beverly," "Delaplaine," "Hotspur," etc., has just been commenced in the New York Weekly.—[Com.]

TAKE YOUR DYEING AND CLEANING to the New York Dyeing and Printing Establisement, Staten Island; 98 Duane St., 752 Broadway, and 610 Sixth Ave., New York; 164 and 166 Pierrepont St., Brooklyn; 40 North Eighth St., Phila.—[Com.]

PEARLS.

THERE is no greater delusion in its way than the notion that the Romans or any other manufacturers have really succeeded in imitating the exquisite polish and soft iridescent lustre of a truly fine pearl. The "Pearl of great price" which was selected eighteen centuries ago as the type of the inimitable in beauty and worth, still remains inimitable. Is the pearl a disease of the oyster? The poets, who have traded on this idea extensively, would probably murder us if we threw doubt upon it. Or is it, as is now supposed by the naturalists, the pearl oyster's way of ridding himself of some intruding bore by overlaying the bore with a deposit of organic matter and carbonate of lime? The reader who will go with us into the establishment of Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, 22 John St. (up stairs), and inspect with us there the wonderful softness, smoothness, polish of the truly "pearly pearls" which they have brought together, will lose, we fear, his scientific interest about the formation of the pearl in his æsthetic admiration of the pearl as formed. He will be in good company. The pearl has held the highest place among ornaments in the estimation of mankind for untold ages. Job and Cleopatra, Solomon and Pliny agreed in their appreciation of its worth and beauty. It was a poetic fancy of Pliny that pearls were simply dew-drops which the oyster had swallowed. How the oyster got at the dew-drops the Roman naturalist does not seem to have troubled himself to guess. The Roman ladies were so fond of them that under the Empire fine pearls were bought at prices which fairly stagger modern belief. It was these Roman ladies who invented the "solitaire" ear-drops, of which our own dames and damsels are so fond. They wore them of pearls, not of diamonds, but called them by the same name, "Unio."—[Com.]

THE WAY TO SAVE MONEY AND HEALTH.—The hot weather of summer is a sore trial to the wives and mothers who have a family to sew for and no sewing-machine to do it with. There is no excuse, however, for any family, however poor, remaining long without a sewing-machine, when the Improved Wilson is for sale so cheap, and on such easy terms. Let it be clearly understood that the Wilson is in every respect a first-class machine, but being made by a company not in the great "Ring," it is sold at a fair price, which every one who needs a machine can afford to pay. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

DRS. STRONG'S Remedial Institute of Saratoga Springs, N. Y., in addition to the facilities of ordinary practice in the treatment of ladies and gentlemen suffering from various chronic diseases, combines, also, the Turkish Bath, Electro Thermal Bath, Sulphur Air Bath, Russian Bath, Swedish Movement Cure, Vacuum Treatment, Health Lift, Oxygen, Gymnastics, Hydropathy, Inhalation, Mineral Springs. Rev. Dr. T. L. CUYLER says: "I know of no institution which I can so cordially commend to those who are suffering from the various ills that American womanhood is heir to." Bishop J. T. PECK writes: "Every appliance for the treatment of disease which skill can invent or money can furnish is at the disposal of their patients." Send for a circular.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR
MOTH PATCHES,
Freckles, & Tan,
USE
PERRY'S MOTH & FRECKLE LOTION.

It is reliable and harmless.

Depot, 49 Bond St., NEW YORK.

Sold by Druggists everywhere.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

TO THE LADIES!

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING
Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.
No lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.
B. F. BROWN & Co., Boston.

WALTHAM WATCHES
FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.

To get full particulars, write as follows:

Howard & Co.,
No. 865 Broadway, New York.
Please send me your Descriptive Price-List of Waltham Watches as per advertisement in Harper's Bazar.
(Sign name and address in full.)

This we will send by return mail, and from it you will obtain full information in regard to all the Watches, with prices of each; it also describes our plan of sending Watches by Express to any place, with bill to collect on delivery, with privilege to examine the Watch before paying the bill. Address

HOWARD & CO.,
No. 865 Broadway, New York.

WEBSTER'S PATENT
Button-hole Worker.

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

It is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented! So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, together with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

ANDREWS'S
DRESSMAKER'S GAUGE,
For cutting flounces and Trimmings of all kinds from one to eighteen inches wide. An article long needed. Those that are using them would not be without them. Sent to any address, C. O. D., for $3.
WM. R. ANDREWS,
134 Belleville Ave., Newark, N. J.

HAIR!!!
L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,
Between 4TH and GREAT JONES STS.
The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.
Import and manufacture their own Goods, and RETAIL THEM AT WHOLESALE PRICES.
PRICE-LIST.
Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00
Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.
Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.
BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.
Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, charges prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.
N. B.—Through the immense increase of business, we will remove to the more commodious building, 364 Bowery, cor. 4th St., after 1st of May, 1873.

GRENADINES, GRENADINES.
WARRANTED PURE SILK & WOOL.
200 PIECES 2 YARDS WIDE, $1 25, $1 35, $1 50, $1 75, $2 00, and $2 50.
BLACK SILKS,
$1 25, $1 50, $1 75, $2 00, $2 25, $2 50, $2 75, $3; good bargains. CANNELE-STRIPE SILKS, $1 25, worth $1 75.
ALPACAS, ALPACAS,
40c. and 50c.; worth 50c. and 65c.
JACKSON'S,
Cor. BROADWAY AND WAVERLEY PLACE.

HEMSTITCHING ATTACHMENT.
Price $2 00. Sent C. O. D. Address, giving name of machine, JOHN H. WILLSON, 91 Liberty St., N. Y.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S HOSIERY,
IN
ENGLISH, FRENCH, AND GERMAN MANUFACTURE.
REAL AND IMITATION BALBRIGGAN.
PLAIN & FANCY SILK & LISLE THREAD HOSE.
HALF AND ¾ SOCKS IN SILK, LISLE THREAD, AND COTTON.
OPERA HOSE in SILK AND LISLE THREAD.
UNDERWEAR IN SILK, LISLE THREAD, AND GAUZE.
GENTLEMEN'S UNDERWEAR,
In SILK, LISLE THREAD, BALBRIGGAN, GAUZE, GOSSAMER, & SCARLET CASHMERE, &c., &c.
HOSIERY.
PLAIN and FANCY HALF HOSE in SILK, LISLE THREAD, and COTTON.
ALSO, A LARGE ASSORTMENT OF
GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING GOODS.
"CHOSSON'S" KID, and GANT de SUEDE GLOVES. All colors, in 2, 3, and 4 Buttons.
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTING DEPARTMENT.
Misses and Children's Pique Suits and Dresses.
Do. do. Cloth Sacques & Walking-Coats.
Do. do. Sailor Suits, &c., &c.
INFANT'S GOODS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.
A large assortment of
LADIES' FRENCH AND THEIR OWN WELL-KNOWN MANUFACTURED
UNDERCLOTHING.
WEDDING TROUSSEAUX a specialty.
MORNING WRAPPERS of every description.
A full line of IMPORTED CORSETS, HOOP-SKIRTS, BUSTLES, &c., &c.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

SPRING NOVELTIES.
A. T. STEWART & CO.
ARE OFFERING
100 PIECES BRIGHT GRISAILLE SILKS, in designs not hitherto shown, at $1 per yard.
Also, a fresh importation of the
LEADING NOVELTIES IN FANCY SILKS.
The latest new colorings in DRESS SILKS will be offered, commencing at $2 per yard.
Vigogne Beize and a variety of novel textures in DRESS GOODS, JUST RECEIVED, will be exhibited at exceedingly low prices, and in an immense variety of styles.
They will make their first display of
BLACK IRON GRENADINES,
both plain and rich satin-striped, SOME VERY ELEGANT, together with all desirable fabrics for MOURNING ATTIRE.
BLACK ALPACAS of unusual good value, in every grade, from 35c. per yard.
RIBBONS.
They will offer 100 cartons of elegant and costly, plain, colored, and fancy PARIS QUALITY RIBBONS, at 25c., 30c., 45c. per yard, a large portion of which are cheap at $1.
PALMETTO HATS, with the newest shapes in imported straw and fine chip, will be exhibited in the RIBBON DEPARTMENT,
Tenth Street section.
An elegant assortment of Paris and New York made HATS, BONNETS,
FEATHERS,
FLOWERS, &c.
100 DOZEN
TWILL SILK NECK-TIES,
In fresh and new colors, at 45c. each, with a large line of Sash Ribbons, at 75c., value $1 25.
Extraordinary bargains.
BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

LADIES' TROUSSEAU "C"
FOR $250.

6 Muslin Chemises	@	$2 25	$13 50
6 Linen "	@	4 75	28 50
1 Bridal Set (3 pieces)			20 00
6 Pairs Muslin Drawers	@	2 25	13 50
6 " Linen "	@	3 50	21 00
3 Plain Cotton Skirts	@	2 25	6 75
3 Tucked " "	@	3 00	9 00
3 " " "	@	3 50	10 50
1 Underskirt			6 50
3 Muslin Night Dresses	@	4 50	13 50
3 Tucked Cambric Night Dresses	@	5 75	17 25
3 Embr'd " " "	@	9 00	27 00
2 Embroidered Flannel Skirts	@	7 00	14 00
3 Corset Covers	@	5 00	15 00
2 Dressing Sacques	@	4 75	9 50
1 " Sacque Embr'd			7 50
1 Robe de Chambre			17 00
			$250 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Trousseau "A," for $150, and "B," for $200, sent by mail if desired.
LORD & TAYLOR,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN
FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,
NEW YORK, {Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

SHOPPING
Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N. Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

MADAME MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, No. 423 Sixth Avenue, has just received from Paris the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats, selected by herself, from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

1873. NOTICE. 1873.
OUR CELEBRATED BUFFALO

AND OTTER

TRADE MARK PAT'D.
BRANDS
BLACK ALPACAS,
AND
BEAVER BRAND.

SILK FINISHED
Black Pure Mohairs
ARE HANDSOMER THAN EVER FOR SPRING WEAR.
These Beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Dry-Goods Retailers throughout the United States.
☞ Purchasers will know these goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece, bearing a picture of the Buffalo, Otter, or Beaver.
PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 and 429 Broadway,
305 Canal and 47 Howard Sts.,
New York.
SOLE IMPORTERS.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:
1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.
2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.
3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.
4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.
NOTICE.
Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.
The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

20 Sheets of Choice Music, $1 00.
Why throw away money on high-priced Music when you can select from our Catalogue of 700 pieces? Any 20 Half-Dime, or 10 of Dime Series mailed on receipt of One Dollar. Sold by all booksellers, and can be ordered through any newsdealer. Send stamp for Catalogue. Address
BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
439 THIRD AVENUE, NEW YORK.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE
Manufactured by the Florence Sewing Mach. Co. The simplest, cheapest, and best in use! Has but one needle! A Child can run it. Agents wanted in every town. Send for Circular and Sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

A PAIR OF BEST TWO-BUTTON KID GLOVES sent postpaid for $1 00. Three pair for $2 75; Twelve pair for $10 00. Every color and size. Real Laces, samples of Sash Ribbons and Dress Trimmings sent free on application.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 Eighth Ave., Bet. 27th and 28th Sts., New York.

Hosted by Google

LADIES' MUSLIN UNDERGARMENTS,

MADE IN SUPERIOR STYLE, OF THE BEST STANDARD MUSLINS, TRIMMED WITH FAST-EDGE EMBROIDERY, SEWED ON LOCK-STITCH MACHINES, AT PRICES THAT SPEAK FOR THEMSELVES.

LADIES' CHEMISES.

Corded band, front, and sleeves, at 73c.
Trimmed with ruffle on band, front, and sleeves, at 95c.
Corded band, front, and sleeves, trimmed with ruffle or tape, at $1 05.
Six-row cording on band, front, and sleeves, at $1 25.
Medallion bosom of French tucking, with crochet edge, at $1 45.
Tucked front and back, corded band, front, and sleeves, at $1 50.
Bosom of alternate puffing and embroidery, band, front, and sleeves trimmed with ruffle, at $1 50.
Pointed bosom of bias tucking, needlework front, band and sleeves trimmed with embroidery, at $1 70.
Tucked front and back, band, front, and sleeves trimmed with embroidery, at $1 75.
Bosom of six clusters of narrow tucks, embroidered front, band, and sleeves, at $1 92.
Bosom "en pointe" of alternate bias tucking and embroidery, band, front, and sleeves trimmed with embroidery, at $1 95.
Sacque Chemise, bosom "en pointe" of bias tucking and needlework insertion, band and sleeves trimmed with embroidery, at $2 00.
Bosom in double points of alternate tucking and embroidery, needlework edge on band and sleeves, at $2 45.
Yoke Chemise, bosom "en pointe" of alternate needlework, straight and bias tucking, band, front, and sleeves trimmed with embroidery, at $2 75.
Pointed bosom of alternate lace and cambric puffing, band, front, and sleeves trimmed with Valenciennes, at $3 10.
Linen Chemise, corded band, front, and sleeves, at $1 89.
Linen Chemise, embroidered band, front, and sleeves, at $3 45.
Linen Chemise, pointed bosom, broad band of needlework down the front, embroidered band and sleeves, at $3 85.

☞ Send measure of band and sleeves.

LADIES' DRAWERS.

Six tucks, with tape edging or ruffle, at 60c.
Six tucks, wide hem, needlework edge, at 87c.
Two clusters of five tucks each, broad hem, at 90c.
Eleven fine tucks, with ruffle, at $1 00.
Two clusters of five tucks each, needlework edge, at $1 15.
Two clusters of tucks, needlework insertion and edge, at $1 25.
Two clusters of tucks, wide insertion of bias tucking, needlework edge, at $1 40.
Four fine tucks, a two-inch wide insertion of eight alternate clusters of tucks, needlework edge, at $1 50.
Turkish Drawers, four tucks, needlework insertion, three tucks on the band, needlework edge, at $1 70.
Half-Turkish Drawers, tucking and embroidery inserted in points, corded band, needlework edge, at $1 95.
Three tucks, a 2¼-inch wide insertion of alternate tucks and embroidery, needlework edge, at $2 00.
Linen Drawers, six tucks and hem, at $2 00.
Linen Drawers, six tucks, needlework edge, at $2 65.

☞ Send length and size of band.

LADIES' SKIRTS.

Ten tucks and broad hem, at $1 00.
Ten tucks and broad ruffle, at $1 20.
Two clusters of five tucks each, with ruffle, at $1 25.
Three clusters of four, five, and six tucks each, with hem, at $1 40.
Four tucks, broad six-inch plaiting, at $1 75.
Ten tucks, with cambric flounce seven inches wide, at $1 75.

REAL LACES AND DRESS TRIMMINGS.

FINE MILLINERY GOODS.

Ten tucks, two seven-inch cambric flounces, at $2 25.
Three alternate clusters of four, five, and six tucks each, with alternate cambric ruffles, at $2 50.
Three clusters of three, four, and five tucks each, broad needlework edge, at $3 00.
Two clusters of three tucks each, two rows of embroidery, at $3 90.
Six wide tucks, a four-inch wide insertion of bias tucking, needlework edge, at $4 00.
Richer styles, at $4 25, $5 00, $5 50, $6 00, and $7 00.
Train Skirts at $2 20, $4 00, $7 00, $12 00, and $15 00.
Under-Skirts at 80c., $1 00, $1 25, $1 70, $1 90, $2 00, and $3 25.

☞ Send length and size of band.

LONG NIGHT DRESSES.

Double yoke, front and back, trimmed with lace or ruffles, at $1 25.
Tucked yoke, back and front, at $1 38.
Tucked and ruffled full length, neat collar, at $1 75.
Double yoke, trimmed with ruffle, superior finish, at $1 85.
Tucked yoke, collar and sleeves, needlework front, trimmed with cluny lace, at $2 00.
Heavily tucked yoke and collar, with needlework edge, at $2 85.
Heavily tucked yoke, back and front, broad embroidered band down the front, trimmed with needlework, at $3 50.
Yoke, collar, and sleeves trimmed deep with alternate clusters of tucks, cambric puffing, and needlework, at $4 15.
Yoke of alternate clustered tucks and embroidery, tucked and embroidered collar and sleeves, trimmed with needlework, at $4 25.
Richer styles, at $4 50, $5 00, $5 50, $5 75, and $7 00.
Linen Night-Dress, four clusters of tucks and needlework insertion down the front, embroidered collar and sleeves, at $7 50.

☞ Send measure of neck, shoulders, and bust, and the length.

CORSET COVERS,

At 75c., 85c., $1 25, $1 67, $2 25, and $3 60.

TOILET SACQUES,

At $1 00, $1 50, $2 25, $2 40, $2 50, $2 75, $3 25, $4 85, and $5 25.

SPECIAL ATTENTION given to Bridal Trousseaux.
Bridal Setts of three, four, and five pieces, at $6 95, $7 65, $9 65, $10 80, $11 50, $12 50, $14 00, $18 00, $28 00, and $40 00.

OUR INFANTS' DEPARTMENT

is the most complete in the country. Our styles are the choicest, our prices are the cheapest.

INFANTS' LINEN SHIRTS,

At 40c., 45c., 75c., $1 25, $1 50, $2 10, and $2 25.
Fine Flannel Barrow Coats, well made, at $1 50.

ELEGANT VARIETY

Of fine Flannel and Merino Shawls, Flannel Skirts, Merino Sacques, Infants' Slips, Robes, Day Dresses, Muslin Skirts, Infants' Waists, Bibs, Lace Caps, Marseilles Cloaks and Dresses, Baby-Baskets, &c.

☞ Minute descriptions of the above articles will be found in our Spring Price-List, which will be sent free on application.

LADIES' SUITS.

Grass Linen Suit, trimmed with ruffle and flounce, at $2 50.
Better qualities at $3 50, $4 00, $5 00, $6 25, $7 00, $8 00, $9 00, and upward.
Real Linen Suit, richly trimmed, at $10 00, $12 00, $16 50 $21 00, up to $40 00.
White Lawn and Swiss Suits, trimmed with wide ruffling and flounce, at $2 75, $3 75, $4 75, $5 50, $6 00, $7 50, $8 00 and $10 00.
Black Alpaca Suits, ranging from $5 00 to $50 00.
Children's Suits, neatly trimmed, from 75c. to $3 00.
We have a vast variety of styles in our Suit Department, and will fill all orders with fidelity and dispatch.

☞ Send measure of bust and waist, width of shoulders, length of back, skirt, and sleeves.

LADIES' WRAPPERS.

1. Cut Sacque or "Gabrielle," collar, pockets, and sleeves trimmed with ruffling, at $1 50.
2. Bias Flounce, cut "Gabrielle," ruffle full length, at $1 65.
3. Bias band down front and around skirt, at $1 85.
4. Tight-fitting "Gabrielle," bias band, at $2 25.

These Wrappers are all made of fine Merrimac Shirting, warranted fast colors, and are exceedingly well made.

☞ Send measure of front, back, and sleeves.

FULL ASSORTMENT OF

Ladies' Lawn and Delaine Wrappers, Ladies' Cashmere Cloaks and Sacques, Lace Shawls and Sacques, and Parasols.

CORSETS AND PANIERS.

A vast assortment at reasonable rates.

OUR MILLINERY DEPARTMENT

is replete with a rich assortment of Ribbons, Flowers, Laces, Trimmed and Untrimmed Hats. We can furnish Trimmed Hats at half the regular prices. Describe the style you wish, and we will try to please you.

EMBROIDERIES.

Over 100,000 yards, warranted fast edge, at 8c., 10c., 12c., 15c., 16c., 18c., up to $1 50.

☞ Send for samples.

REAL LACES,

of our own importation.

LARGE VARIETY

of Dress Trimmings, made-up Lace Goods, Kid Gloves, Handkerchiefs, Gents' Furnishing Goods, Jewelry, &c., &c.

GOODS SHIPPED TO ANY PART OF THE COUNTRY.

EVERY C. O. D. PACKAGE SUBJECT TO EXAMINATION BEFORE ACCEPTANCE.

All Orders Filled Promptly and Faithfully.

SEND STAMP FOR SPRING PRICE-LIST.

EHRICH'S TEMPLE OF FASHION, 287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, N. Y.

If you want the Choicest, most Fragrant, and Delicate ever imported, and all distilled from natural flowers, ask for the NEW EXTRACTS of the CROWN PERFUMERY CO., of London.

PERFUMES

THE WILD FLOWERS OF INDIA,
BUTTERFLY ORCHIS,
MEADOW QUEEN,
HAWTHORN BLOOM,
MATHIOLA,
CROWN BOUQUET,
and 25 others.

Names copyrighted and Trade-Mark registered. For sale by all First-class Druggists.

THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO., Sole Ag'ts for U. S. and Canadas.

A BRAVE BOOK,

"WHAT WOMAN SHOULD KNOW."

A Woman's Book about Women, by a Woman (Mrs. E. B. DUFFEY).

The ONLY work of the kind ever written BY A WOMAN; is a necessity in every household; its entire novelty and eminent PRACTICALNESS will create an IMMENSE DEMAND. Notwithstanding the delicate subjects necessarily treated, it is written in such BRAVE, PURE style as will not offend the most fastidious. LADY agents never have had such an opportunity to make money and do good. Terms and sample sheets mailed free on immediate application. J. M. STODDART & CO., Philadelphia.

Write for Large Illustrated Descriptive Price-List to

Double, Single, Muzzle and Breech-Loading Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, Pistols, &c., of every kind, for men or boys, at very low prices. Guns, $3–$300; Pistols, $1–$25.

NOVELTY PRINTING-PRESSES.

The Best yet Invented FOR AMATEUR & BUSINESS PURPOSES, And Unsurpassed for General Job Printers.

OVER 8000 IN USE.

BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer,

And Dealer in Every Description of

PRINTING MATERIAL,

349-351 Federal & 152 Kneeland Sts., Boston; Branch Store, 543 Broadway & 88 Mercer St., N. Y. Agents, Kelly, Howell, & Ludwig, Philadelphia; J. F. Edwards, St. Louis, Mo.; A. C. Kellogg, Chicago, Ill. Send for Pamphlet.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

BAZAR Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

$20 A DAY FOR MEN AND WOMEN who take the money for "THE LADIES' CASKET"—a beautiful Box with gold edges and clasp—4 by 2¾ inches—Book style—contains $1 12 worth of articles of daily use. Is new—sells at sight. One sample for 60 cents, or two styles for $1 00, postpaid, with circulars. Address

CITY NOVELTY CO.,
Pennsylvania Ave., Philadelphia, Pa.

A GREAT OFFER FOR APRIL!!

Horace Waters & Son, 481 B'way, N. Y., will dispose of 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS of first-class makers, including Waters's, at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES FOR CASH, during THIS MONTH. New 7-octave PIANOS, modern improvements, for $250 and $275 cash. THE WATERS CONCERTO PARLOR ORGANS are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Prices at bargains for cash. Monthly installments received, running from one to three years. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

SEYMOUR'S SHEARS & SCISSORS.

"The Best are the Cheapest."

Extra Quality. Crocus Polish.

Sold Everywhere. State where you saw this when you write.

Family Size, - - $1.50
Ladies' Scissors, - 1.00
By mail, prepaid. Send P. O. Order or Draft.

HENRY SEYMOUR & CO., 29 Rose St., New York.

SILENT FORTUNE TELLER.

"The Bewitched Cross" is silent and dumb, yet by motion it answers questions. Tells present, past, and future events faithfully. Full of fun, mystery, and amazement. Sent by mail on receipt of 50 cents. Address W. T. MICHELL, Box 3001, P. O., N. Y. City.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

WOOD CARPETING,

942 BROADWAY.

Send Stamp for Designs.

WEIRD AND WONDERFUL "APPARITION RINGS." The greatest optical puzzle and delusion ever produced—absolutely inexplicable. They puzzle EVERY BODY. 38 silvered rings scientifically combined. The greatest "WONDER OF THE WORLD." Sent free, boxed, and full directions, prepaid, for 30 cents. Can be had only from Hunter & Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

GIVEN AWAY. A beautiful paper which you have to wait a year for, but with the Eureka Chromo Casket the latest novelty of the day, and agents are selling it with astonishing rapidity. One of our agents taking 104 orders in 1 day, and others are doing equally as well. It is new and original so there is no competition. It is so beautifully packed it sells at sight. Is novel, attractive and cheap also, with it is given an Oil Chromo 8x10 inches. To any parties who wish we will send full descriptive circular of both Casket & Chromos. Now is your time to make money. Samples of Casket and also a Chromo will be sent post paid for $1.25. Send for our new 64 page catalogue. Sent Free post paid. BOND. MARTIN & CO. SPRINGFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS.

A LADY OF REFINEMENT and ABILITY, about to proceed to Europe for the purpose of completing the education of her only daughter, would be glad to undertake the charge of other three young ladies with a similar object, to whom she would afford the watchful care of a mother. Unexceptionable references. Apply by letter to

A. G. C., P. O. Box 959, N. Y. City.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

WORKING CLASS, MALE OR FEMALE, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Cortlandt St., N. Y.

Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 532 B'dway, N. Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

---

12 for 50 cts., by BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS mailed C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

AN enterprising Scotchman left last week for Egypt, where he hopes to be able to arrange for a five years' lease of the Pyramids, and then to charge for exhibiting them.

We owe this excellent conundrum to a clever contemporary:

Why is the 16th of March an unlucky wedding-day?—Because there is not a single happy marriage in Middlemarch.

A chap who in some mysterious manner had received a bid to a large and fashionable party was somewhat disconcerted on finding that he was not acquainted with a single person present—nor a double one either. Finally he perceived an elderly gentleman of disconsolate mien looking over a photographic album. Our hero made for this party of the second part, and said:

"I say, you and I don't seem to know any body here. Let's go home!"

It was the head of the house!

A young yachtsman writes to ask what is the proper season for pitching his boat. Take it out the next rough day and manage it yourself; the wind will soon pitch it over for you.

When is a dog like a fixed doctrine?—When it is a dog-ma.

DON'T YOU SEA?—An ingenious youth presented himself at a fancy dress ball in ordinary evening costume, but described himself as impersonating Ocean. On being asked how he represented Ocean, he explained that he had "creeky" boots.

ÆSTHETIC WITH A VENGEANCE.

TOM. "I say, Old Man, now you've got that stunning House of yours, you ought to be looking out for a Wife!"
RODOLPHUS. "Quite so. I was thinking of one of those Misses Gibson, don't you know—"
TOM. "Ah! Let me recommend the Tall one, Old Man. She'll make the best Wife in the World!"
RODOLPHUS. "Quite so. But the Short one seems to Harmonize better with the kind of Furniture I go in for—Buhl and Marqueterie, don't you know."

"IT'S AN ILL WIND," ETC.

BROWN. "Hullo, Jones! What's the matter?"

JONES (amateur tenor). "Oh, dreadful chronic inflammation of the larynx! Lost my voice entirely!"

BROWN. "Dear me! you don't mean that?"

JONES. "Yes—been compelled to give up singing altogether!"

BROWN (with alacrity). "By George, look here, old fellow! Come and dine with us to-night, and spend the evening."

What shell-bearing creature resembles a circus horse?—The taught-hoss.

The following toast was pronounced at a firemen's dinner, and was received with great applause: "The ladies—their eyes kindle the only flame against which there is no insurance."

Where might you expect to find a cow's pedigree?—In a cattle-log.

Why is the opera Geneviève de Brabant like a profitable ship?—Because it has a good run, and is Offenbach (often back).

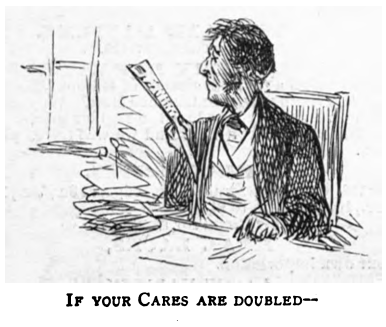
Speculation is unlimited in its scope, as the following bit of recent talk suggests:

"Well, but you're not the boy I left my horse with."

"No, Sir, I just speckilated, and bought 'im off t'other boy for six cents."

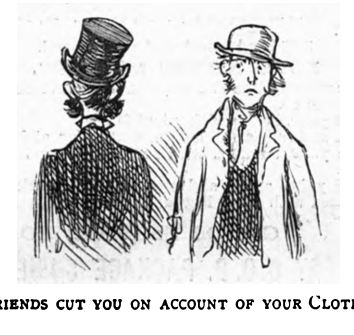
The young one had an older hand at finance to deal with, as he thereupon handed the boy five cents. The youth was equal to the occasion, for he hung on to the horse out of revenge till the proprietor could satisfy him that he was the rightful owner.

COMFORT FOR THE MARRIED MAN.

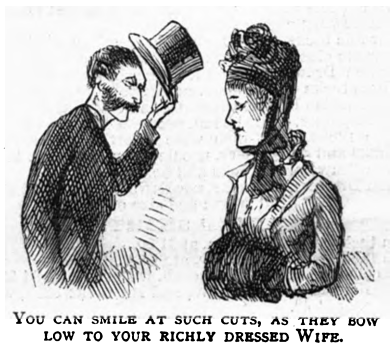


IF YOUR CARES ARE DOUBLED—

SO ARE ALSO YOUR BLESSINGS.



IF FRIENDS CUT YOU ON ACCOUNT OF YOUR CLOTHES—

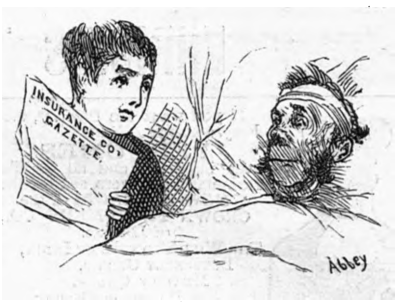


YOU CAN SMILE AT SUCH CUTS, AS THEY BOW LOW TO YOUR RICHLY DRESSED WIFE.

IF YOU CAN'T JOIN THE COMPANY WITH YOUR WIFE—

YOU CAN IMAGINE HOW HAPPY SHE IS.

AND IF YOU ARE SICK, YOU HAVE A HOME, AND A WIFE WHO



SOOTHES YOUR PAIN WITH ENDEARING WORDS ABOUT THE NECESSITY OF GETTING YOUR LIFE INSURED AS SOON AS YOU GET WELL—IF YOU DO.

PRAYING FOR FINE WEATHER.—A worthy and well-known Scotch clergyman took a view of this matter entirely parochial. A deputation of his parishioners having waited on him to ask him to read the prayers for fine weather, he replied that he did not see the need of it, as all of them had got in their wheat with the exception of Mr. ——, and as he had only ten acres to sow, that was of little consequence, and so he would have the extra prayer to read for nothing. A Highland minister having been requested by his flock to pray for better weather, and being at the same time warned to be cautious in presenting his petition, because the last time he prayed for better weather it became worse, thus expressed himself: "An' noo, Lord, I hae a petition to present, but I maun be unco wary o' the wordin' o't. Ye ken, Lord, the kittle state the craps are in. Just send us a soughin', southern, dreein' breeze as 'ill save the strae and winna harm the heed; for if ye send a tearin', reevin' thunderin' storm, as ye did the last time I prayed for gude weather, ye'll play the mischief wi' the aits, and fairly spoil a'."

"Never again with you, Robin," as the convicted thief said to his accomplice.

APPLE-LY WORDED.—A well-known pomologist was heard to assert the other day, apropos of our first parents, that they would have been a happy pear if it had not been for the medlar.

"Well, Doctor, how do you like Angelina's Dress?"
"What there is of it is admirable for our business, Ma'am—a splendid Contractor of Coughs and Colds."

PLEASURES OF HOPE.

Giving sixpence to an organ-grinder, when you are hard at head-work, in the illusive hope of purchasing his silence, and then finding him repeating his call regularly at precisely the same hour, and playing with marked emphasis close before your door-step.

Running errands for your aunt and petting her asthmatic pug-dog, in the hope that at her death you will be liberally rewarded, and discovering, after all, that she has lived on an annuity, and died very nearly penniless.

Putting off and putting off a call upon your coal merchant in the vain and feeble hope of prices coming down, and finding, in the end, that the greatest rise has happened exactly on the day when you are burning your last scuttleful, and are compelled to give an order.

Hurrying home to dinner with a splendidly fine appetite, which you can not avoid hoping will be worthily appeased, and, alas! discovering that the pièce de résistance is cold mutton.

Hailing a passing cab in the hope to catch your train, for which you are already late, and finding that the horse is an incorrigible balker.

What an ass the fellow must have been who made a donkey-engine and expected to get horse-power out of it!

Lame verses should always be bound in limp cloth.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 16.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

THE PERSONNEL OF POETS.

ANY one who studies the faces of such poets as are to be seen must come to the conclusion that Lavater could not have been altogether wrong in his theories, for there is hardly one among the number about whose countenance some distinguishing trait of his profession is not to be found, whether it is owing to the outflashing of native genius or the habit of expression of that thought which dwells in the ideal.

Tennyson's face is as precisely the face of a poet as if a painter had divined it out of all the logical sequences of the facial lines that should follow the poetic fancies: tall, gaunt, near-sighted, and deep-voiced, yet the blowing hair and the dreamy eye and the smile that is half a frown are as much the transcript of a poem as any other symbolical writing could be. Browning's face, also, is all that a poet's should be painted: brilliant it was in his youth as though it looked out of a star; now the dark hair is heavily tinged with the gray that it acquired under the constant anxiety concerning his wife's health which he suffered in the early part of his married life. It is he whom Charlotte Cushman once described, with an upward rolling of the hands, as being like the perpetual bubble of a tossing fountain.

Longfellow's face, though age has quite silvered the hair and beard, and though it is both weaker and handsomer than those above mentioned, has still the starry and distant gaze that tells his race as much as, according to Borrow, the spark in the gypsy's eye tells the zincali strain. James Russell Lowell's face, some ten years ago, was perhaps the most purely poetical of any then living; the blue eye had some of heaven's fire in it, the yellow hair was parted over a white forehead, and the yellow beard beneath glowed as if every thread of it were alive with vitality. Aldrich's face, on the other hand, is like moonlight to Lowell's sunlight: a fair brow, with the fair curling hair parted over it, large light gray eyes, and delicate features, making a combination of much beauty, and such as one might call up with the thought of poetry.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe's face has this same moon-lighted quality, which some one has likened to the light of a lamp within an alabaster vase—a face not altogether attractive in the full view, but as beautiful as sculpture in the profile. Florence Percy also is of the same fair-haired order, with the same poetic spark in the dark and long-lashed eye; and Norah Perry, charming singer of charming songs, has a face, set in its crown of perfectly golden hair, quite as tell-tale in its way. Celia Thaxter's face, quite opposite in lines and tints from these, dark-eyed and clear, has something in its features and expression as harmonious as the sea ripplings that run through her songs like refrains. Alice Cary's, pale, dark-eyed, and dark-haired, was more strikingly illustrative still—a spiritual, saintly face that suffering made fit for an aureole; and Lucy

Fig. 1.—IRISH POPLIN HOUSE DRESS. BACK.—[See Fig. 5.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 27–36.

Fig. 2.—SWISS MUSLIN FIRST COMMUNION DRESS.—BACK.—[See Fig. 4.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 37–41.

Fig. 3.—POULT DE SOIE CONFIRMATION DRESS.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—SWISS MUSLIN FIRST COMMUNION DRESS.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 37–41.

Fig. 5.—IRISH POPLIN HOUSE DRESS. FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 27–36.

FIGS. 1–5.—CONFIRMATION, FIRST COMMUNION, AND HOUSE DRESSES.

Hosted by Google

Larcom's has that same harmonious combination—a handsome face, that lights up in dimples when it smiles, and that seems to display a large and luxuriant nature, with a large and generous heart.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, though usually classed among the philosophers, has much more right among the poets, and could claim his place by reason of his face with any of the rest: a strange, large-boned face it is, that at first glance you would pronounce the very picture of the typical Yankee, but at the second glance you see the Greek grafted on it, and both the head and face become ideal.

Whittier in his youth is said to have had a surprising beauty of face; but now, though the tall form stoops a little and the sparse hair and the beard are iron gray, the eye is left to speak for the poet—an eye that speaks as if the messenger of heaven, instead of touching his lips with the live coal of inspiration, had kindled the great black eyes themselves.

Nathaniel Hawthorne's face, however, though he was not technically a poet, was as expressive of his genius as any face we ever saw; and after his hair became gray those large and deep olive brown eyes looked out on you as if a heaven full of sad autumnal sunshine were glowing behind them. Again, there is Walt Whitman's face, exceedingly characteristic in its own way: the pale blue eye beams over a ruddy freshness of countenance, which is prematurely set in silver, and young as the face is, it overflows with a sort of patriarchal wisdom and a real genius. William Morris is another poet with whom the action of a heated brain has too early sprinkled the hair—immense masses there are of it on an immense head; for the rest, there are fine bold features and an eagle eye: the face of the forger of a ringing metal of music rather than the dreamer of the sweet and sleepy strains of the Earthly Paradise.

A face very satisfactory to the theory that the nature betrays itself therethrough is Algernon Swinburne's. The upper part of it is as noble and grand and white as the ideal of a great poet; the lower part small and weak, and perhaps sensual. To see the upper part alone, you would easily recognize in him the author of the magnificent chorus of spring in the Atalanta; to see the lower part, you might be sure those lips would sing the song of the leper in Laus Veneris.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1873.

☞ WITH the next Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent out gratuitously a splendid pictorial and literary containing two finely illustrated stories, and a very choice variety of interesting miscellaneous reading matter.

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

☞ A Cut Paper Pattern of a new and elegant Spring Redingote Walking Suit will be published with our next Number. For a Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement in previous Numbers.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain an extra-sized Pattern-Sheet, with full-sized patterns of a large number of Spring and Summer Mantles, Sacques, Dolmans, Water-Proofs, and other Wrappings for Ladies and Children; House and Street Suits, Wrappers, Fichus, Jackets, Vests, etc., together with choice literary and artistic attractions.

A SOCIAL CUSTOM.

CERTAIN social customs there are existing among us, and among most other of the peoples with whom we walk abreast, that exist, too, not so much from our own preference for them as from the fact that they are customs pre-established and of long vogue, and which, whether we like them or dislike them, probably will continue to exist for ages yet to come.

We do not speak of them to condemn them, but simply to follow the lead of their suggestions, and because we believe in the old apostolic direction to do all things decently and in order. When, then, we find ourselves guests at the full afternoon receptions of women of fashion, what is the feature of these receptions that is forced most strongly on our attention?

In whatever city the receptions are held, we are likely to be in superb rooms, often in historic ones. There are pictures around us on all sides, pictures and bronzes and marbles, into which artists have wrought their lives and their souls, and there are smaller objets de vertu, sometimes the very spoil of palaces: but is it concerning them we talk, around them that we linger? No, indeed; we ignore them; they do not exist for us; perhaps insensibly they add to our comfort with the recognition of luxury and ease they bring, but otherwise we do not see them; we talk, instead, a platitude of the weather, we pass a compliment of the season, and we betake ourselves, with all the grace we may, to the dining-room. Mr. TYNDALL may be building up a science among us, Mr. FROUDE may be dazzling the truth out of the eyes of a continent, Mr. PHILLIPS may be excoriating Mr. FROUDE, emperors may be dying, kingdoms falling, and republics rising; but if we made our conversation of such themes we should be stared at with open eyes and answered with silence; and so we say our trivial say and hasten to the dining-room, where we excuse our appetites by reference to the laborious duties of the day, and commence to feast ourselves as if we had had nothing to eat since yesterday, and expected to have nothing more till to-morrow. But the truth is, we breakfasted at ten; we lunched, before we came out, at two; it is now between four and five in the afternoon, and we dine between six and seven; and yet our plates are being rapidly changed for chicken-salad, or for crustless sandwiches cut into fantastic forms of hearts and lyres, for croquettes or crabs, for terrapin or oysters; and we begin with sherry and end with rum punch, and go to the next house and repeat it all or in part. And meanwhile we are rolling under our tongues morsels as much to our taste apparently as any sweetmeat of them all—spicy tidbits of scandal—and are considering ourselves virtuously magnanimous because we praise the Parisian dress across the room which is so much richer than our own.

The great end of a certain sort of fashionable life appears to be what is termed "calling," and the great end of calling appears to be eating. Eating only? Eating and drinking! It is not long since very fashionable ladies in a neighboring city rebelled in a body against the use of chocolate at the afternoon receptions; and the delicious Spanish drink, sweet and spiced and foaming, full of its rich Southern associations, Castile and Mexico and the Havana distilled in every cup of it, had to be banished from the polite reception, or was only countenanced when seen in company with wines and liqueurs. More lately a highly seasoned tea of beef stock has been introduced from European society, and has found so much favor as to be able to establish itself and maintain its ground, being both strengthening and stimulating, and, while it is a novelty and is fresh from the sanction of real courts, being allowed companionship with the aristocratic draughts whose vinous parentage dates back a couple of thousand years.

Elderly ladies, who might reasonably refresh themselves with the punches, often enough are contented with this pleasant bouillon; and it is the younger ladies, who have danced all the night before, who now fly for comfort to these sweet and fiery concoctions that their elders pass by; and nothing can surpass the loud contemptuousness with which these young ladies will speak of what they classify as a lemonade-party. If it were a poison-party they could give it no severer notice: in fact, they prefer a poison-party. They have been fed on strong meats till they despise the simple claret punch as they do lemonade, and they demand something that shall send a bubble through their veins. It can not be absinthe yet, because they are too near their childhood to have lost a relish for the sweet, or to have acquired one for the bitter: and so into the bowl where lemon and strawberries and pine-apple are floating in a mixture of Verzenay or Rœderer and Hyson tea, the whole well saturated with sugar and old French brandy, or where Jamaica and Otard and Bourbon have mingled their fires—into such a mixture these little creatures, who last year just began to see the world, dip their ladles and come again.

They have just begun to see the world; and under these circumstances they must see it and get through with it pretty quickly. When a young lady has called at half a dozen of such receptions, and at every one has tasted and tasted again some delicious sort of indigestion served on majolica ware, too tired with dancing and excitement to have relish for any less attractive food, and has spurred her stomach to the task at each of the half dozen houses by a glass of these potent cordials; has dined, perhaps with wines too—in what condition is she for the night's German; how likely to hold herself with the proper restraint and decorum; how likely to dance like a Mænad; how well able to maintain modesty and maidenliness, and the charm of her freshness and sweetness!

And after a season of such eating and drinking, to what a state must we fancy our young lady's nervous system reduced! The dancing may have been out of the way only so far as it was in excess; the late hours, balanced by the morning's beauty-sleep, may have been only relatively injurious; but the nerves, fagged out in a perpetual strain, like tired nags on an endless ascent, aggravated, furthermore, by the cruel indigestion of the majolica wares, and then stimulated to desperation by delicious poison, these airy and invisible wretches—the best friends of all the world so long as you treat them well, but the worst tyrants when your own folly obliges them in self-defense to take things into their own hands—have gotten her by the head, have thrown her prostrate in slow fevers and shrieking hysterics, till haggard and livid and trembling, no longer with any inviting bloom of the peach on her fruity flesh, no longer with any sparkle in her eyes, but a prey to a thousand petty torments, a burden to her own soul, and ready for apoplexy or paralysis, or for a worse fate than either of the two. For it requires no violent stretch of the fancy to see what winter after winter of this may bring about—to see the desperate stimulant become an hourly need—to see the career that began so brightly, with the flutter of gauze and of hearts, the dazzle of jewels and of eyes, with music and dancing and blushes and bloom, end in delirium and the grave!

HOW TO UTILIZE BROKEN VICTUALS.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

THE best piece of beef to boil is from the round; it is more economical than either the chuck, neck, or flank pieces.

Warm water is turned over the meat, so as to wash it well; then it is tightly tied with twine (skewers do not answer the purpose) and put in the soup-kettle, with salt, at the first boiling of the water. A little over a quart of water is allowed for a pound of meat. It is then boiled gently for five hours. Some time after the meat is in, the scum that gathers on the surface is carefully skimmed off, and the liquid is seasoned the same as broth, of which we have spoken in a preceding number. When done, the meat is placed on a dish, and the twine removed. The meat is served surrounded with a purée of vegetables—any kind to suit the taste.

It may also be served with fried potatoes, or with a piquante or tomato sauce.

A round piece or rib piece is cooked in the same manner. The larger the piece the better for boiling as well as roasting. If the piece be small, all the juice and part of the flavor escapes.

The liquid in which the meat has been boiled is an excellent broth for soup, sauce, or gravy. If it should not be found rich enough, it may be used the next day instead of water to make broth, as explained in a preceding number.

In order to enable small families to buy large pieces without wasting any, or without being obliged to make several meals off the same piece, we will explain how to prepare cold beef—we mean what is left from the dinner—from a roasted as well as a boiled piece, and for either breakfast, lunch, or dinner.

In Salad.—After trimming the fat and removing the bones, the cold meat is cut in square slices of about two inches in size and one-sixth of an inch thick. It should be cut as much as possible across the grain of the meat. The slices are arranged on the dish in the following or any other way, according to taste or fancy: a slice is placed in the middle of the dish, then other slices are placed around it, forming either a round or an oval figure, according to the shape of the dish, one overlapping another, and so on until the dish is entirely covered. The meat is then covered with parsley chopped fine, the following sauce is spread over the whole, and an excellent dish is ready to serve.

Sauce.—Beat well together in a bowl two or three table-spoonfuls (more or less, according to the quantity of meat) of oil, about half as much of vinegar, salt, pepper, and mustard to suit the taste, and use.

Stewed.—The bottom of an earthen dish that stands fire is buttered inside, a layer of the slices of cold beef is placed in it; then parsley and pickled cucumbers are chopped together, and some of them are spread over the slices, with salt and pepper. The process is repeated two, three, or four times, according to the quantity of beef. A little broth and butter are added, the dish is set on a rather slow fire for about half an hour, and it is ready to be served. It may also be dusted with bread-crumbs, and put in the oven for ten minutes when ready as above, adding a little more broth in case it gets dry.

Hash.—Instead of slicing the meat, chop it, and knead it with baked potatoes, raw eggs, chopped parsley, salt and pepper. A pinch of grated nutmeg may be added, if liked. Work it then into small balls about an inch in diameter, roll these in bread-crumbs, fry them slightly with a little butter, and serve with piquante sauce. If liked, raw onions may be chopped very fine and mixed with the rest.

With Onions.—The slices of cold beef are put in an earthen dish. Sliced onions are fried with butter until of a golden color; then they are dusted with flour, and stirred for a minute or two in the frying-pan; enough water is added to a little more than cover the bottom of the pan; it is simmered until the onions are thoroughly cooked, when they are mashed through a colander, spread over the slices of beef, with salt, pepper, vinegar, and mustard mixed together, put in the oven to warm thoroughly, and served.

With Potatoes, etc.—Proportions: to a pound of beef add two ounces of salt pork, cut in dice; four middling-sized potatoes, each cut in four pieces; salt and pepper; also the following seasonings, tied in a linen rag: a bay leaf, two cloves, three sprigs of parsley, and one of thyme. Place the whole in a saucepan, with cold water enough to half cover it, set it on the fire, and let it simmer gently until the potatoes are cooked. Then add the beef, sliced or cut in dice, give one boil, take off the rag of seasonings, and it is ready.

Broiled.—When the meat is trimmed as above, cut it in slices about half an inch thick, rub both sides slightly with butter, salt and pepper both sides also, and broil. It is done in less than a minute's time, the meat being already cooked. Place it on a warm dish, spread butter, chopped parsley, and a few drops of vinegar all over it, and serve quickly. When broiled as above the slices of meat may be served on a purée of pease, beans, Limas, lentils, or potatoes.

Piquante Sauce.—When the flour is cooked as explained in a preceding number, add about a pint of water or broth, a table-spoonful of chopped onions or shallots, half a gill of vinegar, three stalks of parsley chopped, salt, pepper, a tea-spoonful of chopped pickled cucumber, and the following, tied in a linen rag—a bay leaf, a clove, and a stalk of thyme. Boil gently until the whole is well cooked. If this reduces it too much, add a little warm water or broth. Mustard may also be added, if liked, but only when off the fire. Slices of cold beef may merely be warmed in piquante sauce, and served. The pungency of the onion or shallot, as well as that of garlics, evaporates in cooking. Many deprive themselves of a most excellent and healthful condiment through mere prejudice. If a sauce tastes of onion it is because the onions have not been cooked enough. Such a sauce as the above is very inferior without onions or shallots, as are many others of which we shall speak in future. The pungent taste of the above spices can not be retained in cooking them, even if it were attempted; it is volatile, and the more or longer it is heated, the more it evaporates.

What is left of stewed beef is merely warmed over. If found rather dry, a little broth or piquante sauce, or both, may be added, according to taste.

Fat.—Many buy inferior meat on account of the waste of the fat that is always found in good meat. When the fat is wasted it is the fault of the cook, who does not know how to use it. Some cooks know how to use it, but will not take the trouble to melt it when the mistress allows as much lard and butter as is asked for. The fat skimmed off the broth or boiled meat, and that coming from the trimming of raw or cold beef, is much superior to lard to fry with. Lard flies all over; beef fat never does when properly melted. To melt beef fat or suet, cut it in small pieces, and set on a rather slow fire, in an iron pan. As soon as it begins to melt, skim the melted part off with a ladle, and turn it into a stone jar, which you cover when cold. Put it away in a cool, dry, and dark place. We contend that a careful cook never needs lard for frying purposes, but always has more fat than is necessary out of boiling or roasting pieces.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SPRING BONNETS.

THE Rabagas, with rim turned up all around in sailor fashion, will be the popular bonnet of the season. At exclusive milliners' something newer is offered in the Hortense bonnets and Spanish gypsies, with coronet rims turned up high in front and receding narrower on the sides. Illustrations of these were given in last week's Bazar. These shapely bonnets fit comfortably over the high coiffure, and are worn half-way back on the head, but should not be tilted high enough to give that peaked, perched-up appearance which spoils so many of the new bonnets. The choice for dressy bonnets lies between sewed chip and straws, or else black net bonnets. The trimmings for chip and straw are folds of turquoise silk around the crown, with soft loops on the left side, from which spring ostrich tips and a cluster (not a spray) of flowers. Two long ends of ribbon without loops hang low behind, and the strings to be tied under the chin are of ribbon. The coronet is smoothly covered with silk, or perhaps velvet piped with silk, and has a soft puff or roll of silk, just above the forehead, prettily draped with black lace. Most bonnets have more than one color in the trimming. The new limon, brighter buff than écru, is associated with olive, réséda, sky blue, leaf brown, cerise, and maroon-red with very pretty effect. A bonnet in perfect taste is a chip Hortense, the brim faced with leaf brown velvet, a puff beneath, and a cord of pale limon silk above; brown turquoise folds cross the crown, a cluster of limon dahlias with velvety brown centres is on the side, pale limon ostrich tips and an aigrette of dark cock's plumes are on the back. Two long straight streamers of ribbon are pendent behind, and similar streamers form strings. A similar bonnet has red-maroon turquoise, and limon dahlias with maroon centres. Around the crown is simply a scarf of silk laid in four folds, with short slanting ends edged with black lace. Price $40. For a rosy young face is a chip bonnet with black silk-faced brim, with a pink rose-bud cluster; around the crown are folds of pale blue turquoise, some blue ostrich tips, and a bunch of variegated roses. No strings. Another is a chip Rabagas with upturned brim covered smoothly with velvet; olive brown ribbon is passed around the crown, tea-rose buds and grapes with embrowned leaves are on the sides, lace streamers and two ribbon ends more than a yard long are behind. Price $40.

Hosted by Google

The black net bonnets are of plain Brussels net, dotted net, or else seeded with jet, as fancy dictates. The net is laid smoothly on the frame, the brim is covered with turquoise silk, or else velvet, and the trimmings are laid on precisely as on straw bonnets, though more border lace is used for edging tulle or net streamers than appears on straw. The jet ornaments are almost as light and fine as lace, and the flowers are Boston bouquets, long-stemmed pink roses with heliotropes, or tea-roses with violets, that look as if freshly cut and loosely tied together. Some stately Spanish gypsies show only black in front, pretty mixtures of jet and net, while low down behind is a variegated cluster of roses, crimson, pink, and yellow. A Hortense from Virot's, showing another favorite fancy of black with a color, has a black net crown as smooth and plain as if made of straw, while the brim is covered with pale blue turquoise, and has a thick roll of the silk on the forehead; black turquoise, showing a blue lining, is folded around the crown, and has upturned loops on the left side, from which spring two blue ostrich tips. Two streamers of net, edged with fine thread lace, are arranged in Spanish fashion behind. No strings. Price $60.

VEILS.

New veils are of thread net, with thick dots wrought at intervals. The shape is scarf-like, smooth over the face, pointed far below the chin, and with very long tabs that form drapery behind. In real net, with appliqué Chantilly borders, they cost $18. Spanish blonde is so cheaply imitated that it is losing favor. Square handkerchief veils are objected to by leading milliners because they crush fine feathers and flowers. They are still worn, however, in polka-dotted net with Spanish lace border, are fastened very low behind with a jet or silver pin, and do good service in the way of covering bonnets that have lost their freshness.

MOURNING BONNETS.

Mourning bonnets are of the shapes just described, covered with folds of English crape and dull lustreless turquoise silk. There is a fancy just now for wearing tulle veils over the face, while the long crape veil is gathered into a small space directly behind, and hangs pendent like an immense streamer. When crape veils are worn over the face one end is gathered around the bonnet, and the sides are caught together behind by a jet pin, making the veil hang smooth and close to the sides and face.

CARRIAGE COSTUMES.

A perfectly appointed salon filled with French dresses is the last noteworthy display. The dresses are carriage costumes of faille in two extreme shades of one color, or else in combinations and contrasting hues that are now admired, but would have seemed audacious once. As a rule, the lower part of these costumes is the lightest shade. The skirts train slightly, and are oftenest trimmed with the new "train flounce" that deepens as it curves backward on the train. The over-skirts are partly deep aprons and partly sashes; sometimes they are merely a voluminous sash made of a width of silk draped halfway down the skirt, the edges finished with elaborate fringe tied in the silk. The bodices are exquisite basques of very simple shape, finished with fringe in front and plain behind, showing facings and sash ends of another shade. The close coat sleeves have plain revers cuffs, with a pleating falling over the hand.

To particularize: Take a dress of Nile and myrtle green faille. Around the foot of the light Nile skirt is a deep circular "train flounce," headed by a puff its own width and a myrtle ruffle; this wide ruffle and puff are repeated above on the back breadths, trimming them almost to the waist. In front is a long apron of myrtle, richly fringed, curving short up the sides, and behind is a carelessly disposed scarf-sash, made of a width of the silk, held by dead-gold buckles. Dark green basque with light revers, fringe in front, light facings behind, and light sleeves. This suit is tastefully copied in black silk. A second dress of Napoleon blue and pale-sky color had diagonal stripes forming the front of the lower skirt, train of light blue, dark blue fringed apron, and a dark sash tied low on the train. The basque had a vest of diagonal stripes. Price $400. A dress in contrasts is of mordoré (golden brown), without upper skirt, but draped far below the hips by a sash of pale rose silk—the whole width of the silk laid in easy folds, knotted low on the left, with a gilt buckle in the strap. A costume in quiet taste is a skirt of pale creamy Ophelia silk, with an olive scarf draped to show a light lining. A black silk costume has revers of moiré on the side, and insertions of yak lace in the over-skirt and basque. A very showy suit had Worth's fancy for combining pale blue with olive and the yellow-green serpent-color.

WHITE DRESSES.

Furnishing houses are making up white organdies and Swiss muslins for confirmation dresses, and whole sets in uniform for graduating classes. As these are for young girls, something of simplicity is attempted. The lower skirt is "demi"—a dress-maker's technicality for just touching the ground—and is finished by a deep hem headed by a wide puff and standing Valenciennes lace; the simple round upper skirt is similarly bordered with hem, puff, and lace, and is draped by a side sash of white watered ribbon; the French waist has a puff on the front and neck, with lace frill standing very high; close coat sleeves with two puffs and lace at the wrists. In the Episcopalian service a veil is not used; for the first communion in Catholic churches the veil is of tulle or organdy, caught above the forehead by a wreath or ribbon loops, and falling close on the sides and back. Swiss muslin dresses, with tucked bands and ruffles without lace, cost from $25 to $35. For "sweet girl graduates" are pretty dresses of fine French organdy, with the waist and coat sleeves entirely formed of lengthwise puffs and Valenciennes insertion; the short apron is altogether puffs, and the lower skirt has flounces with puffed heading. These cost from $40 to $125. A less expensive graduating dress is of embroidered muslin (machine-work), skirt with a kilted flounce, and an over-skirt and French waist of puffs separated by Hamburg insertion: price $33. White cambric morning suits, with a polonaise and skirt trimmed with a Hamburg flounce, are $35. Watteau wrappers of fine cross-barred muslin, with deep Spanish flounce finished by three ruffles, are $18 50.

BATISTES AND PERCALES.

Camel's-hair batiste is a novelty, showing the transparent écru surface inwoven with camel's-hair stripes and raised wool figures, palm leaves, bull's-eyes, and bars, in brown or black, like tufted needle-work; this promises to be accepted as polonaises over plain batistes or else silk skirts: prices range from $1 25 to $1 75 a yard. Another stylish caprice is stripes like white Turkish toweling or dark batiste: price $2. All-white rough Turkish batiste is a Parisian fabric difficult to find here. Lace-striped batistes, to be worn over a plain skirt with striped flounces, cost from 50 cents to $1. Plain batistes come in suit patterns of twenty yards, put up in a box, at $1 25 a yard; flimsy imitation batistes are 25 cents a yard. Real batistes are seven-eighths of a yard wide. Imported ready-made polonaises of batiste, trimmed with machine embroidery and fringe, are sold for $23.

The novelties in percales are morning and breakfast sailor suits of deep solid blue with white border. These have a box-pleated blouse, with the white border down on each pleat and around the sailor collar; lengthwise white stripes on the apron over-skirt, and two kilted flounces on the lower skirt bordered with white. Price $20. Pleated blouse-waists to wear with black silk or alpaca skirts are made of dark blue percale with white polka dots. The designs are precisely like the waists worn last year, with shirt sleeves, and standing English collar turned over in front. Price $2 75. Percales and cambrics in striped chintz patterns are made up in breakfast dresses with pleated blouse, round over-skirt, and demi-skirt with a flounce and two bias bands, and sold for $15. Plain cambric wrappers, white with bold stripe of color, or else blue, gray, or mottled grounds with white stripe, are $5; calico wrappers of the same pattern are $3 50.

FOULARD SUITS.

Foulard suits of the stylish deep blue and olive grounds with white spots are exhibited at the furnishing houses. Made with a jockey basque, ruffled skirt, and over-skirt, they are $85; with polonaise and single skirt, $75. A suit of olive brown had plain brown silk kilting covering the front breadth, and polka-dotted foulard flounces behind, a foulard apron, and a basque of foulard with vest and cuffs of plain olive silk: price $125.

FOR LITTLE GIRLS.

The prettiest dresses for little girls are sailor suits of white repped piqué with blue Chambéry sailor collar, cuffs, pockets, and bias bands around the skirt. The cut paper pattern for these dresses is given with the Girl's Wardrobe, illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. VI. The new Normandy caps, so simple that any mother can make them, are worn by girls from two to eight years old. They have a plain high-pointed crown of Swiss muslin over blue or pink silk, a lace ruffle around the face, and a band of ribbon around the crown, tied in front in a jaunty bow with ends turned upward. The short hair falls in a Shetland pony fringe on the forehead. Little Gabrielle slips of buff linen, trimmed with rows of white piqué braid, are sold at the furnishing houses for $1 each. They are for children one, two, or three years old, either boys or girls, and will answer for dresses or aprons. Newer Gabrielles have a basque set on the side and back, leaving the front piece plain.

VARIETIES.

New sashes and neck-ties to match are made of square-meshed thin armure silk, with an embossed figure in the pointed ends, and a most elaborate tassel fringe below. For other sashes there are watered ribbons of solid color, seven inches wide, in black and all the new shades; also white watered stripes with a color on each side. There are new combinations of Roman colors that form beautiful stripes. Bayadere stripes and the Marseillaise with a single color and white are in horizontal bars.

For information received thanks are due Miss PAGE; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and EHRICH.

PERSONAL.

GISÈLE, the daughter of the Emperor of Austria, soon to be married to Prince LEOPOLD of Bavaria, is seventeen, tall, slight, and has the haughty expression of her mother. The prince is ten years older. She has fine musical talent and a good voice. He is a superior fiddler. From her mother, the beautiful but capricious Empress ELIZABETH, she has inherited a taste for horsemanship, in which accomplishment she is said to be second to no one in the empire or out of it.

—A remarkable woman has recently died in Damascus—the wife of the camel-driver Sheik ABDUL. He was her ninth husband. Thirty odd years ago she was known throughout Europe as the wife of Lord ELLENBOROUGH, from whom she eloped with Prince SCHWARZENBERG, and went to Italy, where, in the course of time, she was married six times in succession. During a journey from Beyrout to Damascus she got pleased with the camel-driver Sheik ABDUL, and selected him for her ninth husband. She was married to him after the Arab fashion, and accompanied him for a whole year on his journeys between Beyrout and Babylon, faithfully fulfilling her duties. She even milked the camels. When she had grown tired of the nomad life she built for herself a charming palace at Damascus, where her latest husband, whenever he came to Damascus, found hospitality for some days. In 1855 or 1856 she won the lawsuit against her first husband, and with it a colossal fortune in England, which now goes to her relatives, as she had no children.

—Among the titled tax-payers of Baltimore are the Marchioness of Wellesley, the Duchess of Leeds, Lady STAFFORD, Lady EMILY M'TAVISH, and Madame BONAPARTE PATTERSON.

—An English journal says: "Those who were at Chiselhurst on the occasion of the lying in state of the Emperor NAPOLEON must have noticed a very tall, broad-shouldered man, who, in evening dress, with a fur cape over his shoulders, was unceasingly smoking cigarettes. This was M. PAUL DE CASSAGNAC, the celebrated fighting editor of the Pays, who has slain eighteen men by his small-sword practice in duels, and who was one of the most vigorous supporters, by pen and sword, of the BONAPARTE régime. He is now suffering slightly from rheumatism, but when his fit is over he has to undergo a duel with M. MANC, the fighting editor of the Gaulois, also an expert swordsman and duelist."

—The late ex-Emperor of France bequeathed all his property to his wife. His will has just been proved, and the estate valued at $600,000.

—A "field-night" in the House of Commons brings to the Chamber the notable men of the time. On a recent occasion, drawn thither by the magic of Mr. GLADSTONE'S eloquence, were: Earl GRANVILLE, always a delightful listener; he is so polite a man that his very attitude pays you a compliment; he has a way of throwing his arms over the front rail, and resting his chin upon the top, which is really a flattering sight to the gentleman who is speaking. Bishop WILBERFORCE—the "saponaceous" prelate so known to fame—sits between the earl and the Duke of Argyll; the bishop has lost some of that smoothness of face which we associate with him; either age or care has given him a sterner look. The Duke of Argyll, with his bright red hair carefully brushed from his forehead, is still the "intellectual" young man of the Mechanics' Institute; he is in evening dress, and wears a huge white neck-tie—so large a one that it catches your attention. Prince CHRISTIAN, who is on the duke's right hand, is a nonentity in English affairs; he married one of the Queen's daughters, and lives in England, but he rarely quits the family circle. Behind the gallery in which these distinguished visitors are sitting are long rows of strangers, of Milesian origin—the Irish bishop and priest being conspicuous among them. The side galleries are occupied by members, and no bench below is unfilled.

—And now Mr. TOM HOOD thinks of coming to the U. S. to lecture, his editorial duties on Fun being undertaken by Mr. ROSS, editor of Judy. The latter gentleman is one of the rising comic writers of London, the author of several plays, and one or two good novels, illustrated by himself.

—VICTOR EMANUEL keeps up the old family traditions and frugal habits of his ancestors in eating, drinking, and sleeping. Every Sunday morning he attends an early mass at the Villa Ludovici Chapel. At four o'clock in summer and five o'clock in winter the king rises. A visit to the royal stables is one of his earliest and favorite occupations. If disposed for a day's shooting he is out by daybreak; but if business requires his presence at home he breakfasts at seven, and is ready for his ministers by eight, so as to finish councils and audiences by noon, when his Majesty dines, allowing himself an hour's repose after the mid-day meal. A drive in the afternoon and an occasional visit to the opera or Cinisella's Circus conclude the day.

—A historical person has just deceased at Glasgow, Miss ANN WALLACE, at the age of one hundred and three. She was a lineal descendant of that W. W. with whom so many Scotchmen "bled." Her brother, Sir J. MAXWELL WALLACE, was chosen to lay the foundation-stone of the Wallace Monument in the Abbey Craig, Stirling. He died at eighty-four.

—What a "personal" of MILTON is given by TAINE: "MILTON lived in a small house in London, or in the country, in Buckinghamshire. Of all consolations work is the most fortifying and the most healthy, because it solaces a man, not by bringing him ease, but by requiring efforts. Every morning he had a chapter in the Bible read to him in Hebrew, and remained for some time in silence, grave, in order to meditate on what he had heard. He never went to a place of worship. Independent in religion as in all else, he was sufficient to himself. He studied till mid-day; then, after an hour's exercise, he played the organ or bass-violin. Then he resumed his studies till six, and in the evening enjoyed the society of his friends. When any one came to visit him he was usually found in a room hung with old green hangings, seated in an arm-chair, and dressed quietly in black. He had been very beautiful in his youth, and his English cheeks, once delicate as a young girl's, retained their color almost to the end. Few men have done such honor to their kind. Amidst so many trials [a scrivener caused him to lose $10,000; at the Restoration he was refused payment of $10,000 due from the Excise Office; his house was burned in the great fire; when he died he only left $7500, including the produce of his library], a pure and lofty joy, altogether worthy of him, had been granted to him: the poet, buried under the Puritan, had reappeared, more sublime than ever, to give to Christianity its second HOMER."

—ESSED PASHA, the new Grand Vizier of Turkey, is one of the youngest men who has ever filled that office, being only thirty-four. He was born at Scio, and came very young to Constantinople. For some months he was director of the Ottoman School of Paris; then he was sent on a military commission to Vienna; and after the war of 1870 was charged by the Sultan to go and congratulate the Emperor WILLIAM. On his return he was made Minister of War. He is a man of ability and distinction, and a prime favorite of the Sultan. The other ministers are understood to be his docile instruments.

—Miss SNEAD, whose clever "Miss Grundy" letters from Washington are read by all intelligent people, was approached a few days ago by a Senator, who desired to present to her a stranger. "Permit me," said he, "to introduce you to the authoress of the world." "I beg your pardon," replied the bright little lady; "I do not care to have myself designated as the wife of ADAM."

—When Miss NELLIE GRANT was in London Mr. DISRAELI was asked whether he thought our American princess was pretty. "I can't say," replied the author of Lothair, "for I have only seen her once; she was then sitting between General SCHENCK'S two daughters, and I thought she had some 'indirect claims' to good looks."

—Since the marriage of Prince CZARTORYSKI with the Princess MARGUERITE D'ORLEANS the celebrated Hôtel Lambert in Paris has again become one of the most brilliant centres of the French aristocracy. At a musical party there recently Queen ISABELLA of Spain, Madame THIERS, and the Comtesse de Paris were present, and some one said, on seeing them side by side, "Voilà le passé, le présent, et l'avenir."

—The King of Saxony has given the fund of 43,000 thalers, presented to him and the Queen last December at their golden wedding, as an offering of the country to a "Golden Stipend Fund" attached to the University of Leipsic, for which scholarships are to be granted to deserving destitute students.

—The late JAMES SAVAGE, of Boston, out of his large estate made a few liberal bequests of a benevolent character—$40,000 to Harvard College, $5000 to the Massachusetts Historical Society, together with his fine collection of coins and medals, and $10,000 to the Institute of Technology, of which Mr. SAVAGE'S son-in-law was president.

—Of people in high life in England it may be mentioned that the Duchess of Inverness has been very ill, and is still not out of danger. The duchess is the eldest surviving member of the last generation of the royal family, though she has never been formally recognized as of the blood. She is a daughter of one of the Earls of Arran, was first married to Sir GEORGE BUGGIN, Knight, and afterward, in 1830, to the Duke of Sussex, one of the Queen's uncles. The marriage was not sanctioned by the sovereign, and therefore the duchess could not take her rank as the duke's wife. In 1840, however, she was made Duchess of Inverness in her own right, and has always been rather a favorite with the Queen and her family. The German embassador, Count BERNSTORFF, has just died. He succeeded Baron BUNSEN, and has always been very popular here. His relations with the royal family have, on account of their connection with the reigning family of Prussia, been particularly intimate and confidential. Lord OSSINGTON, late Speaker of the House of Commons, has just died, and so has Mr. CORRY, a former First Lord of the Admiralty, who first rose to political distinction as a maker of impromptu drawing-room verses—an odd transition. As Figaro says, a ready reckoner was wanted, and a dancer got the place. Mr. CORRY'S son is Mr. DISRAELI'S private secretary, and will now probably go into Parliament. Mr. DISRAELI has gone to live, not at the house he formerly shared with his wife, but at a hotel, and all sorts of wild stories have been started about a blunder in his wife's will, by which he has been dispossessed.

—Whether for long or for the summer has not yet been ferreted out, but the fact exists that Madame LUCCA has hired a fashionable hut at Newport, and proposes there to dwell. They say she is more than half inclined to retire from the old country altogether, and live among a people that are free.

—We have finally, in a Western paper, something "personal" that is both fresh, authentic, and satisfactory. A lady writes to the able editor asking the origin of the phrase, "The army swore terribly at Flanders," and what occasioned the profanity. Answer: Mr. Flanders was a sutler, and his prices and general disregard for all the rules of trade so incensed the army that it cursed him with all its strength.

—Sir CHARLES DILKE, who owns the London Athenæum, an eminent literary authority among Englishmen, though noted for his radicalism in and out of Parliament, is only thirty years of age, and is famous for giving the best of dinners to the clever of both sexes.

—Some idea of BRIGHAM YOUNG'S wealth may be inferred from the returns he has been compelled to make to the Internal Revenue Department. His income from his theatre, mills, farms, rents, bonds, etc., etc., as appears from the records at Washington, is as follows: For 1867, $18,400; for 1868, $20,005; for 1869, $28,584; for 1870, $25,500; for 1871, $111,680; for 1872, $39,592. It may appear superfluous to add that the general notion at Salt Lake, as elsewhere, is that B. YOUNG is not in the habit of overstating his wealth.

—The marriage ceremonial was recently performed in Virginia between THOMAS LOW and HANNAH SHORT, to which the able editor of the village alluded by saying, "No cards, no whisky"—the intent obviously being that nobody should get high on that occasion.

—Dr. PETERMANN, the distinguished German geographer, thinks that the diamond district of Southeastern Africa is the identical Ophir from which King SOLOMON got his gold and gems. He says that Zimbabye is the exact spot, and that the soil thereabout is rich with "alluvial gold, precious stones, and diamonds," and that there are extensive ruins near the place of great antiquity.

Hosted by Google

Stand with Portfolio for Letters, Notes, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS stand and portfolio are of bronzed wood. The portfolio consists of three circular pieces, cut in points on the edge and joined at the bottom; the largest of these is twelve inches and seven-eighths in diameter, and the smallest six inches and a half in diameter. The latter piece is covered on the outside with light gray silk; the silk is cut out in a circle in the middle, and is underlaid with white silk ornamented with a painted picture. The rest of the gray silk is ornamented with gray silk gimp cord, and in point Russe with gray saddler's silk in several shades and gold thread, as shown by Fig. 2, which gives a full-sized section of the embroidery. When used for portfolios the foundation for the embroidery should, of course, be circular on the outer edge; if intended for other purposes, as, for instance, baskets, toilette cushions, etc., the foundation may be cut diagonal, as shown by Fig. 2.

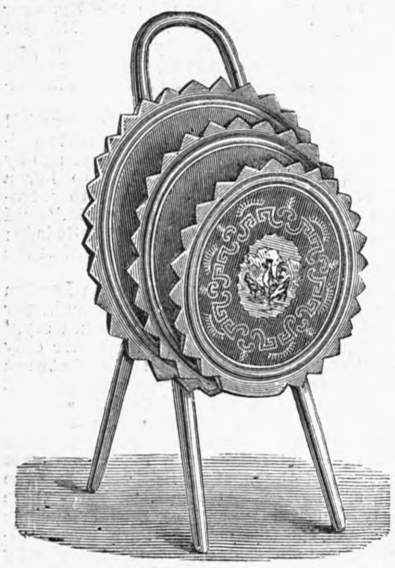

Fig. 1.—STAND WITH PORTFOLIO FOR LETTERS, NOTES, ETC.—[See Fig. 2.]

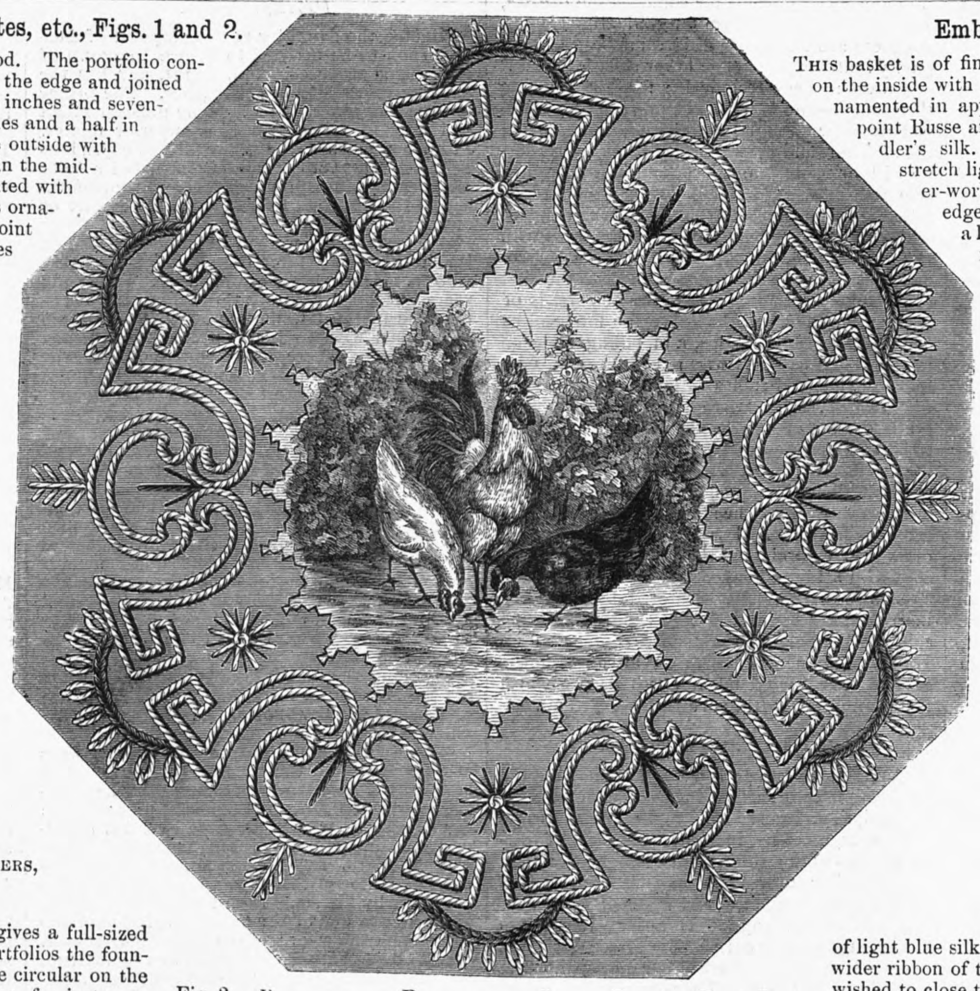

Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERED PATTERN FOR STAND, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

Embroidered Work-Basket.

THIS basket is of fine white wicker-work. The bottom is covered on the inside with a circular piece of light blue silk, which is ornamented in application embroidery with black velvet, and in point Russe and half-polka stitches with blue and white saddler's silk. In connection with the embroidered part stretch light blue silk cord between the ribs of the wicker-work, as shown by the illustration. The upper edge of the basket is trimmed on the outside with a lambrequin knotted of the same cord, and ornamented with small and large black beads, and on the inside with a rose box-pleated ruche of light blue silk ribbon an inch and a quarter wide. Bows of wider ribbon of the same color complete the trimming. If it is wished to close the basket, a bag of blue silk may be set on the upper edge instead of the ruche.

STAND WITH PINCUSHION AND BAG FOR FANCY-WORK, ETC.

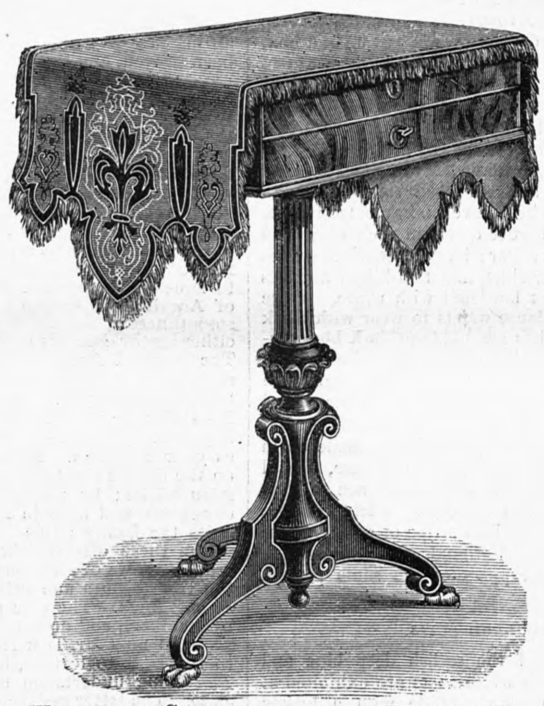
Stand with Pincushion and Bag for Fancy-Work, etc.

THE frame of this stand is of black polished cane, and is eight inches high without the handle. The circumference is twenty inches. The middle part of the frame, which forms six squares, is furnished with a card-board case covered with green silk; the rim of this case is trimmed on the outside, inside of each square, with a puff of green silk arranged as shown by the illustration, in the middle of which is set a flat tassel of silk of the same color. This case is completed by a bag of green silk set on the upper edge, which is closed with green silk cord trimmed with tassels. The foot of the frame is furnished with a pincushion covered with silk, and drawn together in the middle by a button; the seam made by setting on the cushion is covered by green silk cord. Underneath the cushion, each bar is trimmed with a bow of green silk ribbon.

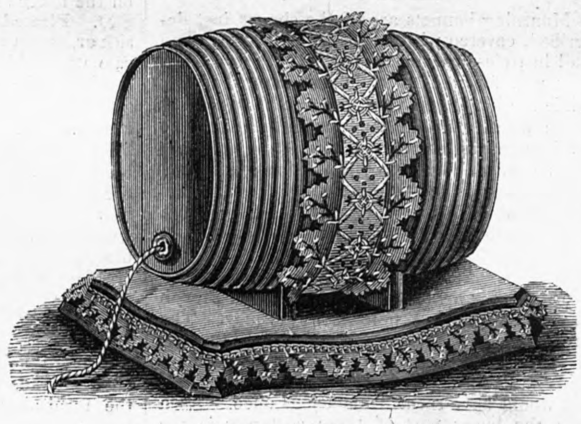
EMBROIDERED WORK-BASKET.



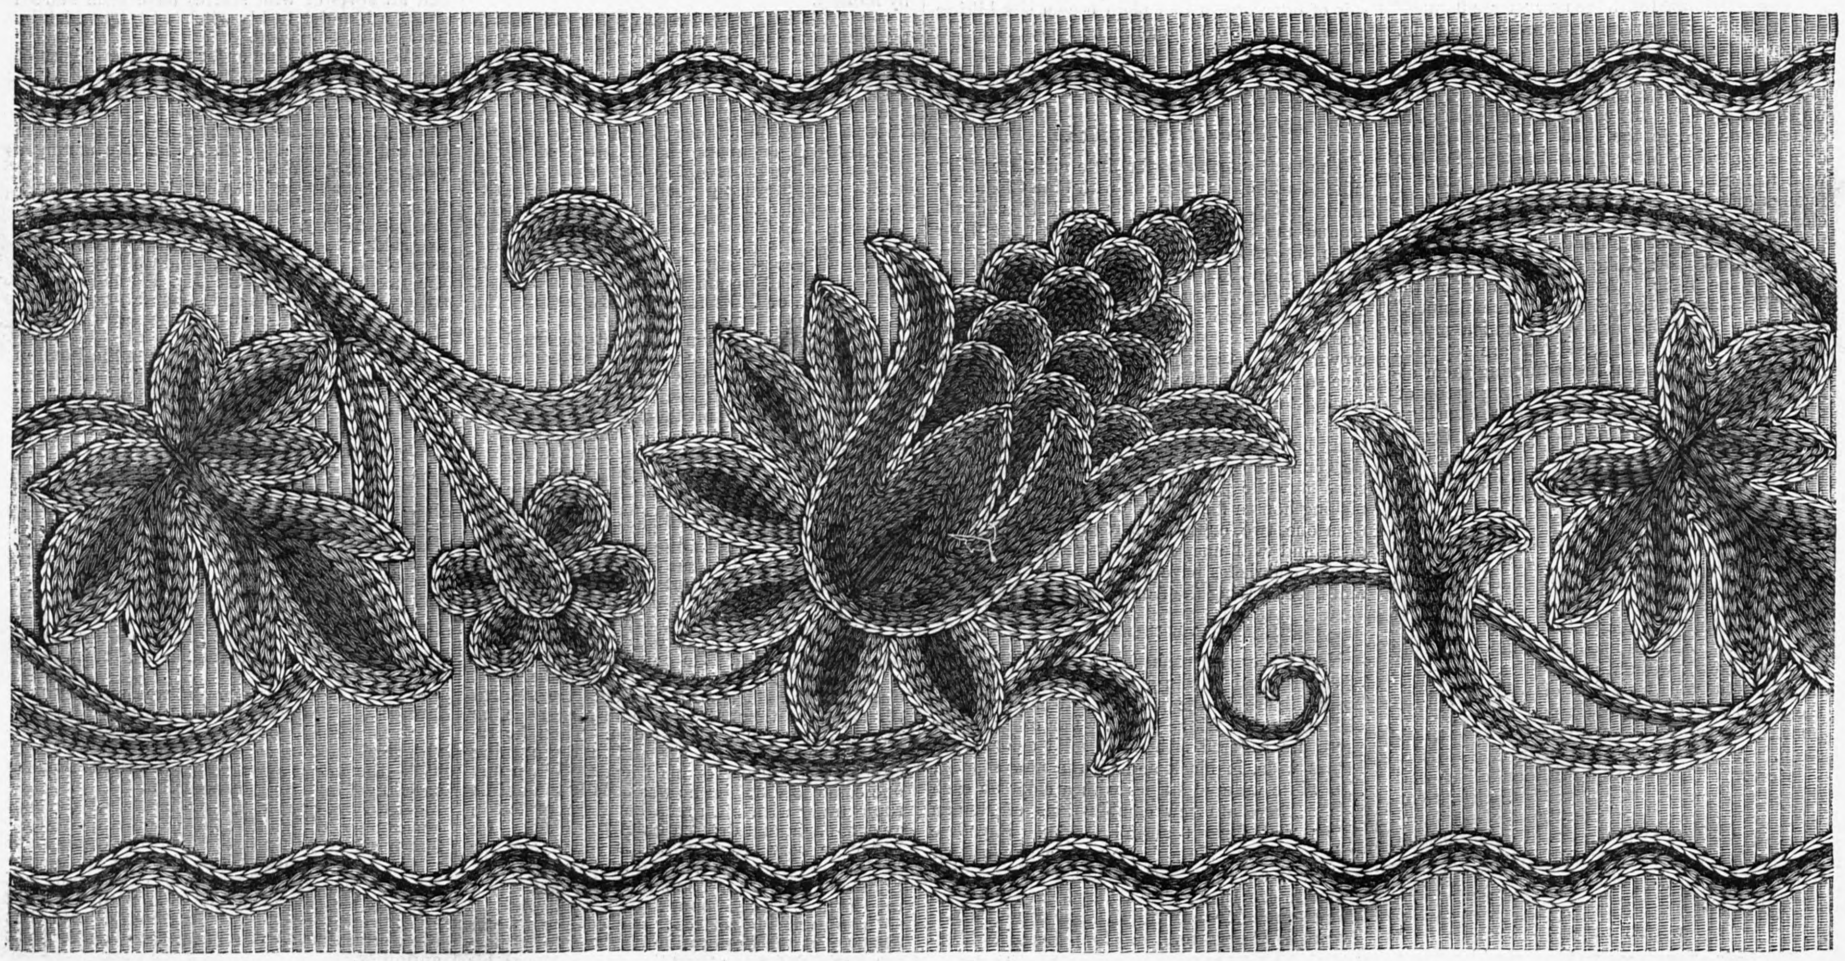
WORK-TABLE COVER.—APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.
For design see Supplement, No. XVII., Fig. 59.

Work-table Cover.—Application Embroidery.

THIS cover is of fawn-colored cloth, ornamented elaborately on the ends in application embroidery. The design figures which look dark in the illustration are applied in brown cloth; on the middle of each leaf of the large middle application figure apply a piece of dark brown velvet. Edge all the applied figures with fawn-colored soutache, and ornament the pieces of velvet besides in point Russe embroidery with fawn-colored saddler's silk. For the lines of the design sew on brown soutache in two shades. Fig. 59, Supplement, gives the design of one-half of one end of the cover. The cover is bordered with light brown open silk fringe an inch and a quarter wide. Brown percale lining.



CASE FOR TWINE.



BORDER FOR FURNITURE, PORTIÈRES, ETC.—CHAIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.

Hosted by Google

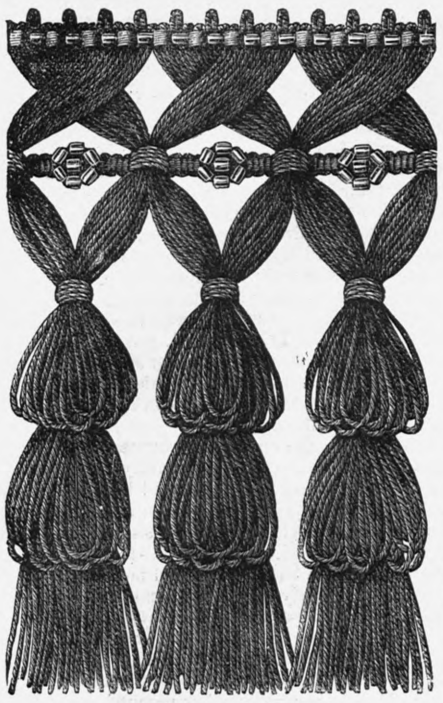


Fig. 1.—SILK AND BEAD TASSEL FRINGE.

Fig. 5.—OXIDIZED METAL BUTTON.

Fig. 3.—OXIDIZED STEEL BUTTON.

Fig. 4.—BRONZED METAL BUTTON.

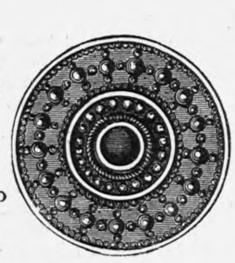

Fig. 6.—OXIDIZED METAL BUTTON.

Fig. 9.—AGRAFE WITH TASSELS.

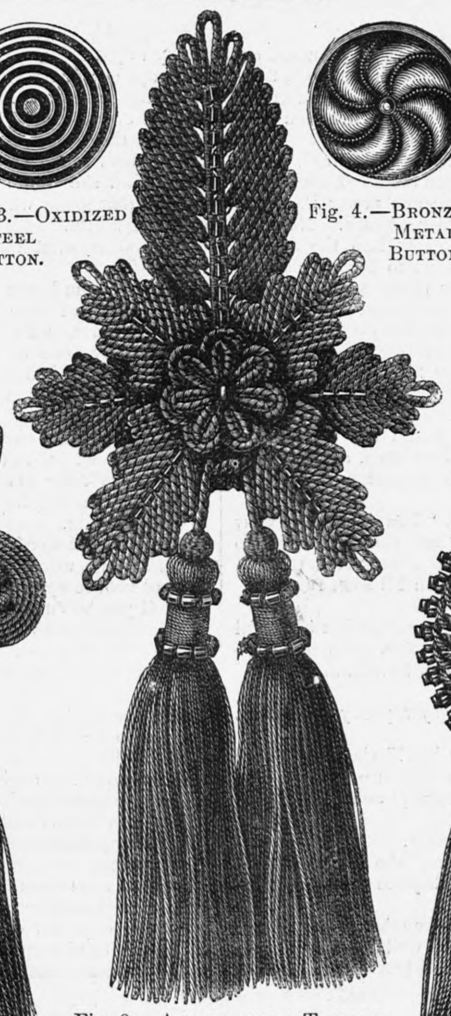

Fig. 8.—AGRAFE WITH TASSELS.

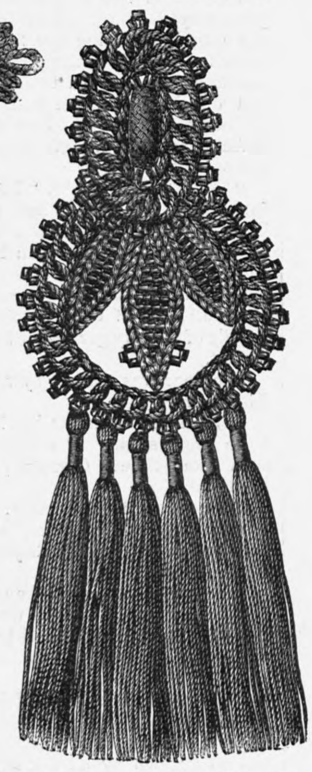

Fig. 10.—AGRAFE WITH TASSELS.

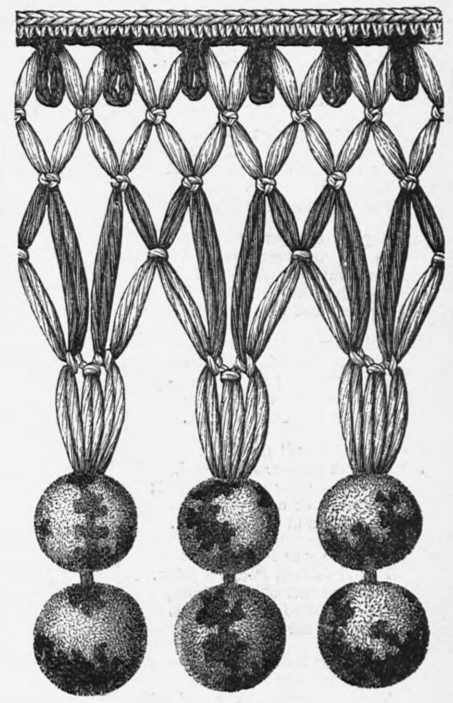

Fig. 2.—WORSTED FRINGE WITH BALLS.

Fringe, Buttons, and Passementerie Trimmings for Dresses, Wrappings, etc., Figs. 1–12.

Figs. 1–12 show a variety of fringe, buttons, and passementerie trimmings for polonaises, paletots, mantelets, Dolmans, etc.

Fig. 1.—SILK AND BEAD TASSEL FRINGE. This fringe of coarse black saddler's silk is arranged in tassels as shown by the illustration. The upper edge is trimmed with narrow silk gimp on which are sewed black cut beads.

Fig. 2.—WORSTED FRINGE WITH BALLS. This fringe is made of gray and black zephyr worsted. The upper edge is worked in netting and crochet-work, and counts four rounds. First net with gray worsted two rounds on a mesh three-quarters of an inch in circumference, and then with black worsted one round of always alternately one stitch on the mesh three-quarters of an inch in circumference and one stitch on a mesh an inch and a quarter in circumference. For the 4th round work with gray worsted on the thin mesh always alternately one knot on the next stitch, three knots on the following stitch. Every three stitches of this round are then caught together as shown by the illustration, fastening on two balls of gray and black worsted strung on double thread. The balls are made, in the usual manner, of a gray worsted strand forty threads thick, which is surrounded evenly all around with black worsted threads. Edge the netted border on the upper edge with two crochet rounds. For the first round work with black worsted always alternately two single crochet separated by a picot turned downward, three chain stitches; for the picot crochet six chain stitches, drop the last stitch from the needle, and draw it through the first single crochet. The second round is worked with gray worsted all in single crochet.

The buttons, Figs. 3–6, are partly of chased oxidized steel and partly of bronzed metal in embossed and raised work; the button Fig. 7 is of passementerie ornamented with beads.

Figs. 8–10.—AGRAFES WITH TASSELS. These agrafes are made of fine round cord, braid, and silk gimp cord, and are ornamented with covered grelot balls, black cut beads, and small covered coat buttons. The tassels are of saddler's silk.

The borders, Figs. 11 and 12, are made partly of fine round cord, partly of braid and silk gimp cord, and are ornamented with cut beads.

Fig. 7.—PASSEMENTERIE AND BEAD BUTTON.

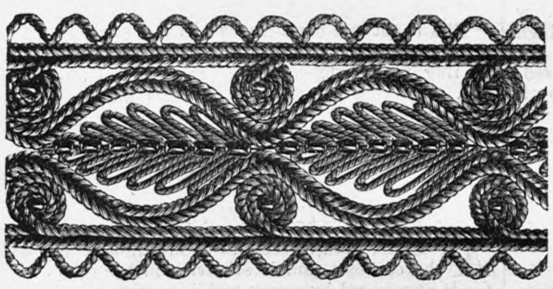

Fig. 11.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.

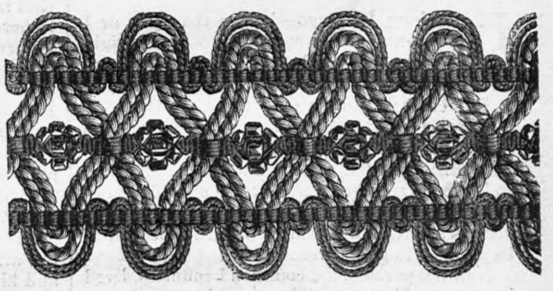

Fig. 12.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.

Case for Twine.

See illustration on page 244.

THIS case is of turned polished black wood, four inches high, and ornamented with embroidered borders. The foundation for the latter is of gray leather pinked in scallops on the sides. Along the middle of the wide border which trims the upper part of the case apply a strip of gray faille five-eighths of an inch wide, which is ornamented with embroidery in point Russe and knotted stitch with white and pink silk. At both sides of this strip work small sprays with black and pink silk in herring-bone stitch.

Cloth may be used instead of leather for the foundation of the border.

BARATHEA MANTELET.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1 and 2.

Border for Furniture, Portières, etc. Chain Stitch Embroidery.

See illustration on page 244.

THIS border is suitable for trimming chairs, sofas, portières, curtains, etc. It may be worked on a foundation of woolen reps or cashmere with saddler's silk or split zephyr worsted in the Turkish style, with various bright colors, or in four shades of one color, or else in the pale colors so fashionable at present. Work the border either with the tambour needle or else by hand in chain stitch. This design would also be suitable for application embroidery and braiding.

Fig. 1.—CASHMERE DOLMAN.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 4–6.

Fig. 2.—CASHMERE DOLMAN.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 4–6.

Fig. 1.—CASHMERE MANTELET.—FRONT. Fig. 2.—CASHMERE MANTELET.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Fig. 3.

ODORLESS TRACING-PAPER.

ACCORDING to Puscher, of Nuremberg, odorless tracing-paper can be prepared, ready for immediate use, by brushing over paper with a mixture of one part of castor-oil, and one, two, or three parts of absolute alcohol, according to the thickness of the paper employed.

Hosted by Google

"BRING ME WORD HOW TALL SHE IS."

Jaques. What stature is she of?
Orlando. Just as high as my heart.
—As You Like it.

WITHIN a garden shade,
A garden sweet and dim,
Two happy children played
Together; he was made
For God, and she for him.

Beyond the garden's shade,
In deserts drear and dim,
Two outcast children strayed
Together, he betrayed
By her, and she by him.

Together, girl and boy,
They wandered, ne'er apart;
Each wrought to each annoy,
Yet each knew never joy
Save in the other's heart.

By her so oft deceived,
By him so sore oppressed,
They each the other grieved;
Yet each of each was best
Beloved, and still caressed.

And she was in his sight
Found fairest, still his prize,
His constant chief delight;
She raised to him her eyes
That led her not aright,

And ever by his side
A patient huntress ran
Through forests dark and wide,
And still the woman's pride
And glory was the Man.

When her he would despise,
She kept him captive bound;
Forbidding her to rise,
By many cords and ties
She held him to the ground.

At length, in stature grown,
He stands erect and free;
Yet stands he not alone,
For his beloved would be
Like him she loveth wise, like him she loveth free.

So wins she her desire,
Yet stand they not apart;
For as she doth aspire
He grows, nor stands she higher
Than her Beloved's heart.

HOW THE SPELL WAS BROKEN.

IT was long, long ago—longer than you or I can remember. Sweet spring, with its bright sunshine, its young tender green, had come again. Little Elsie had watched the transformation, as it had crept gradually over the land, from the window of her turret chamber, in which she had been a prisoner nearly all the winter. For poor little Elsie was not strong, and her parents had to be very careful of her, lest she should be exposed to cold winds and draughts. But to-day all was so bright and warm that Elsie begged to be allowed to go out into the air.

Now her parents, the count and countess, lived in a large old castle. The grounds around were full of trees, shrubs, and sweet-scented flowers. A paved path led from the porch to the white gate at the end, and here it adjoined a wood, part of which belonged to the count; but another and larger part to a baron in the same country. Elsie was sometimes allowed to go with her nurse into the beginning of the wood, but never farther; for it was very dense beyond, and considered dangerous.

On this particular day Elsie's nurse was busy in the spinning-room, and could not go out with her. So the child was told she might play about by herself for a little while, but she must be careful and not get into mischief; nor must she go into the wood farther than where she could always see the white gate.

Elsie promised to comply, and set off gleefully. How gloriously the sun shone! How sweet and fragrant the air smelled! How fresh every thing looked! Elsie's heart bounded with pleasure: it seemed to her she had never enjoyed the open air so much as now after her long confinement. How changed every thing was, too, from the time when she had first to keep her room! Then all looked dead or dying, and the leaves were dropping from the trees. Now they were covered with tender foliage. Purple violets peeped from among their sheltering leaves, ferns were beginning to uncoil from out their shaggy brown scales, hyacinths scented the air, and tulips raised their showy heads. The cherry, plum, apple, and pear trees were covered with snowy-white blossoms, an earnest of the fruit to come.

The little girl skipped about, admiring and enjoying all these beauties, standing still a while to listen to the songs of the birds. At last, when she had surveyed all the newly awakened glories of the garden, she neared the white gate and peeped over. If the garden looked beautiful in its spring dress, how much more so the wood! It seemed to be carpeted with flowers that grew among the bright grasses; and over the whole the sunlight glittered, dappling the ground with light.

"Oh, how beautiful!" exclaimed Elsie. "I must go in and pick some of those pretty flowers for mamma."

No sooner said than done, and Elsie had passed the gate, and stood upon the confines of the wood. White and purple violets, wild blue harebells, snowy wood-anemones, pale golden primroses, and modest daisies pied the ground. She walked on and on, thinking of nothing but these sweet blossoms, and gathering them as she went, till her little apron was full. At one spot the violets peeped thickest, in another grew the finest clumps of primroses, and here, a little farther on, was a mass of the elegant wood-sorrel, with its pretty thin leaves and delicate white bells.

Elsie plucked them eagerly, and still the thought of returning never occurred to her. For the farther she went on, the more beautiful the wood seemed to become, and all the trees, flowers, and birds appeared to lure her on, and to say, "Come, Elsie, come. You have not seen half our loveliness yet."

And whenever Elsie felt a little tired, or the idea of turning back crossed her mind, she always saw some bright flower, some pretty insect, in the distance to attract her onward. Now she had penetrated unconsciously into the domain of a wicked fairy, who tried to attract children into the wood that they might serve her; for she liked to be waited upon by pretty little boys and girls, and had long looked on Elsie with a jealous eye. But never till to-day had she seen any chance of luring her hither, for Elsie had never before been in the wood alone. The child wandered on and on, forgetting fatigue, duty, and obedience, till she found the paths grow indistinct and mazed. Just then, as she began to feel tired and a little frightened, a white house came in sight.

"Come," she thought, "I can't be so very far from home, after all, for here is a house. I'll go in and ask them to give me a drink of water, and let me rest a little, and then I'll soon run hom with my pretty flowers."

So she rang the bell. It was such a beautiful place, all built of white marble, situated in t middle of a lovely garden. She admired it as s waited.

The door was opened by a pretty girl, about Elsie's age.

"Oh, here you are at last!" she said, before Elsie could speak. "We have waited for you such a long time! Come in;" and she held out her hand.

Elsie stared in amazement.

"You must be mistaken," she answered. "I have gone a little too far beyond the edge of the wood, and am tired."

"No, no," interrupted the other, "there is no mistake. I know you very well; you are called Elsie. My companions and I have been waiting for you a very long time, and wishing you would come."

As she spoke she drew Elsie into the hall—a beautiful place, full of marble statues that seemed to grow out of beds of flowers and ferns. Elsie was so dazzled by all the loveliness she could not speak, and let the other child lead her on.

They entered a large room, where sat a beautiful lady. Her long golden hair rippled in waves to her knees; she was dressed in a white robe; on her arms and neck shone crystal jewels; and her face wore a fascinating smile. She sat on a raised throne of ivory. The whole room was inlaid with gold, silver, and mother-of-pearl, and on the floor lay wrought stuffs of Indian design.

When the beautiful lady saw Elsie she rose, and smiling still more sweetly, held out her arms toward her.

"Welcome, dear child."

Elsie hardly knew what was happening to her; but after the beautiful lady had embraced her, and kissed her on brow and eyes, she seemed to have forgotten every thing about her lost way and her home.

"You must call me Winnabelle," said the lady; "all your little companions call me so. But I forget; you have not seen them yet."

She clapped her hands three times, and one of the ivory doors opened, admitting a whole troop of boys and girls. The girls were all dressed in white, with blue sashes and crystal beads; the boys in blue velvet, with white leathern bands and boots. Elsie glanced first at them, then at her own plain gray frock and dirty shoes.

"It does not matter," said Winnabelle, divining her thoughts; "you shall have just the same."

She had hardly said so than Elsie's clothes had disappeared, and she was dressed just like the others.

The children all crowded round to welcome her. Elsie thought they did not look quite happy; still that might be fancy: only they always looked so anxiously at Winnabelle after they had said any thing, as though they feared her disapproval.

"Show your new friend her room, girls," said Winnabelle at last.

What a beautiful room it was! all ivory and light blue velvet. Each child slept in an ivory bed with light blue hangings, and had an ivory dressing-table with silver ornaments. Then the little girls instructed Elsie in her duties, and told her that she would have to wait upon their fairy mistress, but that was easy work; and the rest of the day they might play about and do what they liked.

"You must lead a happy life," said Elsie, who had forgotten every thing in the dazzling excitement.

A cloud fell over the girls' faces, but they did not answer, and looked nervous when Elsie repeated the remark.

"Hush!" they said, "or she will be angry. She will punish us if we tell."

"Tell what?" asked Elsie. "You puzzle me."

At that moment Winnabelle entered, frowning.

"You must not ask questions, Elsie," she said; "little girls who ask questions or rebel are made miserable here. And you would not like to be made miserable in this lovely house, would you?" she asked, once more smiling her old sweet smile.

"Oh no," said Elsie; "it is too beautiful here for that."

She had forgotten all her misgivings at the sight of that wonderful smile.

So the days went on, Elsie did not know how: she had lost all count of them, but she was by no means happy. The fairy was not so kind as she appeared to be; the services she demanded were exacting; she was often hard to satisfy, and, worse than all, if displeased she would punish the children by showing them their distant homes, making all appear so real that they strove vainly to get there. Many a one had attempted to escape out of the fairy's grounds, but though they might run on a long while, their homes remained ever distant. When at last, utterly exhausted, they sank in despair upon the ground, they always found themselves at Winnabelle's porch, and she would stand on the door-step, smiling that smile which made them forget every thing again.

Meanwhile, what had Elsie's parents been doing?

When the sun began to lower in the west, and the child did not come home, they grew uneasy; and when it set, and still Elsie had not returned, their anxiety knew no bounds. They searched the garden and hamlet, they scoured the wood. In vain: no Elsie was there, no voice answered their calls. They had to abandon the search in despair when night closed in. The next day had hardly dawned before the count set out into the wood to look for his missing child. He ran hither and thither, he explored every path and by-path, in vain.

Now you will wonder how it came about that, searching the wood in this manner, the count did not chance upon Winnabelle's kingdom. I can tell you how that was.

Winnabelle was very clever, and always knew who was in the wood. When it was a child she wished to entice, she made every thing look beautiful, let the birds sing more sweetly, the flowers look gayer, the nearer they came to her abode, as she had done with Elsie. But when any one entered who wished to rescue a child from her, or to discover her habitation, she made the forest that surrounded it so dense, dark, and impenetrable that no one dreamed of entering there. And if any person, more courageous or desperate than the rest, attempted this, she caused noxious animals to meet them, and the ground to become marshy, and sink beneath their feet.

Several days the count sought his little girl, till he had to give up in despair. Long and bitterly the parents mourned her, and gave her up as lost.

"If we only knew how it all happened!" wailed the countess; "if she had even died in my arms it would have been better. Now how do I know but she may be living in misery, ill treated by cruel people?"

She wept as she spoke. Her husband had no comfort to offer her, and they both sat silently staring into the fire, by the side of which they were sitting. A beautiful fire it was, piled high with logs and coals to the top of the grate; and it sparkled and crackled, danced and flickered, quite regardless of the two sad mortals who sat gazing into its depths. As the flames leaped in playful fury they split a large mass of coal which had hitherto escaped their devouring tongues. Opening thus in half, it revealed a tiny gray speck, which vaulted briskly out of the black clump on to the fender. The count stooped down to examine it, and found, to his intense astonishment, that it was a little being who was complaining sorely of the enforced imprisonment he had sustained in the coal. The countess lifted him gently in her hand, and asked what ailed him.

"My name is Fye," he said. "I am a gnome, and my home is under-ground, very near to where the coals are found. We had been playing hide-and-seek one day, I and my brothers, and I hid in this piece of coal, which had a large crack. I had hardly hidden there when I heard a great hammering. Before I could recover my courage, or find out what was happening, the block that inclosed me was loosened from its parent coal. We were carried up to earth. I lost all consciousness after that, and only just now the great heat restored me. Oh, if you would aid me in returning to my home, I should be so grateful!" The little mite looked up to the countess with a pleading face.

"If we can, most certainly," she answered. "Ah! would that any one could restore to us our child!"

"Why do you sigh so?" asked the gnome.

The countess related her trouble. The tiny gray figure sprang upon her shoulder the better to hear what she was saying. When she had ceased he was silent some time.

"Your child," he said at length, "has got into the power of a wicked fairy called Winnabelle. She lives in the wood. You can not penetrate there, for by her enchantment she makes it impassable. Restore me to my home, and in return I will teach you to break the spell that parts you from your Elsie."

The unhappy parents consented most gladly.

Next morning the count started upon his journey, the little man safely ensconced in his hat. They had not far to go, for the count's castle lay on the confines of the mine down which the gnome, whom he frequently consulted as to the route, said he must descend. When they had been lowered the count asked if this were the spot.

"It is indeed," cried the little being, gleefully. "Now wait for me while I go for the promised charm."

The count leaned against a wall of coal. It was all so black and dismal, so strangely warm and close down there, he could not tell how the time went on, but it seemed as if Fye had been absent long. He almost began to fear lest he was about to play him false, and at last his fear was beginning to gain the mastery. Just then he heard the gnome panting toward him.

"I'm coming," he said. "Sorry—to have kept—you so—long; but—it's a great—load for—me, and I had—some little trouble—to find one. They're rather rare stones—and in great request. Lift me up; I can't jump with it in my hands."

"See here," he went on, when his request had been complied with, and he had regained breath; "here is a precious stone, called a sapphire. It has been wrought with great exertion and care by our slaves. This stone frees from all enchantment. Used with singleness of heart and faith, you can not fail to succeed in your quest. Adieu. The gnome Fye's good wishes and gratitude follow you."

The count returned home, holding his treasure—the precious blue stone—carefully in his hand. Accompanied by his wife, he set out at once into the wood, their hearts beating high with expectation. The sapphire guided them in the right way, showing the direction they should take by flashes of increased light. When they neared the dense forest, usually so impenetrable, it all changed into fair woodland paths at sight of the stone, and the anxious parents passed in safety to the marble house. They entered, turning neither to right nor left. They did not stay to admire its beauties, but walked straight to the throne-room, where Winnabelle sat in state, surrounded by the children.

When she saw the count and countess come in she stared in amazed anger. Hardly had the count opened his hand and revealed his lovely gem than her face became first of an ashy hue, then ugly and shriveled; then she shrunk and shrunk, trembling violently, and at last vanished in smoke, leaving a bad odor behind her.

Instantly the lovely house, the beautiful gardens, disappeared also, and all the boys and girls were standing round the count and countess on a piece of greensward under the shade of the forest trees.

Elsie gleefully sprang into her parents' arms. The other children wept—no parents had come to claim them. The count at once promised that they should all be taken safely to their homes, and that till he could send them they must stay with Elsie. When they heard this they were glad too; and for the first time their tongues were loosened about the cruelties of the wicked fairy. How much they had to tell! how much to hear!

They all wanted to see the kind sapphire that had freed them from the enchantment, and could not cease praising its beauty, and wishing they could thank the gnome for his kindness.

"Although," said Elsie, sententiously, "if papa had not been kind to Fye, Fye would not have been kind to papa."

"Still we had not done any thing for Fye," added the others. "Long live Fye, and every good gnome; and may all naughty fairies dissolve in smoke!"

The count and countess caused the sapphire that had wrought all this joy to be set in a golden ring, that glistened ever after on Elsie's finger, preserving her from all dangers and enchantments, and reminding her of the great adventure of her youth.

EASTER-EGGS.

AT Easter nature seems to be in league with the children, and is so lavish in her gifts (as is announced by merry cacklings from innumerable farm-yards) that hard must be the heart and close the fist of that housewife who will not lend both of her time and eggs to promote the gayety of the cunning little rogues, backed by so powerful an abettor. At this season our readers may be glad of some directions how to decorate these dainty farm-yard trophies in such a manner as to make them doubly the delight of the child-world as when they come from the nest, spotless and white or of a rich russet brown.

If mottoes are to be inscribed upon our Easter-eggs—and of that I am sure we all approve—let us provide ourselves with the sharpened end of a white wax or adamantine candle. Having first submerged the eggs in hot water, write on them with the candle-end such words or draw such figures as you fancy. The wax or oil will serve the same purpose as what is termed a resist in the process of printing calicoes, and prevent the dye from adhering.

Now we shall like our eggs of various colors—red, to begin with. For this purpose Brazil-wood and also cochineal are used, either dye to be set with a little alum. Boil by preference in a tin vessel. Have your dye-stuffs well dissolved and strained from impurities before immersing the eggs, and then if you keep them stirring all the while they will be painted over evenly. If you want speckled eggs, dot about with white wax or oil, as you did for your mottoes, and the desired effect will be produced. A neater way, though, of engraving eggs is to dye them first whatever color you wish, and then with a penknife scrape upon them any device that occurs to you, leaving thus a tracery of white upon a colored ground. Logwood chips will produce a dark purple dye, to be set with a small bit of copperas. A good yellow may be gotten by boiling in onion skins steeped in hot water, or by taking two parts of black-oak bark and one part of hickory, and boiling in water, with a lump of alum for the mordant. Or, if you wish some eggs yellow and some green, first dye your eggs in a pan of hot water colored with turmeric tied up in a little muslin bag, and when you have dyed as many in that way as you wish, stir into it enough of druggist's blue-indigo composition to produce the desired shade of green. Some boys are satisfied with simply boiling their eggs with grass to color them green, and Scotch broom blossoms to dye them yellow, not, however, to the universal admiration of their friends.

Modern science, though, must be allowed to have her voice in this matter, and the most accomplished chemist we know tells us that the new aniline dyes are to be undoubtedly preferred for this purpose, yielding the finest results with the least possible labor. So subtle are these coloring matters that some of them do not even require to be heated, but are soluble either in water or alcohol, and impart their brilliant hues when applied cold. A few cents' worth of almost any color you name would be sufficient for the purpose, and may be obtained from all city druggists.

Hosted by Google

In France kind mammas have been known to make Easter-Monday the occasion of charming rural fêtes, at which these fancifully colored eggs, gilded and adorned with appropriate mottoes, figured as not the least delightful part of the entertainment. The children were invited into the garden, and there, hid among the grass and shrubbery, each little guest was surprised to find a nest full of many-colored eggs, one at least marked with his or her own name—filling each little heart with delight we may well imagine. Why may we not imitate so pretty a practice? for in family ethics is there any thing that contributes so much to the general welfare as providing for youth recreations that are at once enjoyable and innocent?

Poult de Soie Cravat Bow with Mother-of-pearl Slide.

See illustration on page 253.

THIS bow consists of leaf-shaped pieces and loops and ends of purple poult de soie. A mother-of-pearl slide is slipped on the knot of the bow. For each leaf cut a three-cornered piece, which is five inches and three-quarters long on the straight sides. Bind each piece on the straight sides a quarter of an inch wide with a bias strip of poult de soie, pleat the upper (bias) edge closely, and fasten it on a stiff lace foundation. Set on the loops and ends as shown by the illustration.

Embroidered Towel-Rack.

See illustration on page 253.

THIS towel-rack is of carved wood partly stained brown and partly polished black, and is ten inches and a half high and twelve inches wide. The middle part is ornamented with a medallion of black velvet, which is embroidered in the design given by Fig. 60, Supplement, in satin and half-polka stitch. The corn flowers are worked with blue, the ears with maize, and the leaves and stems with brown and green saddler's silk in several shades.

IN THE BOWER.

BY PAUL H. HAYNE.

THE gusty and passionate March hath died;
And now in the golden April-tide
There sits in the shade of her jasmine bower
A maid more fair than an April flower.

The delicate curve of her perfect mouth,
Whose tints grow warm in the fervid South,
She stoops to press, as she murmurs low,
On a note upraised in her hand of snow.

What words are writ on the tiny scroll?
What thoughts lie deep in the maiden's soul?
Oh, is it with bliss of her love she sighs?
And is love's the light in those shy brown eyes?

So thinks the mock-bird trilling his lay
On the tremulous top of the lilac spray;
He eyes the maid, on his perch apart,
And his song is meant for her secret heart!

So thinks the breeze, for its frolic free
With the rose's stem and the wing o' the bee
It leaves, to sigh in the maiden's ear,
"He is coming, sweet! he is almost here!"

So thinks the sun, for his ardent beams,
Grown mellow and soft as a virgin's dreams,
Through the vine-leaf shadows steal coyly down,
And she wears his light like a bridal crown.

Let the mock-bird sing and the breezes sigh,
And the sun weave crowns of his light i' th' sky;
She heeds them not, for a step is heard,
And her heart leaps up like a startled bird—

Her heart leaps up, but it is not fear:
He is coming, sweet! he is here! is here!
And she flies to his bosom, as bird to nest,
And is folded home on her lover's breast!

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

SELECTED FROM "ADAM BEDE."

IF a woman's young and pretty, I think you can see her good looks all the better for her being plain dressed.....It seems to me as a woman's face doesna want flowers; it's almost like a flower itself:.....It's like when a man's singing a good tune, you don't want t' hear bells tinkling and interfering wi' the sound.

You can so seldom get hold of a man as can turn his brains to more nor one thing; it's just as if they wore blinkers like t' horses, and could see nothing o' one side of 'em.

The best fire doesna flare up the soonest.

I know forgiveness is a man's duty, but, to my thinking, that can only mean as you're to give up all thoughts o' taking revenge: it can never mean as you're t' have your old feelings back again, for that's not possible.

There's no rule so wise but what it's a pity for somebody or other.

It's poor foolishness to run down your enemies.

When people's feelings have got a deadly wound, they can't be cured with favors.

It's them as take advantage that get advantage i' this world, I think: folks have to wait long enough afore it's brought to 'em.

I might mention all the divine charms of a bright spring day, but if you had never in your life utterly forgotten yourself in straining your eyes after the mounting lark, or in wandering through the still lanes when the fresh-opened blossoms fill them with a sacred silent beauty like that of fretted aisles, where would be the use of my descriptive catalogue? I could never make you know what I meant by a bright spring day.

It seems to me it's the same with love and happiness as with sorrow—the more we know of it the better we can feel what other people's lives are or might be, and so we shall only be more tender to 'em, and wishful to help 'em. The more knowledge a man has, the better he'll do's work; and feeling's a sort o' knowledge.

It takes something else besides 'cuteness to make folks see what 'll be their interest in the long-run. It takes some conscience and belief in right and wrong, I see that pretty clear.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THIS has become a serious question, in which not only voting men, but non-voting women, have a deep personal interest—How are life and property to be protected in our great city? The fact is conspicuous that neither our persons nor our pockets are secure at any time. Deeds of violence are constantly occurring not only at night, but in broad daylight; not merely in secret by-ways and concealed places, but in our best streets, on our city cars, on ferry-boats, and in stages. Numberless pickpockets pursue their business successfully and boldly. They are often known, both by private persons and by the police, but seldom are brought to punishment. The law seems powerless to put down a great system of iniquity which is known to exist in our midst—the secret combination of thieves and pickpockets.

The wife of a conductor on one of our most frequented lines of city cars recently stated that her husband pursued his business in constant fear even of his own life. Every day and every night, at regular times, a gang of armed thieves and pickpockets entered the cars. They do not hesitate to let the conductor know that they are armed, and their object is to rob passengers going to and from the steam-cars. Strangers entering the city, unsuspicious and encumbered with baggage, are easy victims. But so skillful are these roughs that even the most cautious and careful may find watches and pocket-books gone without a sign of commotion. The conductor dares not say a word to them; an appeal or complaint to the proprietors of the road would probably cost him his place, into which scores are ready to step; one policeman is unable to cope with an organized band; and notwithstanding the numerous robberies which have been committed, nothing is really done to lessen the evil. Such is the story which we hear from a reliable source. There is no gainsaying the fact that we are not safe in our daily passage to and from business, that no legal protection appears efficient. Must we always walk and ride with our hand upon our pocket? Shall known ruffians, even if wearing the garb of gentlemen, be suffered to pursue their vile calling unmolested? Shall intoxicated men be allowed in our cars, and women exposed to open insult, and there be nothing done about it? These things ought not so to be.

An exchange tells the following incident: Recently a lady, while riding in an omnibus, became aware that the "gentleman" on her right was feeling for her pocket under her cloak. For a moment a cold shiver passed through her, but, as it was broad daylight, and as there were evidently many persons in the omnibus to whom she might apply for protection, she took courage, and recollecting that in the dress she wore her pocket had, much to her previous annoyance, been sewed on the wrong side of the skirt, concluded to sit still and await the course of events. After having been sufficiently entertained by the vain efforts of her neighbor to find the pocket, she turned to him and said, quietly, "My pocket is on the other side, Sir." The man immediately jumped up, pulled the strap, and disappeared with most amusing rapidity, the contemptuous coolness of the lady having been too much for his artistic nerves.

Work on the East River Bridge is again resumed. The frost will not interfere with masonry for many months, and a good degree of progress will doubtless be made before another winter.

Twenty black bass have been shipped by Seth Green to Sir Edward Thornton, the British minister at Washington, and these are to be sent to England. They were packed for their journey in two twelve-gallon cans, according to instructions from the Fish Commissioners of the State.

Old residents in the vicinity of the White Mountains say the winter there has been the toughest known for a quarter of a century. The quantity of snow has been almost unprecedented—observing farmers estimate that no less than one hundred and forty-four inches have fallen. In some sections the thermometer has ranged for several days successively at forty degrees below zero, and certain springs have frozen which never before were known to commit such an indiscretion.

Parents are protesting against the custom of keeping children after school-hours as a punishment for failure in lessons. It certainly must be well understood, in this age of the world, that the physical welfare of a child is as important as the mental progress. Long-continued confinement and protracted mental strain are highly injurious. How is a child who is subjected to extra confinement and extra hours of study in the school-room to be prepared for fresh, vigorous attention to lessons the next day?

Mr. Spurgeon does not like the prefix of "Rev." His friends are informed that letters addressed to the "Rev. C. H. Spurgeon" will be returned to the Dead-letter Office, with "not known" written on them.

Many years ago a workman in a French manufactory decided to make a watch every part of which except the mainspring should be of rock-crystal. After thirty years' labor he accomplished his task. All the pieces of the watch are fastened by rock-crystal screws, and the escapement is most intricate. His widow would never part with it; but when she died the treasure fell into the hands of a French watchmaker, who intends to exhibit it as a sample of French workmanship, pricing it at £400. This watch will be one of the curiosities to be seen at the Vienna Exhibition.

The facts in the latest case of Enoch Ardenism are as follows: Husband was gone sixteen years; wife became the third spouse of a wealthy citizen, and when her husband returned to look into the window (figuratively, for he went squarely into the door), she asked the wealthy citizen to whom he should leave his property. "To my children," said he—"children by my first wife." "Then I shall have to leave you;" and she did, in company with her first and earliest.

A California live frog recently set free from the centre of a stratum of sandstone is reckoned to be several million years of age.

Prince Pierre Bonaparte was detained from the funeral of Napoleon III. not by any unkind feeling, but by an attack of rheumatism. The princess, his wife, however, did not fail to go to Camden House, and was respectfully received by the imperial family and their friends, even by those who can not forgive her for having preferred work to pecuniary embarrassment. It was not eccentricity, but want of money for ordinary expenses, and for the education of her children, that led the Princess Pierre Bonaparte to open in London a large mantua-maker's shop. For the sake of her children—Roland and Jeanne—she devotes her days to honest business. The English climate does not agree with the prince, and he has taken up his abode near Liège (Belgium), whither his wife and her children go often to visit him.

In St. Petersburg horses in the street are never allowed to gallop, but they are urged to go at their very fastest pace, and the rapidity with which they dash along is alarming. It is surprising so few accidents occur; but the police are vigilant. The sleighs are absolutely noiseless, and the powdered snow completely muffles the horses' tread. There is a singular impressiveness to a stranger in such a busy yet silent scene, making it seem unreal and shadowy. But sleigh-riding in Russia has its drawbacks. It is necessary for one to watch his companion's ears and nose, lest they freeze unaware; and frequent stops are requisite, when the color of the skin is unfavorable, to catch up a handful of snow, and give the whitened member a good rub.

The latest method of treating dyspepsia has just been promulgated by a Parisian physician, and will doubtless receive the warmest approval from all sufferers. In fact, we think that although doctors have never been distinguished for taking their own medicines, an exception will be made, and they will practice what they preach. Moreover, we shall suddenly discover that most of our physicians have been life-long victims to dyspepsia, and treatment is immediately necessary. The plan to be pursued is to give very little to eat or to drink, but to give it often, say once in twenty to thirty minutes. The fancies of the patient as to what he would like are to be wholly disregarded, and he is to be fed upon beef, mutton, eggs, and vegetables, and is to take "a little less than a wine-glass of Bordeaux wine and water every thirty or forty minutes." Sherry, claret, and Champagne may be used in lieu of or with Bordeaux. After two or three weeks the patient is to return to three meals per day. Whether the wine is continued or not is not stated by the Parisian physician who has invented this very taking mode of treatment.

A year ago last September four Japanese boys, aged respectively twelve, thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen years, entered one of the Boston schools. They had then been in the country six months, under the instruction of a private tutor. They were classed according to their abilities, and have rapidly progressed in their studies and risen in rank. The oldest boy now stands at the head of the second class, though he entered the fifth. When they first went into the school they could be understood with difficulty. Now they speak and read plainly, and write in better English than a majority of the first-class boys. They are thorough, gentlemanly, and popular.

A New England farmer sent to an orphan asylum for a boy that was "smart, active, brave, tractable, prompt, industrious, clean, pious, intelligent, good-looking, reserved, and modest." The superintendent wrote back that unfortunately they had only human boys in that institution.

Tai Sei Shimbum, or Great Western News, is the name of a Japanese paper about to be started in London. It will consist chiefly of the writings of the numerous Japanese students now in this country and in England, who will thus communicate their ideas of foreign affairs to their countrymen in Japan. The journal is to be illustrated.

The following common-sense rules in regard to shopping are worthy of regard:

First, have a list of articles to be purchased made out in black and white; by this means you will be saved from sudden temptation to buy what is not really necessary, and forget nothing that you require. Second, deal only with merchants in whose business integrity you can confide. Third, in the long-run one always does better to buy at one and the same place than run about for the purpose of hunting up bargains; a regular customer can always get favors denied to an occasional purchaser. Fourth, never buy what you don't want, simply because it is cheap.

In a Chicago court of justice they tried, the other day, to decide how much weight constituted a load for a horse. The question is just as easy to decide—and no easier—as how much a man can lift, or how much a man can do. It depends upon the horse—slightly.

An exchange sarcastically remarks that "if Maud Muller had her life to live over again, and should meet the judge in this year of grace 1873, she would sue him for breach of promise, and obtain sufficient damages to make her family happy, or else shoot him, become a lecturer, and die rich and respected by all."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

C. A. D.—We advise you to try sulphur vapor baths to discharge the flesh-worms or comedones in the face. Exercise much out-of-doors, and use coarse flour bread or mush at each meal.

GERTRUDE L. M.—Fine soaps improve the skin. All powders containing bismuth are more or less harmful. The bran bath would be better than the cold shower-bath for most persons of delicate health. Use common bran dusted into the water. The alum and egg paste is good to keep off wrinkles, and will help sallowness. Dissolve rock-alum in the rose-water, and boil fifteen minutes till the paste is like cold cream. Spread thickly on the face.

MRS. M. E. C. B. will accept our thanks for her valuable hints, of which farther mention will be made.

ALEXIS.—The line, "Though lost to sight, to mem'ry dear," is found in Tennyson's In Memoriam, but whether it originated with the poet laureate or not we are unable to say. Perhaps some friend can inform us.

MARY.—Make your striped Japanese poplin with a basque and apron over-skirt, trimmed with pleatings faced with black silk; for your black grenadine have a polonaise and single skirt, trimmed with flounces and yak lace. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI.

L. W.—The Napoleon blue percales for house dresses will be made with a sailor blouse and two skirts, trimmed with ruffles edged with a tiny bias fold of white linen. For the street this goods will be made up with a belted polonaise and single skirt.

MRS. H. H.—Tulle is commonly pronounced tool, in default of being able to give the indescribable sound of the French u.

W. D. E.—"Regrets" should be written on a note sheet and worded formally in the third person, as follows: "Mr. Smith sends his compliments to Mrs. Jones, and regrets the necessity of declining her kind invitation for Thursday evening."

CAMILLE.—Get a darker brown sleeveless jacket, sash, and bias bands of pongee to renovate your light brown pongee dress. Your sister should get brown silk and use in the same way for her striped silk. Make a double-breasted redingote of your gray striped alpaca to wear over a white linen blouse-waist, and a black alpaca or silk skirt, trimmed with bias folds, upright puffs, or flounces of the gray.—For hints about hair read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 8, Vol. VI.

GRATITUDE.—Get a summer poplin of Napoleon blue for your daughter's suit, and blend gray-blue with it. Make a sleeveless jacket of the darkest shade. A polonaise of your polka-dotted barége would be pretty over a cheap silk skirt of the same shade. Get the beaver mohair brand for your summer alpaca. The square-meshed canvas grenadine is most serviceable. A silk skirt flounced with grenadine and worn with a polonaise of the same is the best arrangement. We can not recall any former letter of your signature.

ALMONDA.—Your sample did not reach us. The answer above to "Camille" will probably apply to your case.

MRS. JAMES B.—We do not make purchases for our readers.

A SOUTHERN ADMIRER.—Your dress pattern is only suitable for an evening dress. It should be made with a low square-necked polonaise lined with rose-colored silk, and worn over a silk skirt flounced with the gauze. It would not answer for a princesse dress. Sage green, réséda, and olive shades will continue in fashion, and when associated with pale buff and rose-color are becoming to brunettes. Blue will be greatly used. Black grenadines with black polka dots will be more stylish than those with colored dots; colored silk facing ruffles and bias silk bands will be worn on black grenadine.

ONTARIO.—The cut paper pattern of a beautiful over dress for little girls can now be furnished you. It is low and square-necked, and forms part of the girl's patterns that cost only 25 cents for the entire set.

ANTOINETTE.—The cut paper patterns illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. VI., will afford models for your little sisters' dresses. The deep blue or gray sailor suits of flannel will be useful for cool mornings. Then get corded piqué, linen, and percale dresses for other occasions. They should wear thin merino or gauze under-vests all summer on account of difference of climate. Get gray vigogne, or else sage green poplin, for your traveling dress; palest blue silk for evening; a black silk, black polka-dotted grenadine, and a gray-blue pongee suit for street dresses; for the house get écru and blue linen, and blue percale with polka dots. We can not suggest styles for all your own and the children's dresses. You must read the New York Fashions and Madame Raymond's letters, and consult our plates, and then make the application to your own case.

MAY.—Do not get a pattern robe, but plain cashmere, either gray or violet, trimmed with a deep flounce around the bottom, and silk buttons, cuffs, collar, and sash, with belt, silver buckle, and chatelaine. Order wrapper pattern from this office, for 25 cents. For summer have white nansook wrappers in Watteau style trimmed with side pleatings, embroidery, and Valenciennes lace. Get gray vigogne traveling dress made with a double-breasted polonaise fastened by large cut steel buttons. Trim the black silk skirt and polonaise with flounces, lace, and jet. The cuir-colored silk should be made over with a dark brown sleeveless jacket, sash, apron, and ruffles. See New York Fashions of Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI. Make a pretty afternoon dress of your green checked silk. Read answer just given "Antoinette."

PERPLEXITY.—Get gray serge, vigogne, or camel's-hair for your traveling suit. Make it with a double-breasted redingote fastened by large steel buttons, and trim with kilt pleating and bias silk bands. Get black straw Castilian hat. See New York Fashions of Bazar No. 12, Vol. VI.

ENTERPRISE.—Descriptions of stitches are given in Bazars No. 19, Vol. I., and No. 11, Vol. III. The netted foundation of the design you refer to is worked with knitting cotton or glazed cotton.

MISS S. H.—A basque, apron, and skirt of bombazine, with sleeveless jacket, cuffs, and alternate kilt pleats of English crape, is the handsomest model for you. Wear your long veil over your face at present, but in summer draw it to the left side across your bonnet. The Double-breasted jacket illustrated in Bazar No. 43, Vol. V., is what you want.

INQUIRER, A. S. P., AND OTHERS.—There is an effort to abolish tournures and all kinds of crinoline, but thus far it has not been very successful. The tournure is probably on the wane, but will be worn through the summer season.

MRS. B. S. P.—Your boy is too young for pantaloons. He should wear kilt skirts of piqué and linen, with a jacket and vest, or else a sailor blouse or a longer double-breasted belted blouse. For your summer dresses read descriptions in Bazar No. 13, Vol. VI.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—ÉCRU PONGEE WALKING SUIT.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—GROS GRAIN WALKING DRESS.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—BLACK GROS GRAIN WALKING SUIT.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 6.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 7–11.

Fig. 5.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 6.—BLACK GROS GRAIN WALKING SUIT.—BACK.—[See Fig. 4.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 7–11.

Fig. 7.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 7 TO 9 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 8.—VIOLET CASHMERE HOUSE DRESS.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 9.—DRESS FOR CHILD UNDER 1 YEAR OLD.
For description see Supplement.

FIGS. 1–9.—LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SPRING SUITS.

Hosted by Google

Swiss Muslin, Faille, and Lace Fichu-Collar.

THIS fichu-collar is made of Swiss muslin folds seven-eighths of an inch wide and purple faille folds of the same width, and is trimmed with narrow and wide white lace. The folds overlap each other half an inch. A faille bow is set in front. Fig. 17, Supplement, gives the shape of the fichu-collar.

Faille and Lace Fichu, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS blue faille fichu is trimmed with white lace seven-eighths of an inch and two inches wide, white silk gimp half an inch wide, and bows of blue faille ribbon an inch and seven-eighths wide. To make the fichu cut of faille two pieces from Fig. 12, Supplement, and two pieces of double material from Fig. 13, having first joined on the piece turned down in Supplement on Fig. 12. Line the pieces, Fig. 12, with Swiss muslin from the front edge to seven-eighths of an inch beyond the dotted line. Fold these pieces on the outside along the dotted line, pleat them, bringing both ×'s on ●, trim as shown by the illustration, and join the neck with the collar according to the corresponding figures. The collar is first sewed up from 24 to 25, rolled along the dotted line, pleated, and trimmed. Finish it with the remainder of the trimming, and with buttons and sewed loops for closing, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 1.—FAILLE AND LACE FICHU.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 12 and 13.

SWISS MUSLIN, FAILLE, AND LACE FICHU-COLLAR.
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 17.

Fig. 2.—FAILLE AND LACE FICHU.—BACK.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 12 and 13.

Removal of Ink Stains from Colored Fabrics.

TO remove ink stains from colored fabrics where either oxalic acid or chloride of lime is undesirable, it is recommended to use a concentrated solution of pyrophosphate of soda. The action is slow, and must be repeated—especially when the stains are old ones—and therefore a good percentage of patience has to cooperate with the above chemical application.

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 7 TO 9 YEARS OLD.—FRONT. [See Fig. 7.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 42–47.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 48–57.

Fig. 3.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 11 TO 13 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 5.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 6.—DRESSING-GOWN FOR BOY FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 7.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 7 TO 9 YEARS OLD.—BACK. [See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 42–47.

Fig. 8.—SUIT FOR BOY FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For pattern see description in Supplement.

FIGS. 1–8.—SPRING SUITS FOR GIRLS AND BOYS FROM 3 TO 13 YEARS OLD.

Hosted by Google

AT THE GARDEN GATE.

SOMEBODY came to the garden gate
While a soft hand trimmed the flowers,
And a blackbird piped to his listening mate
In a language as rich as ours.

Somebody blushed at the garden gate—
A blush it was fair to see;
And the sly sun peered as he fain would wait,
And the blackbird paused on the tree.

Somebody spoke at the garden gate,
As the shadows began to fall;
And the rose looked up, though the hour was late,
And the peach blushed pink on the wall.

A sweet head fell at the garden gate
On an arm that was strong and true,
And a chirrup of lips was heard to state
What words refused to do.

LONDON'S HEART.

BY B. L. FARJEON,

AUTHOR OF "BLADE-O'-GRASS," "GRIF," AND "JOSHUA MARVEL."

CHAPTER XLIV.

A CRISIS.

WHEN old Wheels entered the house he expected Lily to run down stairs to meet him, and he was surprised that he did not hear her voice welcoming him. Indeed, knowing her nature, he was quite prepared to find her waiting and watching for him at the street-door or in the passage, and he was somewhat disappointed, when he put the key in the lock and listened, to hear no sound. Notwithstanding that a deep feeling of sadness was upon him, created by Martha Day's words and by Lizzie's strange absence, the happiness that lay in the assurance that Lily's future was safe was more than sufficient to counterbalance all depression. When Felix had the right to protect his darling from the snares by which she had been surrounded—snares which her own loving nature had strengthened—trouble would weigh lightly upon him. But he could not shake off the uneasiness caused by the scene through which he had just passed. It was so strange and inexplicable: Lizzie's disappearance, for which her mother, who had parted from her but a few hours before, could not account; Alfred's absence; and, added to these, the circumstance of Mr. Musgrave not being at home. He resolved that he would not tell Lily. "Let the child enjoy her happiness," he thought; "Alfred is sure to be home some time to-night." Ascending the stairs, he entered the sitting-room, and looked around for Lily. She was not there. "The puss!" he thought, with a smile. "She thinks Alfred is with me, and she is hiding herself. Lily! Lily!" No sound broke the silence that followed, as the old man stood, with head inclined, listening for the response. But the silence seemed to speak, and his heart turned cold. He looked around again with a vacant eye, and murmured, more than cried, in a helpless tone, "Lily! Lily!" with the same result. He wandered into her bedroom, and into every room in the house, but found no trace of his darling. Then a feeling came upon him, like the feeling of death, and almost deprived him of consciousness. But after a little time, by a strong effort of will, he recovered himself somewhat. "I must think! I must think!" he murmured; and wrenching his mind from the lethargy of despair which was stealing over it, he thought over all that had occurred. Presently a comforting thought came to him: the coincidence of Lizzie being absent from her house was a sufficient reason for his darling not being at home. "I have been away longer than Lily expected," he thought, as he descended the stairs toward the street. "Lily grew anxious, and coming after me, met Lizzie, and perhaps Alfred as well. I must have missed them on the way." In the hope and expectation of finding both the girls and his grandson there, he retraced his steps to Lizzie's house; but the place was dark and deserted, and he obtained no response to his knocks and cries. Even Martha Day was gone. In greater distress of mind, and with a terrible fear stealing upon him, which he found it impossible to shake off, he returned to his own house, and leaving the street-door open, wandered in an uncertain manner again through every room, searching in the most unlikely places. He looked about for a note, a line, from Lily to account for her absence, but not a trace of her writing was to be seen. Not knowing what to think or do, he stood helpless in the middle of the room, with clasped hands, as if waiting for some sign. For the space of little more than a minute he stood thus, when a church-bell began to chime the hour of ten, and as the sound fell upon his ears, he heard the street-door pushed softly open, and afterward a light step upon the stairs. A sudden rush of tears came to his eyes, and the feeling of grateful relief he experienced almost overpowered him. "Thank God! She has come back, and I have been tormenting myself with foolish fears." But there entered the room, not Lily, but Felix. He approached the old man with outstretched hand, and looked eagerly around.

"Ten o'clock exactly," he said, in a cheery tone; "I said I'd be here at ten. I came by the road too. Where's Lily?"

The old man could not find voice to answer the question, and the agitation expressed in his troubled eyes was reflected instantly in the eyes of Felix, as in a mirror. For a moment a shadow rested upon Felix's hitherto joyful face, like a mist upon a mirror, dimming its brightness.

"Where's Lily?" he asked again, hurriedly.

"You have not met her, then?" asked the old man, faintly, in reply.

The shadow instantly passed away, and Felix's face became bright again.

"Seen her! No. Has she gone to meet me? The dear girl! She thought, perhaps, I was coming by train."

He was about to leave the room with the intention of running to the railway station, when old Wheels, who had received the suggestion with a feeling of intense gratitude, convinced that Felix had placed the right construction upon Lily's absence, called out to him to stop for a moment.

"I will go with you, Felix," he said.

Felix waited at the street-door for him, but before the old man left the house he went into Lily's bedroom. He had not thought before of ascertaining whether Lily's hat and mantle were in their usual place. They were not there.

"Of course she has gone to the railway station," he said to himself, smiling. "It's so long since I was young that I see every thing through sixty-year-old spectacles. Ah, young hearts! young hearts!"

His own uneasiness had caused him for the time to lose sight of Lizzie's strange absence and of Martha Day's agitation; but as Felix and he walked to the railway station they recurred to him, and he narrated to Felix the history of the events that had occurred within the last hour.

"Lizzie gone, and Alfred not come home!" Felix exclaimed, in amazement. "And Martha had no knowledge of Lizzie's movements?"

"None; she was terribly distressed at Lizzie's disappearance."

"Tell me. Have you seen Mr. Sheldrake to-day?"

"No."

"He would scarcely be in London," mused Felix. "He would be certain to go to Epsom and see the City and Suburban run." Then to the old man, "And Alfred went to the office this morning at his usual hour, you say?"

"Surely; and was brighter than I have seen him for many a day."

Notwithstanding these apparently satisfactory answers concerning Alfred, Felix found food for grave reflection in the information; but the occurrence of other events prevented him from dwelling too deeply upon what he had been told. As they approached the railway station they saw a number of persons hurrying thither, and some coming from it, with looks of haste and alarm. Felix was about to inquire the cause of this—for there was something unusual in the commotion, and it was evident that an incident out of the common had occurred—when the very man of whom he was about to inquire seized his arm and asked if he was a doctor.

"No," replied Felix; "why do you ask?"

"There's been an accident on the line," said the man, as he hastened away.

"Jim Podmore is employed at this station," said Felix to old Wheels, quickening his steps as he spoke. "Let's get there quickly."

He was thinking of Lily, and of her alarm if she happened to be at the station at the time of the accident. And upon the shock of this news, and of its probably evil consequences to his humble friends, came a dim presage of ill which increased his excitement. Suddenly he paused, and said to the old man,

"One moment—only a moment—for reflection."

And in scarcely more than that space of time he became composed. He had resolutely shaken off all signs of agitation, and he was now cool and collected.

"It has occurred twice in my life," he said, rapidly and distinctly, "to be placed in a position of great peril, where a moment's haste, or a single false step, might have been attended with a fatal result. At the exact instant it was required I have recovered the self-possession I had lost, and thereby have been enabled to escape the danger. This same feeling has come upon me within the last minute or two. Do not interrupt me, but hear me out, and act as I desire." He paused to recover his breath. "So many strange things have taken place to-night that I can not overcome the impression that something of serious moment to persons whom we love has occurred, or may occur. If it be so—and I am convinced that my feeling springs from something more than mere nervousness—only calm reflection and steady action will help us. Lily may not be here; she may have arrived home in our absence, and will be alarmed that there is no one there to receive her. Nay, she will not be able to get into the house. If she goes round to Lizzie's house, she will find no one there. Do you see what I mean? We are wasting our forces. Two men are doing the work of one. Hurry home as quickly as you can. If Lily is there, wait with her until I come; or she may return while you are waiting. If she is at the station, I will return home with her as soon as possible. Under any circumstances, we are wrong in leaving the house alone. And mind," he concluded, with a detaining grasp on the old man's arm, "whether Lily is at home or not, or whether she come or not, do not stir from the house until I arrive."

The old man comprehended the wisdom of the arrangement, and saying, hurriedly, "I will act exactly as you desire, Felix," walked back toward his house.

Felix then ran to the station, and with some little trouble obtained permission to the platform. There he found every thing in confusion. A train had run off the line, and the rails were torn up.

"Is any body hurt?" he asked, in a tone of authority.

"Only a child, fortunately; but she seems to be hurt rather badly. There were not many persons in the train."

"Whose fault was it?"

"The pointsman's, they say. He was half asleep when the accident occurred—the lazy scamp!"

"The pointsman!" exclaimed Felix. "That's Mr. Podmore."

"I don't know his name, I'm sure," the man replied—it was a passenger who had answered Felix's questions—"but whatever it is, he ought to be made an example of, and I hope he will be."

A man employed at the station, who had heard the last question, said, as he passed, "Yes, it's Podmore's doing, this time."

Felix's first anxiety was for Lily, but he could not see her. He made his way into the waiting-room, and saw, in the centre of a little group, a child lying as if dead in the lap of a weeping woman. He darted forward.

"Good God!" he cried, as he leaned over the sad couple. "It's little Polly!"

The weeping woman looked up into his face, and recognized him through her fast-flowing tears.

"She won't want any more dolls," she sobbed, with a gasp between each word. "My Polly! my darling! she's dead! she's dead! Oh, Polly, my blessed, why was not I kilied too!"

The piteous words cut Felix's heart and made it bleed. He laid his hand commiseratingly upon Mrs. Podmore's shoulder.

"Thank you, Sir," she sobbed; "thank you. You never thought to see Polly like this, did you? Oh, why don't the doctor come! Will no one bring a doctor? Look after Jim, Sir, for the love of God, and comfort him if you can."

Felix turned, and saw Jim Podmore standing, with clinched hands and writhing form, apart from the group, and with so strong an agony in his face that Felix stepped swiftly to the side of the suffering man.

"Don't touch me!" cried Jim Podmore, hoarsely, shrinking from the contact. "Don't lay a finger on me! I ain't safe to be touched or talked to. I've killed my child! I've killed what's dearer to me than life, and I want judgment to fall upon me!"

His looks were so wild that Felix feared for his reason; and knowing that it would do the man good to give vent to his grief, said, in a gentle tone,

"You know me, Mr. Podmore? I am your friend—Felix."

Jim Podmore softened at the sound of the friendly voice. He turned his face from Felix, and said:

"Ah, Sir, she loved you, my Polly did! Your name was always on her tongue; and it was only this morning she told me of the new doll you promised her. She said you had another ship come home. She didn't know, when she cuddled me in bed afore I went to work that I meant to kill her afore the day was out. 'And when's your ship coming home, father?' she asked me; 'and when's your ship coming home, father?' Good Lord help me! My ship's come home to-night, and my pet's laying dead afore my eyes! What right have I to stand here a living man, with that sight afore me?"

A man—a fellow-workman—was coming toward Jim with somewhat of a rough manner, when Felix gently put him aside.

"Let him be," Felix said; "let him have his talk out. It will do him good. He knows that I'm his friend, and he doesn't mind pouring out his grief to me. There's no one else hurt, I hope?"

"No one else, Sir," said the man, respectfully.

"Thank God for that! Keep the people away from us, if you can."

Felix had drawn Jim out of the waiting-room; but although Jim could see neither his wife nor child, he spoke of Polly as if she were lying before him.

"Says my pet, a-laying there afore my eyes, as we was a-cuddling one another, 'Felix has got another ship come home, father, and there's a doll in it for Polly. There's a doll in it for Polly,' she says. She went all through with it, as she's done dozens o' times afore; and she says, with her eyes shut, 'Here's the ship a-sailing, a-sailing, and here's the waves a-curling, a-curling'—she knew it by heart, Sir, every word of it—'and here's the captain a-bowing, a-bowing.' And then she shuts her eyes tighter, and says, for all the world as if she was in a dream, 'And here's the stars a-shining, a-shining.' Is it my pet that's a-laying afore my eyes in a dream now, and can she see the stars a-shining, a-shining?"

A voice only a few yards away said,

"Here's the doctor. Move away, and let the child have some air."

The words reached Felix's ears; but Jim Podmore was deaf to every thing but his grief and despair.

"Whose fault was it? I heard some ask. Whose fault? Was it mine, when I was that dead beat with long hours and overwork that I couldn't keep my eyelids open? And I didn't know my pet was in the train. I thought mother and her was home long ago. But I know'd it 'd come to this—I've feared it for months and months. If it wasn't to-night, it 'd come some other time. But I shouldn't ha' minded then, for I shouldn't ha' killed my pet. Ah, Snap, if I'd only ha' known! There was him a-pulling at my trowsers with his teeth, and I never understood him a bit—not a bit."

Felix looked down, and saw the faithful dog standing at some little distance, watching its master with sympathetic eyes. It seemed to Felix as if it knew that something serious had occurred. Jim Podmore was somewhat calmer now, and seated himself on a bench, and rocked himself to and fro, with his head in his hands.

"Don't move for a minute," said Felix. "I want to go into the room to hear what the doctor says. You'll promise not to move till I come back?"

Jim, by a motion of his shoulders, gave the promise, and Felix went into the waiting-room. The people made way for him, and, to Felix's inexpressible relief, he heard the doctor's voice saying, cheerily,

"There, there; it's not so bad after all! No bones broke. Shook a little—that's all. Killed! not at all, thank God!"

And "Thank God! thank God!" came from a dozen lips, and a ray of hope stole into Mrs. Podmore's white face.

"The little thing will live to be an old woman, please God," the doctor continued. "Now don't be a foolish mother." Mrs. Podmore had taken his hand and kissed it. "You must be a wise and steady mother; and if you don't at once stop crying like that, I declare you'll do your little girl a deal of harm." Mrs. Podmore instantly suppressed her sobs. "Pretty little thing! See, she is recovering already!"

Pollypod opened her eyes, and raised her arms to her mother's neck. Mrs. Podmore was about to clasp the child to her breast in the overflow of her joy, but the doctor restrained her.

"No, not like that. Take her in your arms gently. Do you live far from here? No—that's right, that's right. I'll go home with you, and will see the little girl comfortably in bed.—You feel all right, don't you, little one?"

Pollypod answered, "Yes, Sir," in a weak voice; and seeing Felix, her eyes brightened, and she held out her hand to him. Mrs. Podmore whispered,

"Tell my husband, Sir, and bring him to me."

Felix hastened to comply. Jim Podmore could not easily be made to understand that his precious Pollypod was comparatively unhurt; but when he did so his grateful emotion impressed Felix deeply.

"I've lost my situation, Sir; but I sha'n't mind that now. I'll try and get a living in a fairer way than this."

"And I'll help you," said Felix; "but tell me, before you join your wife, have you seen any thing of Lily on the platform to-night?"

Jim Podmore considered for a moment, and pressed his hands across his eyes to clear away the clouds.

"My memory's almost gone, Sir, for every thing but this. Yet I think I should ha' remembered seeing Lily if she'd been here. No, Sir, I haven't seen her; but that ain't saying she ain't been here. The nearest thing to it is the up train from Epsom."

"The up train from Epsom!" echoed Felix, not seeing the connection.

"It stopped here; and one of our porters got a shilling from a passenger for taking a letter to Miss Lizzie—Master Alfred's sweetheart, Sir."

Felix gave a start, but knew that it would be cruel to detain Jim any longer from his wife and child. The last thing he saw before he left the station on his way to old Wheels was Jim Podmore lifting Polly tenderly in his arms.

Old Wheels was waiting at the street-door for Felix's return in a state of intense anxiety; and when he saw Felix coming along by himself his anxiety was redoubled. Felix knew immediately by the expression in the old man's face that Lily had not come home.

"No news of Lily, Sir?" he asked, as he drew the old man into the house.

"None, Felix. And you?"

"She has not been seen at the railway station."

It was necessary that he should tell old Wheels of the accident caused by Jim Podmore, and he did so in as few words as possible.

"I am glad that little Polly is not seriously hurt," said old Wheels—"very, very glad. But I am in dreadful anxiety about Lily."

"I too, Sir. She is our first and only care. You have no theory to account for her absence?"

"None, Felix."

"Her hat and cloak are gone," said Felix, following out a train of thought as he spoke. "That is a proof that she went from the house with deliberate intentions. We must not rest until we find her—that's understood."

"Yes, yes, Felix; go on."

"The first thing to ascertain is if any body is at home at Mr. Musgrave's house. I will run round and see."

Felix returned in a very short time.

"No one is there; the house is quite deserted. There is some connection between Lily's absence and theirs. The only thing I can not understand is that Lily did not leave a line of writing behind in explanation. She knows what deep anxiety her absence would cause."

"Felix," said the old man, in a low tone, "can there have been some foul play?"

Felix did not reply for a few moments; he was mentally busy deciding on the best course of action.

"If there is, we will find it out, depend upon it, Sir. I have a clew. I learned at the station that a passenger from Epsom gave a porter a shilling to take a letter to Lizzie. That letter either came from Alfred or Mr. Musgrave, and upon the receipt of that letter Lizzie has disappeared."

"It could not have come from Alfred," interposed old Wheels; "he was at his office."

"We must be sure of that. I have my suspicions that he did not go to work to-day. Now, Sir, you must still be content to remain quiet, while I ride to London. I shall have no difficulty in obtaining the fastest horse from the stables near here."

"What is your object in going to London, Felix?" asked the old man, gaining confidence from Felix's firm tone.

"I am acquainted with a person employed in Alfred's office. I can obtain from him the information whether Alfred has been at his work to-day. Without that information, we might take a false step; with it (if it be as I suspect), I think I see part of my way. I shall be back sooner than you expect. I am a good rider, and I shall not spare my horse on such an errand."

Felix made good use of his time. It was barely half past twelve o'clock as he ran up stairs to old Wheels, flushed with the exercise.

Hosted by Google

He cast a sharp glance around, and old Wheels shook his head, saying,

"No, Felix, she has not returned."

"I was right in my suspicions, Sir. Alfred has not been at his office to-day. He asked for leave of absence on the plea that you required his assistance at home."

"Where can he have spent his time, then?"

"At Epsom. A great race called the City and Suburban was run to-day, and Alfred has been betting on that race, and has lost. Now, Sir, can you bear a shock?"

Old Wheels waited in trembling suspense. "A greater one than has already fallen?" he murmured.

"As great, almost," replied Felix, gravely; "but it is necessary that you should know. From what I have heard to-night I suspect Alfred has been using money that does not belong to him."

Old Wheels covered his face with his hands and sobbed quietly. Felix continued, steadily:

"My acquaintance who is employed in Messrs. Tickle and Flint's office was desired this afternoon by one of his employers to tell Alfred to step into the private office immediately he arrived to-morrow morning, and my acquaintance told me that, from the tone in which the message was delivered, he believed something serious had transpired. Can you see the connection between these things, and Lily's connection with them? Alfred, having lost in the race money that did not belong to him, is afraid to show his face at the office, is afraid to come home. A letter arrived for Lizzie from Epsom; that letter is written by him, and tells her probably of the danger he is in. Lizzie disappears without warning, without leaving word or message behind her. Why? She is afraid of compromising Alfred. Where has Lizzie gone to? The letter she received from Alfred guided her steps without doubt. Do you agree with me that we have now accounted for Alfred's and Lizzie's absence?"

"Yes, but how do you connect Lily with these movements? Remember that when I left Lily in this house, at half past nine o'clock, neither she nor I had any suspicion of these occurrences. We thought Lizzie was at her house; we expected Alfred's arrival home every moment. Before that time Lizzie must have received the letter from Alfred, and must have gone to join him. Where?"

"There is the difficult point, Sir. If we could ascertain where Lizzie has gone, and how, it would be a most important point. The only livery-stable near is the one from which I hired the horse to go to London on." And here Felix stamped his foot, and exclaimed, excitedly, "Fool that I was, not to have made inquiries there! We must go there at once, you and I. You may be of use. There will be no sleep for either of us to-night."

Before they left the house they went up stairs to the Podmores, to see how Polly was, and to leave a message with Mrs. Podmore, in the unlikely contingency of Lily's returning in their absence. Polly was asleep, and mother and father were watching by her bedside. Snap licked Felix's hand as he stooped to pat the dog's head.

"Snap knows what a friend you are to us," said Mrs. Podmore, in a whisper; "but you seem in trouble. Has Lily gone to bed?"

She was soon made acquainted with their trouble, and promised obedience to Felix's instructions.

"I don't suppose either Jim or me will close our eyes this night," she said; "but one of us will be sure to be on the watch. If Lily comes back while you are away, we'll keep her here until you return."

Felix hastily wrote a few lines to Lily, and intrusting them to Mrs. Podmore, kissed Pollypod tenderly.

"You have much to be grateful for," he said to Mrs. Podmore.

"Ah, Sir, we have indeed!" she answered. "God bless you, and send you success and happiness!"

Felix and old Wheels shook hands with Jim Podmore, and were soon at the livery-stables. There was only one man there, and they had some difficulty in arousing him. He referred to the books, and said that no lady had engaged any thing from the yard that night.

"Two saddle-horses have been taken out since seven o'clock," said the man, with his eye on the page on which the record was made, "a brougham and pair for a customer" (mentioning his name, which satisfied Felix that it could not be for Lily), "and a cab."

"Who hired the cab?"

"Can't say. One of our men, Thompson by name, has gone with it. Hired by a gentleman; ten pounds left as deposit."

"How long was it hired for?"

"Can't say, Sir; all night, most likely. Thompson is generally selected for the long jobs. You know Thompson, Sir?"

"No, I do not."

"He's a tallish man, with his nose on one side, and a harelip; wears an old white overcoat. Now I think of it, I saw him and the cab waiting at the door of the True Blue public-house."

"Ah!" exclaimed Felix, briskly. "At what time?"

"About half past nine, I should say. I happened to be passing just then, and, now I think of it, Thompson and me had a drink."

"Thank you," said Felix, with sudden animation. "Here's something to get another drink. Is the True Blue a late house?"

"Got a one-o'clock license, Sir. Thank you, Sir."

"It's ten minutes to one," said Felix, looking at his watch. "Come along, Mr. Wheels; we shall get there before the house closes."

And he ran out of the livery-yard, followed by old Wheels. Lounging about the bar of the True Blue they found the usual class of customers, who were being urged by the landlord to leave, as the time was come to close the house. The pot-man was busy with shutters and bolts; behind the bar was the landlady. She knew old Wheels, and she nodded to him. Felix was a stranger to her, but she cast a favorable eye upon him, nevertheless.

"Can we have one minute's private conversation with you?" asked Felix. "And there is time, isn't there, for us to drink a glass or two of your best dry sherry?"

The landlady glanced at the clock, as a matter of form—it was five minutes to one—and said,

"Would you like to step into our little room, gentlemen; you'll find it more comfortable?—Now turn out, my men, if you don't want to be put out!"

That it would certainly come to this with some of the customers of the True Blue was evident: one man was especially loath to go.

"Just another pint, missis," he urged; "just another pint, and then we'll toddle," in a tone of such entreaty that, to one unacquainted with the usual proceedings of such topers, it might reasonably have been inferred that his very life depended upon that other pint, and that the most serious consequences to his health would ensue if it were refused. The landlady paid no attention to the entreaty, but devoted herself to Felix and old Wheels, who had stepped into the parlor at her invitation. Seeing that she only set two glasses before them, Felix called for two more, and hoped that the landlady and her husband would join them. He completed the conquest by drinking prosperity to the True Blue, and then proceeded to business.

"We have come to consult you upon a matter of much importance, my dear madam," he said, "and we hope you will give us what assistance you can."

"Any thing that is in my power, Sir," replied the landlady, flattered by the courtesy of so well-looking a young man as Felix; "I am sure I shall be most happy."

"We do not wish it talked about," continued Felix; "so suppose we agree that it shall be a secret between us, taking your husband into our confidence, of course."

The landlady expressed her acquiescence, her curiosity growing.

"It will take the form of questions, I am afraid," observed Felix.

"You've only to ask, Sir," said the amiable woman, "and I'll answer, if I can."

"There was a cab waiting at your door at about half past nine o'clock to-night, was there not?"

"There have been three or four waiting, on and off."

"But there was one in particular, from the livery-stables near here, with the driver Thompson, a man with a crooked nose and a harelip. He came in here to drink with a mate from the yard."

"Yes, he did," was the ready reply. "There's no mistaking Thompson once you set eyes upon him."

"Can you tell us who hired that cab?"

"I should say it was the gentleman who was about the house for an hour or more, and who was in this very parlor for more than ten minutes talking with—with—" But her eyes lighted upon old Wheels, who was listening with strained attention to every word that passed, and she hesitated.

"Talking with whom?" inquired Felix, quickly. "With a gentleman?"

"No," with another hesitating look toward old Wheels; "with a lady."

"A young lady?"

"Yes."

"Do not hesitate to answer, there's a good creature. You know who the lady is, evidently."

"Yes, but I would rather not say. If you like to mention who you think it is, I'll tell you if you're right."

"Was it this gentleman's granddaughter?" asked Felix, hazarding the guess.

Old Wheels held his breath.

"Yes, it was," answered the landlady, reluctantly. "There! you shouldn't have forced it out of me! Look at the old gentleman!"

A deadly pallor had come over his face, and he could scarcely stand.

"You must not give way, Sir," said Felix, with grave tenderness; "every thing depends upon your keeping your strength. Bear in mind that this is what we have come to hear, and that we are approaching nearer and nearer to the unraveling of the plot. And remember, too, dear Sir, that I have almost as great a stake in the discovery as you have yourself. There has been foul play, as you suggested; but something assures me that all will come right, and that our dear girl will be restored to us in a few hours. But not if we're not strong. Remember—we are working together for Lily's safety."

His tone was so tender that tears came into the landlady's eyes.

"I will tell you all I know," she said, addressing herself to Felix. "The young lady came in here, and asked me if she could have the use of the parlor for a few minutes undisturbed. She wanted to speak to the gentleman who came in the cab. They were in the parlor for ten minutes, and then they went away together in the cab."

"Thank you, thank you, a thousand times.—See, Sir, how near we are coming.—Now this gentleman—who was he?"

"I am sure I don't know, Sir; I never set eyes on him before to-night."

Felix thought of Alfred, and described his personal appearance. No, it wasn't him, said the landlady. Then Felix described Mr. Sheldrake, and she answered that it was the very man.

Felix drew a long breath; he was almost at the end of the inquiry. One other question remained to be asked. Did she know what direction the cab had taken? No, she didn't know; but she would call the pot-man in; he was outside all the time. The pot-man was called in, and being refreshed with a drink and a shilling, remembered, after much circumlocution, that he heard the gentleman tell Thompson to drive toward Epsom.

"Nearer and nearer," said Felix, grasping the old man's hand. "Now, pot-man, is there any thing else you know? Another shilling if you can remember any thing else."

The pot-man scratched his head.

"There's the shilling," said Felix, in a hearty tone, giving the man the coin, "whether you can remember or not."

"You're a gentleman, Sir," said the pot-man. "I don't remember any thing else; but there's Dick Maclean, perhaps he can tell something."

The public-house was empty by this time, and the bar was cleared.

"Run out, Tom," said the landlady, excitedly, "and if you see him bring him in." The pot-man ran out at the back-door. The landlady explained. "Dick has been drinking here all night, Sir. You bring to my mind that I saw the gentleman who was here with the young lady give him some money."

They had not to wait a very long time for Dick Maclean. He was the man who had begged for more beer, and the pot-man found him outside entreating through the key-hole for "just another pint." He was fairly drunk, but upon the landlady promising him that other pint, and telling him that the gentleman wanted him to earn half a crown simply by answering a question or two, he pulled himself together, and endeavored to earn it. The skillful manner in which Felix put these questions caused the landlady to ask, admiringly, if he was a lawyer. Felix stopped his questioning to answer, No; and the landlady said, To be sure! How could he be? He wasn't dried up enough. When the cross-examination was over they had learned all: of Mr. Sheldrake giving Dick Maclean a letter to take to Lily, and of the instruction that he was to give it to the young lady in secret, and to tell her, if he found any difficulty in delivering it, that it was a matter of life or death to some one whom she loved; of the young lady accompanying him to the True Blue to see Mr. Sheldrake; of their going into the public-house together; of their coming out together; of the young lady giving him a letter to deliver to Mr. Wheels, and giving him a sixpence to deliver it; of her getting into the cab, and of his going into the True Blue for just another pint before he went with the letter; of Mr. Sheldrake coming after him, and telling him that the young lady had altered her mind, and didn't want the letter delivered; of his getting a shilling for that; and that was all.

It was enough. It was as clear as day to Felix. The pot-man and Dick being sent out of the room, Felix said that what they wanted now was a light trap and a smart horse. Now thoroughly enthusiastic in the cause, the landlady said they had in their stables the lightest trap and the smartest trotting mare out of London.

"You're a kind creature," said Felix, shaking hands with her. "Will you trust us with it?"

That she would, and with a dozen of them if she had them. The landlord assented.

"Now what shall I leave with you as security?" asked Felix. "Here are four five-pound notes, here is my watch and chain—"

The landlady rejected them enthusiastically. She only wanted two things as security—his name and his word. He gave them, and thanked her heartily again and again. While the smartest trotting mare out of London was being harnessed, old Wheels looked at Felix wistfully, earnestly, humbly. Felix understood him. He put his arm round the old man's shoulder, and said, in a tone of infinite tenderness,

"Dear Sir, I never loved Lily as I love her now. I never trusted her as I trust her now. Dear girl! Pure heart! When I lose my faith in her, may I lose my hope of a better life than this!"

His face lighted up as he uttered these words. The old man pressed him in his arms, and sobbed upon his shoulder. The landlady turned aside to have a quiet cry in the corner.

"You're a good young fellow," she said, in the midst of her indulgence, "and I'm glad you came to me."

Before five minutes had passed they were in the lightest trap and behind the smartest trotting mare out of London, ready to start.

"Here!" cried the landlady. And running to the wheels, she handed up a great parcel of sandwiches and a bottle of brandy. "It's the right stuff," she said, between laughing and crying. "Our own particular!"

The next minute they were on the road to Epsom.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

WE see novelties springing up on all sides, not only in fabrics, but in every thing pertaining to female apparel. As concerns fabrics, these novelties are very peculiar. The new spring stuffs both of wool and silk are made to imitate lace in their texture, and it is difficult to imagine, without seeing them, what pretty effects can be obtained with these lace-like fabrics, which are made of all colors from black to white, passing through the various shades which are in fashion. They are almost always worn over a skirt of a different color, which shows through the transparent net-work of the stuff. All these dresses have parasols to match, with a lining of the same color as the under-skirt of the dress. A polonaise which I lately saw, made of this new fabric; was of very pale maize, with skirt, waist, and close sleeves of pink faille. The polonaise was very long, extending to the top of the flounce that bordered the skirt, and was open on each side. Boots of the same material and color as the polonaise. Parasol also of the same material and color, with pink lining.

For a less dressy toilette the polonaise would be worn over a skirt of brown or black faille. When the fabric is white, it produces exactly the same effect as a guipure over dress. When black, it is worn over lilac, violet, green, pink, or blue silk.

The style of hair-dressing is still of eccentric simplicity, if I may venture to define it in two words. I will attempt to describe that worn the other day at a dinner-party by Mademoiselle Favart, the distinguished artiste of the Theatre Français: The short hair above the nape of the neck was parted in the middle, and simply combed on each side and flattened down. Above this parting the hair was carelessly combed upward over a very small crêpe, and arranged in torsages, which were looped together and fastened at the right side, on the crown of the head, with a large pin of light shell, closely resembling a huge shawl-pin. Mademoiselle Favart's hair, by-the-way, is jet black. The front hair was partly arranged in small light curls, which shaded the forehead; the greater part of it, however, was combed upward, and artistically joined with the rest of the hair, on the crown of the head, in graceful confusion. The dress was of very pale pinkish-gray satin, and was composed of a trained skirt, over-skirt edged with silver-fox fur, and sleeveless basque, trimmed with the same fur, and open in front to the waist, over a voluminous fraise and ruche of white lace. Full under-sleeves of the same lace. A bouquet of natural red roses was set at the bottom of the waist. There was no crinoline: the dress fell straight, like that of an antique statue, and the over-skirt was gracefully draped behind the arms.

It is idle to say that over-skirts are no longer worn: every one still clings to them, and I have quoted this dress of Mademoiselle Favart, who is perhaps the most elegant woman in Paris, not only for the novelty of her toilettes, but also for the incomparable grace with which she wears them, partly to prove irrefutably that both the polonaise and the over-skirt, far from being abandoned, continue to enjoy the highest favor. The details alone are varied, while the general effect is preserved; for instance, many mixed dresses are made, either with a half-long or demi-trained skirt, or a round skirt—that is, short enough to be worn on foot in the street without holding it up. Both have the front breadth pleated, and the back breadths entirely covered with flounces, edged each with a roll, made either of the same stuff or a different color. When the toilette is of two shades, this roll serves to make the flounce bouffant, and to give a greater volume to the back of the dress. Over the skirt thus trimmed is worn a demi-polonaise, composed of a waist with basques behind, tight fitting, and buttoned precisely like an ordinary waist, but with fronts extending as low as those of a common polonaise. In a word, this demi-polonaise is a sort of tight-fitting mantelet, made with sleeves and very long tabs. So much for the details; as to the general effect, thanks to the voluminous trimming of the back breadths, it is almost exactly like that of the polonaise suits we have worn so long. It would be hard to succeed better in inventing the new without making any change in the old: which, by-the-way, is precisely what we are doing in politics.

I do not know whether we shall have very hot weather next summer, but it will be almost a pity if we do not, in view of the beautiful fabrics that are in course of preparation for it. For some years past, during what was called our epoch of prosperity, I have remarked the barrenness of fancy in our manufacturers. They made so much money, and with so very little effort, that they did not take the trouble to invent and improve, or to call forth the resources of the artistic and inexhaustible French imagination, but hurriedly manufactured plain thick stuffs for winter and plain thin stuffs for summer, then having gathered in their profits, hastened to lay them out either in investments or pleasures. More than once I have pointed out the risk to French manufactures in neglecting the invention and execution of graceful designs, which was their specialty, and only doing what English or German workmen could do as well, and perhaps cheaper than the French artisans, who asked and obtained wages in proportion to their artistic value. It was urged in reply that plain stuffs, and nothing else, were in fashion. But no sooner did the country need to increase its business, in order to revive, than fashion agreed with necessity in putting artistic fancies under contribution, and the result has been the new and exquisite colors and fabrics that have dazzled and are dazzling our eyes. Among the beautiful combinations that I have seen is a skirt of plain vert-de-gris faille, with a polonaise of grenadine or other fancy stuff of a deeper or lighter shade, with designs of the same color—detached bouquets, branches, brocaded stripes, or dots of various sizes. It would take too long to enumerate all the beautiful elements of this sort with which our dress-makers, themselves artists, create dresses that could be devised and executed nowhere outside of France.

The polonaise, which ladies can not make up their minds to lay aside, will be, therefore, in many cases, a sort of wrapping such as we have described. The skirts of these suits will be in general either of faille or foulard, and the polonaises of one of those charming new transparent soft and silky fabrics called canvas guipure, brocaded grenadine, etc.

Another kind of toilette, of the grande dame style, is composed of an under dress cut in the princesse shape—that is, with the waist and skirt in one piece. This first dress, which is entirely plain, without trimming except elegant buttons to match, is invariably of plain silk of one color, or else of velvet. Yes, velvet; for it is discovered that even in our fine climate there are but two months in the year, July and August, when the heat of the weather is incompatible with the use of this beautiful fabric, and we are preparing to wear it even at the season when it was formerly proscribed. Over this princesse dress is worn a large polonaise of crêpe de Chine, canvas guipure, or any other stuff of the same family. This polonaise is very long, flat, open all the way down the front, and looped only under and with the aid of a very wide sash. The sleeves of the princesse dress are almost tight, and those of the polonaise very full. The polonaise being open all the way down the front, shows the princesse dress from top to bottom.

Hosted by Google

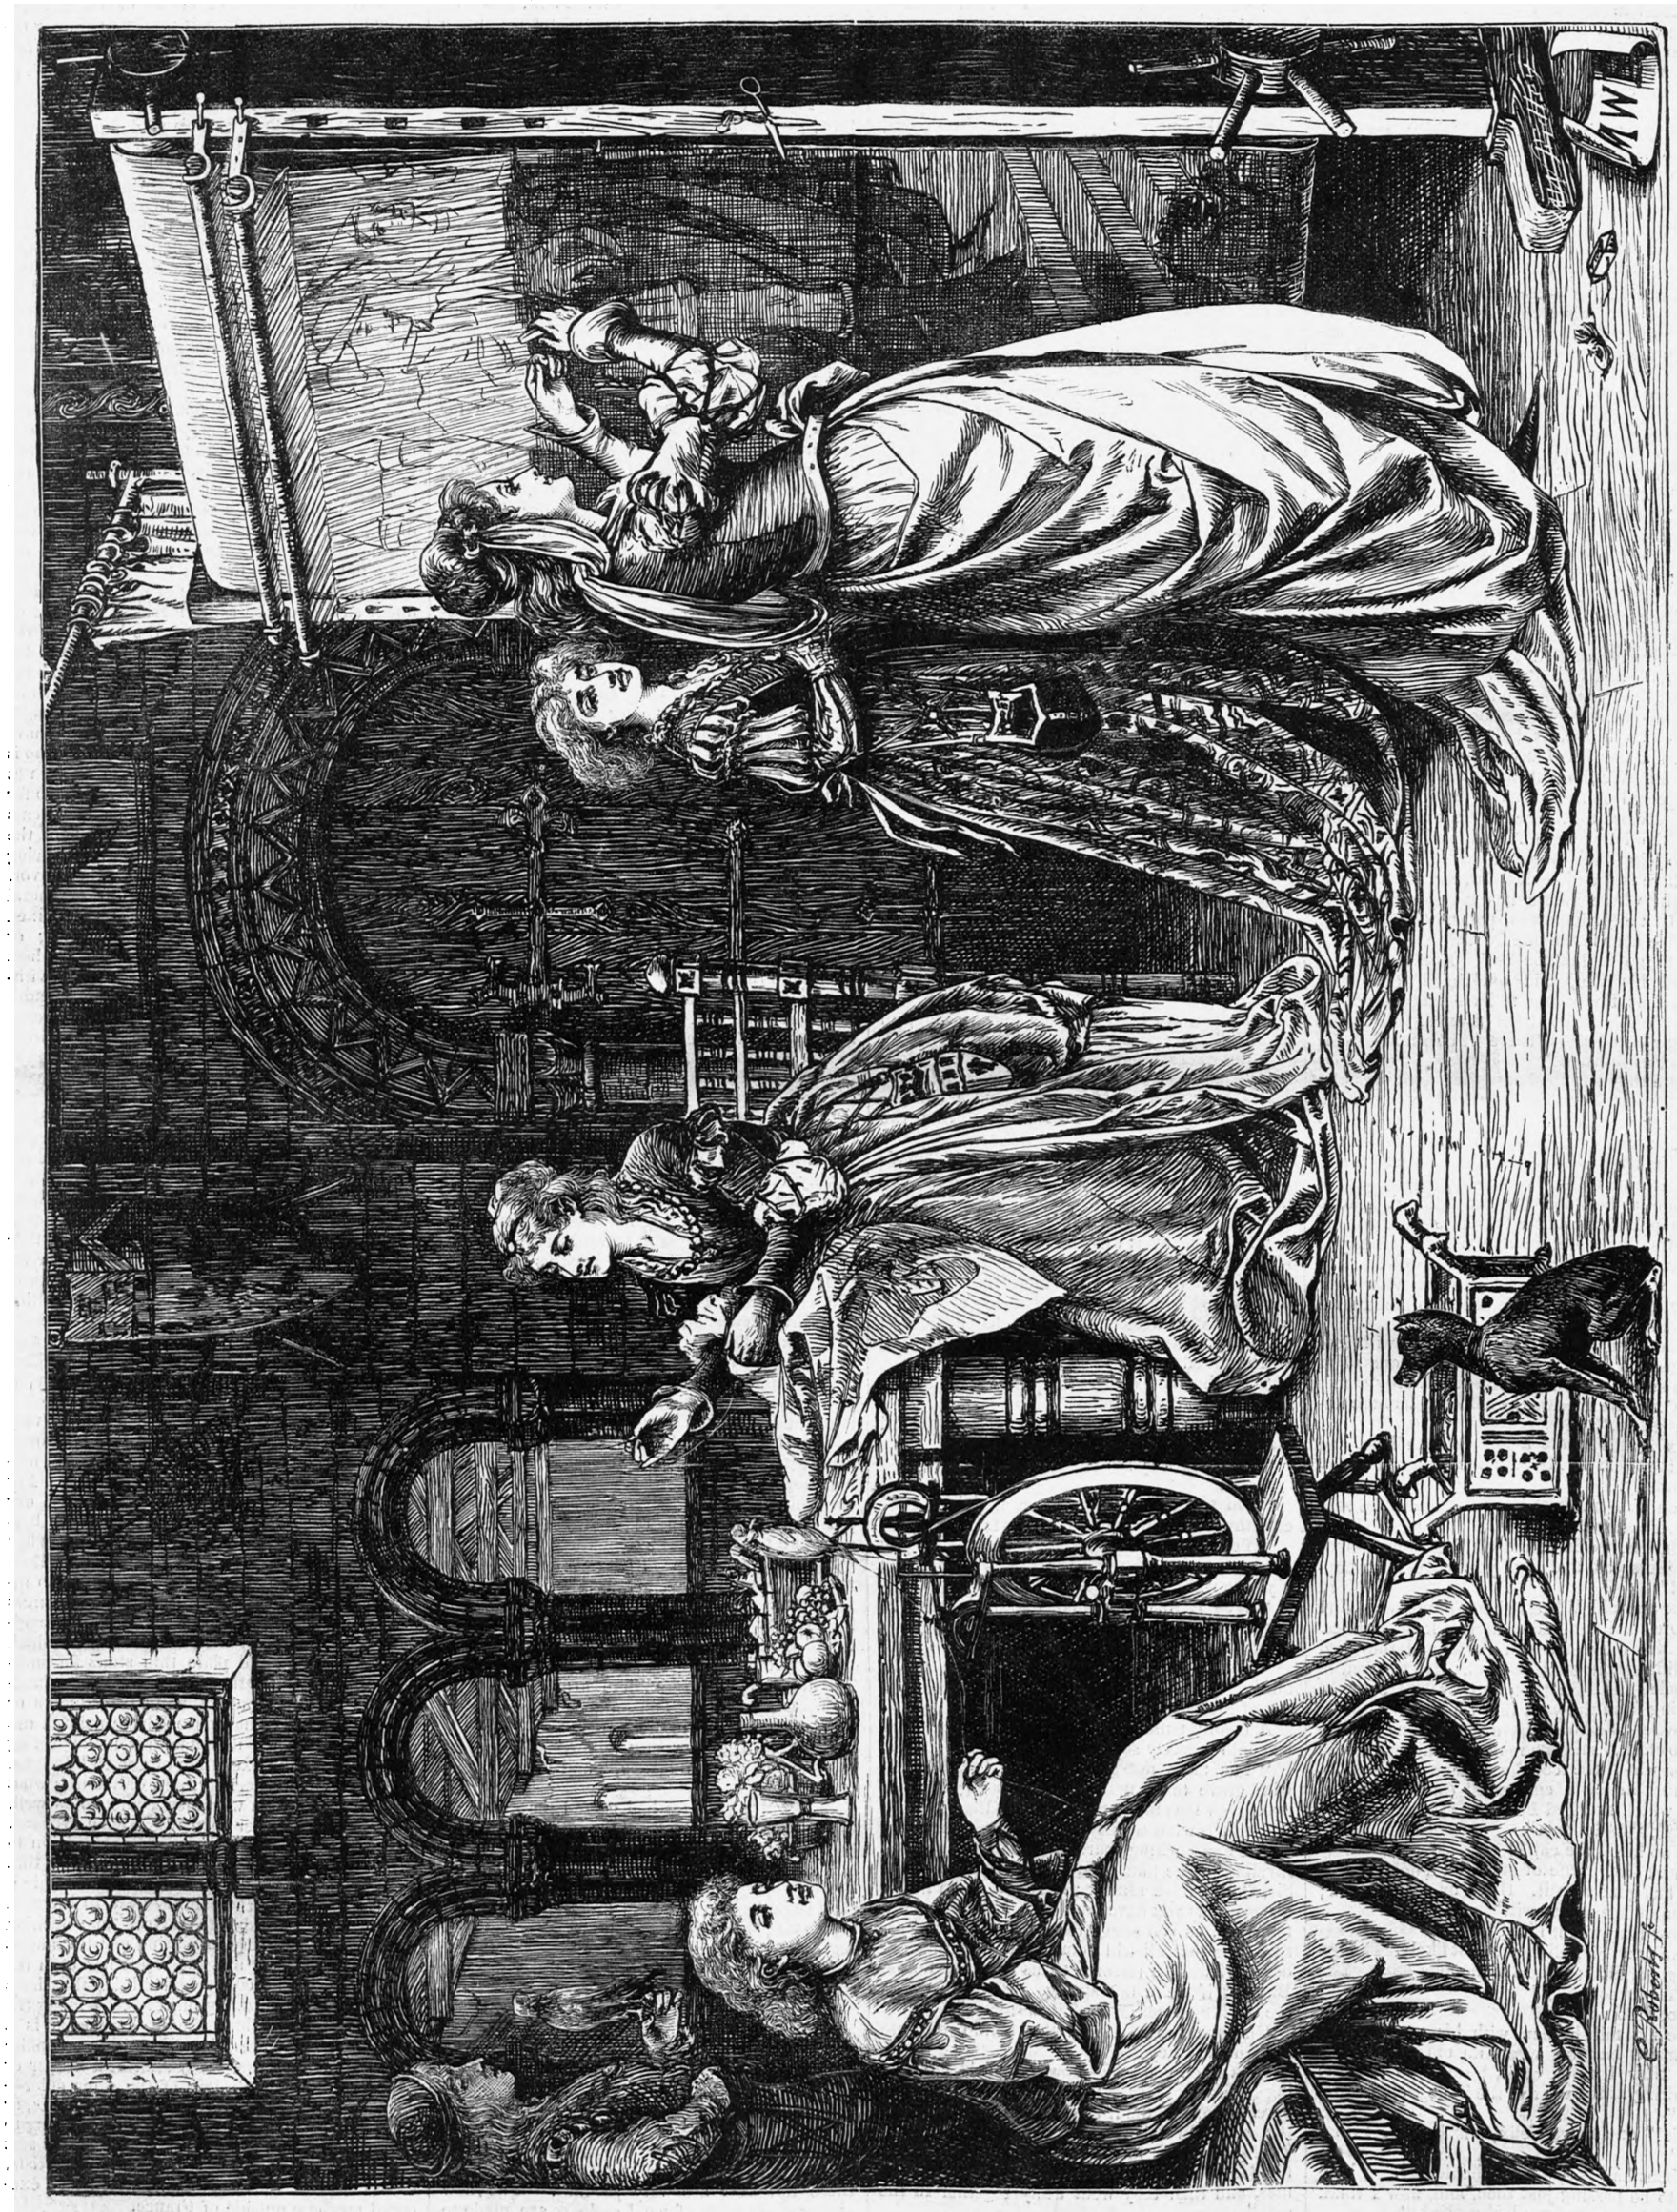
Other dresses will be made, according to the material, with two skirts trimmed alike, with the over-skirt looped on the sides by two sashes of the same material as the dress.

Lastly, linen dresses are in preparation of all the fashionable shades, which are still undecided and vaporous, as if seen through a mist. They will be trimmed, according to the color, either with white cotton braid, or, if the color is wholly neutral, shading on gray or écru, with Pompadour braid—that is, with small flowers of bright colors. Other summer stuffs are also made with designs of raised velvet. There are an immense number of stripes of all kinds, some damask fabrics like table-linen, and many brocaded foulards, color on color.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

LADIES AT TAPESTRY-WORK.

HERE are four damsels of the olden time, all actively engaged in peaceful feminine employments. The maiden in the left-hand corner sits by her spinning-wheel, an implement that is now to be seldom found in actual use, though some of its characteristics are curiously enough reproduced in the sewing-machine. At the table is seated a lady occupied with needle-work, while the two girls standing on the right are busy with a tapestry frame. The youth, hawk on finger, is the only idle person present. Tapestry, though a very ancient art, is said to have been revived by the Saracens. The art was greatly improved by the Flemings, who enriched their tapestries with historic subjects, purposely painted as cartoons for copies by artists of the highest rank, as, for example, Raphael. The celebrated manufacture of Gobelins at Paris owed its prosperity to the encouragement given by Louis XIV. (prompted by his great minister, Colbert) and his successors. The mode of working at the Gobelins is as follows: A series of threads are arranged vertically in a frame like the warp of a loom, and the workman stands behind the frame, the pattern being placed behind him for reference. To produce the design he has a number of wooden needles threaded with wool and silk of the colors required, and these are passed through the upright warp threads, and brought back, so that each thread becomes covered with the necessary color, and this is done with such nicety that scarcely any difference is perceptible between the tapestry picture and the painting from which it was copied.



NEEDLE-WORK IN THE OLDEN TIME—LADIES AT TAPESTRY WORK.

Hosted by Google

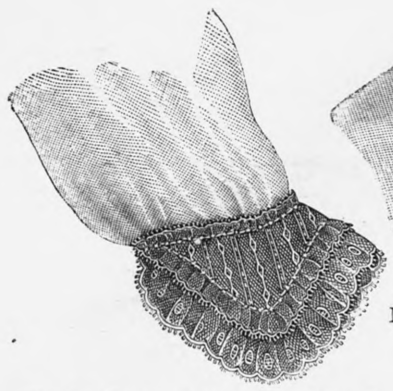


Fig. 8.—Sleeve for Collar, Fig. 7.
For pattern see Supplement No. X., Fig. 24.

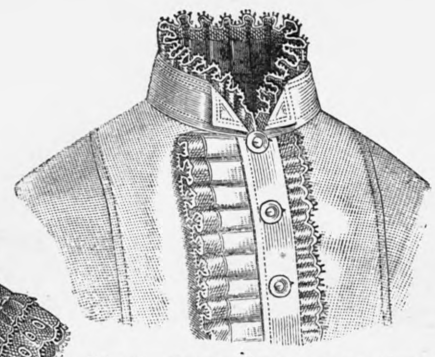

Fig. 2.—Linen Collar with Swiss Muslin Ruffles.—[See Figs. 3 and 4.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 18-20.

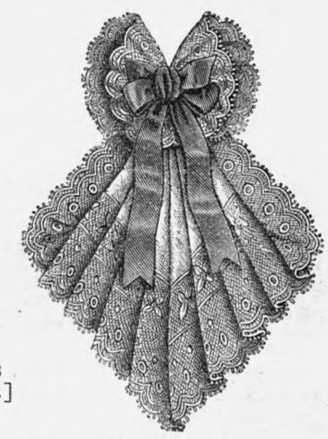

Fig. 1.—Swiss Muslin, Insertion, and Lace Cravat Bow.

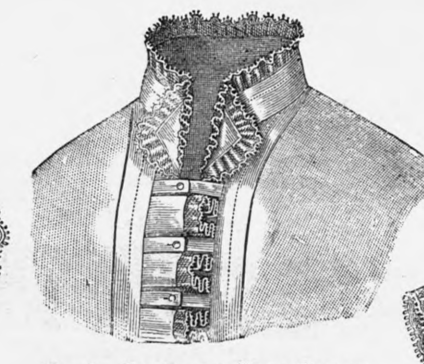

Fig. 5.—Linen and Lace Collar. [See Fig. 6.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. IX., Fig. 22.

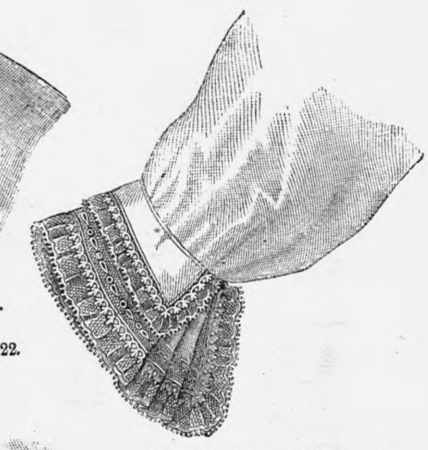

Fig. 4.—Swiss Muslin, Insertion, and Lace Sleeve for Collar, Fig. 2.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 25 and 26.

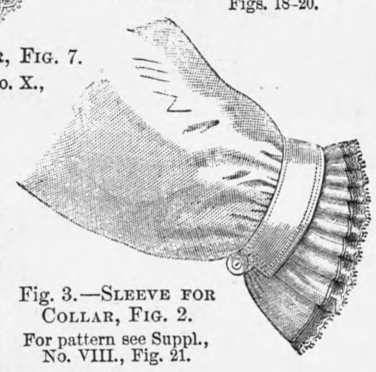

Fig. 3.—Sleeve for Collar, Fig. 2.
For pattern see Suppl., No. VIII., Fig. 21.

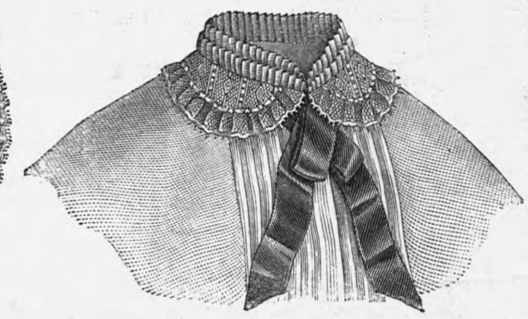

Fig. 7.—Insertion and Lace Collar.—[See Fig. 8.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. X., Fig. 23.

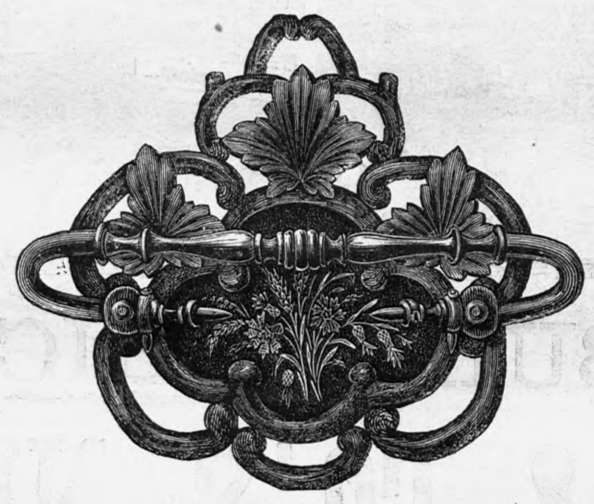
Fig. 6.—Sleeve for Collar, Fig. 5.

Lingerie, Figs. 1-8.

Fig. 1.—Swiss Muslin, Insertion, and Lace Cravat Bow. The fan-shaped part of this cravat bow consists of a straight strip of Swiss muslin four inches and seven-eighths long and eight inches and a half wide, which is sloped off on the under edge, from the middle toward the sides, so that the latter are only two inches and three-quarters long. Trim this part, as shown by the illustration, with lace insertion an inch and three-quarters wide, and with lace an inch and seven-eighths wide; arrange the upper edge in close side-pleats, and sew it on a stiff lace foundation. Cover the seam with a half rosette of gathered lace and a bow of pink gros grain ribbon.

Poult de Soie Cravat Bow, with Mother-of-pearl Slide.

Figs. 2–4.—Linen, Swiss Muslin, and Lace Collar and Sleeves. On the neck of the collar of double fine white linen, on the wrong side, sew a box-pleated Swiss muslin ruffle an inch and three-quarters wide, trimmed with narrow lace. Set the collar on a Swiss muslin chemisette.—This chemisette is faced four inches and seven-eighths wide with linen on the front edge as shown by the illustration, trimmed with lace, and furnished with button-holes and pearl buttons for closing. The sleeves are arranged in a similar manner. For the collar cut of double linen one piece from Fig. 20, Supplement, stitch it a quarter of an inch from the edge, fold it on the outside along the dotted line, and join it with the chemisette. Cut the latter of Swiss muslin from Figs. 18 and 19, Supplement. Pay no attention to the straight line on Fig. 18. For the sleeve cut of Swiss muslin a straight piece sixteen inches wide and fifteen inches and three-quarters long, which is rounded off on the under end from the sides toward the middle to a length of fourteen inches. Sew up the ends of this piece, hem the top, and gather the bottom. Set on the cuffs cut from Fig. 21, and a Swiss muslin ruffle two inches and seven-eighths wide, sloped off toward the middle, and trimmed with lace. Instead of this sleeve, that shown by Fig. 4 may be used. The latter is made of linen, Swiss muslin, and lace. Cut the lower cuff of Swiss muslin from Fig. 25, trim it, as shown by the illustration and partly indicated on the pattern, with lace insertion seven-eighths of an inch wide, a needle-work strip three-quarters of an inch wide, lace an inch wide, and narrow bias strips of linen stitched on. Cut away the material underneath the insertion. Pleat the upper edge, bringing the three ×'s on ●, and join it with the upper cuff according to the corresponding figures. Cut the upper cuff of double linen from Fig. 26, and furnish it with trimming. Finally, join the cuffs with a sleeve of Swiss muslin.



Embroidered Towel-Rack.
For design see Supplement, No. XVIII., Fig. 60.

Figs. 5 and 6.—Linen and Lace Collar and Sleeves. This collar, which is cut of double fine linen from Fig. 22, Supplement, is trimmed with lace three-quarters of an inch wide along the outer edge and along the folds of the turned-down corners, and is set on a Swiss muslin chemisette. Cut the latter from Figs. 18 and 19, Supplement. The straight line on Fig. 18 indicates the front edge of the chemisette. The right front edge is edged with a linen ruffle an inch and a quarter wide, trimmed with lace three-quarters of an inch wide, and which is arranged in double box-pleats an inch and one-eighth wide each at intervals of three-eighths of an inch. Bands of double linen an inch long and three-eighths of an inch wide, which are furnished with buttons and button-holes, serve to close the chemisette. The seam made by setting on the ruffle and bands is covered with a strip of linen an inch wide. The cuffs consist each of a straight piece of double linen three inches and a half wide and eight inches and a half long, which is trimmed with a ruffle and furnished with bands for closing similar to the chemisette. Set the upper edge of the cuff on a Swiss muslin sleeve.

Figs. 7 and 8.—Insertion and Lace Collar and Sleeves. This collar of needle-work insertion half an inch wide and lace insertion seven-eighths of an inch wide is trimmed with a narrow needle-work border and with gathered lace an inch and seven-eighths wide. The collar is trimmed on the neck with kilt-pleated crêpe lisse ruffles, and is set on a Swiss muslin chemisette. The fronts of the latter, which is cut from Figs. 18 and 19, Supplement, are arranged in narrow tucks. Bow of sea green gros grain ribbon. The cuffs of the sleeves are arranged similar to the collar. Cut the collar and cuffs from Figs. 23 and 24, Supplement.

Gros Grain Cravat Bow.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XVI., Fig. 58.

Gros Grain Cravat Bow.

This cravat bow is made of gros grain in two shades of brown. Fig. 58, Supplement, gives the pattern.

Fig. 1.—Black Poult de Soie Confirmation Dress.—Front.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 14-16.

Fig. 2.—Black Poult de Soie Confirmation Dress.—Back.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 14-16.

Hosted by Google

REBUILT CHICAGO.

D. B. FISK & CO.'S NEW STORE,

CORNER WABASH AVE. AND WASHINGTON ST.

THE NEW CHICAGO.

If the burning of Chicago was the world's astonishment, its sudden rebuilding is a still greater marvel. To the Old World, the increase of wealth and population in the New appears incredible, while the unvarnished history of the growth of the great West—of which Chicago is the distributing centre—seems to the people of the older States almost fabulous.

TIME ALLOWED FOR REBUILDING.

Ten years were assigned to Chicago as the shortest time in which she could replace her burnt edifices. But to-day, not eighteen months since the great fire, she has a larger area of substantial and elegant business-houses than she had before the fire, and ere the year ends—when the buildings now designed and in process of construction are finished — Chicago will be far more magnificent, beautiful, and complete than ever, with much larger, more convenient and elegant structures for business, art, religion, and home comfort, than any city of its size on the continent. This wonderful display of constructive energy is due to two causes:

CENTRAL POSITION.

1. To the position of Chicago as a commercial centre, at the head of our great inland seas, connected by navigable waters with the Atlantic and the Mexican Gulf, with tunnels under lake and river, the largest grain mart in the world, and the focus of a hundred railroads stretching out their Briarean arms to gather the products of the land and of the sea, of forest and mine, of anvil and loom, over a whole continent.

BUSINESS CHARACTER.

2. To the character of her business men, composed of the most enterprising citizens from every State, from Canada, and from Europe, full of electric energy, and inspired by the great possibilities here opened to capital, industry, and enterprise. Chicago could not be what she is without such business men, and the result of their united efforts is the New Chicago, the pride of her own citizens, and the wonder of all beholders, whose "name has gone out into all the earth."

And conspicuous among the merchants who have given character and fame to Chicago is the well-known firm of importers and manufacturers of, and wholesale dealers in, millinery and straw goods, ladies' furnishing and fancy goods, a representation of whose magnificent new store, on the corner of Wabash Avenue and Washington Street, is seen above.

D. B. FISK & CO.,

BEFORE AND AFTER.

Before the Great Fire they had the finest millinery store in the West, a cut and notice of which appeared in the BAZAR. But the present building so far excels the former one in size, convenience, and splendor, as to make comparison useless. And its

LOCATION,

In the very centre of business, on the Broadway of Chicago, near the principal hotels and chief railways, makes it accessible to customers and an attractive point for visitors. The building, fronting on two streets, is

SUPERBLY LIGHTED

Throughout, the panes of French plate glass on the main floor being 7 feet wide and 15 feet high, so that not only is there ample room for the display of their immense stock, but every floor is so fully lighted that all their goods are shown to the best advantage for purchasers.

GENERAL DESCRIPTION.

The premises consist of six floors, finished from basement to roof in the most substantial and elegant manner, heated by steam and furnished with elevators for freight and passengers, and every modern convenience, so that the whole business can be transacted more easily than if the space was all on one floor. The Offices, Ladies' Parlor and Toilet Rooms, on the main floor, are of black walnut and ebony, with rich carvings and plate-glass; and the grand massive stairway to the second floor

CHALLENGES ADMIRATION.

No expense or labor has been spared to combine Use with Beauty, and make the whole a perfect temple of art. Every accommodation and comfort are afforded to customers which an intelligent appreciation of their wants, prompted by a liberal hand, could provide.

DEPARTMENTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

On the main floor are exhibited Ribbons, Silks, Velvets, Laces, French Flowers, and Millinery articles and materials. The second floor is filled with Fancy Goods, Ladies' Furnishing, Trimmings, and Small Wares. The third floor contains Straw Goods, Hats and Bonnets for Ladies, Misses, and Children, the Pattern Hat and Bonnet Department, and Exhibition Rooms for Trimmed Goods.

On the fourth floor are the receiving and distributing rooms and duplicate goods. The fifth floor contains the manufacturing department, with all the latest machinery for manufacturing hats and frames. The basement is used for entering, packing, and shipping goods sold, and contains the steam-engines, boilers, and machinery for heating and elevating goods and passengers.

THE PROPRIETORS

Began trade here twenty years ago, establishing the first exclusively wholesale millinery house in the Northwest, and by indefatigable industry, enterprise, sagacity, nerve, and fair dealing, from small beginnings have built up an immense trade requiring a building of mammoth proportions, and a small army of employés. They are now in the prime of life, and have justly won the honorable pre-eminence of having the largest and finest millinery establishment in the world.

LARGEST AND RICHEST STOCK.

Their stock is the most extensive and complete to be found in the country, and as they always keep the best class of goods, both as respects quality and style, their house, for a long time, has been the of Fashion for the West. And Eastern parties going West to establish themselves in the millinery trade will desire to visit their establishment, not only to see on what a magnificent scale business is conducted there, but to post themselves as to the kind of stock adapted to the Western trade.

HEAD-QUARTERS

And no more fitting type, or truer representation, can be found of the wonderful growth, magnificence, and prosperity of the New Chicago.

Hosted by Google

1873. NOTICE. 1873.

OUR

CELEBRATED

BUFFALO

AND OTTER

BRANDS

BLACK ALPACAS,

AND

BEAVER BRAND.

SILK FINISHED

Black Pure Mohairs

ARE HANDSOMER THAN EVER FOR SPRING WEAR.

These Beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Dry-Goods Retailers throughout the United States.

☞ Purchasers will know these goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece, bearing a picture of the Buffalo, Otter, or Beaver.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 and 429 Broadway,
305 Canal and 47 Howard Sts.,
New York.

SOLE IMPORTERS.

STEM-WINDING

WALTHAM WATCHES

FOR LADIES.

This beautiful watch is the smallest and best American Watch made. It is described in our Price-List, which is sent free and postpaid to all who write for it. Watches sent to any place, no matter how remote, with bill to collect on delivery, with privilege to open the package and examine the watch before paying the bill; and for any watch that does not give satisfaction we will

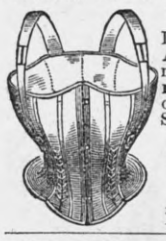
REFUND THE MONEY.

Send for the Price-List, and please mention HARPER'S BAZAR. Address

HOWARD & CO.,

No. 865 Broadway, New York.

MADAME FOY'S CORSET SKIRT SUPPORTER,



For Health, Comfort, and Style,

Is acknowledged THE BEST ARTICLE of the kind ever made. Numerous Testimonials in its favor are being received from all parts of the United States.

LADY AGENTS WANTED.

HARMON, BALDWIN, & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers,
New Haven, Conn.
ARNOLD & BANNING, New York;
D. B. FISK & Co., Chicago, Agents.

---

20 Sheets of Choice Music, $1 00.

Why throw away money on high-priced Music when you can select from our Catalogue of 700 pieces? Any 20 Half-Dime, or 10 of Dime Series mailed on receipt of One Dollar. Sold by all booksellers, and can be ordered through any newsdealer. Send stamp for Catalogue. Address

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
439 THIRD AVENUE, NEW YORK.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE

Manufactured by the Florence Sewing Mach. Co. The simplest, cheapest, and best in use! Has but one needle! A Child can run it. Agents wanted in every town. Send for Circular and Sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. Co., Bath, Me.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. MRS. C. C. THOMSON, 335 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

COLGATE & COMPANY'S
EXTRACT CASHMERE BOUQUET,
FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.

"CASHMERE BOUQUET."

COLGATE & CO'S
CASHMERE BOUQUET SOAP,
FOR THE TOILET.

FASHION'S Triple FAVORITE, "Le Plus Nouvelle."

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1873, by A. Burdette Smith, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington, D. C.

MAGIC COSTUME.—This is the Acme of Paris ingenuity!!!! This engraving represents two views of it. And there is still another, viz.: a draped apron front. THREE Entirely different Costumes in one! It can be changed from a Polonaise to a Redingote or Waterproof in less than one minute, by simply adjusting one button. The original is made in dark blue ladies' cloth, trimmed with Hercules braid.

This pattern is Particularly desirable for wash goods, because when unbottoned it falls into a beautifully shaped Wrapper without pleat or gather, making it easy to laundry. The Traveler, especially the Voyager, will find it an indispensable convenience. It is very simple and easy to make. Complete instructions are printed upon each pattern, besides a Cloth Model. (See below.) Requires five yards Waterproof. All Sizes. Price of pattern and cloth model, One Dollar. See Premium below.

We furnish it "READY MADE" in Linen or Batiste, from $5 to $15; in Waterproof, $10 to $20; in any color of ladies' cloth, handsomely trimmed, $25. SEND STAMP for our CATALOGUE of STYLES.

We give a CLOTH MODEL with each pattern, which SHOWS every seam, pleat, gather, loop, etc., how to put the garment together by the pattern, and how it will look when completed. By the use of our Cloth Models any person who can sew can FINISH the most difficult garment as easy as the plainest. They are PERFECT GUIDES.

As a Polonaise. As a Waterproof.

SUBSCRIBE NOW FOR

SMITH'S ILLUSTRATED PATTERN BAZAAR—ONLY One Dollar a Year!

Sample copy mailed for 25 cents.—BEST AND CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD!!!!

PREMIUM, FREE. Every subscriber is entitled to select Patterns to the value of ONE DOLLAR, By enclosing ONE DOLLAR and Stamp to A. BURDETTE SMITH. you will be made a YEARLY SUBSCRIBER, and the pattern of the above engraving, with a Cloth Model, will be mailed to you FREE! OR, if you prefer to select your premium after you receive the Bazaar, he will mail to you a receipt for your subscription, and a "PREMIUM COUPON," which will entitle you to select patterns to the value of ONE dollar FREE at any time. When you send your subscription, please state which you prefer.

Address, A. BURDETTE SMITH,
P. O. Box 5055. Smith's Pattern Bazaar, 914 BROADWAY, N. Y.

HAIR!!!

L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,

Between 4TH and GREAT JONES STS.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

Import and manufacture their own Goods, and RETAIL THEM AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight,	-	-	-	-	$5 00
Do. 22	do.	do. 4	do.	do. -	- - 6 00
Do. 26	do.	do. 4	do.	do. -	- - 8 00
Do. 32	do.	do. 4	do.	do. -	- - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, charges prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.

N. B.—Through the immense increase of business, we will remove to the more commodious building, 364 Bowery, cor. 4th St., after 1st of May, 1873.

SEND FOR

SPRING CATALOGUE

TO

EHRICH'S TEMPLE OF FASHION,
267 & 269 EIGHTH AVENUE, N. Y.

A BRAVE BOOK,

"WHAT WOMAN SHOULD KNOW."

A Woman's Book about Women, by a Woman (Mrs. E. B. DUFFEY).

The ONLY work of the kind ever written BY A WOMAN; is a necessity in every household; its entire novelty and eminent PRACTICALNESS will create an IMMENSE DEMAND. Notwithstanding the delicate subjects necessarily treated, it is written in such BRAVE, PURE style as will not offend the most fastidious. LADY agents never have had such an opportunity to make money and do good. Terms and sample sheets mailed free on immediate application. J. M. STODDART & CO., Philadelphia.

DR LYON'S TOOTH TABLETS

For Cleansing the Teeth.

A PAIR OF BEST TWO-BUTTON KID GLOVES sent postpaid for $1 00. Three pair for $2 75; Twelve pair for $10 00. Every color and size. Real Laces, samples of Sash Ribbons and Dress Trimmings sent free on application.

J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 Eighth Ave., Bet. 27th and 28th Sts., New York.

THE AMERICAN CARD PRINTER.—The best, neatest, quickest, and most durable article for printing visiting cards that has ever been on the market. With it an agent can travel from town to town printing visiting cards in various styles; a business at which Card Writers are now making from $10 to $20 per day, and have done so for years past, and now not beginning to supply the demand, as only the best writers can do the work, but with the above printer a boy 12 years of age can do work better and more accurate than the most experienced Card Writers. 50 well printed cards with your name, as samples, post paid 50cts. BOND, MARTIN & CO., SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

VISITING CARDS.—1 pack, with name printed in latest style, postpaid any where, for 60 cts. Specimens sent for 6 cts. J. F. DAVIS, 207 Juniata St., Alleghany, Pa.

WEBSTER'S PATENT

Button-hole Worker.

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

It is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented! So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, together with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

TRUE TIME FOR $1. 50,000 SOLD.

Magnetic Time-Keeper, Compass, and Indicator. A perfect GEM for the pocket of every traveler, trader, boy, farmer, and for EVERY BODY desiring a reliable timekeeper, and also a superior compass. Usual watch-size, steel works, glass crystal, all in a neat OROIDE case. WARRANTED to denote correct time and to keep in order—if fairly used—for two years. Nothing like it! This perfect triumph of mechanism will be sent in a neat case, prepaid to any address, for only $1; 3 for $2. Circulars sent free. Try one. Order from the manufacturers' Agents. Eureka Manufacturing Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

NOVELTY

PRINTING-PRESSES.

The Best yet Invented FOR AMATEUR & BUSINESS PURPOSES,

And Unsurpassed for General Job Printers.

OVER 8000 IN USE.

BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer,

And Dealer in Every Description of

PRINTING MATERIAL,

349–351 Federal & 152 Kneeland Sts., Boston; Branch Store, 543 Broadway & 88 Mercer St., N. Y. Agents, Kelly, Howell, & Ludwig, Philadelphia; J. F. Edwards, St. Louis, Mo.; A. C. Kellogg, Chicago, Ill. Send for Pamphlet.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

TO THE LADIES!

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.

No lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.

B. F. BROWN & Co., Boston.

$72 EACH WEEK. Agents wanted every where. Business strictly legitimate. Particulars free. Address J. WORTH & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

MOURNING DEPARTMENT.

We have now in stock a complete assortment of MOURNING FABRICS,
Adapted to present and coming season.
ENGLISH AND FRENCH BOMBAZINES,
IMPERIAL SERGES, CASHMERES, POPLINS,
BRILLIANTINES, ALPACAS,
HENRIETTA, TAMISE, CREPE,
BARATHEA, CANTON, and BOMBAZINE CLOTHS.
ALSO A NEW ARTICLE,
"DRAP DE POLONAISE."

VAIL AND TRIMMING CREPES.

Special attention is called to our magnificent selection of SUMMER NOVELTIES in
SILK AND SILK AND WOOL GRENADINES,
In Plain, Striped, and Brocaded.
BYZANTINES, FLORENTINES, GAZE DE CHAMBRAIS,
ENGLISH TAMARTINES, LAWNS, ORGANDIES, CAMBRICS, GINGHAMS, PRINTS,
MOURNING HANDKERCHIEFS, CREPE, LACE, AND MUSLIN COLLARS, SETS, &c.

SPRING AND SUMMER SILKS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. have in stock a splendid assortment of STRIPED, CHENE, PLAIN, AND BLACK SILKS, of the Latest Styles and at the LOWEST PRICES.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

CHENEY BRO'S

American Gros-Grain Silks,

IN BLACK STRIPES,
AND ELEGANT FALL COLORS,
Of Shades especially adapted for Suitings.

SEYMOUR'S SHEARS & SCISSORS.

"The Best are the Cheapest."
Extra Quality. Crocus Polish.

Family Size, - - $1.50
Ladies' Scissors, - 1.00
By mail, prepaid. Send P. O. Order or Draft.
HENRY SEYMOUR & CO., 29 Rose St, New York.

Sold Everywhere. State where you saw this when you write.

MADAME MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, No. 423 Sixth Avenue, has just received from Paris the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats, selected by herself, from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

A LADY OF REFINEMENT and ABILITY, about to proceed to Europe for the purpose of completing the education of her only daughter, would be glad to undertake the charge of other three young ladies with a similar object, to whom she would afford the watchful care of a mother. Unexceptionable references. Apply by letter to
A. G. C., P. O. Box 959, N. Y. City.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF
WOOD CARPETING,
942 BROADWAY.

Send Stamp for Designs.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

WORKING CLASS, MALE OR FEMALE, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Cortlandt St., N.Y.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

---

12 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS mailed for 50 cts., by C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year.....	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year.....	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year.....	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

THE rivers in the northern part of Maine are frozen solid down to the bottom, and the people are blasting for fish.

REASSURING. — A young lady fainted when told that over five hundred thousand men died last year; but was revived by the information that there were thirteen million left.

A prominent apiarist, while arranging his beehives recently, inadvertently turned one over. Snugly ensconced in a fresco of poultices, he says to his friends, in sepulchral whispers, that the cost of raising bees far exceeds the pleasure and profit.

Wedding-cards in Denver consist of the jack of diamonds and the queen of hearts, with the names of the contracting parties on each. If the bride's mother is living, the ten of clubs is also inclosed.

PRIMEVAL MATRIMONY.— The marriage ceremony among the Bushmen of Australia is very simple, and don't cost a farthing. The man selects his lady-love, knocks her down with a club, and drags her to his camp.

A Western man at the St. Nicholas, having taken possession of his room, locked it up to go out into the city, and leaving the key at the bar, told the clerk, with great simplicity, not to wait dinner for him.

A lady who is not thoroughly posted in natural history asked a friend who was going to Utah to bring her a couple of Mormons for her aquarium. She thinks them to be of the oyster species, and illustrative of Darwin.

THE RETORT COURTEOUS.

MATILDA (who does not like being "Wall-flower"). "You've no Idea, Maud, how utterly Idiotic you People Dancing look to those who Sit Down and Watch you!"
MAUD. "I dare say not, love! I never tried!"

A fashionable New York gentleman thinks that if ladies would only use their powder-puffs more sparingly, men would get through the season with only one dress-coat.

Mexico is said to be like the earth, because it has a revolution every twenty-four hours.

A physician says mosquitoes have in their veins some of the best blood in the country.

BEAUTIFUL SNOW. — A young man who proposed to a handsome but heartless creature the other evening suggested a very popular poem—the "Beautiful's No."

A Naples contemporary styles Mr. James Gordon Bennett, of the New York Herald, who is now in Naples, the discoverer of the discoverer of the discoverer.

A contemporary speaks of the finding of a skull in a well in the door-yard of one of the citizens of a New England town, and innocently remarks that the person to whom the skull originally belonged is dead.

"If you want to see what men will do in the way of conformity," says a modern philosopher, "take a European hat for your subject of meditation. I dare say there are twenty-two millions of people at this minute each wearing one of these hats to please the rest."

A pair of newly arrived Britishers, being about to undertake their first sleigh-drive in New York, were asked by the waiter whether they would have one or two "buffaloes," meaning robes, of course. Believing that he spoke of horned cattle of unknown temper, they modestly replied that, as they were new to the work, one buffalo would suffice to begin with.

PERSIAN FABLES.

A heedless boy having flung a pebble in the direction of a basking lizard, that reptile's tail disengaged itself, and flew some distance away. One of the properties of a lizard's follower is to leave the main body at the slightest intimation of danger.

"There goes that vexatious narrative again!" exclaimed the lizard, pettishly. "I never had such a tail in my life! Its restless tendency to divorce upon insufficient grounds is enough to harrow the reptilian soul! Now," he continued, backing up to the fugitive part, "perhaps you will be good enough to resume your connection with the parent establishment."

No sooner was the splice effected than an astronomer passing that way casually remarked to a friend that he had just sighted a comet. Supposing itself menaced, the timorous member again sprang away, coming down plump before the horny nose of a sparrow. Here its career terminated.

We sometimes escape from an imaginary danger only to find some real persecutor has a little bill against us.

A jackal who had pursued a deer all day with unflagging industry was about to seize him, when an earthquake, which was doing a little civil engineering in that part of the country, opened a broad chasm between him and his prey.

"Now here," said he, "is a distinct interference with the laws of nature. But if we are to tolerate miracles, there is an end of all progress."

So speaking, he endeavored to cross the abyss at two jumps. His fate would serve the purpose of an impressive warning if it might be clearly ascertained; but the earth having immediately pinched together again, the research of the moral investigator is baffled.

SCRAGSON. "Call him off, will you! What's he Sniffing at my Heels for?"
BOY. "Dunno, Sir. P'r'aps he thinks yer a Bone, and he wants to Pick yer!"

FINE WOMAN. "But they're so Small. I never saw such Small Smelts!"
SMALL MAN. "That's true, Mum, they ain't all big; but you see, Mum, we ain't none on us all a one size."

The following took place in an attempt to prove an alibi:

ATTORNEY S——. "You say that Ellis plowed for you all day on the 29th of November?"
WITNESS (referring to his book). "Yes."
S. "What did he do on the 30th?"
W. "He chopped wood."
S. "On the 31st?"
W. "That was Sunday, and we went a-squirrel-hunting."
S. "What did he do on the 32d?"
W. "He thrashed the wheat that day."
S. "What did he do on the 33d?"
W. "It was raining, and he shaved out some axe handles."
S. "What did he do on the 34th?"
W. "He chopped wood."
S. "What did he do on the—"

But before the question could be finished the witness's wife seized him by the collar and whisked him outside of the witness-box, yelling in his affrighted ear, "You old fool! don't you know that there are only thirty-one days in the month of November?"

CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES.

JUDGE. "I fine Tim Larry ten dollars for assault and battery on Pat Malone."

PAT. "But, your honor, I want more damages. He blacked my eye, and if I had been invited to a tea-party I couldn't have gone."

JUDGE. "The Court knows nothing about consequential damages. You must carry your case to Geneva."

"CIRCUMLOCUTORY!"

POLITE PORTER (seeing smoke issuing from Brown's coat pocket). "You'll excuse me addressin' o' you, Sir—Common Man in a manner o' Speakin'—Gen'leman like you, Sir—beggin' Pardon for takin' the Liberty, which I should never 'a thought o' doin' under ordinary Succumstances, Sir, on'y you didn't seem to be Aware on it, but it Struck me as I see you a-goin' along, as you were a-fire, Sir!"

[By this time Brown's right coat tail was entirely consumed. His fusees had ignited by private arrangement among themselves.

NEWS.

AUNT GRACE. "My dear children, you will all be pleased to hear you have got a New Brother—"
SMALL SON AND HEIR. "Oh, how awfully jolly! Let me be the first to go and tell Mamma!"

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 17.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

FIGS. 1–3.—LADIES' SPRING WALKING SUITS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Fig. 1.—RAW SILK WALKING SUIT. Fig. 2.—BLACK SILK DRESS WITH CASHMERE POLONAISE. Fig. 3.—CHÂTELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN).

[Cut Paper Patterns of the Châtelaine Redingote Walking Suit, Fig. 3, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Hosted by Google

HARRY.—1855–1873.

"Bearded like the pard."

"HERE we go down, down, down-y,"
I sang to you long ago,
When you wore a sweet little gown-y
As soft and as white as snow.

And now in your great long trowsers
You stand and sing it to me;
And the strain such emotion arouses,
I hardly believe what I see.

Not whiskers already! Don't tell me!
Yet coming events, as we know,
Cast shadows before; and so really
They may be beginning to grow.

Forgotten the wee sweet gown-y,
As, stroking your cheek and chin,
"Here we go! down, down, downy,"
I hear you softly begin.

Well, finish the song, and gladly;
'Tis nature's marvelous plan.
A baby might end more sadly
Than by growing to be a man.

If a shade of pain will tarry
To think of the baby that went,
What matters it? Haven't I Harry?
And are we not more than content?

So, "Here we go down, down, down-y,"
Was not more sweet in the past
Than, "Here we go! down, down, downy,"
As echoed by Harry at last.

Ladies' Spring Walking Suits, Figs. 1–3.

See illustration on first page.

Fig. 1.—RAW SILK WALKING SUIT. Spring suit of damask raw silk. Skirt with polonaise of plain raw silk. The skirt is in two silvery gray shades, made with three lapping gathered flounces. Polonaise with long front draped very short behind, and trimmed to represent a châtelaine bodice by rows of black velvet ribbon and lace. Swinging passementerie cords in front of corsage; braiding in corners of polonaise skirt; fringe of silk tied in the edge of the garment. Medici fraise of pleated muslin. Medici hat of black straw, with blue-faced brim and gray plume.

Fig. 2.—BLACK SILK DRESS WITH CASHMERE POLONAISE. This suit consists of a silk skirt and cashmere polonaise. The skirt has a deep straight flounce of silk headed by a pleated puff. Narrower frills on the front breadth. The vest-polonaise is trimmed with thick curled braid and netted fringe. Black watered ribbon sash. Pointed neck with English linen collar. Rabagas bonnet of white chip, trimmed with black velvet and roses.

Fig. 3.—CHÂTELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). This elegant suit, which is copied from one of the most stylish Paris dresses imported this season, consists of a walking skirt and a single-breasted close-fitting redingote or polonaise. The skirt is of olive brown silk, and is trimmed with circular pleatings on the front breadth, and a deep gathered flounce and narrow pleatings behind. The polonaise is of pale écru summer camel's-hair cloth, elaborately embroidered, and trimmed with swinging cords on the waist. It is edged with netted fringe, and draped by a side sash of watered ribbon. Any other material may be used, with trimming to suit the taste. English straw bonnet, trimmed with olive brown and écru silk, wild roses, and a black lace scarf on the crown. Olive brown silk umbrella.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises two articles—châtelaine redingote and walking skirt.

CHÂTELAINE REDINGOTE.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, side back, back, sleeve, and cuff. The front is fitted by a cross basque seam and two darts on each side. The back is adjusted by a seam in the middle and side back seams which extend to the shoulder. An extra width is cut on each seam in the back at the waist line, and gathered on the under side. The skirt is draped on the side by five pleats turning upward, according to the perforations, commencing at the lower hole; and underneath the garment, at the waist line, are tacked two tapes twelve inches long—one from each side seam. Place the perforation nearest the top of the skirt part on the middle of the tape, and the lower one on the end, each side, to form the panier. Baste up and try on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. The wide coat sleeve is finished at the wrist by a deep cuff. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back part of the armhole, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. Put the pattern together by the notches. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back for the hem in front. If the sleeves are too long or too short, take from or add to the top and bottom an equal quantity, always keeping the same shape.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8 yards. Fringe, 4½ yards.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, two side gores, and straight breadth for the back. Cut the front gore and back breadth with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut two pieces each of the pattern given for the side gores. Put the pattern together by the notches, paying no attention to the grain of the paper.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1873.

☞ WITH the next Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be published the Twelfth Part of DORÉ'S LONDON.

This magnificent Serial, which is published at a high price in England, is issued gratuitously in Eight-page Supplements to the subscribers to HARPER'S WEEKLY.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the new and elegant Châtelaine Redingote Walking Suit, illustrated on the first page of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 271.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain an extra-sized Pattern-Sheet, with full-sized patterns of a large number of Spring and Summer Mantles, Sacques, Dolmans, Water-Proofs, and other Wrappings for Ladies and Children; House and Street Suits, Wrappers, Fichus, Jackets, Vests, etc.; together with choice literary and artistic attractions.

FAST OLD WOMEN.

THERE is a sisterhood of women, something past the meridian of their days, who, the labors of life being done, suddenly emerge from their obscurity like flies from the chrysalid—who, having been confined by unescapable duty for thirty years, more or less, gladly show how irksome the duty was by the buoyancy with which they accept their freedom, and of whom no other description tells better than that contained in the above term—fast old women.

They are not literally old, perhaps, but they certainly are not young: their hair would be very gray, save in rare instances, if they knew nothing of the delicate dyes; their skins would be creased and corded if they knew nothing of the French enamels; their mouths would be dark and dreary caves, marked like the cave of Pagan with old bones, if they knew nothing of the dentists; and their forms would be shapeless if they knew nothing of the dress-makers. Yet it is not of any such knowledge that we complain, since, believing it to be the duty of all to make themselves as comely as may be, we must accord them the privilege of choosing for themselves the ideal of comeliness to which they would approach: it is the ill purpose to which such knowledge is applied that we deprecate, in that, after the effect of a false youth is gained, it uses that effect for evil results.

A little observation of this sort of women teaches us that they were married early, and that they had so little girlhood that they have been like unbroached bottles of Champagne lying on their sides and waiting, with all their froth and bubble in them, for the moment of escape. They have borne children, but seldom borne with them much; have reared them usually after that way which the proverb recognizes in saying a selfish mother makes a generous child. They have been active and capable housekeepers, using their superfluous energies upon domestic affairs, till now, when they can delegate the duties to elder children or others; or having disposed of the children—the daughters to marriage, the sons to clubs—they can reduce the ménage to a suite at a hotel, as they have already reduced the husband to an animated ledger and breathing bank account.

They are very seldom widows; for the widow requires more circumspection in her daily walk than they are wont to exercise—they who are fortified by the existence of husbands, and husbands who do not complain: and so long as the husband is not seen to adjust his spectacles, the world discreetly looks the other way. They are quite as seldom absolutely vicious, for, being past the heyday of the blood, emotions rather than passions are in play with them. They are sentimental and romantic, sometimes melancholy, sometimes gay, and always vain, always fictitiously living over the youth they never had. They smile, and forget that where once the dimples nestled now only two wrinkles are furrowed; they flourish their lunettes coquettishly, displaying the fact that the lenses are convex; and all the poudre de riz in the world can not hide the fact that the bloom has long been brushed from the bosom bared so bravely to the blast. In the background there is always mystery, persecution, sorrow—they compliment each other on the marks of suffering which give pathos to their absent-minded expression; but in the foreground there is always a man—a man who has no business there; now it is the youth they failed to marry, now the ideal they never came across, now the young man of the present who feels himself twice a man when dangling at the side of a woman twice his age, and whose insipid adoration is soothing to their hungry vanity and stimulating to their vapid fancies.

As to where they can be seen—they are to be seen every where where it is public—behind the scenes at the theatre, where they invite the players home to supper, and regret the misapplied talents that have rusted with themselves in private life, and talk still as if CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN'S playing in her own gray hair ought to give them the freedom of the boards; sometimes they are seen on the exchange; sometimes at the race-course, betting—not always gloves—on the favorite. They are connoisseurs of pictures and of wines; and they always have a reform or two on hand, which gives them excuse for any amount of visiting and weak flirtation—reforms generally of the kind that allows much conversation which, if not indecent, is prurient, and which renders them, by the latitude of their remarks, and by the relish with which they accept and roll over every high-seasoned scandal like a sweet morsel under their tongues, as unfortunate companions as the young man or woman of their acquaintance could encounter, and demoralizing to every community they enter, like old and overripe fruit with a worm at the heart, corrupting all the fresh young fruit beside it. Never is this influence of theirs more injurious than when used upon the young wives and mothers who look with wonder and pleasure on their beauty, be it artificial or be it well-preserved, and listen to the ejaculations and declarations that teach mistrust of husbands and neglect of families, that invite to idle reading and hurtful enjoyments, and disturb them with vague and restless longings for the things that are not.

Sometimes these advanced sirens play the rôle of the unappreciated wife, sometimes that of her whose life has been a grand mistake, and they spend their days attitudinizing and posturing in the character of a victim to enduring martyrdom: they might have been Corinnes crowned at the Capitol, but for the brutal husband whose whole soul was wrapped in veal cutlets fried in olive-oil; their aspirations have been crushed, their desires suppressed, their genius has gone to babies, their lives are wrecks; and they quote poetry, and travel, and go through devotional seasons, and are horror-struck with the lately discovered depravity of the world, and they warn the particular young man of the moment in such a ravishing way that he hastens to tempt that depravity for himself.

But after all, assuming every other rôle though they may, the only one in which they really succeed is that of the silly wife. Accomplished in nothing, they profess a little of every thing—a little art, a little literature, a little virtue, a little love—yet their sole possessions are the miserable affectations and vanities to gratify which they seek a publicity of admiration, enjoy it perhaps a short while, to receive in the end a publicity of contempt. And when we see them whirling by, or meet them in the galleries, with their false bloom, the disguising crêpé of their borrowed hair, the veiling and softening laces, the fluttering feathers and ribbons, the paint and powder and falseness and fashion, we turn to some sweet and simple grandmother—no older by a day—whose silver locks are white with a lustre out of heaven, and whose hand is clasped by the loving babies whose mothers were once her own babies, and we thank Heaven that a model for age to take pattern by yet remains in a world that has not learned to shudder at fast old women.

THE YOUNG REPUBLIC.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

CHILDREN are no doubt tiresome to people who have the care of them, but irresponsible association with children is a never-ceasing interest and delight. To sit alone in the Park and study the different groups of little ones playing about you is at once employment and enjoyment. The flossy, flowing hair, the vandyke collars, the dainty, diminutive petticoats, the broad sashes, the Tyrolese hats, the shapely legs, the free, visible motions, the infinite flashing of vivid colors—here is a little picturesque world within the world, not less real and far more accessible than the outer world which infolds it. Have the mothers given too much time to tucks and trimmings? I dare say they have, the vain, fond, silly mothers, but they have made a pretty picture after all. And if the painter is praised who spends his time in tricking out canvas with color and contour to delight the eye and inthrall the heart, shall the mother be harshly blamed even if she trims the midnight lamp to deck with freshness and softness and brightness that little living statue, rounded and rosy, as fair and pure and sweet as if it had been carved from vitalized marble?

True, this picture is for a day, and the painting and the sculpture are for all time. But so the flowers spring as gracefully outlined, as exquisitely tinted, as lavishly dowered with the sweet mystery and ministry of scents, as if they were not to yield up their lovely life in a night. All the year waits on one moment of superb and supreme beauty. Nay, a hundred years serve steadfastly for one brief blossoming, and we do not chide Nature for the lavish outlay, but admire her patience and applaud her accomplishment. The picturesque childhood passes so swiftly, and the bright colors must be subdued and the charming outlines hidden—we may pity if we must, but not too severely censure the poetry, the love of art, the refinement and delicacy, which find expression while they may in a child's dress.

And if the heavens are shrouded as on this bitter spring day, and the air is full of invisible ice, what substitute for sunshine is so bright as the faces and the voices of the eager, busy children? You sit by the glowing grate with an entertaining book, but "keeping an eye out," yes, and an ear too, for the microcosm in the other corner. And if you can but furnish a little wisdom of your own, you will find as much wisdom there as in any book. There, in little, all the large world reveals itself. There the future is forecast. The present holds the germ of all that is to be. It wants only the seeing eye. Life is strictly logical, but we fail to frame the syllogisms, and stand astonished at the conclusions. All the same they are conclusions, and not caprices.

There are many arrangements in the world that we can not understand; but involuntarily watching the children at their play, we can readily see why they are arranged in groups, and not consigned to solitary education. It is not alone for enjoyment, but for training. Parents do their part, but they can not do the whole. Children must themselves complement their own development. Even the defects of parental training may be made up by the inevitable trituration of these atoms. The parents are strong and self-possessed and protecting and just and friendly; but when the child goes out into the world he will find it indifferent, unjust, reckless. How can he bear the transition from the warm atmosphere of home to the cool, not to say biting, airs of this new sphere? But the wise, self-restrained, helping adults do not constitute all of home. Again and again comes a little baby more helpless, ignorant, appealing, than the helpless, ignorant, and appealing child. The three-year-old immediately constitutes herself a mother superior to the three-day-old. The same lovely, helpful traits which she calls forth in her parents the baby calls forth in her. Children are to each other what the outside world is to their parents. Heedless, headlong children become careful and cautious when the baby wanders into their play-ground. The boy who howls and storms and raves because his mother will not yield to his wish and whim will himself yield to the whims of the tiny sister left a while in his charge, and coax and cajole and induce not only with marvelous patience, but with a wisdom and a tact of which you had never suspected him to be capable. Children have an unconscious confidence in their parents and elders, and an unconscious and correct lack of confidence in their younger friends. They will be unreasonable with their parents, knowing that their parents will not be unrestrained in return; but when little Peggy totters about among the infantile crockery they know it is of no use to thrust her out fiercely, because no shame will restrain her from pushing unearthly yells which will spoil their sport. So they check their impatience, and lure her out lovingly, and learn the valuable art of self-government.

Thank Heaven for the quarrels of children! Thus they learn the balance of power before they leave the nursery. Perhaps his father will not allow Charley to be punished, but if he strikes Kitty, Kitty strikes back, and with blind fury. So he learns to curb his tempers in spite of his father. The trouble is that parents too often interfere when it would be much better to leave the children to fight it out. But Charley is stronger than Kitty, and hurts her. True, but it is very important that Kitty should learn to measure herself, and to know that if she flings herself rashly against a superior power she will be beaten. Besides keeping a general supervision of eyes and bones, let us not exercise too close a watch. The outcry and clamor are not soothing or musical considered merely as sounds, but when you classify them as the friction of souls striving to adjust themselves to the relations of life, they are far from annoying. Let the children alone. The brother's impatience may better discipline the offender than the father's patience. The sister's quick, effective resentment is more like the world's ways than the mother's loving endurance. The slap that promptly follows encroachment is a good practical lesson in human rights. Be not too hasty to forbid the little children to beat and box and tease and scold and scratch each other into a respect for ownership, for sensitiveness, into a dignified self-control, and even, at length, into a profound and universal benevolence.

Hosted by Google

An absolute monarchy may give more social order, but a republic makes stronger men and women for citizens.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE CHÂTELAINE REDINGOTE SUIT.

THE Châtelaine Redingote Suit, illustrated on our first page (and of which a cut paper pattern will be furnished), has a long over dress fitted smoothly over the hips, in imitation of the châtelaine bodice seen in old portraits. This garment, made of camel's-hair cloth, embroidered all over, and fastened by filigree silver buttons, is rich enough to have been worn by any stately lady of the castle of medieval times. Modern taste preserves this richness, if desired, but finds also a certain chic in the plain garment, well fitted and simply trimmed; for instance, a redingote of summer camel's-hair or of cashmere may have the needle-work omitted, and be merely edged with wool fringe or a piping fold of velvet or of silk. In the back of this redingote the waist is defined by two large buttons, and the skirt is draped by tapes underneath the upper part. The waist should be lined throughout with silk. The sash is loops and long ends of watered ribbon. The skirt is of silk of the same color as the redingote, but is of a darker shade. Linen, percale, piqué, grenadine, and batiste suits may be made by this pattern; with summer dresses a belt like the sash is used.

PARISIAN DRESSES.

The leading exclusive modistes have returned from Paris, bringing carefully selected dresses that will decide definitely the fashions of the spring and summer. The polonaise, or redingote, as it is commonly called this season, and the basque with over-skirt, remain the models for another season; both are equally fashionable, but there is a preference for polonaises for street suits. A conspicuous feature is the novel effect produced by doing away with side drapery, and drawing up polonaises and overskirts very short behind, leaving the sides and long front absolutely smooth and plain. To add to this appearance of flat front, slender sides, and bouffant back, the lower skirt has its three front breadths trimmed flatly with lengthwise bands, pleats, gathered puffs, or smooth melon puffs, while the back widths are covered with three full gathered bunchy flounces. To complete the effect, these skirts are tied back over the new French tournure, which is a long, narrow affair of twelve steel springs incased in muslin, and worn strapped behind the person. This bustle adds nothing to the breadth of the hips, but is behind only, pushing the skirts far out backward in a slender curve, and is long enough to support them half their length, making them flow outward gracefully, instead of falling in below a projecting hump at the waist, as they have lately done.

The high standing Medici fraise of silk or the dress material trims the pointed neck of basque or polonaise, and adds to that stateliness which promises to supersede the jauntiness so long in fashion. This fraise is bias silk three inches wide behind, where it is held in full pleats, and slopes gradually away toward the throat. It is seen on all dresses, from the simplest muslins to elaborate dinner dresses of faille. An inner pleating of white crêpe lisse comes in the neck and wrists of imported dresses, and is often preferred to lace. It is sold, ready pleated, for 80 cents a yard. The standing English collar and turned-down round collars made of the dress material trim cashmere and linen costumes.

Wide silk flounces are made straight on many French dresses, and are simply hemmed below and gathered on a cord above. They are often arranged in three side pleats at intervals with gathers between the clusters. For edging and heading wide flounces are puffs and shell scallops—ruffles three inches wide in clusters of side pleats caught over on the plain spaces. The train flounce may be either bias or straight. Bias gathered flounces are very full, having three-quarters of their length added; their lower edge is turned up an inch on the outside, and piped with one or two tiny folds. Irregular flounces, one wide and two narrow ones below, trim the foot of skirts; a quantity of narrow ruffles around the skirt is passée. All ruffles in groups overlap. It is the rule to trim front breadths different from the back, and in many cases a third kind of trimming extends down the side breadths, such as puffs, folds, bars, or revers. For bordering upper skirts plain edges or fringes are preferred to ruffles—thus a bias band of silk a finger length broad is laid on cashmere and other woolen dresses; sometimes a band of the dress material is used, and piped on the upper side with silk. The fringes are tied into the edge of the over-skirt or garment, and are used without heading. Many over-skirts are made to lap in front, and others fasten on the left side; there is also a fancy for draping each side differently. A row of three or four bows made with irregular loops and ends holds the fronts of over-skirts together; few plain apron fronts are shown on the last importations; sash ends and lengthwise loops are placed far back on the sides.

Superb black silk costumes have the three front breadths trimmed with seven bias bands thickly corded on the sides, pointed and fringed below, extending lengthwise from the belt below the knee, and meeting a straight deep flounce held in three side pleats and gathers. On the back breadths are three deep flounces with shell scallops at top and bottom. Over this is a polonaise made with a double-breasted basque in front, fastened by two rows of vieil argent buttons; a standing fraise of silk trims the neck; the polonaise skirt laps in front, slopes away long on the sides, and is caught up high and short behind. The coat sleeves have four bias bands extending from the armhole to the cuff, and a plain stiffly lined cuff is turned over the wrist. These stately costumes combine all the new fancies of the spring, and are used for church, carriage, and visiting dresses. Price $300.

A hundred summer camel's-hair polonaises are shown at one house, with scarcely two alike. Those of écru summer camel's-hair, with brown velvet revers down the front, velvet cuffs, epaulets, pockets, and a straight flat velvet Watteau down the back, are $175. Insertions of yak are let in the skirt. A brown velvet skirt is required to complete the costume. A novelty from Worth is a dark green camel's-hair polonaise with jacket back, military passementeries in front, swinging cords behind, and sailor scarf of the camel's-hair knotted at the throat, with ends passed under the belt. With green silk skirt, the price is $200. New stylish cashmere suits have the Josephine polonaise, with plain tight round waist, wide silk belt and huge buckle of smoked pearl; the polonaise skirt is lapped to fasten on the side, trimmed in front with a wide bias band, while the back has a fringed flounce and sash. A tiny standing English collar is made of the cashmere, and bosom folds drape the corsage. The silk skirt has two narrow gathered bias ruffles below a wide straight flounce edged and headed with shell scallops.

A perfect costume for a bride has a skirt of lavender silk, with alternate black velvet and silk kilt pleating on the front breadth, and three silk flounces behind widely faced with black velvet. The polonaise of lavender cashmere, embroidered with a deeper shade, is fringed on the edges, and has a wide sash, collar, and front bows of black velvet, showing lavender silk lining.

A réséda cashmere suit has a silk skirt with side pleating and narrow ruffles held down by a cashmere band an eighth wide. The Worth over-skirt hangs open long and plain in front and sides, is caught up high behind by a sash, and has square pockets like a polonaise; the edge is finished by a bias cashmere band like that on the skirt, piped with silk. The shapely basque is fringed in front and plainly piped behind, with sash ends coming out from underneath. Coat sleeves, with two cuffs turned over to show a silk facing.

SUMMER SUITS.

For summer suits thick Napoleon blue soft-finished linen is imported for $1 a yard, and twenty-five yards are sold for a suit. Polonaises of this linen are wrought all over with white polka dots; others are machine embroidered with white, and sold for $35. A very simple suit of deepest blue with a vine of white brier stitching on polonaise and skirt is $35. Another novelty is toile bleu, blue linen striped with white like bed-ticking coutille. When stylishly made this is very effective, and will not become common, as plain suits cost $70. They are made with a long tight polonaise caught up behind, edged with a scalloped needle-worked ruffle, and fastened by smoked pearl buttons. The skirt has a wide straight flounce edged by two scalloped ruffles. When a line of red is in the white stripe the ruffles are overcast with Turkey red cotton. Cool-looking brown linen suits are not largely imported. The most stylish and simple ones shown have the skirt trimmed with two straight gathered flounces each two-eighths wide, headed by a bias band. The long loose belted polonaise has a similar flounce all around it, is buttoned down the front by large pearl buttons, has square pockets, and has a black faille folded belt with a sash that drapes it high behind. Folds of black faille and a bow are on the sleeves. Around the neck is an English collar of the gray linen. A white linen ruffle will be worn inside.

The newest fancy in batiste costumes is to trim them with strong heavy Malines (old-fashioned thread lace). A row of Malines insertion is set in the polonaise, and three rows are in the Spanish flounce on the skirt. Price $125 for suit. Among other washing dresses are lace-striped percales in brown and gray goods, with white stripes and damask figures.

The loveliest white cambric suits have the polonaise wrought all over in open-worked English embroidery, all eyelet-holes and compass-work. The skirt has a single deep flounce of embroidery. Embroidered fraise around the neck. Violet watered ribbon sash, belt, and knots at the throat and elbow complete this perfect costume. Price $175. A white nansook suit has a Watteau polonaise and Spanish flounced skirt, trimmed with thick Hamburg insertion and scalloped ruffles. New Swiss muslin dresses for afternoon and evening have the front breadth formed of lengthwise insertion and box-pleats, while the back is covered with five flounces made of insertion and puffs. The blouse-waist is formed of alternate insertion and box-pleats. Less expensive dresses are made in this elaborate style with tucked bands and puffs: price $60. These models are commended for graduating dresses. White nansook wrappers have the Watteau fold behind; three fluted ruffles begin at the neck in front, and sweep down the skirt, gradually widening toward the back; they are edged with Valenciennes. A Watteau bow and ends of blue or pink watered ribbon hang from the neck behind, and small bows are down the front.

For information received thanks are due Mrs. CONNELLY; and Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and A. T. STEWART & Co.

PERSONAL.

SINCE LOUISE COLET died, in 1871, at Nice, "George Sand" is the only living female writer in France whose pen has proved a plume d'or. Madame COLET, once a poor governess, was a very voluminous writer, and left a fortune of about $160,000. "George Sand" is still richer. We have divers ladies in this land of the free who have many thousands of "governments" and other good collaterals, the result of penwork.

—CHARLES KINGSLEY says:

"If you wish to be miserable, you must think about yourself; about what you want, what you like, what respect people ought to pay you, what people think of you; and then to you nothing will be pure. You will spoil every thing you touch; you will make sin and misery for yourself out of every thing God sends you; you will be as wretched as you choose."

—The ladies are coming in for some of the good things. Mrs. CAREY, sister of Senator STEWART, has been appointed postmistress at her native town in Ohio, with a salary of $2200. She presided over the household of Senator STEWART during the absence of his family in Europe, and is a very charming and estimable lady—and widow.

—THAYER, the biographer, says BEETHOVEN looked like a little ugly mulatto; was very short; had a yellow skin, broad, spread-out nose, and projecting teeth, over which his heavy lips shut; with a slight Indian look about the cheek-bone. As a spectacle he was not a success.

—ADELINA PATTI seems to have excited the Russians, from ruler to rustic, to a pitch of enthusiasm previously unprecedented in the musical history of that nation. At her recent benefit the Emperor ALEXANDER, according to the published reports, went on to the stage, and with his own hands offered the heroine of the evening "a diamond coronet representing wild roses." At the inspiriting sight of the Czar of all the Russias making a present on the public boards to an undoubtedly charming prima donna the loyal audience rose as one man and applauded with enthusiasm, though what they applauded, whether the emperor or the prima donna, or the homage done by the former to the latter, does not appear. This seems the most extraordinary performance in which royalty has taken part since the days of LOUIS XIV., who, though he acted and danced on the stage, did so only at court entertainments, where he was more or less among acquaintances.

—Speaking of the late Emperor of France, M. GUIZOT says, "He was all his life one of three things—prisoner, journalist, or carbonari—but always thoroughly a gentleman."

—Mr. TOM HUGHES, in a lecture recently delivered in Edinburgh on Problems of Civilization, says, in reference to the munificent donations for benevolent purposes going on in this country, that "upon most social problems England has perhaps but little to learn from America, but upon this particular one much. Few things struck me more in the United States than the scale upon which private citizens are undertaking and carrying out great works for the public good. Girard College in Philadelphia, Harvard College in Massachusetts, are well-known instances of what past generations have done while the country was poor and struggling; but now that it is growing at a pace which will soon make it the richest and most populous of nations, there is every sign of a growing public sentiment that it is disgraceful in those whom society has enabled to gather vast riches not to return to society with an open hand." Mr. HUGHES names Cooper Institute and Cornell University as notable instances of later liberality. He might have largely extended the catalogue. The princely gifts of VASSAR, PEABODY, DREW, HOPKINS, ASTOR, LENOX, ROOSEVELT, GROSVENOR, and scores of others, added to the noble endowments made during the last five or ten years to colleges and educational institutions, present an affluence of liberality without parallel in the history of any country, ancient or modern.

—JOHN G. SAXE has just returned from a very delightful and profitable lecture tour through the South. At Mobile, Vicksburg, Tuscaloosa, Savannah, Memphis, and other cities he was greeted with audiences not only large, but embracing the best social position and highest culture of the Southern States. His lectures, poems, etc., as read by himself, were subjects of the highest encomiums from the press wherever he went, and have led to very numerous engagements for next season. Mr. SAXE has sold his residence at Albany, and was last week looking around the suburbs of New York for a place which shall hereafter be his home—"not for a day, but for all time."

—Fifteen years ago MICHAEL CANCEMI, an Italian, was four times tried for the murder of EUGENE ANDERSON, and finally convicted of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to imprisonment for life. In 1864 he was pardoned, and returned to Italy, where he joined the army, and gradually obtained promotion, until now he holds a colonel's commission, and is acting general. His case was over six years in court.

—Theological professors are sometimes indiscreet in speech on temporal matters. Recently Professor SABATIER, having made some aspersions on the women of Germany in two lectures at Bischwiller, received orders to leave Elsass within forty-eight hours. He left.

—Mr. MARSHALL O. ROBERTS, one of the true merchant princes of this city, will bring home with him from Rome over sixty thousand dollars' worth of good paintings, purchased there by himself during the past few months.

—M. EMILE DE GIRARDIN, in conjunction with M. GILBRAT, of Le Constitutionnel, and M. JENTY, of La France, has purchased the Petit Journal of Paris, which has the largest circulation of any newspaper in the world, its daily edition being over 200,000 copies. Its price is a sou. M. DE GIRARDIN is now nearly seventy.

—Mrs. WILLIAM STEINWAY and Mrs. General ALBERT STEINWAY were passengers by the steamer Weser, Saturday, April 5, for Europe.

—A gentleman who had the means of knowing the fact, states that during his last visit to this country the amount of money CHARLES DICKENS cleared by his readings was about $225,000, gold, which was more than thrice as much as he had ever anticipated in his most sanguine moods.

—The Emperor of Russia will, it is said, settle $250,000 a year on his only daughter, the Grand Duchess MARIA, on her marriage with the Duke of Edinburgh.

—Judge POLAND, of Vermont, has this history: His grandfather was a Polish refugee, and had a name so contorted with consonants that the Vermonters gave up the contest, and called him POLAND "for short," and his descendants grew up by that name.

—JOSEPH POWELL, who recently died at Greenville, Tennessee, deserves honorable record in this: He was a member of the Legislature of South Carolina, and the only man who voted "no" at a public meeting that passed nullification resolutions. A gold-headed cane was presented to him, inscribed "The Immortal No."

—In connection with Commodore VANDERBILT'S half-million gift to found a Southern university, to be under the auspices of the Methodist Church, it may be mentioned that the Commodore's wife and the wife of Bishop M'TYIERRE are sisters.

—AUGUST PICKARD, the oldest dweller in the city of Rochester, celebrated his birthday a few days since by scoring one hundred and six since the year he was born. He is in good health, takes daily exercise, burns his little tobacco of an evening, and once in a while takes something with sugar.

—Princess MATHILDE BONAPARTE has written and will soon publish a novel entitled La Dame à la Rubine. It was submitted to M. PROSPER MERIMEE some time before his decease, and was corrected by him.

—ROBERT GRAVES, the last of the old class of engravers of the Royal Academy, died recently in London. His last complete plate was the portrait of CHARLES DICKENS for FORSTER'S Life. He was elected to the Academy in 1836, having just then completed his line engraving of Lord BYRON.

—GEORGE BROWN, of Hoosick Corners, New York, owns the "Ouderick Bible," a large illustrated folio, printed at the Hague, July 29, 1637, and consequently now 237 years old.

—Commend us to the fruitful West for the able and fearless critic. In Peoria dwelleth and writeth one who dealeth thus with a RUBINSTEIN concert:

"Mlle. LIEBHART didn't leave a dry eye in the wigwam when she sang 'There sno plash kome,' and it was the general impression among her German auditors that she sang Rawbing Awdah in English, while the English-speaking inhabitants were equally positive that Robin Adair was a German ballad. Mlle. ORMENY had, and we suppose still retains, a magnificent voice for a fog whistle. Its compass was perfectly surprising. She would shake the chandelier with a wild whoop that made every man instinctively feel for his scalp, and follow it up with a roar that would shame a bassoon."

—HELEN M. BARNARD has been appointed by the President one of the special commissioners to the Vienna Exposition. It seems to be a "part of the eternal fitness of things" that a lady journalist should be one of the commissioners at that showy affair.

—Theatrical ladies seem to be in high favor at Vienna, three of them having had exceeding good fortune during the past year. Miss DUSTMANN, a lady of limited means and unlimited aspirations, had an admirer whom she turned away for another. The swain whom she disdained has recently died, leaving her a large fortune. Another, Miss RABATINSKI, is to be married to a very wealthy manufacturer. One of the paragraphs of the marital contract stipulates that on separation, no matter for what cause, or which party demands it, one hundred thousand dollars are to be paid to the lady. The third, Mlle. TROUSIL, a singer, is engaged to a captain in charge of the German north pole expedition. He has legally pledged himself to marry her on his return, or to leave her all his possessions.

—A few days since the Emperor and Empress of Germany invited themselves to dine at Lord ODO RUSSELL'S—an honor never before conferred on a foreign diplomatist.

—Mr. W. H. RUSSELL, of "Bull Run" renown, will accompany the Russian force to Khiva, for the London Times, the Russian government having specially invited the Times to send a correspondent.

—Lady SHELLEY, who died recently in England, was the person who made a copy of the confidential letter which the Duke of Wellington wrote to Sir JOHN BURGOYNE on the defenseless state of the kingdom, and sent it to the London Morning Post.

—LIDIA RODELRENA is the name of a Russian lady who has given to the St. Petersburg Academy of Medicine $40,000 to endow a department for medical instruction for women.

—It was something for MATHEW ARNOLD to refuse an offer of fifty thousand dollars to produce a novel on the TICHBORNE case. The widow, by-the-way, of the late Sir TICHBORNE, whose estate is in controversy, was recently married to a Captain WICKHAM.

—TOM HUGHES, in his new book, Memoir of a Brother, has an admirable paragraph, applicable, of course, to that brother, who was one of those quiet, excellent, yet able men who do not aspire to make themselves conspicuous before the world, but can make themselves felt when the hour calls them forth. He says:

"For in a noisy and confused time like ours it does seem to me that most of us have need to be reminded of, and will be the better for bearing in mind, the reserve of strength and power which lies quietly at the nation's call outside the whirl and din of public and fashionable life, and entirely ignored in the columns of the daily press. The subject of this memoir was only a good specimen of thousands of Englishmen of high culture, of high courage, high principle, who are living their own quiet lives in every corner of the kingdom, from John o' Groat's to the Land's End, bringing up their families in the love of God and their neighbor, and keeping the atmosphere around them clean and pure and strong by their example—men who would come to the front, and might be relied on, in any serious national crisis."

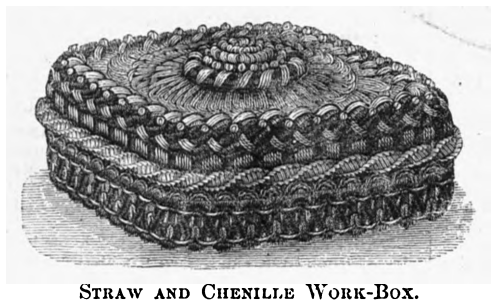
—The Sultan, it is said, proposes to abolish the office of Grand Vizier, and inaugurate the system of ministerial responsibility.

—It is stated, on the authority of General SCOFIELD to General SHERMAN, that the new potentate of the Sandwich Islands, King LUNALILO, will accompany him on his return, and make a tour of the United States, for the purpose of personally looking into the practical working of free institutions, and to learn more about our people, whom he dearly, dearly loves.

Hosted by Google

Book-Rest with Application Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS book-rest is made of carved brown stained wood, and is ornamented with a medallion in application embroidery, which is shown in full size by the illustration, Fig. 2. The foundation of the medallion is of white cloth. The violets are cut of violet and the leaves of green cloth in different shades, and are embroidered in point Russe embroidery with filling silk in a lighter shade, and fastened on the foundation with the points depressed therein. The inside of the calyxes is formed of several stitches of yellow saddler's silk. A number of buds are worked with violet and green saddler's silk in satin stitch. All the feathery sprays and the stems are worked partly with green chenille in point Russe, and partly with green and brown saddler's silk in herring-bone, half-polka stitch, and point Russe.



STRAW AND CHENILLE WORK-BOX.

Fig. 1.—BOOK-REST WITH APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.—[See Fig. 2.]

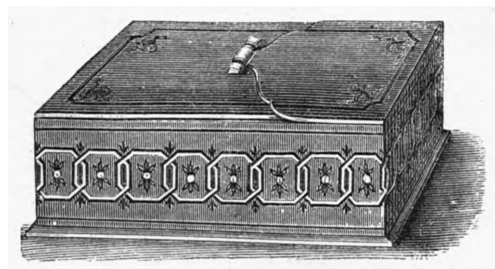


Fig. 1.—CHESS BOX WITH FOLDING BOARD AND MEN. CLOSED.—[See Fig. 2, and Fig. 3 on Page 261.]

Straw and Chenille Work-Box.

THIS pretty work-box is made of an oblong box of yellowish wicker-work rounded off on the corners, and furnished with an overlapping lid fastened by means of hinges. The box is ornamented on the rim and in the middle of the top with raised straw braid, through which red chenille is run as shown by the illustration. The inside is lined with red silk, on which are fastened bands of red silk ribbon for holding the various sewing utensils.

Chess Box with Folding Board and Men, Figs. 1-3.

THIS chess box consists of an oblong four-cornered box of maroon Russia leather two inches high, which is furnished with a lid opening in the middle and fastened with a small metal clasp. The rim of the box is ornamented with an embroidered border worked on red gros grain in point Russe with saddler's silk in various colors and gold thread; Fig. 3, page 261, shows a full-sized section of the border. Both sides of the lid are also ornamented on the inside with a medallion, as seen by Fig. 2, which shows the box open. This medallion is worked on red silk in satin stitch, half-polka stitch, and point Russe with silk of different colors. On the outside of the lid a monogram may be worked with red silk and gold thread in satin and half-polka stitch. A chess-board of thick card-board is folded up and laid above the men, inside of the box, as shown by Fig. 2.

Corners of Borders for Handkerchiefs, Covers, etc.—Venetian and Point Lace Embroidery.—Figs. 1-5.

THESE borders are designed for trimming handkerchiefs, covers, cushions, etc. The border shown by Fig. 1 is worked on Swiss muslin or nansook in satin and button-hole stitch. Stretch the bars between the design figures with coarse thread, which is tied in a knot at regular intervals, and cut away the foundation material underneath the bars. Fig. 1 shows where to work the wheels and lace stitches; the wheels are worked as shown by Figs. 3 and 4.

For the border shown by Fig. 2 first baste tulle and point lace braid on a foundation of enameled cloth or linen in the design given, and fasten the braid together at the intersecting points. Then work the lace stitches on the tulle; instead of the lace stitches separate parts may be ornamented with wheels and point Grec, as shown by Figs. 3-5. The outer edge of the border is edged with close button-hole stitches and with button-hole stitched picots.

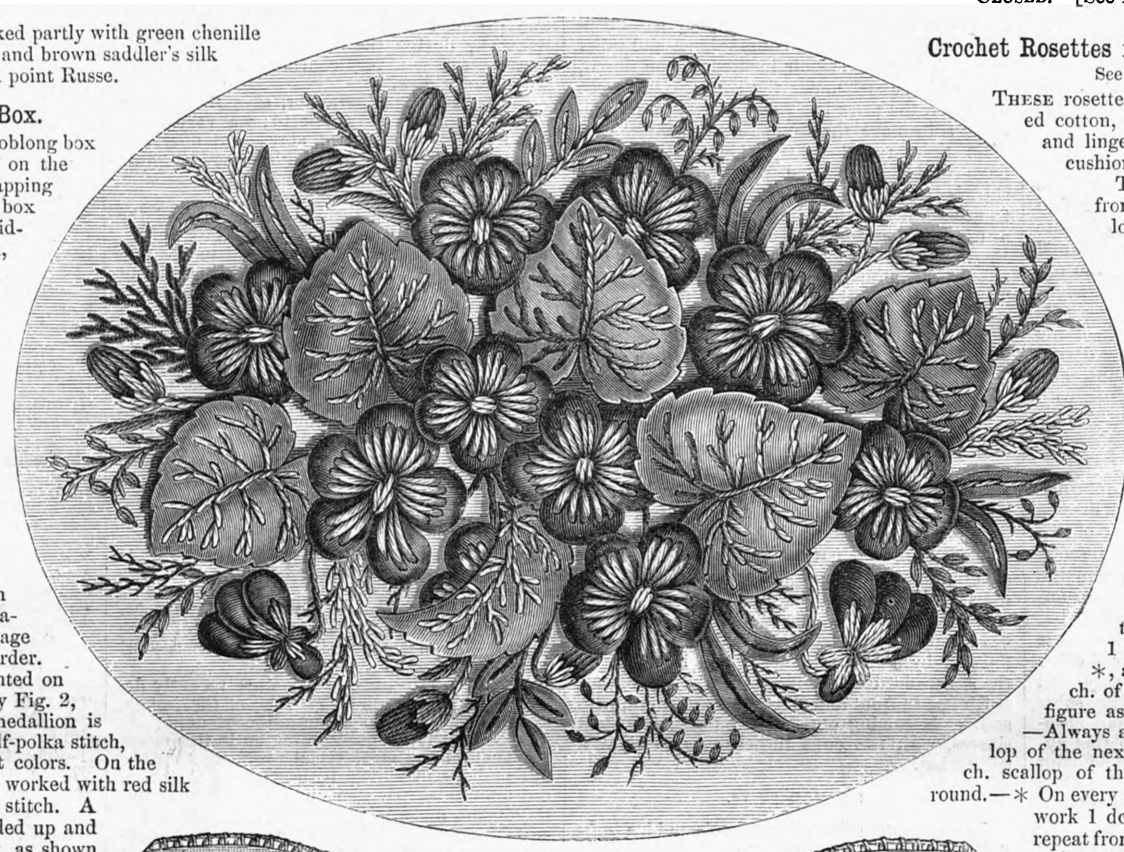

Fig. 2.—APPLICATION EMBROIDERY FOR BOOK-REST, FIG. 1. FULL SIZE.

Crochet Rosettes for Cravats, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 261.

THESE rosettes are worked with fine or coarse twisted cotton, and are suitable for trimming cravats and lingerie, and also for small pin or toilette cushions.

The rosette shown by Fig. 1 is crocheted from the centre, in seven rounds, as follows: Make a foundation of 12 ch. (chain stitch), close these in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and crochet the 1st round.—3 ch., which count as first dc. (double crochet), then 31 dc. on the ring; finally, 1 sl. on the last of the 3 ch. which count as first dc. 2d round.—* 4 sc. (single crochet) on the next 4 st. (stitch), 3 ch., 1 p. (picot—that is, 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), 18 ch., 1 sl. on the fourth of these, so that the last fifteen form a loop, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the third following ch. of the loop, 11 ch., 1 sc. on the same ch. on which the preceding sc. was worked; three times alternately 5 ch., 1 sc. on the third following ch., 5 ch., 1 sc. on the same ch. on which the sl. was worked, 3 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 sl. on the last of the 4 sc.; repeat from , always going forward, but fasten the 11 ch. of each following figure to the preceding figure as shown by the illustration. 3d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the middle ch. scallop of the next figure, 16 ch. 4th round.—On each ch. scallop of the preceding round work 25 dc. 5th round.— On every second following dc. of the next scallop work 1 dc., between these 12 dc. always 1 ch.; repeat from *, always going forward. 6th round.—On each ch. of the preceding round work 2 sc., and between the 2 dc. in each hollow between the scallops always 1 sc. 7th round.—1 sc. on every fourth following st. in the preceding round, after every sc. 1 ch., 1 p., 1 ch. At the end of the round 1 sl. on the first sc.

Fig. 2.—For this rosette, which consists of eight rounds, make a foundation of 12 ch., close these in a ring with 1 sl., and crochet the 1st round.—24 sc. on the ring. 2d round.—* 4 sc.

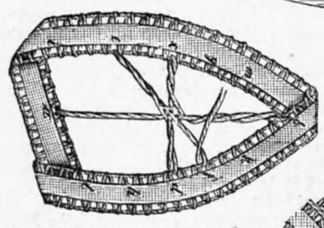

Fig. 3.—WHEEL FOR VENETIAN EMBROIDERY, FIG. 1. FIRST DETAIL.

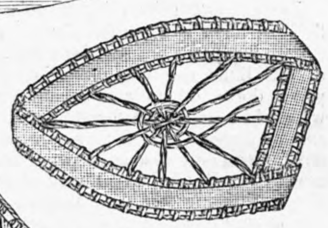

Fig. 4.—WHEEL FOR VENETIAN EMBROIDERY, FIG. 1.—SECOND DETAIL.

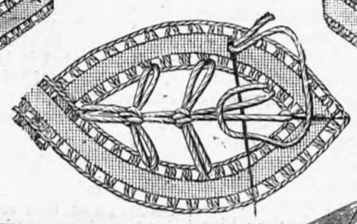

Fig. 5.—POINT GREC FOR POINT LACE EMBROIDERY, FIG. 2.

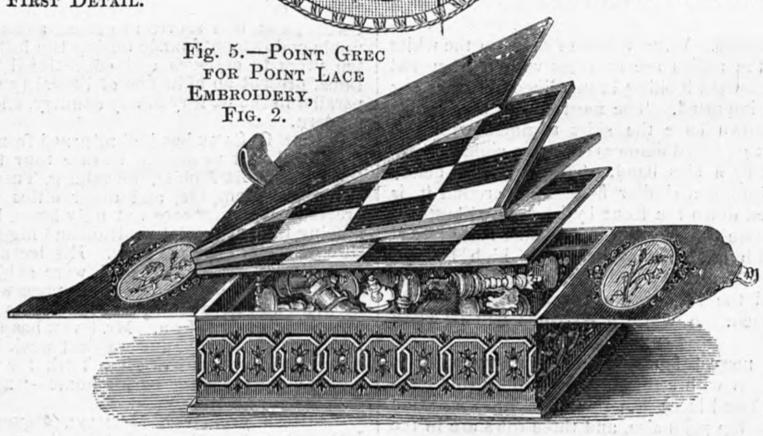

Fig. 2.—CHESS BOX WITH FOLDING BOARD AND MEN.—OPEN. [See Fig. 1, and Fig. 3 on Page 261.]

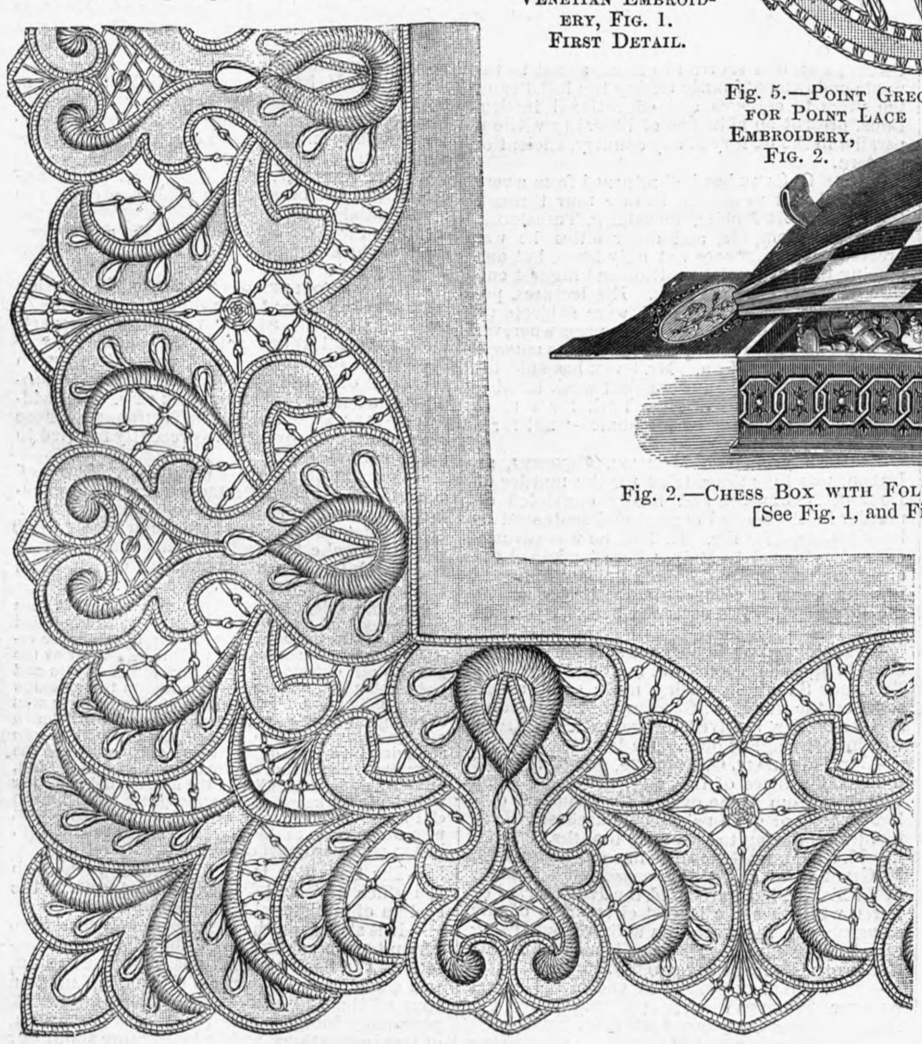

Fig. 1.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR HANDKERCHIEFS, COVERS, ETC.—VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.—[Figs. 3 and 4.]

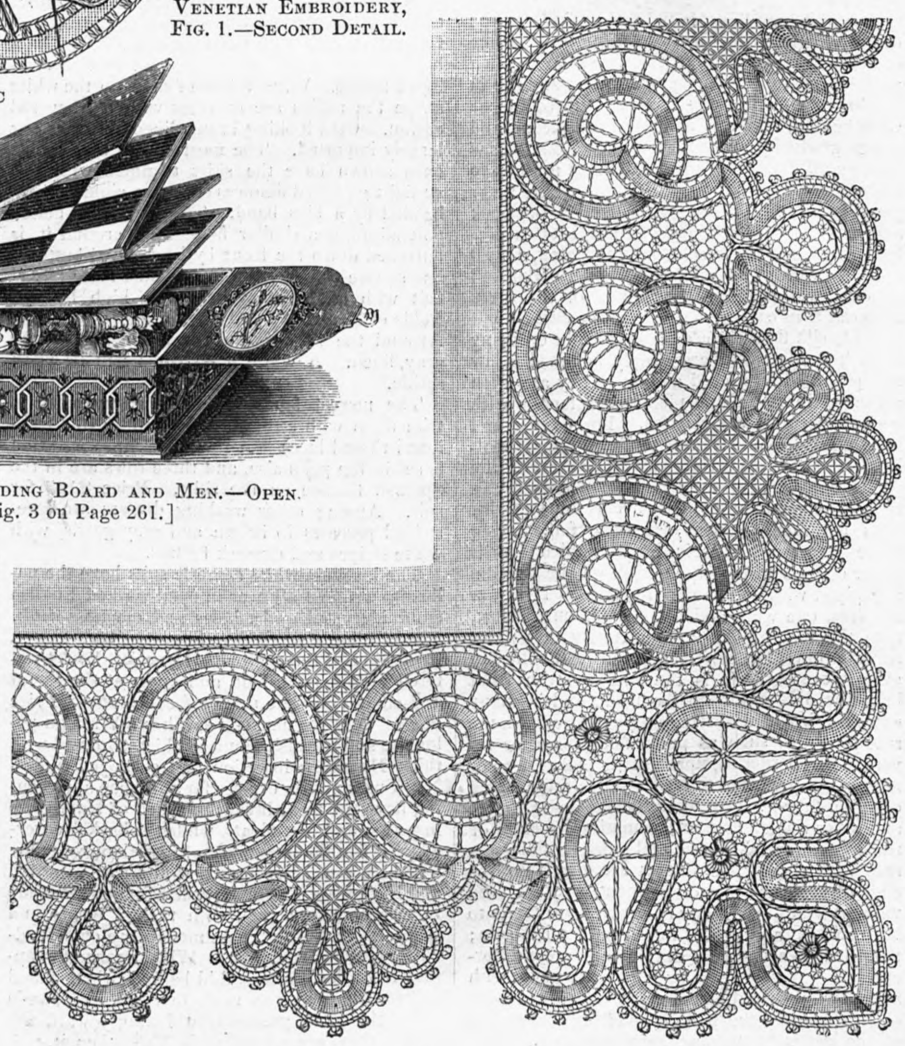

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR HANDKERCHIEFS, COVERS, ETC.—POINT LACE EMBROIDERY.—[See Figs. 3-5.]

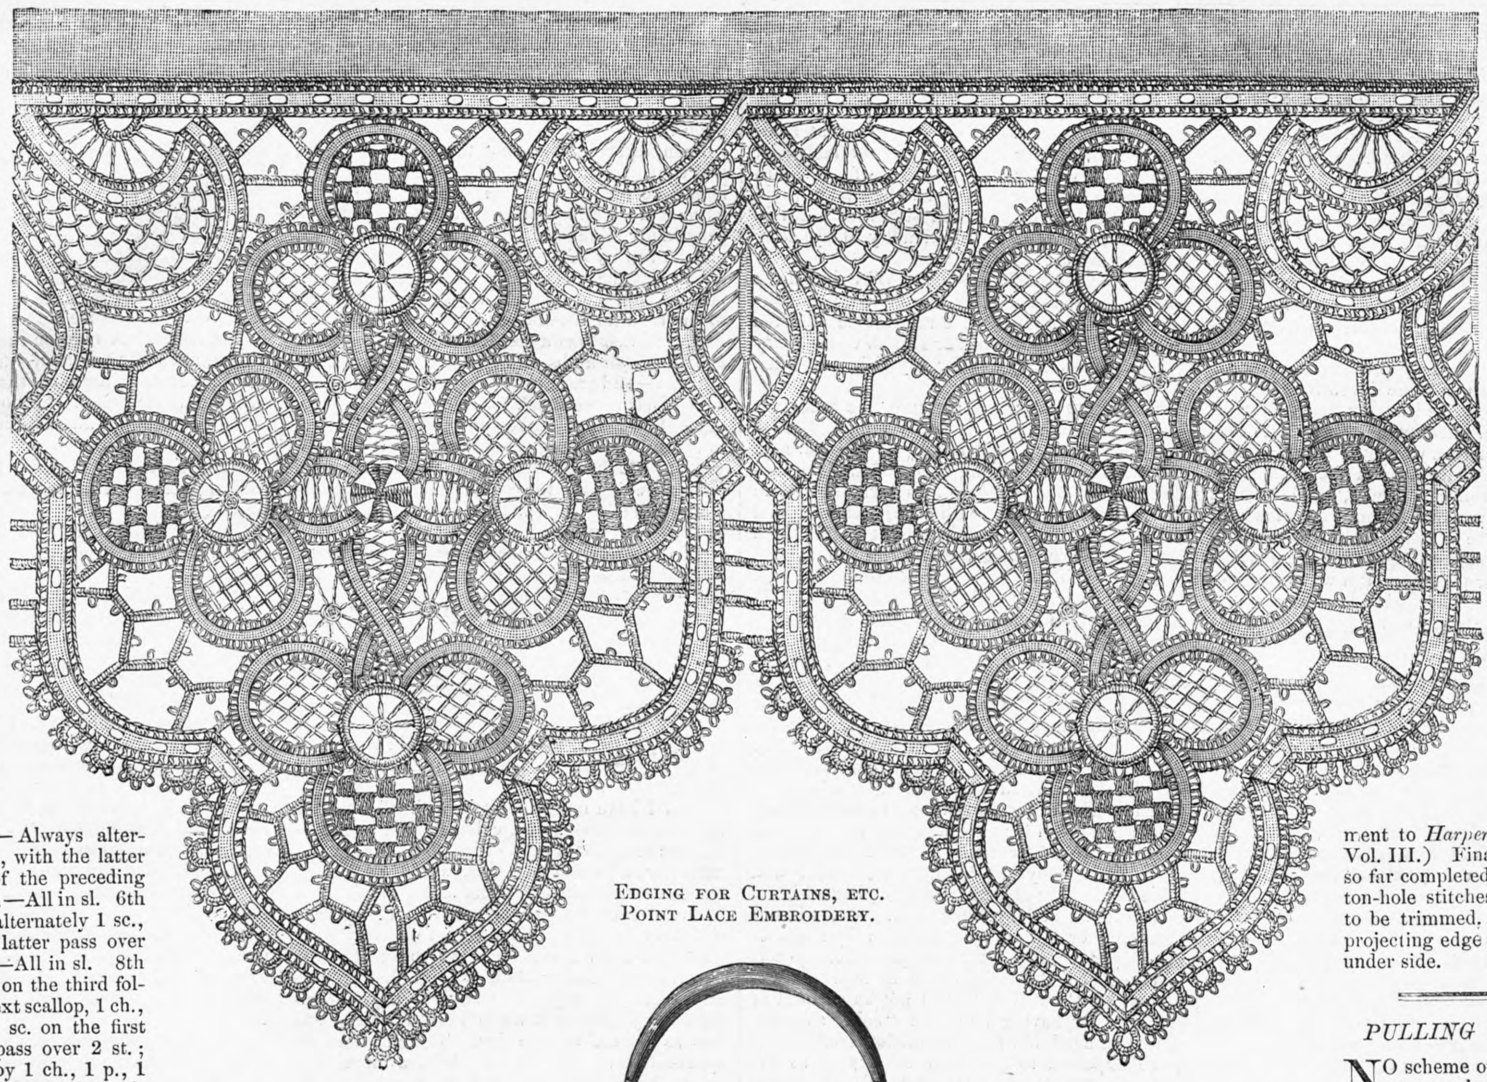
Hosted by Google

on the next 4 st., 15 ch., 1 sl. on the fifth of these, 4 ch., 1 sl. on the first of the 15 ch., so that two ch. loops are formed; work on the next loop 1 sc., 2 sdc. (short double crochet), 1 p. (consisting of 4 ch.), 2 sdc., 1 sc.; on the following (upper) loop work 1 sc., 2 sdc., 1 p., 2 sdc., 1 sc., 1 p. (this p. forms the point of the figure), 1 sc., 2 sdc., 1 p., 2 sdc., 1 sc.; again on the first of the two loops work 1 sc., 2 sdc., 1 p., 2 sdc., 1 sc.; finally, 1 sl. on the last of the 4 sc.; repeat five times from , but fasten the figures together by means of the lower picots as shown by the illustration. 3d round.—1 sc. on each figure in the preceding round, after each sc. 19 ch. 4th round.—Always alternately 1 sc., 1 ch., with the latter pass over 1 st. of the preceding round. 5th round.—All in sl. 6th round.—Always alternately 1 sc., 12 ch., with the latter pass over 9 st. 7th round.—All in sl. 8th round.— 1 sdc. on the third following st. of the next scallop, 1 ch., 1 p. (4 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), 1 ch., pass over 2 st.; 2 sdc. separated by 1 ch., 1 p., 1 ch., on the middle 2 st. of the scallop, 1 ch., 1 p., 1 ch., pass over 2 st., 1 sdc. on the following st., pass over 5 st., and repeat from *, always going forward.



EDGING FOR CURTAINS, ETC. POINT LACE EMBROIDERY.

Edging for Curtains, etc. Point Lace Embroidery.

THIS edging, which is worked in point lace embroidery, is especially adapted for trimming curtains, window-shades, etc.—Transfer the design for running on the point lace braid (one piece of narrow braid and one wide piece of figured braid) to linen, run on the braid, following the outlines, in doing which fasten the pieces of braid together with a few stitches at the intersecting points, and work the various lace stitches as shown by the illustration. (Descriptions of all the stitches used in point lace work are given in the Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 11, Vol. III.) Finally, fasten the lace so far completed by means of button-hole stitches on the material to be trimmed, and cut away the projecting edge of the latter on the under side.

Embroidered Music Case, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS case is made of red Russia leather, and consists of a straight piece sixteen inches long and fourteen inches wide, which is rounded off on one end for the flap, and ornamented an inch and a quarter from the outer edge with an embroidery border. Fig. 2 gives a full-sized section of the border. For the design figures cut out the foundation material as shown by this illustration, and underlay it with maroon satin. The remainder of the embroidery is worked with maroon saddler's silk in chain and half-polka stitch and point Russe. The embroidered part is then lined with silk, folded on the inside an inch and three-quarters wide at the straight end, so as to form a small pocket, and bound on the outer edge with maroon silk braid. A leather handle, fastened by means of bronzed metal rings as shown by the illustration, and a tab with metal clasp, complete the case.

Fig. 1.—CROCHET ROSETTE FOR CRAVATS, ETC.

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED MUSIC CASE.

Crochet and Tapestry Afghan.

THIS afghan is especially suited for cradles, infants' carriages, sofas, etc. The foundation consists of wide and narrow strips, which are crocheted lengthwise in the ordinary Tunisian or Afghan stitch with zephyr worsted of different colors, and joined by means of one round of slip stitches each. The wide strips are alternately worked with green and with red worsted, and count thirty-one pattern rows each (each pattern row consists of one round going forward and one round going back), while the narrow strips are worked with black worsted throughout, and count only fifteen pattern rows each. On the wide strips work separate figures in cross stitch and point Russe with zephyr worsted and filling silk in different bright colors, as shown by the illustration; the narrow strips are ornamented each with a Greek border in cross stitch with maize filling silk. All along the outer edge of the coverlet fasten in fringe strands four inches long, made of zephyr worsted of different colors corresponding to the strips of the foundation. Instead of in the Turkish style, the foundation may be worked in two shades of one color.

Fig. 2.—CROCHET ROSETTE FOR CRAVATS, ETC.

PULLING TOGETHER.

NO scheme of household economy can be effectually carried out unless the husband and wife, in old-fashioned phrase, pull together. And how often do they? Why, on the contrary, they have usually quite separate "spheres;" and this also is a part of that regimen of imitation which is a stronghold of many mischiefs. The husband is to be the "winner," the wife the spender, and that is too often supposed to settle the matter. But economy, and certainly economy with kindly and tasteful management, can not be had upon these terms. Monsieur and madame must pull together, and no division of "spheres" must be known in the family council. The husband will do certain things, and the wife certain other things, and these will inevitably follow certain old-world lines. But we must break the tradition which dates from the times when the wife's sticking the knife into an empty trencher at breakfast was the signal for the men to take horse and hunt the boar and deer. If Omphale wants help, and Hercules can do her work, let him, whatever the work may be. In point of fact, women-servants now do a great many things that no woman ought to do—scrubbing, the hard part of the washing, shoe-cleaning, and worse. Leigh Hunt at sixty-five told Hawthorne that, not being able to

CROCHET AND TAPESTRY AFGHAN.

Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERY FOR MUSIC CASE.—FULL SIZE.

Fig. 3.—EMBROIDERED BORDER FOR CHESS BOX. FULL SIZE.—[See Figs. 1 and 2, Page 260.]

Hosted by Google

keep a boy-servant, he cleaned his own boots. And why should not a man make beds? It is of the very utmost consequence that boys, as well as girls, though not in the same degree, should have the training which comes of being made "handy" in the house; and there is something so utterly ridiculous in the idea of a woman having an inalienable right to make tea (whether she makes it weak or strong, well or ill), or to apportion all the minor expenses without concert, that if we were not the slaves of use and wont, we should laugh at it. No: husband and wife must pull together. Of course certain conditions are essential to their doing so. First, they must love each other; and second, they must have brains. If you can first catch your hare in these particulars, you may proceed to cook it. As a rule, the man is more inventive than the woman; at the least, he has seen more and read more; and he can often suggest economies that never would occur to a woman. But a woman must have brains before she will allow him to do much in "the woman's sphere," and perhaps nine out of ten wives, or a larger proportion still, would sneer to see a man, drawing-pencil in hand, elaborately suggesting the cut of an article of female dress, or pointing out a way of economizing the stuff, or discussing how a poor material could be made to yield a good and pretty result.

A GIRL OF THE PERIOD.

HATEFUL title, hateful phrase, hateful article that first set it ringing in our ears! I thought so at the time, though it was impossible to help enjoying its envenomed cleverness, and deemed it the broadest, most exaggerated caricature that had ever been drawn. And yet I have met one. Yes, I can sympathize with the American navigator who has had the misfortune to see the sea-serpent, and is bound, in the interests of truth, to pass during the rest of his life as a person upon whose word no reliance can be placed; for it is to be feared that I too may be suspected of romancing when I assert that I have ridden for some hundreds of miles with a girl of the period, warranted Saturday Review pattern.

When I was young—

I pause here to allow for the reader's glancing to the end of this narrative to ascertain its length. False alarm, you see—it is short, in spite of the threatening commencement.

When I was young, very young, I formed an attachment to a girl of my own youth, who would have had me if her parents had allowed her, which they very properly, I suppose, did not, and she married a man very much older and better off, who, I fear, made her dreadfully happy. I went into despair and wrote poetry, which I read to such sympathetic listeners as I could find. But my friends began to drop off one by one, so I tried dissipation, and replaced them. Dissipation, however, made me bilious, and as a state of perpetual nausea and headache is quite as bad as that of blighted affection, I tried hard work, first in England, and then, more lucratively, in a British dependency. It was a capital remedy, curing the heart and filling the pocket; and, at the age of wisdom, I returned to my native land for good.

After a little while I began to feel lonely. My old friends were dispersed, dead, or converted by time into mere acquaintances: another generation had sprung up, which did not know me. I wanted a home. The obvious course seemed to be marriage. My early and successful rival was as old as I now was when he took my bride out of my mouth, and he had been happy enough afterward, by all accounts; why should not I, in my turn, take some other fellow's bride out of his mouth? I assumed that any girl worth having would be provided with an ineligible nibbler, just as the best peach always shows signs of having had a wasp at it; and I did not intend, after waiting all these years, to put up with a fruit which was not specially attractive.

One of the old set, Lushington, had married directly after my leaving England, and had now a marriageable daughter, who suited me in every respect—a fine, healthy, merry girl, with a frank, open face, feminine in feeling and expression, lady-like in manner, quite good-looking enough, without being a beauty.

Her father had altered less than most of the friends of my youth; and her mother was a charming woman, good-tempered and genial; so that not only was Lucy Lushington an attractive girl in herself, but her family was a nice one to marry into, which is quite another matter. The only drawback was the fact of my being twenty years her senior; but I was strong and hale, and no gray in my hair—or very little, quite underneath. I did not look her father's age at all. Then she might have been taken for eight or ten years older than she was. Altogether, I fixed upon Lucy.

The Lushingtons lived in Cheshire, and had but come up to London for a couple of months during the season, which was how I met them. I soon saw that Lucy was the sort of wife I was on the look-out for, and commenced siege operations in form. I broke ground at a flower-show, opened the first parallel during a sentimental opera, and carried the parents with a frank statement of my resources, and so hoped that I was pushing my way to the heart of the place—or, at any rate, might induce her to capitulate.

I did not much expect love—at all events, before marriage; and Lucy seemed to like me well enough. She brightened up when I came, and asked where they should meet me next when I left, and chatted to me as freely and pleasantly as if she had known me from her cradle. However, I made no formal proposition while they were in town, desiring to think the matter calmly over first; but a fortnight after their return to Cheshire I made up my mind, and wrote a decided letter to Lushington, putting it to him if he thought Lucy would have me if I asked her.

The reply soon came. Lushington and his wife approved of the match with all their hearts, and thought there would be no difficulty. But Lucy was a queer girl about some things; and if her mother urged the marriage, it might very likely set her against it, dutiful as she was in most respects. The best plan would be for me to go down and stay with them in Cheshire, and take an opportunity of speaking to Lucy myself.

This was reasonable enough. Why should the foreign custom of settling matters with the parents be introduced to save me trouble, and the poor girl be done out of her British courtship?

I named an early day for my visit, and when it came I started.

That great historical measure, the Smoking-Carriages Act, had not yet been passed, so I had to give the guard a shilling for solitude. But at Reading a young lady got into my carriage. She was a fine-grown girl, dressed in the height of fashion, with a large chignon and a forward hat, and a tight, spotted veil; with smart petticoat, short dress, striped stockings, and high-heeled boots. I rushed to the opposite side of the carriage with the intention of throwing away my Regalia, not half smoked through; but she stopped me. It would be a pity, especially as she did not mind the smell of tobacco—in fact, liked it.

"Sensible girl," thought I, as I replaced the cigar in my mouth; and I commenced, in gratitude, to try and make myself agreeable. But whether the young lady thought that her kindly impulse had carried her too far, or whether I failed at first to hit upon topics of conversation which interested her, she was very retiring, and confined herself for some time to monosyllables. Now, every body has his little weakness; and mine is a strong objection to being baffled in an endeavor to make people talk. So, without persisting or boring, and between intervals of newspaper reading, I tried subject after subject, and touched the right chord at last. It was horses. I think that I need not be accused of stupidity for having remained "cold" so long. A middle-aged, old-fashioned fellow could hardly be expected to hit upon the stable as the probable centre of a young lady's affections. Now that I had got her pitch, however, there was no longer any difficulty in drawing animated talk from her lips. We spoke of the last Derby and the late Goodwood Cup, and the prospects of the Ebor and the Leger—I cribbing a bit now and then from the sporting intelligence in the newspaper to seem duly knowing. Then we plunged into reminiscences of the hunting field, and I was able to tell her something about foreign horses and bits and saddles which was new to her; and so we got very friendly.

"You are quite sure you do not mind smoking?" I asked, when I required another cigar, after ten minutes' refreshment at Swindon or somewhere.

"Very fond of it, on the contrary," she replied.

"I can not see why ladies should not smoke as well as gentlemen; indeed, I believe a good many do."

"Oh yes—I know several who do."

"Have you ever been induced to try?"

"Yes, I have often smoked a cigarette."

"Dear, dear! I wish I had one to offer you now."

"I wish you had."

"Do you think one of these cigars would be too much for you? They are very good tobacco."

"So I smell," said the young lady. "I think I will try one, if you please."

She raised her veil a little, put the Regalia in her mouth, lit it, and puffed away with gusto. I confess that I certainly should not have offered it if I had anticipated any probability of its being accepted; for those Regalias were very large and full-flavored, and I feared that the effects might be distressing. But there was no cause for alarm: the only action of the nicotine was to soothe the nerves and open the heart of my fair companion to such an extent that she confided to me its most precious secret.

I did not at all like the way in which she began.

"I don't mind telling you something," said she; "only, of course, I trust to your honor not to mention the matter to a soul till afterward."

It was discouraging, under existing circumstances, to be treated as an old fogy, and taken for father confessor by the first pretty girl I met in a public conveyance. Was my appearance, then, so very venerable?

"I promise," said I.

"Well, then, Fidelity is a moral."

A moral quality, I supposed she meant. But why was I to conceal the fact of this young lady's admiration for a virtue which is professed by courtiers and lovers, and practiced by puppy dogs, until after her marriage?

I could think of nothing better to say than—

"Ah?"

"Yes," she replied. "Why, look here—Fidelity beat Juno at a stone at Newmarket, didn't she?"

I thought it best to nod.

"Well, then, taking the line through Juno, Black Tommy, and Peppermint, it would be like putting Black Tommy in at five stone four, at which weight it would be a hundred to one on him; in fact all the other horses would scratch. And yet you can get seven to one against Fidelity at this moment."

"Curious, isn't it?" said I.

"I confess, I look upon the race as over, bar accidents."

So we were back to the stable, were we! I had been terribly puzzled, but now I had my cue. So I looked as cunning as I conveniently could, and said—

"Ah, but is the money all right?"

"That's it," cried my fair companion, triumphantly. "They have worked it beautifully. But I happen to know that the stable are on to a man. It's a real good thing, you may depend upon it."

Soon after this we got the railway fidgets, and conversation languished. Reading could no longer be managed in that vibrating carriage, without a certainty of headache and a risk of permanent blindness. Experience had taught me the futility of trying to sleep in a railway train; but the young lady endeavored to compose herself, and failed utterly. At last we got to a ten-minutes-allowed-for-refreshment station, and that was a relief. One could stretch one's legs—or limbs, rather, as there is a lady in the case—and partake of bottled stout and pork pie. That is the snack for a long railway journey. It is sure to make you stupid and content to sit still, and may possibly give you an indigestion, which beguiles the time gloriously: an hour watching for the symptoms, an hour deciding whether you will take a cockle on arrival, or two, or three, etc.

The bell rang; we hurried back to our seats. The guard banged our prison door to. A newsboy came to the window—

"Times, Standard, Daily Telegraph, Punch, pack of cards."

"Let us have a pack of cards," cried my fellow-traveler, who was now quite like an old acquaintance.

"Hi, boy!"

I took a pack, and when the train was clear of the station the girl challenged me to name my game.

Now I have mingled freely with all sorts of fellow-creatures—home, colonial, and foreign—and confess that a proposition to play at cards, made by a perfect stranger, would, as a rule, excite unfavorable suspicions in my mind. But in the present instance distrust would have been a shallow mistake. Miss Period was very, very fast, and aped masculine ways to an absurdly extravagant extent; but, for all that, it was impossible for any one who had any experience and judgment at all to doubt but what she was as honest as the day. The girl was no card-sharper. If she had been a man, you would have deemed her a very gentlemanly young fellow, for there was not a tinge of vulgarity about her accent or manners. The conclusion I came to was that she was the only girl in a large family of boys, and had lost her mother early; that she was by nature and habit very mannish in her tastes, and was exaggerating them in order to mystify a middle-aged gentleman like myself. The only way to foil such an attack being to take every thing as a matter of course, I determined to humor her to the top of her bent, and proposed blind hookey; and at that simple game we gambled for sixpences, with fluctuating fortunes, for three mortal hours; and when we arrived at our destination I was the loser of a couple of pounds, which the girl popped into her purse with a natural air which showed that she was not at all unaccustomed to playing at games of chance for money. I offered to call a cab, and see to her luggage; but she declined, on the plea that she always paid a porter.

"People write to the papers to say that it's wrong," she explained; "and as I don't choose to be dictated to, I make a point of it."

So I took off my hat to her, and commenced negotiations for a six-mile drive to the Lushingtons' place; for at the end of so long a journey it would not do to take the first horse on the stand. At last I selected a likely animal and driver, who did justice to my discrimination by rattling me over in thirty-five minutes; and you should have felt the roads!

As we jolted along I reflected upon the difference between the Girl and the Lucy of my hopes; and the only drawback to my satisfaction at the contrast was that I could not get the last words of Miss Period out of my head. For observation suggested that it was not fast, mannish girls only who resented dictation. Suppose Lucy also had a habit of doing the exact reverse of what she was told! Her father's remark that it might be injudicious for her mother to support my suit too openly seemed to favor such an idea. It was true that a very judicious husband might get his own way, even under such circumstances, by ordering his wife to do what he most objected to, and forbidding those things which he wished done; but had I the genius of tact necessary for such a complicated existence? H'm—perhaps I was making a mistake; perhaps—pooh! "Look before you leap" sounds like wisdom, but "The more you look at it the less you will like it," is an axiom with more common-sense and practical application about it.

There is one very agreeable characteristic of a courtship the course of which runs smooth, and that is the attention shown you by the parents, and the consequent care taken of you by their domestics. Lushington rushed out to meet me without his hat; Mrs. Lushington came into the hall beaming; a glass of the driest possible sherry was administered before I had been seated in the drawing-room five minutes; my keys were demanded, and when I went up to the best bedroom to dress for dinner, I found all my evening clothes laid out, a clean shirt with the studs in, and a collar with the white tie inserted. Item, a hot bath ready. Now I have never dared to indulge in a valet, for fear he should become my master; and yet it is a great comfort to me to be waited upon; so that I went down stairs in a very amiable frame of mind indeed.

At dinner my glass was kept filled.

After dinner, when the ladies rose, I was given a cigar.

These details may seem offensive to the fair; but the man who has turned forty and ceased from active labor is apt to become self-indulgent. He has learned that there are no great joys in life without overbalancing penalties, and he consequently prefers to accumulate as many little comforts about him as he can.

But where was Lucy all this time? Present, madam. Lucy was in the drawing-room when I arrived, and sat opposite to me at dinner. She seemed glad to see me, and said I was very good-natured to come and relieve their dullness. My silence about her in the account of my arrival was an artistic attempt to convey the state of my mind with reference to her. Now that I had quite determined to make her an offer of marriage, she had become too serious a matter to be talked about. A man on the eve of an examination, upon the result of which his future depends, prefers to direct his thoughts and conversation to other topics. So do I.

An opportunity was afforded me on the very first morning.

"Excuse me for an hour or so, old fellow," said my host. "I have got a little justice to do to-day."

Then, a little later, Mrs. Lushington discovered that she must unfortunately go into the village.

"Lucy," said I, "I am deteriorating."

"Good gracious!" she cried, looking up from her work with genuine surprise.

"Yes," I continued; "old bachelors get narrow and selfish."

"And gouty?"

"Well, yes—and gouty. I have led too busy a life to miss home blessings much; but now I am settled in the old country, with a comfortable income, I want a companion to share it."

"There ought not to be much difficulty in finding one," said Lucy. "Girls who want husbands are plentiful enough."

"Ay, but I am no longer a young man."

"What does that matter? You are not an old one."

"But then—I am full of buts—there is only one who would suit me, and I am not sure whether she would have me. Enough of beating about the bush—will you have me for a husband, Lucy?"

Lucy dropped her work, and looked up at me with eyes exceedingly wide open. Then she got very white; then she flushed very red. At last she said,

"You have taken me completely by surprise. I never had a notion of such a thing. I have not thought of you in that light at all."

"Well, then," said I, "do not give me an answer at once; take time to consider—"

At this critical moment a servant entered the room, and gave Lucy a note.

"From a young lady down stairs, miss, who has called to see you—an old school-fellow, she says."

"Is she in the dining-room?" said Lucy, after reading the note. "I will go down to her."

But the words were hardly out of her mouth before a footstep was heard on the threshold, and in hurried my Girl of the Period.

"My dearest Lucy, what a time it is since I saw you!" she cried, embracing her with effusion. Then, seeing me, she held out her hand. "Ah, my traveling companion of yesterday! The idea of meeting you again so soon, and here! Do you want your revenge at blind hookey? You will excuse me just now, I am sure. I have not seen my dear Lucy for so long."

"I only play at blind hookey at the end of long railway journeys," said I, laughing. And guessing that I was one too many, I took my departure.

In the grounds I found Lushington.

"Well?" said he.

"Nothing decided," replied I. "A young lady has called, an old acquaintance of Lucy's—Miss Brown, I think the name is."

"Ah? I know she has some female correspondent, though I am ignorant of the name, and never saw her yet. Has she come to stay, I wonder?"

The Girl had not come to stay; she would not even remain to lunch, but hurried away directly her tête-à-tête with Lucy, which was a long one, was disturbed. Poor thing! she must have had misfortunes, for all her fastness and apparent high spirits, for Lucy was very low and tearful after she had gone.

By the next day, however, she had cheered up, and on that which followed I took an opportunity of asking whether she had considered my proposition.

"Yes," she said, "and I do wish that you would say nothing more about it. I like you so much as a friend, and if you would keep so, and let me look upon you as a fath—I mean as a brother, it would be so nice."

It was Sunday evening. We had dined an hour earlier than usual, and were strolling about the garden, listening to the last note of the blackbirds, smelling the syringa, watching the stars come out one by one. Most romantic, had I but been the right man. However, I was not; and I set myself to find out whether the one particular individual existed. And here the peculiar influence of the hour assisted me, for never was an evening better adapted for heart-openings.

Of course it was the old story, my old story over again—the favorite plot of every play and every story in prose or verse, because it is the one of which we have the most experience in real life. I wonder if there is a civilized man or woman who never had a little love-plant blighted in his or her spring-time? If so, the specimen should be given over to the physiologist and phrenologist for analysis. The heart of this abnormal creature would probably be found of excellent India rubber.

The hero, "in love with Lucy," as the dear old play-books have it, was a friend of childhood, a cousin twenty times removed, and a cornet of Lancers. He was nineteen, had an allowance of five hundred a year besides his pay, and only spent seven hundred. When he and Lucy were both of age, he was to coax his people to pay off his little debts—which, as he intended to steer clear of money-lenders, would be under a thousand pounds—and marry her. There was to be no more reckless expenditure after marriage, for he would exchange into the "Heavies," and only hunt once a week. But, alas! would I believe it?—papa and mamma entertained a blind prejudice against the cornet. They called him reckless, extravagant, and all sorts of dreadful things. They had even said that he cared for somebody else, so that she had almost begun to think of giving him up; and that was the reason why she had hesitated a moment when I first spoke. But, on calm reflection, she was convinced that she could never be happy with another.

Hosted by Google

After a sympathetic pause I then repaid confidence with confidence, in my turn, and told her, more succinctly, the little episode of my own youth—omitting, however, to point out that it happened before she was born. The moral I intended her to deduce was, of course, that as my charmer was happy with a matured Another, she might be happy with me; but, to my dismay, she jumped to a totally different conclusion.

"Oh!" she exclaimed; "and you were driven by her faithlessness to foreign lands, and have been deprived of friends and home. What a warning to me! He, too, might exchange into an Indian regiment, and be killed or have sunstroke; and then I should die of remorse."

We went in to tea, and I relinquished all matrimonial designs upon Lucy—not because of the youthful Lancer, but in consequence of her talking to me about him so freely, which I took as a sign that she looked upon me in a very patriarchal light. I need hardly say that my stay in Cheshire was not a prolonged one. I took a little run through North Wales, and returned to London. I had made my effort to escape from a life of chambers, clubs, and bachelor repasts, and had been unsuccessful. After all, I find solace.

Upward of a year after my visit to the Lushingtons I accepted an invitation from a friendly colonel to meet him at Aldershot, and see a little pomp and circumstance; and as I was provided with a comfortably furnished hut, had the use of two horses, and was taken occasionally for a member of the royal family, or some one exalted from the War-Office—as the regimental cook was clever, the weather fine, the Long Valley reviews gorgeous, and the whole scene stirring and novel—I did not find the lines in which I was temporarily accommodated at all hard ones. Hospitality was rife, and as the guest of a man who was a general favorite, I received many invitations—among others one from a Lancer regiment.

I was struck, as we sat down to dinner, with the youthful appearance of the president, or vice—I am very stupid at making out which is the top of a table. He seemed a clean-limbed, active young fellow, soldier-like withal; but his face was as smooth as a girl's, and somehow not unfamiliar to me. I pride myself on never forgetting a face, and I generally manage to recollect the circumstances under which I had previously seen it; but now I was baffled. It could not have been very long since I met him, either; his youth forbade that. However, the matter did not annoy me much at the time, for I had an agreeable, chatty neighbor on either side of me, a good dinner before me, and a powerful appetite; so that my attention was for the most part more pleasantly employed than in a painful struggle with a fleeting reminiscence. Yet at times I stole a furtive glance toward the lad, and on each occasion felt more firmly convinced that I had met him before.

I had no opportunity of speaking to him at the dinner-table; but when we adjourned to the anteroom he accosted me of his own accord.

"Will you try one of these cigars?" he said, holding an open case to me. "They are pretty fair, I think; though of course they can not be compared to your Regalias."

Oh, he knew my Regalias; and we had met! I was sure I could not be mistaken.

"Your face and voice are familiar to me," I said, accepting his tobacco; "but I can not for the life of me remember at the moment where or how we became acquainted. Ah!" I added, as a light flashed upon me, "do you happen to have a sister?"

"Are you thinking of a fast girl who travels alone by railway, smokes, and plays blind hookey with strangers?"

"You mean to say that you—"

"Not so loud, please. I should get into an awful row if the chief heard any thing about it."

"I can believe that; though I must say your get-up was capital."

"So I've often been told, when acting girls' parts in private theatricals. It was that put the idea into my head."

"It was a strange frolic," said I, shaking my head.

"It answered," he replied. "You see, I heard from a friend that the girl I was engaged to had been set against me, and that another fellow, who was backed by the parent Lushingtons, was going down to Cheshire after her. It was no good trying to keep her head straight by letter, for her mother looks at her correspondence to see if there is any thing from me; I could not call in person, being forbidden the house; so I thought I would try to get to see Lucy, as Miss Brown, an old school friend of hers. Asked for leave, dressed the part, and arrived just in time. For I am not at all sure that she would not have thrown me over if she had gone much longer without seeing or hearing any thing of me—at least, she did hear something of me, but it was not creditable, or half true. It was queer, though, that you, whom I traveled down with, should have been the other fellow, wasn't it?"

I could not help smiling.

"You talk rather freely about it," said I, "considering my position in the affair."

"Well," said he, "I beg your pardon, I am sure; but, you see, I thought you would like to know, as you have given the matter up. After all, why should you mind? One girl is as good as another to you; but with me it is a case of spoons. Will you have a soda-and-brandy?"

So my evidence goes for nothing; and they may still be right who hold that the Girl of the Period is but a Girl of a Periodical.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The Gladstone Defeat.—Charles Knight.—Dr. Guthrie.—An English Brinvilliers.—Female Post-office Clerks.

THE government has been defeated upon the question of the Irish University bill, and for the moment—for it is supposed the opposition will not be strong enough to hold the reins of power in the present Parliament—"the people's William" is out of office.

"But yesterday the word of Cæsar might Have stood against the world;"

and so it stands now. Indeed, like Antæus, he seems absolutely stronger for his kissing of the earth: the voice of detraction, which was so loud of late, has ceased, and we who most lamented his faults and short-comings are beginning to count up what he has done for us since he has been in office. No English minister has certainly ever passed so many important measures right in the teeth of prophecy, and from which preceding statesmen, though acknowledging their justice, have shrunk aghast. He abolished the Irish Church, in the interests of justice and of that very party whose ingratitude has now overthrown him. He introduced the Irish Lands bill, against all the power of the landlord influence in both Houses. He did away with purchase in the army—a more prolific source of jobbery, and one, therefore, more warmly defended, than any existing abuse. And he gave to the voter that protection which for a quarter of a century has in this country been held a political dream—the ballot. Compare these accomplished facts (three out of the four initiated by himself) with any other four things done by any previous English minister, if such ever did four things, and you will find this man stand supreme. He is not personally popular—having no sense of humor, nor bonhomie, and not one grain of that social tact of which Palmerston was a perfect granary—but his earnest seriousness of purpose and sense of right are thoroughly appreciated by the nation at large. If he had been born free from Tory trammels, instead of having to cast them off one by one as study begat conviction, it is my belief that he would have been the greatest statesman of any age. How strange it is that when a minister is out—even for an hour—one should speak of him as dead, and still more strange that one should equally forget one's grudges against him, which, in my case at least, are many.

Charles Knight is really dead, and Jerrold's epigram in epitaph—"Good-night"—may now be written over his gray head. He was a diligent student, did a good stroke of work in his time toward instructing us all, and would have undoubtedly had the malady called "genius," could the thing have been caught by contagion; for all our great names in literature, from Macaulay to Dickens, were household words with him. It was in Knight's Magazine that the former, when a Cambridge under-graduate, tilted against Mackworth Praed in the lists of verse, the one on the Roundhead side, the other on that of the Cavaliers, and the gentle manners of the editor made personal friends of his two young contributors readily enough; and throughout the intervening forty years Knight's path has lain in the pleasant fields of literature, and in the society of its highest ornaments.

Dr. Guthrie, too, is dead: quite as noticeable a man, in his way, as the originator of the Penny Magazine—a good and genial-hearted preacher of God's word, who was always, above all, "careful to remember the poor." His last hours were soothed by the hymns of children that his aid had lifted from the sloughs of poverty and temptation, and the hand that placed the chaplet on his grave was that of a ragged-school boy. In the same paper that announced his decease I read the trial and conviction of the woman Cotton, who, I suppose, has poisoned twenty persons—some husbands and many children of her own among them—under circumstances of the most serene and complacent selfishness. It is difficult to imagine that this man and this woman, the one dedicating himself to good, and the other to evil, should be fellow-creatures, and almost makes one wonder whether some of us are not angels and some devils already. With respect to this modern Brinvilliers, her case seems to contradict a very striking remark that I once heard made by Mr. Delane, the editor of the Times, and one who by his social position must needs be as well acquainted with our aristocracy as most men. He said that more murders were committed—quiet puttings away of fathers and elder brothers—in the few acres on which stand our most fashionable squares than in any similar area in England, because the position of the inhabitants places them above the reach of a coroner's inquest. The obsequious family physician sees the necessity of avoiding "exposure," and of "shielding a noble house from scandal;" and giving the fullest benefit of his doubts to the case in question, he signs his certificate of "died from natural causes." This may perhaps be the case; but certainly it seems that the very poverty of a household may also exempt what occurs in it from public inquiry, since Mary Ann Cotton has been at her deadly work for these twenty years with perfect impunity. There was no pretense of jealousy, hate, or passion to account for any of her crimes: they were all committed because the victim was more or less a burden to her, or was insured for a few pounds in a benefit club. She is described as comely, quiet-looking, and almost lady-like, yet very resolute—much the sort of person that one would picture one of Miss Nightingale's gallant band of hospital heroines to be. God help the man or child, however, who trusted to her tender mercies!

She who had seen so many little children die in agonies, and tended them from first to last with her cruel, careful hands, was, we are told, "excessively affected" by her own sentence, and protested against it in her quiet, sullen way. Quite otherwise did a certain lively young reprobate behave on his conviction at the Central Criminal Court last week, who, by his careless abandon and close imitation of "the Artful Dodger," won more of my sympathies than I care to own to. He was sentenced, notwithstanding all his gifts, to seven years' penal servitude; and after he had heard his doom pronounced made this astounding proposition to the judge, "Look here, my lord, I'll toss you, double or quits, whether it shall be fourteen years or nothing!"

There are more openings in your labor market, I believe, for women than there are in ours; and, indeed, it need be so. On the occasion of eleven vacancies having occurred for female assistants in one Post-office the other day, the notice was responded to by over 2000 candidates! Not to mention the terrible proportion of disappointments, imagine the need and misery which such a gathering represents! Our middle classes are sufficiently eager for "an appointment" of any sort, but among them, of course, there is no such desperate struggle for existence. The candidates sometimes exhibit a humor which shows that they have had leisure to cultivate that faculty. During an examination in dictation last week one of them expressed his preference for "a dictator like Fabius, who went slow."

R. KEMBLE, of London.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE most interesting and curious of all studies is the study of human nature. And as distinguished professors have remarked concerning other branches of natural history, this "can not be learned from books;" an inspection of live specimens is essential. We object to cruel dissection; even if the subject is unconscious, delicacy of feeling in the operator is likely to be injured in the process. But if possessed of a spirit of kindly charity, close observation of the habits of those about us may teach wisdom and prudence. There is no better time to study people than when traveling; cars, steamboats, and stages afford admirable places for witnessing curious and peculiar phases of human nature. For, strange as it may seem, many persons when traveling appear to lay aside a certain wholesome restraint which surrounds them in the company of friends, even if it be within the free home circle. Apparently they feel that strangers have no claims upon them, and that they are at liberty to ignore their presence and their comfort.

Glance for a moment through this car—a handsome one, on one of the best patronized railroads in the country. One, two, three, four—ten seats, each occupied by one gentleman. No harm in that, certainly. But here enter two ladies, one with a child in her arms. They look for a vacant seat. The gentlemen are all looking out of the window, or into their newspapers. Of course they do see what is going on, but every one appears innocently unconscious or sternly resolved. And when at length the ladies, finding no other accommodations, venture to take, each one, the unoccupied seat beside some gentleman, there is no recognition of their right to do it. The first comer plainly though silently shows that he considers the newcomer an intruder, and both feel uncomfortable. Even more inconsiderate are the two ladies who turn a couple of seats designed for four persons so that they will face each other, seat themselves by the windows, fill the places by their sides with bags and bundles, and remain consciously unconscious that the car is crowded, and persons are even standing.

It is curious—sometimes annoying, but more often amusing—to see how different people manage about eating when taking a long railroad journey. Facilities are improving, and in many parts of the country it is not difficult to obtain a suitable meal even on a "through train." Still it is often wise and needful to provide a lunch for one's self instead of trusting to "railroad" cake and coffee. But there are some omnivorous individuals who use the cars as a perpetual restaurant. They eat every thing, and eat all day long, scattering débris of all kinds upon the floor, regardless of appearances or cleanliness. We have in mind one young woman who recently sat near us in a journey of a hundred miles. She was bright and pretty and plump, but yet evidently starved! Immediately on taking her seat she bought a huge ball of pop-corn—a conglomeration of molasses and corn that would give an ostrich the dyspepsia—which she devoured like an apple. Then she commenced upon pea-nuts, eating them with ceaseless avidity. The next thing in order was an immense stick of candy, a trifle less than a foot long and proportionately thick. We closed our eyes wearily, but have good reason to believe a course of apples and gingerbread followed. When we ventured to look toward her again she had recommenced upon pea-nuts with as much gusto as if she had not eaten a mouthful that day. There had come into the car with her a weary-looking man, apparently her husband, who sat beside her in a helpless sort of way. We could not help fancying that he might have used up half his small fortune in attempts to appease that extraordinary appetite. He ate nothing; his whole aspect seemed to say, "Eat what you please, but don't ask me to touch any thing." The last we saw of the hungry woman she was going out of the car with her sachel in one hand and pea-nuts in the other, and eating as she went. She represents one class of travelers.

From repeated and very definite experiments it has been ascertained that the average time required to send a letter by post from New York to Brooklyn, or vice versa, is two days and five hours longer than to send a letter from New York to Chicago. There are, of course, exceptions to this rule. We have known a letter to accomplish the crossing of the East River in two days and three-quarters; and then, again, it is needful to allow as much time as if it were sent to London.

A New York publisher advertises Three to One, Six in All, and Six of One by Half a Dozen of the Other; and a Boston publisher announces Chance Acquaintance in the same paragraph with Other Girls.

A damsel fresh from Ireland, who proposed to perform certain household services for a lady of Brooklyn, made the following inquiry:

"And plase, ma'am, will ye be afther telling me if it's Croton water that ye've got all over the house?"

"No," replied the lady; "we do not have Croton water in Brooklyn."

"Och! Shure, then, I'm not afther stayin' here, havin' been always used to it in Ireland!"

The artists of Germany are reported to be in a state of excitement in consequence of the alleged preference shown by the directors of the Vienna Exhibition to the French artists in allotting them more space and better rooms in which to hang their works than have been allotted to the Germans.

A young man in Nashville, Tennessee, recently sustained a fracture of the leg by being thrown from a carriage. There is nothing strange in that, but the curious feature of the accident is that this is the fifteenth time he has broken some limb, and he is only eighteen years old. The fractures have always healed readily, but it is inconvenient to be always breaking bones.

Ice-cream, as made in Paris, consists mainly of corn starch, French clay, and poisonous coloring matter. French physicians who have been making experiments concerning this matter say that a continued use of these poisonous materials produces serious maladies.

Great results from little causes come. The company had assembled for an expected wedding in Bangor, Maine. The clergyman was ready, and the groom had gone up stairs to escort the bride down to the place appointed for the ceremony. The lady was elegantly dressed, and her hair fashionably arranged in puffs and rolls and curls innumerable. The would-be husband objected to the "fast" style, as he termed it, saying that a bride's hair should be modestly arranged. A war of words followed. The angry youth declared the hair must be re-dressed, or he would leave her forever; the girl expressed her willingness to have him go at once. Go he did, and the wedding-guests lost their supper. "This fable teaches"—we are not sure whether this is one of Æsop's or not; but, any way, the moral is so plain that we forbear to mention it.

Boston sent to the Vienna Exposition its educational representation in thirty huge boxes, two thousand feet of lumber being used in making the boxes. The contents consisted of photographs of school architecture; school fittings and furniture; sets of reports; samples of scholars' work; volumes of drawings; text-books and books of reference.

A Western paper gives the history of a young woman who has for several years past successfully cultivated a farm of 120 acres. In 1868 she was attending a young ladies' seminary; but her father died, leaving a farm encumbered with debt, with only her feeble mother to oversee the hired help. The daughter left her school, and with the assistance of her little brother, ten or twelve years old, commenced farming. She dresses in a gymnastic suit, with broad-brimmed hat, gloves, and boots; but she has learned to do most kinds of work, and has been successful in her harvests. She chiefly cultivates corn and wheat, though several acres are devoted to grass, and her young orchard has borne a good deal of fruit, which she herself has taken to market.

Between Birmingham and London a line of telegraph is now in practical operation on the double-current system. The currents pass in opposite directions on one wire simultaneously; clerks at both ends can be transmitting messages at the same moment, and the receivers receiving from the instruments used for the purpose. An essential condition to the perfect working of the plan is that the two currents shall be of equal strength, otherwise the weaker would be beaten back and the signals rendered unintelligible.

Barbadoes, an island having a superficial area of only about 166 square miles, without any large towns, without manufactures of any description, a purely agricultural colony, actually supports a population of 180,000 souls, or over 1084 to the square mile.

The young Archduchess Gisèle, daughter of the Emperor of Austria, is in the seventeenth year of her age. Prince Leopold of Bavaria, to whom she is to be married, is ten years older. The princess is described as tall and slight, with blue eyes and a somewhat haughty expression of countenance. She has fine musical abilities, and is a graceful equestrienne. The trousseau and wedding presents are laid out solemnly for exhibition in Vienna, and naturally draw immense crowds. Besides the numberless costly laces and magnificent shawls and dresses, a complete toilette-table, in silver, is admired for its exquisite design. There is also a prayer-book painted in vellum in the style of the fifteenth century, and a fan, set with precious stones, which has been painted by Lebrun. The Grand Duchess Alice of Tuscany has given the bride a set of antique cameos of great value, and the Countess of Chambord, who is related to the bride and bridegroom, has added to the collection a costly knot of pearls and diamonds. The event will be one of much éclat, and the Viennese very naturally are on the tiptoe of expectation.

Hosted by Google

THE ARTISTS' CARNIVAL IN BERLIN.—[See Page 266.]

Hosted by Google

LOVE'S GIFTS.

THIS dark brown curl you send me, dear,
Shall save its freshness of to-day
In gentle shrine, when year on year
Has turned its former fellows gray.
So shall your image in my breast
With never-fading beauty rest.

What love has once on love bestowed,
Translated in its dew of youth
To some remote divine abode,
Withdraws from risk of time's untruth.
Keeping, we lose; but what we give
Like to a piece of heaven doth live.

THE ARTISTS' CARNIVAL IN BERLIN.

See illustration on double page.

SOBER-SIDED Berlin is little addicted to public gayeties in carnival-time, that period being generally devoted to private dinner-parties, with perhaps an impromptu dance afterward. Here, however, we have a scene from the only public masked ball of any notoriety that Berlin can boast of—the ball of the Berlin artists. This year the festival was held in the court-room of the Marcusplatz, which had been gorgeously decorated for the occasion. The ceiling of the room was hung with garlands of flowers and evergreens, forming canopies of green boughs, and from these were suspended various colored flags, some bearing the arms of the society—three silver shields—and others being inscribed with mottoes, such as "Aspera at asthma," or "Cogito ergo oppossum." On each side of the recess usually occupied by the orchestra floated two large Venetian flags, with a colossal gold picture of the winged lion of St. Mark on a light blue field. The boxes in the bend of the house were painted in the Renaissance style, and the lower ones made into arcades, while Oriental carpets hung down from the front of the boxes to the arcades underneath. At the end of the room was erected a representation of the Giant's Staircase at the Doge's Palace at Venice, with the two giants' statues. The palace stood at the top, and between the pillars of the building could be seen the columns of the winged lions on the Piazza of St. Mark, and beyond them the waters of the lagoon glittering in the sunshine.

Along the walls and side galleries stalls and booths had been erected for the sale of all kinds of wares, wonderfully verbose programmes, gigantic nonsensical placards, and quaint pictures. One booth was a wild-beast show, with a lion roaring inside, and two gigantic monkeys swarming up and down a rope outside, while a tall negress clamored to the people to inspect the zoological treasures within. In another stall there was a lottery, where for the sum of a thaler every one gained a prize, from a photograph to a water-color drawing, contributed by the artists. A third booth was occupied by a wax-work collection of the celebrities of the day, and in the next a Dr. Dulcamara was vaunting his miraculous powders, mixtures, and cures for every human ailment. Nearly the whole of one side of the room was taken up by the "Circus Olimpieus," in which every branch of the gymnastic profession except the equestrian was ably represented.

But we must not forget the maskers themselves. Among the best were a tribe of gypsies—the dusky gypsy girl in her tattered artistic costume, her coal black hair floating wildly as she shook her tambourine in a mad dance, the old man with a short pipe in his toothless jaws, the young wife with her baby on her back, the fiddler and his dancing bear, and even the dog and the donkey. The most curious character, however, was the trunk of a tree, with an owl sitting in a hole of the stem, a young fox in a nest in another, crows and small birds on the top, and a little rabbit nibbling a cabbage at the root. Then there were some foot-soldiers of times gone by, with immense plumes, and doublets slashed and puffed from neck to knee, marching through the room with their captain, drum, and standard at their head. There were slim charming patrician ladies of 1520; a tall, broad, and bearded Helen in antique dress; a six-foot British Amazon in authentic costume; Venetian nobles with gold-embroidered sleeves reaching to the ground, and large pointed shoes; costumes of the Raphael type; cavaliers of Francis I. and Henry II.—a series of figures from the pictures of the old masters.

At eight o'clock the Doge in his state robes appeared at the top of the Giant's Staircase, surrounded by his nobles and senators. After briefly addressing the people he came down into the room, and the fun of the evening began. In about two hours' time the Doge made a fresh speech, and the maskers congregated in the other saloon, while the hall was turned into a supper-room. In another half hour a wonderful alteration had taken place. The Giant's Staircase had disappeared, and in its place was a curtain, concealing the preparations for the coming play. The maskers then sat down to supper, and the president of the society made a brief speech concerning the origin of the ball. About two o'clock the curtain rose on "The Origin of the Pyramids." This was a realization of Gustave Richter's picture of "The Pyramids" and Alma Tadema's "Death of the First-born." The story runs thus: Pharaoh Schafra VII. had lost his first-born (Alma Tadema's picture exactly reproduced), and promised his daughter Amoritis to the person who should erect the most beautiful monument to his dead child. Amoritis loves a Nile fisherman, and the lovers hit on the idea of the Pyramids. The last scene gave a perfect realization of Richter's picture, and worthily closed the evening's entertainment.

THE KING'S BULL.

I.—PEPITA'S LOVER.

I AM about to relate a story of one Mendez Pinto, not the notorious liar, but the boldest bull-fighter that ever entered the Spanish arena; and if it be asked, Is the story true, and how did you learn it? I reply that it is true, and that it was told at supper after a bull-fight in the Seville ring, and in the presence of the descendant of the man whose exploit it commemorates.

In all Andalusia there was no prettier girl than Pepita, the daughter of Gomez, ex-bull-fighter, and seller of fried fish at Puerto Santa Maria. When dressed for the bull-fight in her smartest Maja costume, she was a sight worth a long journey to see, with her slender ankles, arched insteps, and shapely legs; her tall undulating figure, her glorious dark eyes, and wealth of raven hair.

And Pepita was very partial to the Plaza; this taste, it is true, she shared in common with many thousand fair Spaniards, into whose heads the idea of there being any cruelty in the sport had never intruded itself, and who would probably have stared with amazement had such a notion been suggested to them; but the ring at P. Santa Maria had especial attractions for Pepita, inasmuch as she could there feast her eyes on the valiant deeds of Mendez Pinto, prince of picadors and her own betrothed lover. Time had been when the Pintos were a family of no small importance and prosperity, and had not two of their number shared in the toils and triumphs of Columbus? But the days of their high estate had departed, and their descendant, the hero of this tale, found himself, in the reign of Ferdinand VII., "pious, fortunate, and restored," enrolled in the second rank of bull-fighters.

I say the second rank, because the social status of the picador was confessedly never equal to that of the matador; but so great was the strength and daring of Mendez, and so comprehensive his knowledge and skill in every branch of tauromachy, that not the most conceited of the swordsmen could feel his dignity compromised by the company of the great master of the lance. Popular opinion, if thoroughly canvassed, would probably have conceded to Pinto the proud title of the first bull-fighter in Spain, and this at the date of our story, 182–, was no empty compliment, for a monarch more devoted to the fiesta de toros than Ferdinand VII. never filled the Spanish throne.

Ferdinand looked upon a good bull-fighter as the noblest work of God, and next to him a good bull—it may, indeed, be doubted if he did not consider the dumb animal the superior of the two. A pretty woman and a genuine Havana possibly divided the third place in his esteem.

During his reign there was instituted a not unsuccessful attempt to restore something of the ancient glory of the Plaza; and the establishment of a tauromachian college, of which the king himself was head and all the nobility members, raised the dignity of the ring to an unprecedented pitch.

Except in the case of the bull, which was doomed to a succession of tortures and a death identical with those inflicted at the present day, the sport was conducted in a somewhat less blood-thirsty manner. Instead of the miserable worn-out hacks, fit only for the knacker's yard, which disgrace the modern arena, strong, active, and often valuable horses were supplied to the picadors; and the roar of applause which now greets the bull as he rips some wretched animal from shoulder to flank was then bestowed on the rider, whose strength and dexterity fended off the charge, and saved his steed from the murderous horns. He, indeed, who was able to carry his horse unscathed through the dangers of a whole fight was entitled to retain it as his own property. In this manner had Pinto gained possession of a very powerful and well-bred gray mare, which, on becoming the acknowledged "querido" of Pepita, he had presented to her father, old Gomez; and after the fair girl herself, there was nothing the ex-bull-fighter regarded with so much pride and affection, and tended so carefully, as La Perla.

Next to his bull-fighters and bulls, his pretty women and his "purones," ranked in Ferdinand's estimation his regiment of guards; and never did royal favor inflict upon society a more swaggering and obnoxious set of bullies and swash-bucklers. It happened that at the date of our story a detachment of these favorites was in temporary quarters at P. Santa Maria. Now the claim of Pinto to the pretty Pepita had been readily allowed by the indigenous youth of that place, and there was not one among them who would have cared to cross the great picador in his loves; and this not only from a wholesome dread of his physical prowess, for, with the natural gallantry of the Spanish nation, it was agreed on all hands that the bravest, strongest, and handsomest man was properly matched with the fairest girl. But, as might be expected, the gentlemen of his majesty's guards recognized no such provincial scruples or sentiments, and in an unlucky hour two of them cast an evil eye on Pepita.

One morning Gomez sent out his daughter with a message to a neighbor, and it was but natural that on passing the café which Mendez usually frequented she should peep in to see if her lover was there. There were but half a dozen people in the room, and Pinto was not among them. Pepita, therefore, would have retired as quietly as she entered, had not the way been barred by the extended arms of two of the royal guard, who had followed her unperceived.

"Pray let me pass, señores," said Pepita.

"Not until you have paid toll, my pretty one," answered the bigger and more audacious of the two. "No, hija di mi alma, I must first see if those red lips of yours taste as sweet as they look."

"And, por Dios, I too," added his companion.

And in spite of her resistance the two ruffians closed with the poor girl, and the first speaker, throwing his arm round her waist, pressed his lips to her cheek. But Pepita's was the last cheek those lips were destined to touch; for as the other guests, attracted by the scuffle, rose like gallant Spaniards to her assistance, the door was thrown violently open, the guardsmen were sent reeling back, and before them stood Mendez Pinto, his swarthy cheeks white with fury, and his dark eyes glowing like live coals.

With an instinctive feeling of imminent peril, the hands of the soldiers clutched at their side-arms, but before the steel could leave the scabbard Pinto sprang upon them with the bound and roar of a savage tiger; extending his mighty arms, he seized each man by his outer ear, and with the rapidity of thought and the force of some deadly engine dashed their heads together in the midst; there was a dull crashing thud, horrible to hear, and then the two men, released from his iron grasp, fell prone upon the floor of the café, the blood streaming from mouth and ear and eye.

The spectators stood aghast and tongue-tied with horror, as Pinto, passing his arm round the half-fainting Pepita, led her out of the café, and back to her father's house.

Very grave and anxious was the face of Gomez as he listened to Pinto's short account of what had occurred. He went out at once to the café, and presently returned with the intelligence that one of the guards was dead and the other dying; both their skulls were fractured by that fearful blow.

"It will cost your life, lad," he said to Mendez. "No excuse, no plea of provocation, will the king allow where his guards are concerned."

At this poor Pepita sank sobbing bitterly to the floor, and Mendez, now gentle and tender as he had lately been fierce and unsparing, occupied himself with consoling her with loving words and caresses.

But Gomez broke in upon the lovers.

"Now listen, Mendez Pinto," said he; "by your love for that girl, listen. There is but one chance for you, if you would win the king's pardon. Something you must do; something that has never been done in Spain before, and that no other man but yourself can do.—Pepita, girl, rouse yourself, if you would help to save him. Run to the stable, and give La Perla a full flask of Val-de-Penas, and the broth of the stew that is on the fire, and then see her carefully saddled and brought round to the back-door: in ten minutes the guard will be here to arrest him.—Mendez, lad," he went on, "you must start for Madrid at once. This is Thursday. On Sunday the king holds a corrida real; at that fight you must be. You must get the promise of pardon before the real offense is known. In any case, you can but die; and better to die as a picador should, with the eyes of all Madrid upon you, than as a felon under the hands of the executioner."

Not long afterward Mendez had taken a tender farewell of Pepita, who, under the sense of her lover's terrible danger, overcame her own womanly weakness. Tearless and self-possessed, although pale as death, she fulfilled every injunction of her father. At the last moment she took from her attire a red silk scarf, and gave it to Mendez.

"Whatever happens, mi querido," she murmured, "wear this for me."

"In life and death," he answered. Their lips met in one long lingering kiss; and then, at a sign from Gomez, Pepita went quietly back into the house, and Mendez, mounted on La Perla, sat at the back gate, listening to the old man's last instructions.

"You will have time enough to think it over between this and Madrid," said Gomez, with a kind of grim humor. "Remember, wherever you halt, the Val-de-Penas and the broth from the guisado. With that La Perla will go for a man's lifetime. Let her have the same an hour before you fight. And now, my son, God speed you. You must go, for I hear the hum of the crowd coming up the street on the other side. But Pepita has barred the door, and I am taking my siesta in the back-room; and it will be hard if I hear the summons of the guard before you are far on your way. Farewell."

With a wave of the hand, a touch of the spur, and a shake of the rein, Pinto dashed up the street, half asleep in the quiet noonday, and began that long, wearisome journey to Madrid.

Always slow and deliberate, like a true Spaniard, never in all his life did Gomez more slowly and deliberately prepare and roll his cigarillo than now, as he stood listening to the receding beat of La Perla's hoofs. There was a half-triumphant smile on his shrewd face as he turned back into the yard. "Man and horse," he muttered, "there is nothing in all Andalusia can touch them. But God and the holy Virgin help them now, for they need it."

The cigarillo was consumed to the last puff before the old man, with well-feigned surprise and the sullen air of a Southerner aroused from his mid-day nap, responded to the summons of the alguacils. An angry murmuring crowd surrounded the officers; for the blood of P. Santa Maria had long boiled against the insolent demeanor of the guards, and now that the local hero was threatened with arrest and imprisonment, popular excitement was at its height, and the sharp click of the opening navaja began to be heard amidst the confused hum of voices. But as the officials and the soldiers who accompanied them passed in to examine the premises, Gomez faced the crowd, and with an expressive glance and a rapid motion of the fingers, easily intelligible to a people with whom every gesture has its meaning, made known the safety of Pinto. There was a murmur of satisfaction, and then the inevitable, "Pues, señores, echemos un cigarito." Out came the little books, the pouches, and the flint and steel; and when the officers returned from their useless search the crowd, collected in peaceful groups, was engaged to a man in the solemn enjoyment of tobacco.

II.—"THE BEST MAN AND THE BEST BULL."

Despite its many associations, it is a weary journey, that between Seville and Madrid, as I myself can testify, who performed it in the banquette of the diligencia. Ah me! we were young then, but the misery of that time comes back to me vividly—the glaring heat, the stifling clouds of dust, the incessant "Anda, anda!" of the driver, the jangling of the bells, the jolting of the unstable box in which we were confined, and, above all, the reek and steam from the long team of mules. I remember how the anatomy of my dearest friends developed angles of superhuman size and excruciating acuteness, how they noticed the same phenomena in myself, and how savage we became in consequence. I remember, too, that in calmer moments we speculated with awe, not unmixed with envy, on the physical conformation of the boy who rode the leader, and who, sleepless and untiring, kept the saddle (and such a saddle!) from first to last.

On, still on, through the heat of the day and the silence of the night, halting only as long as was absolutely necessary, did Mendez urge the gallant gray toward Madrid. On, still on! Across the wide grassy plains beside the Guadalquivir, dotted with herds of bulls, which raised their heads with a sudden bellow as the solitary horseman went by; skirting the fair walls of stately Seville, and the red Moorish towers of Alcala' de Guadaira; past the palms of Moncloa and the olive groves of Ecija; by the domes and convents of Cordova and the corn fields of Andujar. On through the gloomy gorges of the Sierra Morena, the tawny monotony of La Mancha, and the vineyards of Valde-Penas; startling the wild fowl in the marshes of Guadiana, and waking the echoes of the rocky Ocanian hills; speeding past the cool gardens and gushing fountains of royal Aranhuez and the wastes of Valdemoro, until the first rays of the Sunday's sun were glinted back from the spires of Madrid, and the wondrous ride was accomplished.

The streets were nearly empty at the early hour when Mendez passed through the gate. He rode to a small quiet inn, kept by a brother of Gomez. Great was the astonishment of the proprietor when he saw who had roused him from his morning slumbers, but Pinto cut short his inquisitiveness abruptly.

"Ask no questions, my friend, and above all tell no one that I am here. You will know all in time. See the mare well cared for, and ready to fight, if need be, at three o'clock. Remember the stew and the Val-de-Penas. Have breakfast and the bed in the back-room ready for me when I return."

And so saying he strode off to the house of Don Miguel Florez, chief manager of the royal bull-fights. This important personage was equally surprised when he learned the name of the early visitor in whose cause the servant had ventured to disturb him.

"Valgame Dios!" he exclaimed; "Mendez Pinto in Madrid! I wonder if he comes to fight to-day. How pleased the king will be! Show him in, show him in!"

Now during his ride Pinto had matured the advice of Gomez, and had settled exactly what he intended to do; and therefore, in reply to Don Miguel's inquiries, without narrating the catastrophe of P. Santa Maria, he simply expounded that intention.

"Mendez, my son," said Don Miguel, solemnly, when the bull-fighter had concluded, "something has affected your brain; you can not seriously mean what you say. Ah, que me burlas, mi amigo!"

"I would not venture to trifle with your excellency," said Pinto. "I mean it so far that since Thursday I have ridden from P. Santa Maria to undertake it, by the king's leave, this very afternoon."

And so it happened that an hour afterward Don Miguel, with a heavy heart—for he had a real regard for Mendez as a bull-fighter—set out to lay before his most Christian majesty our hero's hitherto unheard-of proposal.

Ferdinand VII., "pious, fortunate, and restored," was in a heavenly temper that Sunday morning, with the prospect of a glorious bull-fight before him. Wrapped in his dressing-robe, he was reclining in an easy-chair, sipping his chocolate and smoking one of his own peculiar puros, preparatory to attending mass in the royal chapel, when Don Miguel Florez was announced.

"Welcome, Don Miguel; always welcome, early or late," said his majesty, with a gracious wave of his hand. "But what brings your excellency here at such an unearthly hour, and with such a grave countenance? Nothing wrong with the bulls, I trust."

"Nothing whatever, your majesty," replied Don Miguel. "But, sire, I have to offer to your royal consideration the most astounding proposal it has ever been my lot to entertain since I have had the felicity of being connected with your majesty's bull-fights."

"Ave Maria purisima!" exclaimed the pious monarch, rubbing his hands in expectation. "Take a seat, man, and a cigar, and let us hear it."

"Sire," said Don Miguel, inhaling the delicious fragrance of the royal tobacco, "there is at this moment in Madrid a picador who is willing to match himself alone against the best bull that can be found in Spain. He will fight with the blunt garrocha, without padding and without greaves, in silk stockings and Majo dress, like a mere chulo. It is his desire that if he be overthrown none should assist him, and the bull be allowed to do his worst. If his horse be but scratched in the encounter, his life lies at your majesty's disposal; but if he kill the bull, or fight him until he falls exhausted, he humbly prays that your majesty will grant the request he shall ask."

Hosted by Google

"Que disparate," said Ferdinand, contemptuously. "It is absurd; the thing is impossible. There is no man in all Spain can do it. You have been imposed on, my good Don Miguel."

"I can assure your majesty that this is a genuine challenge, and from a man who will do his best to win."

"He is either a madman or a murderer," remarked the king, sagaciously. "And the name of this suicide?"

"With your majesty's permission, I am not at liberty to reveal."

"This becomes interesting," said Ferdinand, rising and striding across the room. "Now tell me, Florez," he continued, half imploringly, and coming to a sudden stop, "has De Veraguas any thing to do with it? does he back the man?" For the duke of that name was the king's great rival in bull-breeding, and as aficionados, or members of the "fancy," there was jealousy between the two on that score.

"On my honor I believe not, your majesty."

"And do you know what request the man will make if he should chance to win?"

"I do not, sire."

"I can not make him a grandee of Spain," said Ferdinand, "but any lower title or wealth I can bestow on the man who shall fairly perform such an unheard-of feat, a feat that would reflect honor on my reign, on the whole nation. I accept the conditions. If he wins I will grant whatever favor he may ask and a King of Spain may bestow. But, por Dios," said Ferdinand, slapping his thigh, "he shall work for it, for we will have out El Re."

When Don Miguel heard these last words his knees knocked together, and he let fall the royal cigar. Let me account for the discomposure of the chief inspector of bull-fights.

Among the many splendid animals destined to be butchered for the delectation of Ferdinand and his subjects was one of the royal breed, pre-eminent for strength, activity, and ferocity, and the possession of all those "points" in which the initiated delight. The youth of this animal had been of singular promise, from the time when, as a bull-calf, undaunted by branding-iron or garrocha, he turned furiously on his attendant herdsmen, and when, baited as a "novillo," he spread havoc and trepidation among the baiters. Those who prognosticated his future greatness were not disappointed; never since the days of the celebrated Harpado had such a grand brute been seen in Spain as "the King's own Bull," which title was usually abbreviated into that of "El Re." For six years he had been reserved for some occasion worthy of his fame; and now, when Don Miguel learned that his favorite Pinto was to be confronted by this prodigy, his humanity overcame his love of sport, and he was filled with consternation.

"El Re, sire?" he stammered; "El Re? Surely I believed your majesty would reserve him—"

"No matter what you believed, Sir," interrupted the king, excitedly, as he noticed Don Miguel's evident emotion; "he shall not be reserved another day. The fight shall come off this very afternoon. See that it be properly announced for three o'clock, and let El Re be driven in at once. Ah ha, Don Florez! you begin to tremble for your audacious Don Fulano; but hearken, Sir—I will have no trifling in this matter. If the man enter the ring, by Heaven he shall stay there until he or El Re be dragged out! And take care that the point of the garrocha be fairly sheathed. This braggart shall be taught a lesson."

"And he has your majesty's promise if he wins?"

"If he wins," said the king, shortly, "he has." And when Don Miguel had retired his majesty went to chapel with an easy conscience, as became an upholder of strict justice and a hater of deceit and arrogance.

Mendez, who had employed his time in making arrangements about his dress, and in the careful selection of a garrocha, received the king's decision with proud composure. "It is fair," he said; "the best man and the best bull. No compro nada de gangas—I buy nothing a bargain;" and after paying a last visit to La Perla he went to bed, and slept soundly.

Great was the excitement among the aficionados of Madrid when, over the old bills of the approaching fight, appeared a placard notifying that the sports would be preceded at three o'clock by a "novedad," in which El Re and a nameless picador would be engaged.

To realize the extraordinary difficulty of the task which Pinto had undertaken, it must be remembered, first, that the picadors are usually securely padded, in case of a heavy fall, the head protected by an enormous stiff-brimmed hat, and the right leg, which is always turned to the bull, by la mona, a greave of leather and iron. Mendez was to fight in silk stockings and Majo costume.

Secondly, that in case of a fall the attention of the bull is immediately distracted from the fallen horseman by the red cloaks of the chulos or footmen. Mendez was to be alone in the ring.

Thirdly, that the garrocha is a stout pole with a triangular point of iron but an inch in length when properly guarded, and is used only for fending off the charge, the bull being always killed by the sword of the matador after he is exhausted by the combat with the picadors, of whom there are usually three. Mendez was to be opposed to a perfectly fresh bull, which was to be killed or subdued with the garrocha only.

III.—LIFE OR DEATH.

The hour had arrived: every nook and corner of the vast amphitheatre of Madrid, boxes, benches, and pit, the very balustrades and barriers, seethed with a dense mass of anxious, excited humanity. The fierce Iberian sun beamed with unclouded splendor, darting its fever alike into the blood of high and low, of rich and poor, of man, woman, and beast: into the sangre azul of the fair Castilian seated in the upper tier, whose eyes burned large and lustrous between the folds of the white mantilla; into the commoner lava that glowed in the veins of the swarthy Majo who lounged against the inner barrier; and into the thick red tide which the bull was soon to lavish on the dust of the arena. The shadow of the partial canopy overhead lay upon the sand in a clean curving line, like that of still waters on the beach, the rustle of twenty thousand fans created a mimic breeze, and the hum of voices sounded like the muffled roar of the surge. But the flutter of the fans was hushed instantaneously, and the loud murmur subsided to a death-like silence, as the gates were thrown open, and, in place of the glittering cortége of the ordinary bull-fight, of the many-hued procession of picadors, chulos, and espados, closed by the gayly caparisoned team of mules, there rode slowly into the wide arena the figure of a solitary Majo mounted on a noble gray steed. His features were concealed by a black mask, a red scarf was bound upon his arm, and he bore in his hand the garrocha of the picador. Madrid was fairly puzzled, Madrid was at its wit's end, as the caballero, profoundly saluting the royal box where sat Ferdinand, incredulous of his eyes, quietly crossed the Plaza, and took up his station against the barrier on the left of the toril, or passage by which the bulls are admitted to the ring.

Then the key was tossed to the alguacil and deftly caught in his hat; the door of the toril was unlocked, and you could hear the sharp catching of the breath throughout that mighty assembly as, with a leap like a stag, El Re bounded into the arena. El Re, the king's own bull! there was no mistaking him, for his brawny neck was encircled by a broad ribbon of scarlet and yellow, the royal livery of Spain, from which depended the device of a gilded crown and castle, the arms of Castile. A roar of applause greeted his entrance, and, dazed by the sudden clamor, and the transition from the darkness of his cell to the glare of open day, the magnificent brute stood like a bronze statue, his noble head raised, and his fierce eyes seeking for some object on which to vent his wrath.

On his left, like another statue, sat Mendez Pinto on the gray mare.

But apparently El Re considered this single antagonist beneath his notice, for, with a disdainful toss of his mighty crest, he began to paw the sand. Then the horseman shook his garrocha, and the flutter of the red scarf on his arm caught the eye of El Re. With a deep murderous bellow, the bull lowered his front, and rushed straight at his enemy, and the duel to death had begun.

The sharp straight horns were within a few feet of La Perla's side, when Mendez met the charge with the point of the spear planted to an inch, true and fair, above the shoulder-blade, while he wheeled the mare slightly to the left. The terrific rush could not be stopped, but its deadly course was altered, and when El Re, half blinded by the clouds of dust he had raised, and half stunned by the shock with which he encountered the barrier, recovered his sight and senses, there, again ahead of him, provokingly calm, sat Pinto on the gray mare. Fiercer even, and to the spectators more irresistible than the first, was the second rush of the monster, smarting under the sting of the garrocha, and again was his fury forced to expend itself on sand and timber, while Mendez galloped ahead and took up a fresh position.

I will not undertake to describe the many phases of that marvelous encounter—how unfaltering was the savage determination of the brute, and the courage and coolness of the man. If the ferocity and activity of El Re were such as had never before been witnessed by the oldest frequenter of the Plaza, they were surpassed by the dexterity and horsemanship of Pinto: nobly seconded by La Perla, he exhausted every art of the picador. It would be still more impossible to convey an idea of the agony of excitement which pervaded the spectators from the king downward.

How strong men writhed and gesticulated, and shouted until their voices fell to a hoarse shriek; and stately women and fair girls forgot their conventional decorum, and with eyes, breasts, and mouths flashing, heaving, and panting, sprang up and leaned over to bestow their applause; and how, like a consuming fire, there ran through that vast crowd a longing for the end, a lust for blood, for death—of either man or bull.

At last it came. Not less than eighteen times had El Re charged home, and eighteen times had the spear-point been planted with cruel exactness, until the gore poured down from one great wound above the shoulder, to leave a ruddy trail upon the sand. Then, as the combatants stood facing each other, Mendez felt La Perla sway beneath him, and knew that the critical moment had arrived.

For the first time he took the initiative. And now began an exhibition of skill and daring never surpassed. With the garrocha held low in rest, and his eye fixed on the blood-shot orbs which followed his slightest movement, slowly, almost imperceptibly, so as to avoid provoking a charge, he backed La Perla in a half circle, until the point of the spear lay at an acute angle behind the shoulder of the bull. Those only who were nearest, straining over the barrier to catch, like true aficionados, the niceties of the combat, could hear the words, "Ahora o nunca, por mi vida, o por mi muerte;" and lifting La Perla with spur and hand and will, with the inexplicable sympathy which exists between a true rider and his horse, he hurled her at the bull. So rapid was the dash that before El Re could make a half turn to meet it the spear was in his shoulder, driven with the full weight of man and horse, with the full vigor of that tremendous arm. Beneath the terrific impulse the blunt point burst through the lacerated hide, and, irresistible as the keen blade of the matador, the huge shaft followed, boring through flesh and brawn and muscle, right down into the very heart of the mighty bulk. The mass still surged and heaved and struggled against the mortal agony, the tough garrocha bent like a wand, and La Perla reeled and tottered like a drunken man; but the arm of Mendez was as a bar of steel. You would not have said that the horse was supporting the rider, but that the rider, holding by the spear-shaft, was sustaining the horse between his knees; and so the three remained until the last convulsive throe died out of what was once El Re, and La Perla, though shivering in every limb, had recovered from her exhaustion; then with one mighty effort Mendez drew out the garrocha, and removing his mask, again saluted the royal box.

"And you ask, my gallant Mendez," said Ferdinand—"you ask for—"

"That which I have risked, your majesty—my life."

"Your life, man; por Dios, how is your life in danger now?"

"I have had the misfortune to kill two of your majesty's guards at P. Santa Maria."

"Two of my guards!" thundered Ferdinand; "two of my guards! And you come here expecting to save your own miserable life. Ah, scoundrel, you have laid a trap for me. Had I but known before I pledged my word, not if you had killed fifty bulls with your naked hands, should you have escaped. Vengo sofocado! Begone, rascal, out of my sight, and let me never see or hear of you again!"

But after Ferdinand's first passion had subsided he did see and hear of Mendez again; for with the dispatch from P. Santa Maria came a petition, signed by the principal inhabitants, against the general conduct of the guards; and the king inquired carefully into Pinto's case, and finding that there had been provocation enough to justify, at all events in Spanish eyes, the cutting of at least half a dozen throats, and that the double homicide was more the result of an unfortunate superfluity of strength than of malice prepense, inasmuch as probably any other man in the kingdom of Spain might have knocked together the heads of two of his majesty's guards without producing any material effect: considering all this, he not only forgave Pinto, but rewarded him liberally. Nay, more, he insisted that Gomez and his daughter should be sent for, in order that the latter might be married to her lover in Madrid, and bask in the sunshine of royal favor. Which was done accordingly. But the volatile monarch being deeply smitten with the fair Andalusian, the sunshine of royal favor waxed so warm that old Gomez, who was sufficiently loyal not to desire his sovereign's head to be broken, one fine day persuaded Pinto to undertake the return journey to P. Santa Maria, somewhat more slowly and comfortably than he had come. So the three went back to their native town, where the family of Pinto still flourishes in the bull-fighting line, though no member of it has hitherto equaled the exploit of their grandfather with El Re.

THE METHODIST BOOK CONCERN EXHIBIT.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

YOUR committee find, on examination of the reports of the Book Concern submitted to them for the years 1871 and 1872, large differences in the estimated values of real estate and merchandise, without any explanation from the Book Committee.

To give the Conference a clear understanding of these differences, we present the following comparative statements:

In 1872—Real Estate—One undivided ¾ of property, 805 Broadway	$600,000 00
In 1871—Real Estate—One undivided ¾ of property, 805 Broadway	717,904 13
Difference	$117,904 13
In 1872—Buildings and Lots—Mulberry and Mott streets	$125,000 00
In 1871—Buildings and Lots—Mulberry and Mott streets	150,000 00
Difference	$25,000 00
In 1872—Buildings and Lots—San Francisco, California	$30,000 00
In 1871—Buildings and Lots—San Francisco, California	48,000 00
Difference	$18,000 00
Aggregate difference in Real Estate between 1871 and 1872	$160,904 13

Of merchandise we can give no definite statement, but the aggregate difference of real estate and merchandise is as follows:

In 1871	$1,850,315 50
In 1872	1,646,595 33
Difference	$203,720 17
The Net Capital of 1871 is reported as	$1,055,179 57
" " 1872 " "	794,175 17
Difference	$261,004 40

In the report of 1872 there is no statement made of profits or losses, which, in the judgment of your committee, is entirely unsatisfactory. We therefore respectfully request the Book Committee hereafter, in their annual statements, to give to the Conferences an exhibit of profits and losses, and the reason for the difference between the estimated value of assets in the reports of 1871 and 1872.

JOS. FRANCE, Chairman.
ROBERT N. BROWN, Secretary.

JOSEPHINE EVENING DRESS.

See illustration on page 268.

THIS full-dress toilette has a short apron and demi-train of pale Sèvres blue faille, trimmed with spirals of point lace and bows of dark sapphire blue velvet, on which are bouquets of pink roses. The front breadths, representing an under petticoat, are of white silk, with flounce and loose puffs of Malines tulle caught at intervals with rose clusters. The low round Josephine waist has a puffed tulle bertha, with roses on the bosom and a velvet bow on each shoulder.

VISITING COSTUME.

See illustration on page 268.

THIS visiting costume is in contrasting colors—skirts of pervenche silk (the blue-purple of periwinkles), with basque and border of salmon-colored Oriental damask. The lower skirt has a deep "train flounce;" the long upper skirt is cut in Gothic points, and edged with duchesse lace headed by a band of salmon damask. The basque is of damask, fastened over a white silk vest. Lace jabot and coral buttons are on the vest; deep lace frills for under-sleeves. Rabagas bonnet of pervenche faille, with salmon-colored ostrich plume.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. DR. M'C.—You will require a sleeveless jacket, cuffs, sash, apron, and bias folds of dark brown silk or poplin to trim anew your peculiar gray dress. Polonaises will be worn again.

A CLERK'S WIFE.—Put deep kilt pleating around your black alpaca skirt, and add two rows of large buttons down the front of the polonaise.

MRS. A. T. H.—Make a simple basque, a ruffled apron, sash, and put side pleating on your silk skirt. An old-fashioned mantilla with square fronts, or else crossed like a fichu, and a round or pointed cape back, is what you want to make of your black silk. Trim with yak lace, jet passementerie, and watered ribbon bows. Find suit patterns for your little boy in our advertised list. Use steel bullet-shaped buttons on his cloth suits.

MAUD STANLEY.—Make your buff sample with a single skirt, edged with a deep Spanish flounce of the stamped pattern. With this have a loose-belted polonaise, trimmed with narrower stamped ruffles.

ELLEN S.—Deep blue linen will be used principally for trimming gray and buff linen suits. Contrasts will be used, but two shades of a color is always in more refined taste. The deep French blue called Napoleon blue can be worn by brunettes, but will suit your blonde sister better than yourself. The écru linen is not as much imported as darker gray and tea-colored linen. Batiste is thin linen. There is also woolen batiste. The high Marie Stuart ruff, graduating smaller in front, is the most stylish finish for your cashmere mantle. It is three inches wide behind, and tapers down to an inch in front of the throat. It is made of lace, or else black silk edged with lace. It should be very full and laid in pleats.

R. S. T.—Gather hints for remodeling your gray silk in New York Fashions of Bazar Nos. 11 and 13, Vol. VI. You should get a lighter shade of gray. Boys will wear sailor suits again, and striped shirts pleated behind and before. For your little girl's garments see patterns illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. VI.

LUCIE.—The Double-breasted Redingote Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., is an excellent model for alpaca.

ADMIRER.—Your ideas are good, and your dress will not look like Harlequin. Get blue-gray silk, plain, not striped, and make by descriptions in New York Fashions of Bazar Nos. 11 and 13, Vol. VI. Get a straw round bonnet, with blue and gray folds of soft turquoise silk, and a coronet wreath of blue myosotis and dried grasses.

M. B.—Your cape is all right, also your polonaise. Some watered ribbon bows, moiré bands, a lace fraise, and a buckle and buttons of dull silver might be added. Read about mantles in Bazar No. 13, Vol. VI.

R. S. L.—The satin on your black silk dress is all that is out of fashion about it. Make a Dolman or a mantle of your black silk. See hints in Bazar No. 13, Vol. VI.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Directions for making a scarf-mantle, also an illustration, can be furnished you in a back number of the Bazar. This promises to be a very popular wrap for spring and summer.

KNICKERBOCKER.—We do not give addresses in this column.

BRIDE EXPECTANT.—Two dresses illustrated on page 120 of Bazar No. 8, Vol. VI., will furnish more hints to you than any pen description can possibly do. Make your silk of dark blue and blue-gray by the design for a black gros grain suit, using blue yak lace instead of black, putting gray sleeves in a blue basque and gray pleatings on blue flounces. For your traveling suit have a brown silk skirt, with cashmere or vigogne polonaise like that on the same page, trimmed with silk instead of velvet. The sash should be brown silk also, and the buttons and buckle either steel or dull silver.

MRS. A. E. C.—Remodel your black silk by adding an apron front, sash, and pleated flounces. Use the sailor blouse, or else loose-belted polonaise pattern, for nice calico dresses; the simple Gabrielle wrapper belted at the waist is best for common calicoes. Get a black cashmere mantilla, trimmed with yak lace and bias silk. A dark blue or green cloth suit, with jacket, little vest, and long trowsers, is what you want for your boy.

ROCHESTER.—We have not cut paper patterns of child's first short dresses, but can send you a Supplement number containing illustrations and pattern.

ELLA V. D.—Make your white alpaca graduating dress with a simple basque edged with two silk cords; have a plain round over-skirt, and put a single deep-kilted flounce on the lower skirt.

DRESS-MAKER.—Read about over-skirts in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI. The apron over-skirt with fully trimmed lower skirt will probably be more worn than any other style. Make the green and black grenadine with a polonaise and simply flounced skirt.

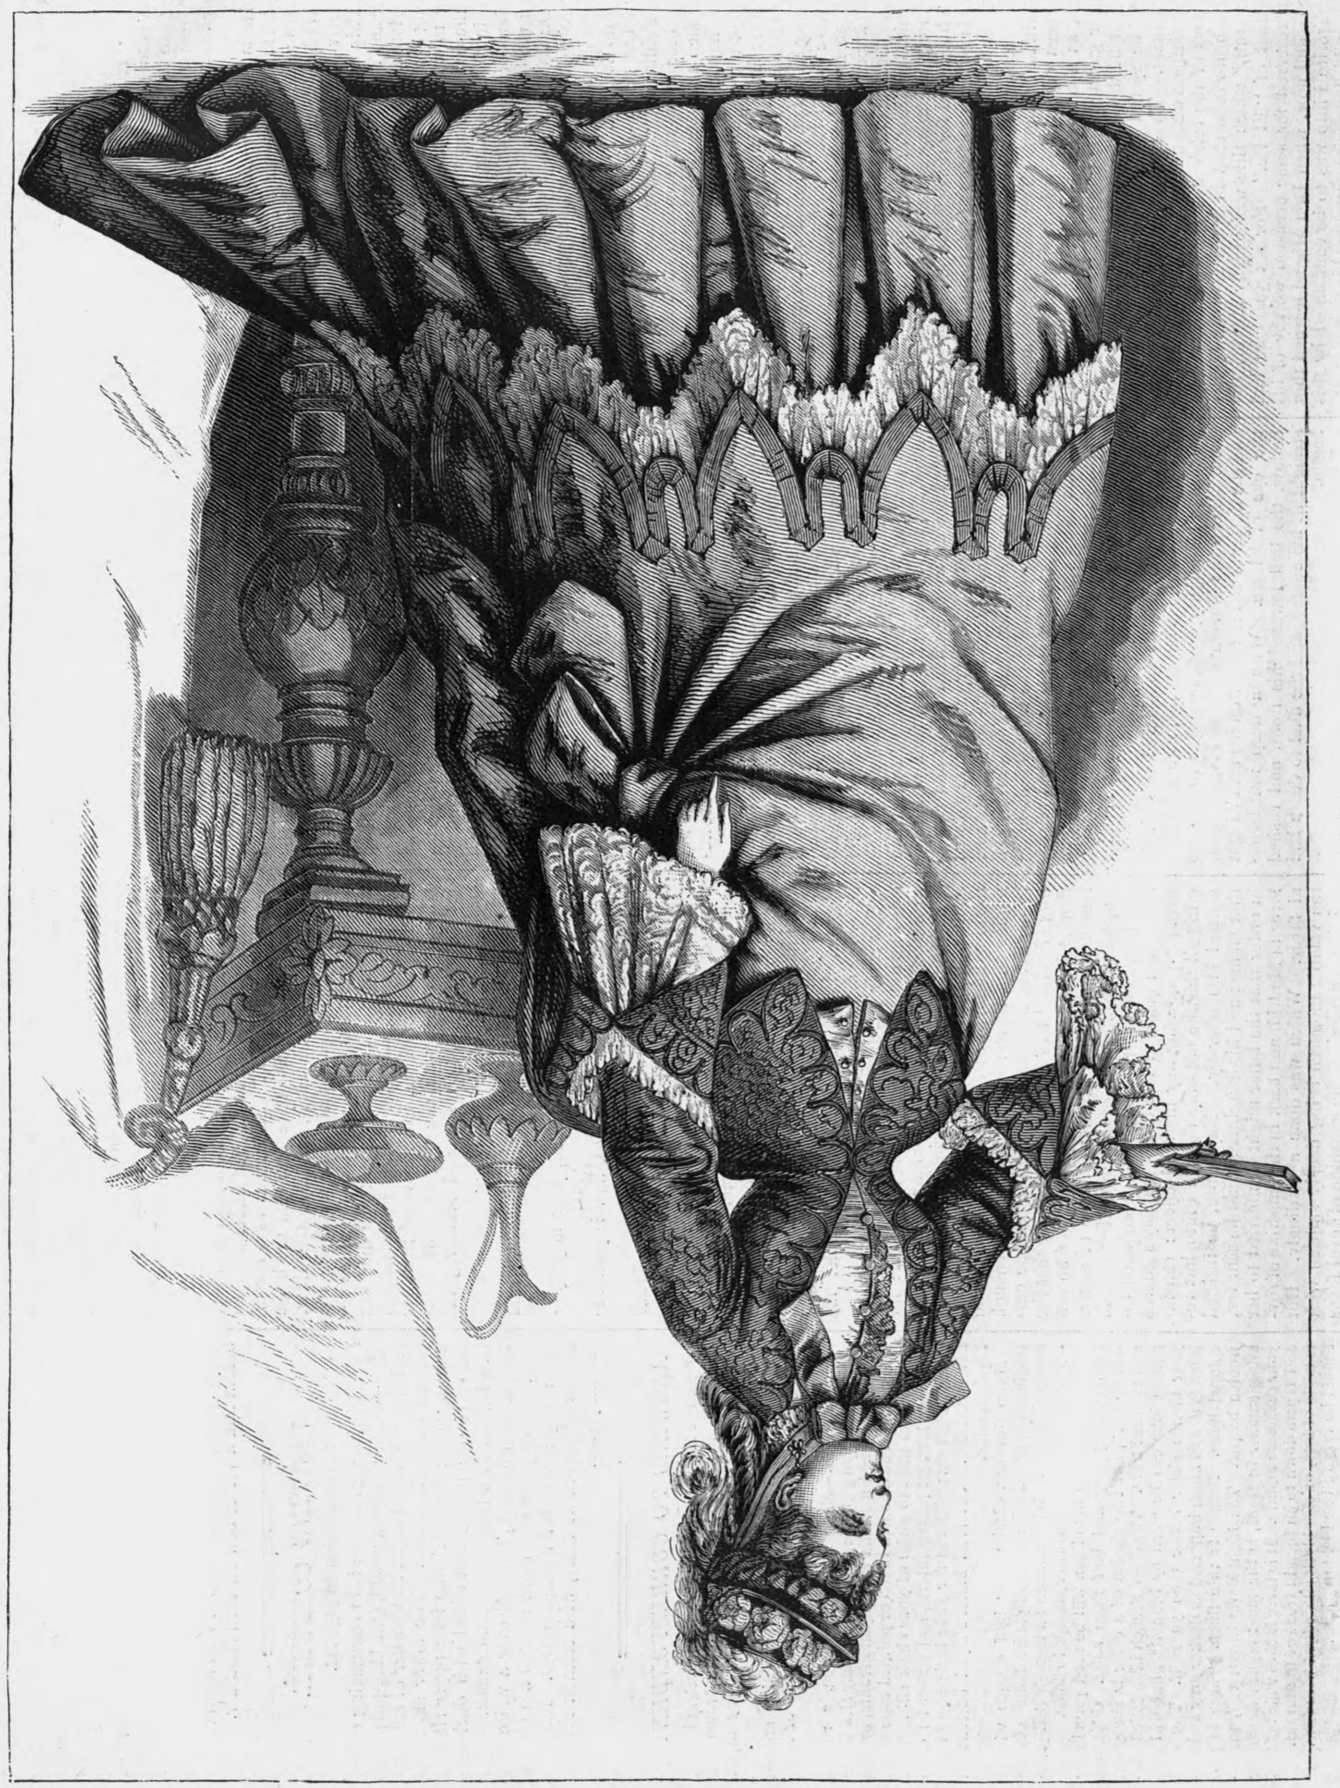
E. S.—Put a double cord around the basque of your silk, trim the front breadths with lengthwise puffs and folds, and have side pleatings and folds across the back. Simply hem or else ruffle the over-skirt.

LOCKSLEY HALL.—Read article on the "Etiquette of Mourning" in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI.

Hosted by Google

JOSEPHINE EVENING DRESS.—[See Page 267.]

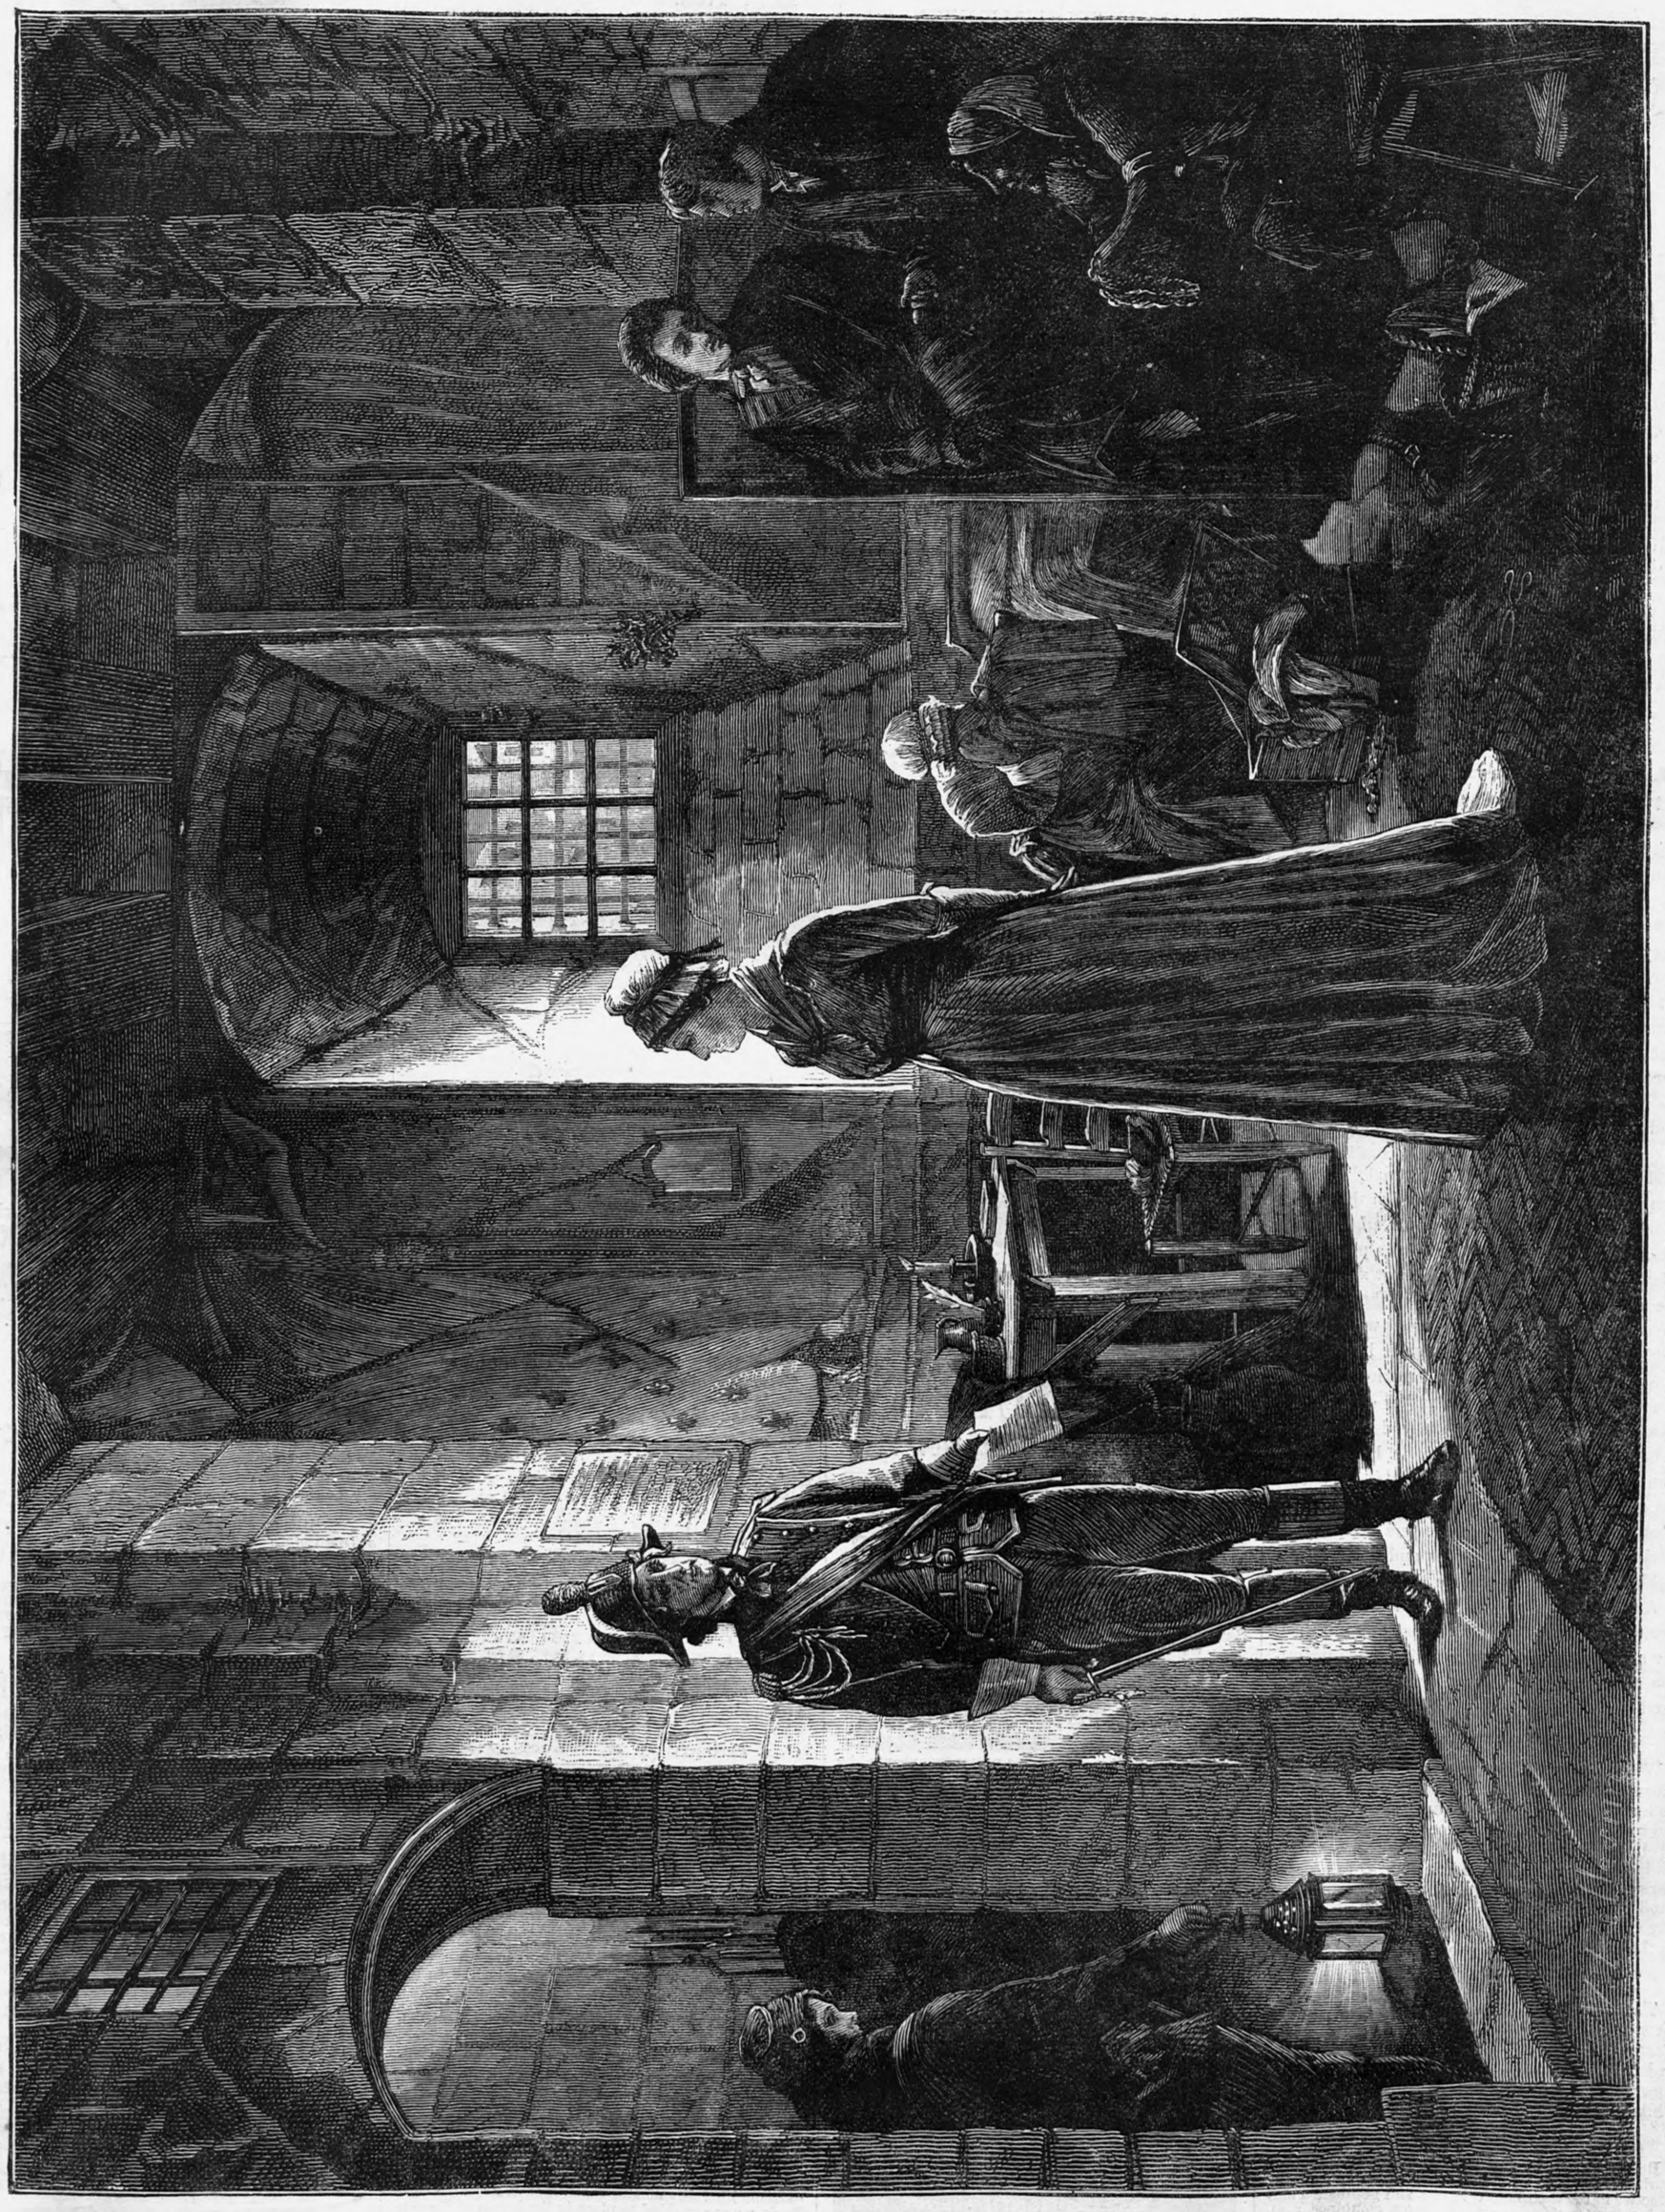
VISITING COSTUME.—[See Page 267.]



Hosted by Google

MARIE ANTOINETTE LEAVING PRISON FOR THE SCAFFOLD.

A MOURNFUL interest clings to every thing concerning the ill-fated daughter of the illustrious Maria Theresa, who exchanged her sunny life at the brilliant Viennese court for death on a French scaffold, amidst the hootings of an infuriated rabble. Hers is one of the saddest stories recorded by history, and which finds few parallels save that of the unhappy Queen of Scots, to whom death must have come as a blessing after so many weary years of captivity. The artist in the picture before us depicts the once-beloved Queen, now ignominiously known as the Widow Capet, leaving her prison for the car of the condemned that is to bear her to the scaffold. Imagine her thoughts! Where are you, beautiful shades of Trianon, golden remembrances of Versailles? adieu! you have vanished.....A bloody river is flowing, and submerges under its furious waves all the brilliant past of splendor, elegance, and beauty. The cachot, which the Queen is about to exchange for the guillotine, is a small council-room.....Rags of fleur-de-lisée tapestries are still hanging on the walls.....There is the table where the poor martyr wrote to her sister, Madame Elizabeth, her last letter.....The lamp is smoking.....The light is not bright and clear in this low cell on the cold and foggy morning of the 16th of October, 1793.....The Queen has cut off her hair; that beautiful fair hair has become white in one night, and a miserable convict, a wretch who attends the prisoner, hands it to the executioner, M. Sanson.....In the background, awed, half dead, is sobbing the unfortunate servant, Rosalie Lamorlière, who afterward furnished the details of the private life of Marie Antoinette in the Conciergerie.....The fatal hour has come.....The officer displays the order. .....The Queen looks at him proudly, without fear; she remembers that she is a queen, the daughter of Cæsars, and she will die like a daughter of Cæsar. The artist has endeavored to paint a genuine historical picture, not a fancy sketch, and we think he has succeeded. The picture is one before which we forget ourselves in a painful reverie.



MARIE ANTOINETTE LEAVING HER PRISON FOR THE SCAFFOLD.

A METHOD FOR BRONZING OR REBRONZING METALS.

PERSONS having shabby articles made of metal, old gas fixtures or other similar ornaments, may save much by bronzing them at home by a very simple and inexpensive application. It is only necessary to clean the articles thoroughly, and remove the marks of flies by rubbing with alcohol or benzine, leaving the surface smooth. Any druggist will put up the prescription at a cost of about twenty-five cents. Ammonia hydrochlorate, one dram; acid oxalic, fifteen grains; acet. vini, one pound. Mix and shake well, then apply with a brush, rubbing it in well until satisfactory in tint.

Hosted by Google

FOR THE VIENNA EXPOSITION.

THE WILSON SEWING-MACHINE COMPANY'S MAGNIFICENT MACHINES AND MACHINE WORK ON EXHIBITION TO-DAY AND TO-NIGHT.

To excel in improvement and in work produced by their machine, has ever been the motto of the Wilson Sewing-Machine Company. Their career, from the opening of their first office and works in the city, years ago, to the present time, has been in the fullest sense of the term "a success," and the development of their plans and the growth of their business without a parallel in the history of Sewing-Machines. This is the direct result of the herculean efforts put forth by the managers for the advancement of their object, until it has reached the height of perfection in point of mechanism, and is rendered useful in all hands by the wonderful simplicity of its construction and its adaptability to a range and variety of work attempted with success by no other machine.

In the few years just past, the opposition brought to bear against the "New Wilson Under-Feed Machine" has been very hard, and in many instances the combined efforts of all the older machines have been brought against it, but without effect, and without exception, as the scores, and, we may say, hundreds of Premiums, Diplomas, and Medals received at the different fairs and trials all over the land fully demonstrate.

But this is not enough. Having proved their ability and power to Americans to overcome all competitors, they proceed with the same indomitable spirit which has characterized their every step and made them successful here, to the tried fields of the Old World, there, as here, to justify their claims over all others to the front rank among the mechanical productions of the globe.

The preparations for their introduction at the World's Great Exhibition at Vienna have been such as will do credit to the nation in whose name they are sent, to the Company which has produced them and whose name they commemorate, as well as the instructive workmen who have contributed their commendable skill to the result.

The samples of work embrace every thing which tend to show the power of their machine and its adaptation to all uses—harness and saddle work, ladies' fine embroidering, braiding, cording, tucking, quilting, felling, and innumerable other kinds and varieties of work for which their machines are so admirably adapted.

The machines and their work are on exhibition to-day and till 10 o'clock this P.M., at the Company's elegant place on Superior Street, corner of Bond, where all are invited to view and inspect them. On Saturday they will be started on their way across the seas, for competition in the world's arena, and the result can not be otherwise there than here—the verdict unanimous in favor of the Wilson.—Cleveland Daily Herald.

PEARLS.

THERE is no precious stone so dependent as the pearl upon the skill and taste of the jeweler, when it is worn as an ornament. The exquisite purity, and, as one may fairly call it, etherealized softness of lustre which is the peculiar characteristic of this most beautiful production of nature, may easily be dimmed or even destroyed by a heavy, cumbrous, or incongruous setting. If the diamond is really a work of human art, the pearl is absolutely a work of nature. We find it formed, rounded, shaped to our hands. All that we can do with it, then, is to preserve its natural effect as completely as possible. This great secret of pearl-setting has been thoroughly comprehended by Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, of 22 John St. (up stairs). Their fine pearls, whether Oriental or American, might seem really to have been formed in the ornaments which they make valuable and lovely. Nothing is overladen with gold. The delicate shimmer of the pure white Oriental pearl, which may be almost said to diffuse a sort of moonlight of its own, they preserve free of all reflections, and reflections which might tarnish it, while they adjust such harmonious tints in enamel or gold to the American pearl as effectually to counteract the rather quicksilvery appearance which too frequently detracts from its beauty. Pearls, like diamonds, have greatly risen in value of late years, and under the operation of not dissimilar causes. So difficult has it become of late years to secure fine, round, pure pearls of from 20 to 30 grains and more, that a necklace of perfect pearls which the Emperor of Austria began twenty years ago to collect throughout the world still remains unfinished. For a single pearl of immense size in his possession, the Imaum of Muscat some years ago refused $150,000 in gold.—[Com.]

WE notice a decided change in Parasols this season; instead of the Alpine stick of last year, we have a new style of short handle with ring top and to be used with chatelaines. The best stock we have noticed is WM. A. DROWN & Co.'s, Philadelphia and New York. For full-dress Parasols, their embroidered black silks are very handsome, and among the many novelties we like their gray and réséda fringe parasols, as well as the changeable, with short handles.—[Com.]

TAKE YOUR DYEING AND CLEANING to the New York Dyeing and Printing Establisement, Staten Island; 98 Duane St., 752 Broadway, and 610 Sixth Ave., New York; 134 and 166 Pierrepont St., Brooklyn; 40 North Eighth St., Phila.—[Com.]

DRS. STRONG'S Remedial Institute of Saratoga Springs, N. Y., in addition to the facilities of ordinary practice in the treatment of ladies and gentlemen suffering from various chronic diseases, combines, also, the Turkish Bath, Electro Thermal Bath, Sulphur Air Bath, Russian Bath, Swedish Movement Cure, Vacuum Treatment, Health Lift, Oxygen, Gymnastics, Hydropathy, Inhalation, Mineral Springs. Rev. Dr. T. L. CUYLER says: "I know of no institution which I can so cordially commend to those who are suffering from the various ills that American womanhood is heir to." Bishop J. T. PECK writes: "Every appliance for the treatment of disease which skill can invent or money can furnish is at the disposal of their patients." Send for a circular.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HAIR!!!

L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,

Between 4TH and GREAT JONES STS.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

Import and manufacture their own Goods, and RETAIL THEM AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.

N. B.—Through the immense increase of business, we will remove to the more commodious building, 364 Bowery, cor. 4th St., after 1st of May, 1873.

WEBSTER'S PATENT

Button-hole Worker.

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

It is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented! So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, together with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

STEINWAY & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, & UPRIGHT

PIANO-FORTES,

109 & 111 East 14th St., New York.

☞ ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES, WITH PRICE-LIST, MAILED FREE ON APPLICATION.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

TO THE LADIES!

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.

No lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.

B. F. BROWN & Co., Boston.

SEND FOR

SPRING CATALOGUE

TO

EHRICH'S TEMPLE OF FASHION,

267 & 289 EIGHTH AVENUE, N.Y.

Ladies' and Children's Undergarments and Suits. Real Laces, Embroideries, Kid Gloves, Parasols, &c. Cheapest in the country.

Every C. O. D. package subject to examination before acceptance. EHRICH & CO.,
287 & 289 8th Avenue, New York.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N.Y.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S HOSIERY,
IN
ENGLISH, FRENCH, AND GERMAN MANUFACTURE.
REAL AND IMITATION BALBRIGGAN.
PLAIN AND FANCY SILK AND LISLE THREAD HOSE.
HALF AND ¾ SOCKS IN SILK, LISLE THREAD, AND COTTON.
OPERA HOSE IN SILK AND LISLE THREAD.
UNDERWEAR IN SILK, LISLE TH'D, & GAUZE.

GENTLEMEN'S UNDERWEAR
In SILK, LISLE THREAD, BALBRIGGAN, GAUZE GOSSAMER, and SCARLET CASHMERE, &c.

HOSIERY.
PLAIN AND FANCY HALF HOSE IN SILK, LISLE THREAD, AND COTTON.

ALSO, A LARGE ASSORTMENT OF
GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING GOODS.
"CHOSSON'S" KID, and GANT de SUEDE GLOVES, All colors, in 2, 3, and 4 Buttons.

SPRING AND SUMMER SILKS.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. have in stock a splendid assortment of STRIPED, CHENE, PLAIN, AND BLACK SILKS, of the Latest Styles and at the LOWEST PRICES.

RICH LACES.
A choice selection of novelties in
REAL POINT LACE SHAWLS, FLOUNCINGS, HDKFS., BARBES, and TRIMMING LACES,
At prices lower than ever before offered.
Also, a handsome assortment of
BLACK THREAD LACE FICHUS,
WITH AND WITHOUT SASHES.
BARBES, PARASOL COVERS, TRIMMING LACES, BLACK and COLORED "YAK" LACES, &c.
PARIS EMBROIDERIES, TRIMMINGS, &c.,
IN GREAT VARIETY.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Are offering IMMENSE BARGAINS in all the various departments of their RETAIL STORE a large invoice of

IMPORTED WHITE GOODS,
Viz.: BANNER WELTS, 25c. to $1 35 per yard.
FINE FRENCH WELTS, 42c. per yard.
New PATTERN FIGURED MARSEILLES, 25c. to $1.
YOSEMITE STRIPES, white and colored, 25c. to 30c.
New designs in BROCADE STRIPES, 35c. to 45c.
STRIPED FLORENTINE & GENOESE SUITINGS.
EMBROIDERED PIQUES, 85c., upward; last season's prices, $1 25, upward.

PLAIN AND FANCY SILKS,
Gaze de Chambery, Canton Crepes, white, rich Armure Grenadines, Sicilienne Cashmere, Plain, Spotted, and Broche Cachemire d'Ecosse, Camel's-Hair Suitings.

POPULAR DRESS GOODS.
Plain and Fancy Fabrics for Suits and Polonaise, from 25c. to 50c. per yard.

NEW SPRING COSTUMES.
The new shades in colored Gros Grain, Silk Suits, elegantly trimmed, from $185 upward.
Very choice and costly Paris Silk Dresses, fully 50 per cent. less than cost.
Black Silk Suits, from $50 to $250. Pure Linen Suits, $6 upward. White Lawn Suits, $4 50 upward.
A large assortment of Misses' and Children's Suits.
A fresh importation of Paris Cloaks, Sacques, Dolmans, &c.
Extraordinary attractions in the prices and qualities of their
REAL INDIA CAMELS'-HAIR & PARIS BROCHE LONG AND SQUARE SHAWLS.
A choice offering in colored Yak Laces, Llama, Point Gaze, Chantilly, and Applique.
LACE GOODS AT ATTRACTIVE PRICES.
FRENCH MILLINERY.
The choicest conceptions of the most celebrated Parisienne Artists and their latest productions. Dress Bonnets, Breakfast and Dress Caps, Paris Artificial flowers, Garniture for Dresses, Exquisite Bridal Adornments, Fine Belgian and Paris Split, Straw, and Chip Hats, LONDON STYLE BOYS' HATS.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

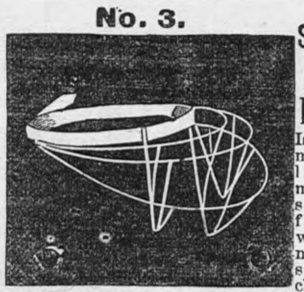
OTHER BARGAINS SECURED.

GRENADINES, GRENADINES.

180 PIECES, TWO YARDS WIDE, WARRANTED
PURE SILK AND WOOL.
$1 25, $1 50, $1 75, $2, $2 25, $2 50.
The above prices are scarcely half cost of importation.
BLACK SILKS, $1 90 & $2, warranted the best value in the trade. Handsome ALPACAS, 40c. & 50c. per yd.

JACKSON'S,
Cor. Broadway & Waverley Place.

No. 3.



THE STANDARD LOTTA BUSTLE

Is the best in the market. It is light and well made, graceful in style, and comfortable to the wearer, being made with a spring which closes up on sitting, allowing the wearer to sit back in the chair without injury to the bustle.

For sale by retailers generally all over the country. Wholesale Depots,

91 White St., New York;
801 Race St., Phila.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

1873. NOTICE. 1873.

OUR

CELEBRATED

BUFFALO

AND

OTTER

TRADE MARK PAT'D.

BRANDS

BLACK ALPACAS,

AND

BEAVER BRAND.

TRADE MARK PAT'D.

SILK FINISHED

Black Pure Mohairs

ARE HANDSOMER THAN EVER FOR SPRING WEAR.

These Beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Dry-Goods Retailers throughout the United States.

☞ Purchasers will know these goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece, bearing a picture of the Buffalo, Otter, or Beaver.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 and 429 Broadway,
305 Canal and 47 Howard Sts.,
New York.
SOLE IMPORTERS.

20 Sheets of Choice Music, $1 00.

Why throw away money on high-priced Music when you can select from our Catalogue of 700 pieces? Any 20 Half-Dime, or 10 of Dime Series mailed on receipt of One Dollar. Sold by all booksellers, and can be ordered through any newsdealer. Send stamp for Catalogue. Address

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
439 THIRD AVENUE, NEW YORK.

Write for a Price List to J. H. JOHNSTON,

179 Smithfield St., Pittsburgh, Pa.
Breech-Loading Shot Guns, $40 to $300. Double Shot Guns, $3 to $150. Single Guns, $3 to $20. Rifles, $8 to $75. Revolvers, $6 to $25. Pistols, $1 to $8. Gun Material, Fishing Tackle, &c. Large discounts to dealers or clubs. Army Guns, Revolvers, etc., bought or traded for. Goods sent by express C.O.D. to be examined before paid for.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE

Manufactured by the Florence Sewing Mach. Co. The simplest, cheapest, and best in use! Has but one needle! A Child can run it. Agents wanted in every town. Send for Circular and Sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

A PAIR OF BEST TWO-BUTTON KID GLOVES sent postpaid for $1 00. Three pair for $2 75; Twelve pair for $10 00. Every color and size. Real Laces, samples of Sash Ribbons and Dress Trimmings sent free on application.

J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 Eighth Ave., Bet. 27th and 28th Sts., New York.

SEYMOUR'S SHEARS & SCISSORS.

"The Best are the Cheapest."

Extra Quality. Crocus Polish.

Family Size, - - $1.50
Ladies' Scissors, - 1.00
By mail, prepaid. Send P. O. Order or Draft.
HENRY SEYMOUR & CO., 29 Rose St. New York.

Sold Everywhere. State where you saw this when you write.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

12 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS mailed for 50 cts., by C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

Hosted by Google

HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

Retailed at same price as I charge Hair Dealers. All First quality Hair. No short crimped hair in. Warranted not dyed.

32 in. long, weight 3 oz. only $9.00
32 " " " 4 " " 12.00
32 " " " 5 " " 15.00
32 " " " 6 " " 18.00

CORONET OR POMPADOUR BRAIDS—SOLID HAIR.
2 oz., 20 in. Hair, only . $4.50

Back or Waterfall Curls—full sets Naturally Curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails for
Medium,	$7.00	$10 00
Large,	8.00	12.00
Extra Large,	10.00	15.00

Long single Curls (heavy) naturally curly
22 in hair, only $3.00
24 " " " 3.50
26 " " " 4.50

BEST FRIZ WEFT OR FACE CURLS, . . . 50 cents per yard.
NATURALLY CURLY, FRIZ WEFT CURLS, . . $1.00 per yard.
LATEST STYLE. — Spanish Comb, Imitation Shell, sent prepaid on receipt of $1.50...everybody wearing them.

I sell the hair just as I import it, without intermixing [as imitators of my advertisements do,] to make their Price Lists appear cheaper. I AM the only Hair Importer and wholesale dealer in this city who RETAILS at WHOLESALE Prices. I will send Switches PREPAID by REGISTERED MAIL, on receipt of P. O. Money Order, Draft, or Money in Registered Letter, or will send by Express to COLLECT ON DELIVERY. Remember money sent in advance saves ALL express charges.

Wreath with any Initial, Monogram, or word, or Bouquet, made of as many pieces or colors of Hair as you may send.

Almost every family possesses some hair of deceased relatives, which can be made into beautiful pictures, forming imperishable and unchangeable mementoes and handsome h usehold ornaments. Either of the above designs appropr.ately framed 4 x 6 inches, sent prepaid on receipt of $10.00. The above is the very best method of preserving the hair in its original color, and is now being extensively adopted by all who wish to preserve such as relics to perpetuate the memory of the departed. Have one made. You will surely order others on seeing how really artistic the work is done. Will return all hair not used. Established 1843. CHAS. V. PECKHAM, Near Amity St. (Copyright secured.) 687 Broadway, N.Y. City.

When you write please mention HARPER'S BAZAR.

DANIEL D. YOUMANS, HATTER,

719 & 1103 BROADWAY.

IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS.

Ladies' Riding Hats in Variety.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

NOVELTY PRINTING-PRESSES.

The Best yet Invented FOR AMATEUR & BUSINESS PURPOSES, And Unsurpassed for General Job Printers.

OVER 8000 IN USE.

BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer,

And Dealer in Every Description of

PRINTING MATERIAL,

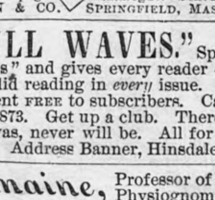
349-351 Federal & 152 Kneeland Sts., Boston; Branch Store, 543 Broadway & 88 Mercer St., N.Y. Agents, Kelly, Howell, & Ludwig, Philadelphia; J. F. Edwards, St. Louis, Mo.; A. C. Kellogg, Chicago, Ill. Send for Pamphlet.

CONCERTO PARLOR ORGAN!

The Waters Concerto Organs are the most BEAUTIFUL in STYLE and PERFECT in TONE EVER MADE. They are the best in the world and will wear a lifetime. The Concerto Stop is the best ever placed in an Organ. It is produced by a Third set of Reeds peculiarly voiced, the effect of which is most charming and soul stirring, while its imitation of the HUMAN VOICE is superb. Prices low for cash, or small part cash and balance in monthly or quarterly payments. Other Organs from $55 up. - PIANOS AT GREAT BARGAINS. Illustrated Catalogues mailed. Warerooms, 481 Broadway.

HORACE WATERS & SON.

GIVEN AWAY. A beautiful paper which you have to wait a year for, but with the Eureka Chromo Casket the lat est novelty of the day, and agents are selling it with astonishing rapidity. One of our agents taking 104 orders in 1 day, and others are doing equally as well. It is new and original so there is no competition. It is packed it sells at sight. Is novel, attractive and cheap also, with it is given an Oil Chromo 8x10 inches. To any parties who wish we will send full descriptive circular of both Casket & Chromos. Now is your time to make money. Samples of Casket and also a Chromo will be sent post paid for $1.25. Send for our new 64 page catalogue. Sent Free post paid. BOND. MARTIN & CO. SPRINGFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS.



"IT STILL WAVES." That Starspangled Banner "still waves" and gives every reader 40 long columns of splendid reading in every issue. Prang's superb Chromo sent FREE to subscribers. Can still send back Nos. for 1873. Get up a club. There is nothing like it, never was, never will be. All for $1. Specimens for 6 cts. Address Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.

Dr. Romaine, Professor of Physiology, Physiognomy, Hygiene, &c., &c., and Teacher of a True and Beautiful Life. Send ten cents for Circular and Invaluable Instructions as to How to Live, &c. Address DR. ROMAINE, Care of Box 421, Washington, D. C.

WILHELM & ZACHMAN,

IMPORTERS AND DECORATORS OF

CHINA, GLASSWARE, & CROCKERY,

CLOCKS, BRONZES, PLATED-WARE, &c.

1152 Broadway, N. Y.

STERN BROTHERS,

367 SIXTH AVENUE. SIXTH AVENUE AND TWENTY-THIRD ST. 110 WEST 23d ST.

ARE NOW OFFERING FOR SPRING AND SUMMER A VERY LARGE AND ELEGANT ASSORTMENT OF Passementerie Trimmings, Fringes and Ornaments, Guipure, Chantilly, Yak, and other Laces.

Sacque & Bonnet Ribbons, Bonnets, Hats, French Flowers, Millinery Goods.

WITH A LARGE LINE OF

CASHMERE MANTLES, DOLMANS, SACQUES, AND POLONAISES.

IMPORTED LINEN AND LAWN SUITS IN GREAT VARIETY.

OUR STOCK OF

Ladies' and Children's Undergarments

IS UNRIVALED IN VARIETY, FINISH, MATERIAL, & OUR PRICES SPEAK FOR THEMSELVES.

An inspection of our Departments will convince Ladies of the inducements we are offering as regards large assortments and

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

PARTICULAR ATTENTION PAID TO ORDERS.

STERN BROTHERS, Sixth Ave. and Twenty-Third St.

JOHNSON'S EMBROIDERY ATTACHMENT.

Embroiders with all kinds of Material, BEAUTIFUL AS HAND WORK, AND DONE WITH THE EASE AND RAPIDITY OF ORDINARY MACHINE SEWING.

AS EASY TO ATTACH AS A HEMMER.

ADAPTED TO ALL SEWING-MACHINES.

Sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price, $3 50, or by express, C. O. D.

AGENTS WANTED. Send for Circular.

Address JOHNSON EMBROIDER CO., New Haven, Conn.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown) ..... No. 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old) ..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt ..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT ..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old) ..... " 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT ..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt) ..... " 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT..... " 51

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)..... " 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT.... " 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 17

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

A BRAVE BOOK,

"WHAT WOMAN SHOULD KNOW."

A Woman's Book about Women, by a Woman (Mrs. E. B. DUFFEY).

THE ONLY work of the kind ever written BY A WOMAN; is a necessity in every household; its entire novelty and eminent PRACTICALNESS will create an IMMENSE DEMAND. Notwithstanding the delicate subjects necessarily treated, it is written in such BRAVE, PURE style as will not offend the most fastidious. LADY agents never have had such an opportunity to make money and do good. Terms and sample sheets mailed free on immediate application. J. M. STODDART & CO., Philadelphia.

Beautiful inventions for marking Clothing and printing Cards. &c. One will do for a whole family. Movable Type. Profitable, amusing and instructive for the young. Jet Printer $1. Silver $1.25, with Ink, Type and neat Case, delivered by mail anywhere. 4 Alphabets extra 60c. Agents wanted. Golding & Co, 14 Kilby St, Boston.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$20 A DAY FOR MEN AND WOMEN who take the money for "THE LADIES' CASKET"—a beautiful Box with gold edges and clasp—4 by 2½ inches—Book style—contains $1 12 worth of articles of daily use. Is new—sells at sight. One sample for 60 cents, or two styles for $1 00, postpaid, with circulars. Address

CITY NOVELTY CO.,
1505 Pennsylvania Ave., Philadelphia, Pa.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

WORKING CLASS, MALE OR FEMALE, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Cortlandt St., N.Y.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 845 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON: Its Negotiation, Execution, and the Discussions Relating Thereto. By CALEB CUSHING. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

2.

LITTLE KATE KIRBY. A Novel. By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "Christie's Faith," "Mattie: a Stray," "No Man's Friend," "True to Herself," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

3.

THE FISHING TOURIST: Angler's Guide and Reference Book. By CHARLES HALLOCK, Secretary of the "Blooming-Grove Park Association." Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

4.

BY THE LATE LORD LYTTON:

THE COMING RACE. 12mo, Paper, 50 cents.

GODOLPHIN. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

LEILA; or, The Siege of Grenada. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

KENELM CHILLINGLY: His Adventures and Opinions. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; 12mo, Cloth. (In Press.)

5.

TURNING-POINTS IN LIFE. By the Rev. FREDERICK ARNOLD, B.A., of Christ Church, Oxford. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

6.

TO THE BITTER END. A Novel. By Miss M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Dead-Sea Fruit," "Birds of Prey," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

7.

SANTO DOMINGO, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti. By SAMUEL HAZARD. Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

8.

STUDENT'S HALLAM'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND. The Constitutional History of England, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II. By HENRY HALLAM, LL.D., F.R.A.S. Incorporating the Author's Latest Additions and Corrections, and adapted to the Use of Students. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D. 12mo, 747 pp., Cloth, $2 00.

9.

RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

10.

GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50. Popular Edition, 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

11.

HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

12.

THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

This work embraces in one volume:

ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.

ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

A LADY OF REFINEMENT and ABILITY, about to proceed to Europe for the purpose of completing the education of her only daughter, would be glad to undertake the charge of other three young ladies with a similar object, to whom she would afford the watchful care of a mother. Unexceptionable references. Apply by letter to

A. G. C., P. O. Box 959, N. Y. City.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Boston, Mass.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

THERE is a time for all things. The time to leave is when a young lady asks you what sort of a day it is for walking.

The following is said to have been a Yankee's reasoning on progress in locomotion: "I can recollect, ten or twelve years ago, that if I started from Bosting on a Wednesday I cud git in Philadelphy on the next Saturday, making jist three days. Now I kin git from Bosting to Philadelphy in one day; and I've been calc'latin' that if the power of steam increases for the next ten years as it has been doin' for the last ten years, I'd be in Philadelphy jist two days before I started from Bosting."

One of the boys at Camp Noble, Indiana, was lately put on guard, and reported to his captain in the morning that he was abused by a fellow because he would not allow him to pass.

"Well," said the captain, "what did you do?"

"Do? Why, I remonstrated with him."

"And to what effect?"

"Well, I don't know to what effect, but the barrel of my gun is bent."

Overpaid one hundred dollars on a check by a bank, the Georgia negro who received them at once returned the money. The local paper says this is another evidence that the race can never be civilized.

HINTS FOR THE EMPTY-HEADED.—We have much pleasure in suggesting these questions, to be asked by a young lady during the awkward pauses in a quadrille; they will be sure to please: Have you ever had measles? If so, how many? Do you keep an aquarium? Have you an uncle? If so, are you on good terms with your uncle? Do you like chiccory in your coffee? Do you smoke? If so, how does your meerschaum color? Do you believe in spirits? Do you tattoo? Do you think you will be much missed at home this evening?

WHO IS HE?—An English publisher announces The Baronet's Cross. Well, we don't much care if he is; but which baronet is he, and what makes him cross, and what consequences may we expect from his wrath?

A school inspector, examining the boys, put them through their "animal kingdom," and in the course of his performance rather grandly exclaimed, "Now can any of you boys name to me an animal of the order Edentata—that is, a front tooth toothless animal?"

A boy at once smitten with wisdom replied, "I can."

"Well, what is the animal?"

"My grandmother!" replied the boy.

A Yankee in Paris, who was listening to the boasts of a lot of English and French artists about the wonderful genius of their respective countrymen, at last "broke out" and said, "Oh, pshaw! Yeou git eout! Why, there's Bill Devine, of our village, who kin paint a piece of cork so 'zactly like marble that the minute you throw it into the water it will sink to the bottom kuh-chug, jes' like a stone."

SCENES OF CLUB LIFE.

Colonel Forney offered a town in Texas a free library, but, after consultation, the citizens decided that they would rather have twelve bags of buckshot and twelve shot-guns, if he didn't mind.

A German in Buffalo fell into a beer vat the other day and was drowned. He drank as hard as he could to save himself, and would have succeeded had not a floating cork choked him.

PROGRESS.

GRANDPAPA. "Well, Willie, how are you getting on? I suppose you are quite a clever Little Man by this time?"

WILLIE. "I should rather think I was. I can Fight any Boy or Girl in the School—School-mistress—yes, and my Ma, too!"

When you see a gentleman trying to convince a lamp-post that it is impolite to get in a gentleman's way, it is a sign that he has been drinking something—lemonade, perhaps.

COOL.

GENT (to party with pipe). "The Gentleman opposite objects to your Smoking."

PARTY WITH PIPE. "Yes, some People do, but I never take any notice of it." [Goes on.

Explaining the meaning of the word phenomenon, a lecturer said, "A cow is not a phenomenon, nor is an apple-tree; but when you see the cow go up the tree, tail foremost, to pick apples, that will be a phenomenon."

ANOTHER WAY.—Somebody is advertising a preparation which, among other merits, is warranted to keep a lady's hand free from chaps. We know another way to effect this. Let her dress in the present fashion, and have it known that she has no money. Chaps, if they are sensible chaps, will let her hand alone very severely.

At an examination for teachers' certificates the word "irony," from Dryden's Æneid, was given for students to explain. One of them supplied the following: "Irony, a substance found in mineral wells; it is carefully preserved in bottles, and sold in chemists' shops as tincture of iron."

When does an author's wife call herself a book?—When she says she's a t(h)ome.

What is the difference between a good dog-show and a bad one?—When it is a good one the dogs go to the show, but if a bad one the show goes to the dogs.

An intelligent Aberdeen preacher recently took for his text, "Adam, where art thou?" and divided his subject into three distinct parts: 1st, All men are somewhere; 2d, Some men are where they ought not to be; and 3d, Unless they take care, they will soon find themselves where they would rather not be.

SILENCE.—A grave contemporary, fond of denouncing sage maxims, observes, "Silence is the safest course for any man to adopt who distrusts himself." This doesn't go half far enough. Silence is also the safest course for a man to adopt who distrusts other people. Although he is by this means "under the silent system"—as they say in jails—at all events he doesn't commit himself.

JUST SO!

MAMMA (reading to nice boy). "'The Esquimaux are a dirty people, and wash but once a year—in the summer season;' but you, Johnny, will be a clean boy, and wash like an American, won't you?"

NICE BOY. "No, ma; I'll be an Esquimau; please, ma."

If a man named William marry, why is he pretty certain to be hen-pecked?—Because his wife will always have a Will of her own.

A man, writing poetically of the weather, says, "The backbone of winter is broken, but the tail wags yet occasionally."

When a man "fires" with wrath, what sort of shot does he use?

Why is a man who ran away without paying his rent like an officer in the army?—Because he is a left-tenant.

CURIOUS.—Under the head of "Curious Canine Antipathy," a contemporary gives a long account of a dog who will never pass a butcher's shop. Brown says he doesn't see any thing remarkable about that, for he's got three or four dogs who'll never pass one while there's a chance of stealing any thing out of it.

APRIL SHOWERS—
"My old Hat makes me look a p-p-p-perfect f-f-f-fright!"

BRING FORTH MAY FLOWERS.
"Aren't these Roses and Violets lovely, Dear?"

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 18.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

IMITATIONS OF MARBLE.

A VALUABLE plastic composition in imitation of marble may be made in the following manner, and applied to any moulded articles, such as statuary, pedestals, vases, etc. For outside decorations it will be especially adapted, as it is capable of resisting the action of frost even better than marble itself.

If the article you are about to manufacture is intended to remain white, take sulphate of potassa fourteen ounces, river or rain water sixteen quarts, gum-arabic two pounds, purified cement twenty pounds, marble or alabaster dust twenty pounds, and treat as follows:

First dissolve over a slow fire, stirring all the time, the sulphate of potassa in the water; when this is entirely dissolved add the gum-arabic, letting it stand until it is also dissolved. Set this away as your first mixture, and proceed to a second one. Stir together the above quantities of purified cement, marble or alabaster dust, and five pounds of lime slacked sufficiently to crumble into powder. Put into a large mortar of

Fig. 1.—SWISS MUSLIN SLEEVELESS JACKET.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 3.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 30-34.

Fig. 2.—GROS GRAIN AND LACE VEST.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 5.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 35 and 36.

Fig. 3.—SWISS MUSLIN SLEEVELESS JACKET.—BACK.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 30-34.

Fig. 4.—FAILLE AND LACE VEST.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 5.—GROS GRAIN AND LACE VEST.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 35 and 36.

FIGS. 1-5.—LADIES' SLEEVELESS JACKETS AND VESTS.

Hosted by Google

marble or porcelain a portion of both these mixtures, and stir it with a wooden or bone spatula until the substance assumes the appearance of thick paste. Then work it well with the pestle until the mass becomes elastic, which will be seen by the composition ceasing to adhere to the pestle.

To make mouldings or castings, grease the mould well, and apply a first layer of this composition over every part of it, of about one-third of an inch in thickness. This first layer is backed by another of a different texture: Boil for several hours over a brisk fire a quantity of hemp, tow, or similar substance, cut into very small pieces, in the first mixture of gum and sulphate of potassa. The product must then be well mixed with the remainder of the second mixture in a mortar, and beaten together with the pestle until the threads are entirely mixed through the whole mass, which is like a thick paste. Now press this into the centre of the mould until it becomes a solid body, and leave it to harden. By this simple process is produced the most substantial substitute for white marble, lighter in weight, but capable of receiving as beautiful a polish as the stone itself.

LAST WINTER.

(1872–73.)

BY WILLIAM C. RICHARDS.

A WONDER-WORLD of white and glitter,
Instead of winter's wonted brown—
If winds wailed low or blasts were bitter—
Four slow-paced months have shown.

A carnival of snow, whose mummers
Were trees and shrubs and garden bowers,
All masked as ghosts of happy summers,
With icicles for flowers.

Its spectral gleam, 'neath storm-clouds' darkling,
Hung o'er my sight a sombre spell;
Its dazzling glow with sunbeams sparkling
I wearied of as well.

The chiming of the sleigh-bells' tinkle
Is music for some swift-winged day,
And fit, with rare delight, to sprinkle
Winter's dull opera.

But sleigh-bells, rung from bleak November
And into April's frightened ear,
Are monotones I sha'n't remember
With one regretful tear.

I love the mountain-tops' snow cincture
To flush with amber or with red,
As morning's dyes, or evening's, tincture
Each grand and reverent head.

And snow-drifts, aping hills gigantic,
And blotting villages from sight,
I fancy, as a freak romantic,
Of Nature—for a night.

But twenty weeks are long to slumber
For the brown earth beneath the snow,
While violet eyes beyond all number
Lie wide awake below.

Weary of white, in tiresome splendor,
We sighed for stains of pink and blue—
Sighed for the glances, soft and tender,
Of blossoms wet with dew.

One Lent of snow, with penance humble,
We keep to bleach earth's stains away;
But three long Lents our patience stumble,
Waiting spring's Easter-day.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1873.

☞ WITH the next Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent out gratuitously a splendidly illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing a choice variety of exceedingly interesting reading matter.

PIN-MONEY.

POLITICAL economists may talk as they will of the standard of coin and the value of gold and silver over cowry-shells and wampum, and they may read us their riddle—If it costs a dollar to mine an ounce of silver, and sixteen dollars to mine an ounce of gold, how much more is gold worth than silver?—as long as they please. Doubtless our weaker intellects will always remain in a maze about it; and so, for our part, we shall content ourselves with declaring that cowry-shells may do for Bengal, and wampum for the Rocky Mountains; but of all money, the world over, the money that we think the most of is pin-money.

We hardly expect our male readers to agree with us: they will probably think far more of hard money, of ready money, of tribute-money, or even of paper money. But we are sure of sympathy from our female readers—from such of them, that is, as have ever heard of pin-money save in the vague traditional way in which they read, when at school, that once on a time the groaning people were taxed to raise a fund for the purchase of pins for the young queen, who demanded that those novel and luxurious implements should be added to the appurtenances of her toilette.

For in America we are fain to believe pin-money is a thing almost unknown as pin-money. Nothing surely can equal the generosity of the American men to their wives, as a rule, when they have the wherewithal to be generous. The wheel of fortune has turned up wealth for them so easily that it is impossible to be miserly with it, as with the hard earnings wrung from toil; light come, light go, says the saw; and they hand money over to the asker with a rather reckless prodigality, so that the wives of many men are little more than lay figures, on which the resources of their husbands are displayed in velvets and laces and diamonds. Once in a while, too, there is a man of more than ordinary delicacy of feeling to whose mind it occurs that it may be pleasant to his wife to have something of her own for which she shall be responsible to none, and who places, therefore, a sufficient sum, safely invested, at her disposal, and asks no questions about it, sure that if he can trust her with his happiness, his honor, his children, he can trust her with money also. But that man is the exception that proves the rule. There is probably one such in ten thousand. The average American loves to dispense his bounty personally. As for settling jointure on his wife, except in the way of protecting himself, he would tell you it was time enough for him to put his property out of his hands when he died; and if his wife has any inheritance of her own, it is ten to one that he will require from her some sort of understanding as to the expenditure of its income. Certainly he is prodigal; but perhaps he loves the continuous dropping better than the douche, constant giving better than absolute abdication.

It used to be said of the Bostonians, who, before the late fire, were investing their moneys in the vast and magnificent buildings that were rising every where through the city, that they loved to see their money; that hidden away in stocks and bonds it was unsatisfactory to them; that no one, though he walked its whole length, could tell which tractional part of a railway belonged to himself; but once amassed in the great carved granite or white marble blocks, the owner could take a stroll round it every morning of his life, survey it, and gloat over it if he would. And it is in something the same fashion that the American husband prefers to bestow on his wife a large sum to-day and a larger to-morrow, rather than make a settlement upon her and be done with it. For by that means he still retains his authority over it, one might say, and allows himself the pleasure of frequent giving in addition.

This may be all very well among the rich, though at the best it can hardly fail to be the least in the world humiliating to the wife, unless her sensitiveness has been well calloused. But if we turn to those of less means we shall find that the thing works very differently. The man of narrow income can not afford, of course, to toss his wife bank-bills for her papillotes; on the contrary, it costs him an effort to part with a bank-bill any way, and if his wife wants half a dollar to buy thread she has to ask for it, if not to cringe—lucky, sometimes, if she is not put off with a quarter. As a consequence, the wife has to resort to petty arts of cajolery, of selling rags to the junk-man before they have in reality come to rags, of pilfering small change from the sleeping man's pockets, or else she has proudly to do without it, dire though her need, and when a few dollars would make her a happy and independent woman, to feel herself a pauper in the midst of comfort.

In England, whenever there is any money at all at marriage, a certain sum, be it more or less, is invariably allotted the wife for her pin-money; not for wardrobe or housekeeping or other expenses, but for the thousand and one trifles with which she does not care to go to her husband—perhaps on the magnified principle that familiarity breeds contempt—and those little wants are the very ones to teach a husband that his idol is made of clay. And where is the woman who does not wish still to be her husband's idol? and where is the man that does not wish his wife to remain his ideal—that is to say, at her best and fairest? In France there is said to be hardly a household where the wife is not as much of an authority in money-matters as the husband. In many households there she is the purse-bearer; and certainly the very general distribution of wealth in that country among all classes, as shown in the way the people rose to the exigencies of the German indemnity, speaks well enough for this sort of management in the family.

But in America a man feels himself competent to manage his own business, without any meddling from a woman; and with this nobody could quarrel if he managed the woman's share equally well with his own. But what he wants he gets, what his wife wants she gets if she can. A friend of ours once ardently went begging for some case of great suffering, we remember, and in a whole city ward—counting out the few who were notoriously wealthy, or who had money in their own right—she did not find a dozen women who, however well inclined they professed themselves, were able to bestow a shilling on the charity till their husbands should have come home to dinner. And that told the whole story. They were not free agents, so far as a single cent was concerned. They were always suppliants; they had nothing as a right. They had their livelihood, but Bridget in her different sphere had as much, and her wages too. If they had been allotted so much as ten dollars a year, to dispose of utterly untrammeled by question or remark, the sons of those women, it seems to us, would have inherited a fuller manhood, and would have stood up with a little bolder front to the great battle of life.

Of course it shall be demanded of no one as a necessity that he shall grant over and above the measure of his fellows, that he shall give as though it were an established right what it is not even yet a general custom to give as a favor. Yet if when a man married he set apart the amount he could afford for his wife's needs, paying no heed to her magnanimous, but not always genuine, remonstrance, and put the allowance into her hands, it is evident that presently self-interest would teach her discretion in its handling; and in learning to use that to advantage she would have learned to manage the domestic expenses to an equal advantage; there would be an era of undreamed-of happiness in the house; and the husband would soon be heard agreeing with us that, though hard money may have its merits, there is no such thoroughly satisfactory money as pin-money!

DRESS AS THE GAUGE OF CIVILIZATION.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

WHEN young King Philip—I refer now not to him of Pokanoket, Prince of the Wampanoags, son of our old friend Massasoit, but to Philip, my king—when this youthful monarch put on his first jacket and trowsers he signalized his sovereignty by striking an attitude. Out went his feet as widely apart as his small legs could conveniently allow, deep went his lordly hands into his diminutive but sufficient pockets, and up tossed his shining head as bright and fine and yellow with its lustrous hair as the silken summer maize. So there he stood—and, caught by the cunning sun, there he still stands, a demure little mockery of a man, a caricature of strength and dominion, a puny baby, but mighty with the foreshadowings of fate—not ridiculous, because altogether transparent and innocent, and because altogether certain in his promise.

For the king will never go back again under petticoat government. Once a boy, always a boy, until he is, better still, a man. No draggling of draperies for him through rain or hail, or fire or snow. No beating against the wind with sails full spread. He goes through life close reefed, all the hinderances of friction reduced to their lowest terms. He runs the race without carrying weight. He rejoices in he knows not what. It is a greater freedom than he comprehends.

But look you, my lord, power brings duty. We shall expect you to use your freedom. What avails that you are girded for the race, armed for the fight, if you fail in the one or flee from the other? Dress is a significant, not a merely capricious, fact. From time to time benevolent men and enterprising women have attempted to change national customs and costumes, and here and there a brave BLOOMER has crooked the pregnant hinges of the knee before the public gaze, but in vain. No confessed convenience, no considerations of health even, have been able to banish or materially to modify the flowing female drapery. It is felt to be not simply female but feminine, and even now it is a hand-to-hand conflict between skirts that "just clear the ground" and skirts that drag their slow lengths over it. A merciful Providence save us from being conquered by the last alternative! Though to any person who sees a dress trailing over the pavements, with its intricate pleats and puffings well grimed, its protecting wiggin(?) flounce gray with dirt, or, as these eyes have seen, torn off and hopping behind, half a yard of narrow rag, a train not provided for in any fashion plate—to such, I say, it might seem as if Providence had no call to interfere. We might provide against this degrading display and this untidy consciousness by our own common-sense.

But obstinate adherence to an inconvenient dress means something. Men have not so clung to it. Men by whole nations and whole races have cast aside the flowing folds which women not only retain but multiply. Visiting lately in China, I was struck anew by the similarity between the dresses of our male and female friends. Our host was equipped in a short loose black satin sack and petticoat. His queue was less luxuriant than the ladies' hair, and his stout English boots beneath his petticoat, unlike little mice, much more like very large rats, stole in and out. His raiment was plain, whereas the silk robes of his family were rich and varied in color, and heavy with gay and golden embroidery. Otherwise their dresses were generally the same. Doubtless the Chinese eye saw a great difference in cut and fit, but to me the fullness, the length, the outline were one. The resemblance was far greater than the difference.

Here, then, we have a female dress more comfortable than our own, loose, light, and not ungraceful; as modest as our own, as rich as our own, far more permanent, and necessarily more economical. Such a dress as this must give women greater freedom of motion, and must be therefore more conducive to health. It must require far less time and thought in its construction, and therefore leaves the mind at liberty to range in other fields. The man's dress, on the contrary, is less adapted to work than the English male dress. The Celestial gentleman would seem to be as much hampered by his clothes as the Celestial lady. While relinquishing beauty, he has not gained freedom. The husband is really worse off than his wife.

Our international diversities go further than this. Our American women do not live too much in the open air; but if we may accept the truth of history and tradition, they are in it far more than the Chinese women. They are not very accurate or profound scholars, but there is among them far more intellectual depth and activity, it is generally believed, than among Chinese women. That is, the dress which we all agree is the most sensible and comfortable, and which some of us are ready to fight for, and a faithful few to suffer martyrdom on account of—the dress which gives most scope to mind and body—is worn by a race proverbially circumscribed in both; while the most impeding and absorbing dress ever devised is worn by a race of women who stand relatively higher than any other on earth.

There are ever so many morals fluttering from this fact as naturally as the tail from a kite. But as the columns of the Bazar are limited, suppose we confine ourselves to one. It may not be the right one, but I should like to see any person bring forward a better.

The spontaneous and increasing difference between the male and female dress marks the growth of a nation in higher civilization, and points to the different work of man and woman. In the beginnings of things there is a general commingling, a chaos of individualities and offices. Woman is but an inferior sort of man, always more weak, sometimes more beautiful. The distinctions of nature are imperious, but have no significance beyond their existence. Women do pretty much the same work as men, and wear pretty much the same dress. At the worst they are low, at the best they are not high. But rising in the scale, the dividing line defines itself more and more sharply. The man's world evolves itself, rough and palpable, from the chaos; the woman's world, too, floats into the finer light, less palpable, but not less real. For his world and work the man folds away his delaying draperies, and arrays himself in compact and enduring substance; for her world the woman as instinctively and unerringly wraps herself in intricacy and voluminousness and beauty—unerringly, because she is none the less accoutred for her world in being encumbered for his. The higher the man, the higher the nation, the higher the civilization, the more he takes upon his own brawny shoulders the pioneer toil, and reserves her for the secondary, the social, the invisible, the all-pervading.

So, dear lady, though your dress may be a little in advance of your life, though you may have put on the attire of the future while yet under the yoke of the lingering and brutal past, take courage. You suffer and are hindered, but you are in the line of promotion. Let Philip your king rejoice in his propria quæ maribus, for that way conflict and victory lie for him. But when your clean soul is vexed that you can not preserve your spotless dress for much sweeping and dusting and dish-washing, rejoice over the coming woman, whose feet are already beautiful upon the mountains, and whose sole house-cleaning shall be to keep the chambers of the heart—all hearts—pure and fresh and fragrant.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

WRAPS.

THE long polonaise, plain and smooth in front, stylishly bouffant behind, with collar, cuffs, pockets, belt, and sash of heavy faille or velvet, will be the most distinguished-looking as well as most popularly worn over dress of the season, and this garment dispenses with extra wraps. There are, however, numerous costumes that require a wrap to complete them; besides, many ladies prefer some kind of shoulder drapery when in the street, and for these independent mantles are provided. As they are to be worn with various dresses, black is the best color for them. The materials are cashmere, or else the soft repped Sicilienne that has never met here the favor it deserves. The Dolman scarf or mantle, slightly fitted to the back, is thus far the most successful garment; and sacque Dolmans are really the only sacques to be found among French importations. We have seen black Sicilienne Dolmans edged with goffered tape fringe, and exquisitely embroidered, or else ornate with Gothic passementerie. Cashmere Dolmans are made up entirely of inch-wide guipure or yak insertion, with bands of cashmere between, making a garment almost as light as lace. For quite young ladies there are talma capes, with the fronts lapped like fichus, and the back in Watteau drapery, with watered ribbon bows and lace, while the whole garment glistens with jets. The regular old-time mantilla, with long, square fronts, is very stylish, but is most used by older ladies.

Hosted by Google

The fancy in summer wraps is for garments made entirely of yak insertion, with velvet or moiré bands. For wearing over black grenadines and light-colored silks there can be nothing prettier than a sacque of lace and velvet stripes, with glistening jets sewed on. These are brightened by bows of blue or pink watered ribbon, changed to suit the costume. Écru yak insertion and lace are also much used with lengthwise stripes of bronze or black velvet. A polonaise of écru insertion alternating with bronze velvet stripes, and draped by a sash of double-faced satin ribbon, black on one side, écru on the other, is a very stylish garment for carriage and watering-place wear: price $225.

For dressy-wear in the house are sleeveless jackets of black velvet or moiré bands, with guipure insertion stripes. These brighten up simple toilettes, and cost from $60 upward. Colored velvets are also used in this way over white or black dresses; for example, rose velvet stripes with white insertion, and blue velvet with écru yak. A dark blue velvet jacket has the back of plain velvet, with merely the side forms outlined by a guipure band, while the front is formed of crosswise bands of lace and velvet. This is also admired on black velvet with white guipure, and is illustrated in Bazar No. 12, Vol. VI.

The black lace scarf to be worn around the neck when furs are laid aside is now lapped in front like a fichu, and fastened low down on the tournure of the Marguerite polonaise, which is again imported, just as it was about to go out of fashion. This scarf is of figured net, edged with lace, and ornamented with watered ribbon bows. An illustration of it is found in Bazar No. 10, Vol. VI.

For morning wraps at the sea-side are some pretty Marie Antoinette fichus of camel's-hair in pale blue, Nile green, and réséda shades, trimmed with lace of the same color, or else heavy wool fringe. The newest breakfast sacques are of white cashmere, trimmed with white goffered tape fringe, above which is laid a band of black guipure insertion. For heavier wraps in the country are the lovely Chuddah shawls of summer camel's-hair in pale blue or scarlet, soft, fine, clinging, and of scarcely any weight. They are four yards long, are simply fringed, and cost from $40 to $60. A refined choice among these is the Philadelphia shawl in Quaker drab and gray shades. Evening wraps are white Sicilienne Dolmans wrought all over with what the French call white jet, and elaborately fringed. There are also mantles of India cashmere of glowing scarlet and deep blue, with lengthwise vines and borders of rich Oriental embroidery. Exquisite hoods, with pelerines or fichus attached, are shown for summer drives and evenings on the balcony. They are daintily made of China crape, blue, black, white, or pink, with bands and edge of white lace. These are illustrated in Bazar No. 4, Vol. VI.

DINNER AND EVENING DRESSES.

A leading furnishing house displays evening dresses by gas-light, bringing out the faint shimmering tints of silk with fine effect. More than a score of Parisian dresses are shown; they have demi-trains, with fanciful revers, tabliers, sashes, and parts of over-skirts; the basques have voluminous Medici fraises; the new sashes are of double-faced satin ribbon, black on one side, the dress color on the other. White crêpe lisse pleatings, fine, soft, and clear, supersede Swiss muslin pleatings on silk. Quantities of embroidery appear in silk floss, and newer still in pearl and jet on illusion, which is then applied to the silk. A dress in French taste is white faille, with the entire front breadth and side revers covered with jet embroidery on tulle; double-faced sashes of white and scarlet; the low corsage has tips of scarlet and white ostrich feathers on the shoulders. A pale limon silk has crêpe lisse pleatings, headed by pearl embroidered bands; the quaint sashes are black, with pale blue on the other side. A pearl-colored silk has a cherry sash with Valenciennes flounces. These three dresses are examples of the stylish contrasts—the first, white, black, and scarlet; the second, pale yellow, black, and sky blue; the third, pearl, cherry, and white.

Pale flesh tints and lightest green silks are chastely trimmed with seed-pearl embroidery and crêpe lisse pleatings.

Two dresses of black tulle are made with low round Josephine corsages, with the neck cut in deep points back and front. One is trimmed with long garlands of variegated roses, pink, damask red, and yellow, that trail down on the train, and fall in a great cluster as if thrown there. The other has straw embroidery representing the dangling oat-bells so much used this season, and sashes of rose and scarlet double-faced satin ribbon.

A remarkable dress, of private importation, is pale soft pink faille, with seven lengthwise vines of white embroidery trimming the three front breadths from the waist down to the foot, where they are met by bias folds and white crimped fringe. The back of the demi-train has deep flounces and a trained over-skirt, with revers held back by bows on one side, while on the other is a large garland of roses of various hues extending from the waist to the floor. The low pointed corsage has a bertha of white crêpe lisse pleatings, with embroidery and bouquets on front and shoulder.

BLACK GRENADINE SUITS.

Damask-figured, lace-striped, and polka-dotted suits of grenadine are imported almost to the exclusion of plain grenadines, though the small square-meshed canvas grenadines will be worn again. They are made usually with a silk-lined tight basque, half over-skirt, and a silk skirt on which the grenadine flounces are mounted. Sometimes silk flounces are put like a lining under the grenadine flounces; but this seems useless and heavy. The Parisian fancy is to use jet, watered ribbon bows, and French laces on these dresses; but jets are heavy on thin goods, and American ladies can not reconcile themselves to wearing imitation laces. For a polka-dotted grenadine, trim the silk skirt with two straight flounces of grenadine held in three side pleats at intervals, with gathers between, and headed by a wide bias puff, with ruffle at each side edged with lace, the fullness laid in three tiny side pleats reversed at top and bottom. Put an apron over-skirt in front, with a pleated puff around it, a row of pleated puffing up the whole of the second side seam, a panier puff and watered sash behind, and add a simple jockey basque with coat sleeves, and you have a stylish summer suit. Black satin sash ribbons with bright blue or else mustard-color (yellow-green) on the reverse side are much used with black grenadines.

IMPORTED SUMMER SUITS.

The summer novelties in costumes announced by our Parisian correspondent are already found here in the salons of enterprising modistes, and will appear simultaneously at Newport, Saratoga, and the French haunts of fashion. For example is a suit of the new canvas guipure—écru linen in square meshes like canvas grenadine. A flounce covered with embroidery trims the skirt; the over-skirt is wrought in polka dots and edged with yak lace; the basque is also polka-dotted, with yak insertion outlining a vest, and the self-colored dress is brightened by bows and sash of scarlet watered ribbon. There are also polonaises of unbleached damask linen with blue or red woven borders, edged with crocheted lace, white, with a color intermingled. The most tasteful batiste suits are of solid flax gray, with insertions and edges of Malines thread lace on the flounces and forming a vest on the basque; to complete the dainty dresses are Watteau bows, armlets, sailor knots, and wide sashes of deep purplish-blue ribbon.

The demi-polonaise, described by Madame Raymond, with long straight fronts and basque backs, or else just the reverse, with a basque in front and long sash-like tabs behind, is also found in lovely suits of white repped piqué and sheer nansook muslin. On piqué suits five or six embroidered ruffles trim the front breadth, and two pass around the skirt and edge the polonaise, while great white pearl buttons fasten the front of the garment and define the waist behind. The neck is stylishly finished with a fraise made of a bias piqué band arranged to curve upward and outward, and edged with two standing embroidered ruffles. Another stylish fancy is to make repped piqué suits entirely plain, and add large black velvet buttons, collar, cuffs, pockets, and sash on the polonaise. These are merely basted on, so that they may be easily removed before washing, and the simple dress is a boon to the laundress. For breakfast dresses there are piqué skirts with a simple embroidered Spanish flounce, and a graceful little sacque all covered with embroidery. White cambric suits have flounces of open English needle-work with insertion headings set in the skirt; the apron of the over-skirt and the basque are made entirely of this eyeleted embroidery. The old fashion of puffs with colored ribbon run in them is prettily revived on sheer white nansook dresses. An inexpensive white suit for afternoons may be made in this way, with three wide flounces on the skirt edged and headed by a puff lined with blue, violet, or green, and a belted polonaise with a single ruffle and puff. Black-lined puffs are worn in white dresses by ladies in mourning. Breakfast sacques trimmed in this way, with slightly trained skirts puffed across the front, are pretty house toilettes.

Suits of dark blue linen lawn, as thin and cool as batiste, are shown in solid color, with white branching lines. The skirt has a deep Spanish flounce, with white needle-worked scallops, and a narrower scalloped ruffle edges the polonaise. Gay costumes for summer hotels and for afternoon fêtes at country-houses are usually in contrasting colors. One of Napoleon blue silk has an over-skirt and sleeveless basque of the white rough-surfaced raw silk called Mousaia, with sleeves and sash of dark blue. A polonaise costume in two delicate mordoré shades has a sash and bow of brown faced with rose-color.

PALMETTO HATS.

The palmetto hats made in Florida have been taken to Paris, beautified by French taste, and returned here to appear as midsummer hats for town or country. They imitate the old-fashioned calash in shape, also the Dolly Varden of last year, and the new tip-tilted Lynette. These light Southern hats are appropriately trimmed with browned grasses, and the sugar-cane feather clustered in amid knots and loops of soft mousseline ribbon. $5 buys a trimmed hat.

For information received thanks are due Mrs. CONNELLY; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

ANY number of royalties will forgather at Vienna during the Exposé. All the potentates of Europe have been asked; all are coming; not together, but in squads—some in squadrons. The Majesty of England will show with her daughter and son-in-law, the Prince Imperial of Germany. Old Kaiser himself is turning the thing over in what he calls his mind.

—Poets and emperors are usually separate persons. China had a specimen of the two joined. There is soon to be sold in London an Oriental trophy, a poem, entitled Ten Complete Records; or, a Song of Triumph, written by the Chinese Emperor KIENLUNG, on the subjugation of Ghoorkhas. It is in the Chinese language, embroidered in red silk characters on a dark blue silk ground of twenty-two leaves or sides. It was captured at the sack of the palace at Pekin.

—After a life-long devotion to the late Emperor of France, Dr. CONNEAU, the most intimate of all his friends, who enabled him to escape from the fortress of Ham, and who in the final adversity still clung to him, is now quite poor. He neglected opportunities to enrich himself during the empire, and his wife has, therefore, been forced to give concerts under the patronage of her wealthy friends at Nice, Pau, etc.

—MARY ANN KEYES, of Boston, has received from the local Board of Engineers a gold watch and chain, as a testimonial for her bravery in saving the lives of four persons at a fire in that city.

—Mr. and Mrs. HAWLES JOHNSON, of Newbury, Vermont, celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of their marriage on the 14th of March last—their diamond wedding. Many presents were given to the dear old couple, and for the feast the table used was one used for dining in 1801 by the members of the Vermont Legislature.

—Miss ELLEN M. COULTON, the daughter of a Southern gentleman, took the prize medal in each of her classes at a recent examination at the convent of the Sacred Heart, in Rome. This entitled her to the grand gold medal of the convent—an honor so difficult of attainment that it has been conferred only twice during the past ten years, and never before to an English-speaking pupil.

—Miss EMMA CALL, the first female graduate of Michigan University, has had a resonant call of $3000 a year and her expenses, to export herself to Japan, and there "teach the young idea how to," etc., etc.

—A defunct Englishman, eccentric while living, has bequeathed his library, consisting of a rare number of valuable books and papers, to the Bodleian Library, fastened up in a box, conditioned that it be not opened until January 1, 1920. The bequest has been accepted, and the musty old things will be added to the other musty old things belonging to the very deceased Mr. BODLEI.

—The Princess KOLSTOFF-MASSALSKA, better known as "Dora d'Istria," now residing in Florence, continues to display an intellectual activity like that of Madame DE STAËL, with whom she has many points of resemblance, especially in her philosophical power, and in her marvelous linguistic attainments. She writes fluently in modern Greek, Wallachian, Italian, French, and other languages, and she is conversant with Russian, German, and English, and a great admirer of the nobler aims of American civilization. She is completing her work on her ancestors, the sovereign princes of Roumania, or history of the Ghika princes, under the title of The Albanians in Roumania, besides publishing an interesting description of Liguria, and of Persian epical poetry, and of popular ballads of Asiatic nations.

—Miss MARY CARPENTER, known in England as a philosopher, proposes to visit the United States this spring.

—WILLIAM MORRIS, the poet, author of The Earthly Paradise, is also a prosperous business man, and one of the most extensive dealers in stained glass in London. A specimen of his work has been on view for a few days past at 288 and 290 Fourth Avenue, viz., a painted window, intended as an altar-piece for the memorial chancel at Trinity Church, Sa..gerties, New York. The subject is "Christ on the Cross," and contains a great deal of elaborate work. It is one of the costliest productions of the kind in this country, about three thousand dollars having been paid for it to the poet-artist. The memorial in question is in honor of Judge VANDERPOEL.

—The name of NATHAN PLATT is to be inscribed on the roll of public benefactors, he having bequeathed $10,000 to the public library of Arlington, Massachusetts; $10,000 to the high school; $5000 to the poor widows' fund in the same town; and $15,000 to several charitable institutions elsewhere.

—It has been thought worthy of a paragraph in London papers that the numerous members of the Clan Campbell would be glad to learn that M'CALLUM MORE'S son, Lord ARCHIBALD, has become a member of the famous banking house of COUTTS & Co.

—The Rev. GEORGE BOWERS, late Dean of Manchester, has bequeathed to his nephew, Mr. ADDINGTON, the gold ring known as originally belonging to JOHN BUNYAN.

—Count RAVING has recently died at the age of one hundred years. He was formerly in the Rohan-Montbazon regiment, and was wounded at Quiberon in 1795.

—Miss KELLOGG did a pleasant thing a few days since at the Continental Hotel, Philadelphia. Having a spare hour, she invited the servants who could be spared from their duties to assemble in the ladies' dining-room about nine o'clock. She had her music and some musical instruments with her, and played and sang for them a choice selection of her best pieces, interspersing with them a number of Irish ballads and negro minstrel melodies. It was a very graceful act in the great cantatrice, and is as creditable to her generosity as it was enjoyable to those who do not often have the good fortune to hear such music sung and played as she can do it.

—The man largest in cattle in this hemisphere was W. D. WILSON, of Madison, out West, who died a few days since at the age of sixty-nine. At the time of his father's death, eighteen years ago, the united survey lines of the paternal estate amounted to seventy-four miles. A large-acred man was he in very deed—in very many deeds.

—It is a good thing to be the maker of thread. GEORGE A. CLARK, of Paisley, who died in this country recently, bequeathed to his native town $100,000 to build a town-hall, and a similar round sum to Glasgow University.

—As a noteworthy incident in the religious history of the day, it may be mentioned that a Jewish lady was buried in Evansville, Indiana, recently, a Lutheran minister performing the ceremony in the Jewish cemetery.

—As regards jewels—not of the type, fine as they may be, that are set in high places in Connecticut—it may be mentioned that the Shah of Persia is the owner of the finest collection of diamonds in existence, valued in the aggregate at $10,000,000. The largest of these is the Derya-i-noor, weighing one hundred and seventy-eight carats, which is fifty-five carats more than the Koh-i-noor weighs since its last cutting.

—M. BUFFET, the new President of the French Assembly, is an eminent politician, a man of wealth and great personal influence. He is fifty-five years old, and has been in public life thirty years. Under the Presidency of LOUIS NAPOLEON he was Minister of Commerce, but retired when the "nephew of his uncle" overthrew the government in 1851. In 1864 and 1869 he was elected a member of the Corps Législatif, despite the utmost exertions of NAPOLEON to return a candidate favorable to the existing government.

—FORSTER, the biographer of DICKENS, thus sketches a visit to VICTOR HUGO with DICKENS in the winter of 1846:

"Closed that day at the house of VICTOR HUGO, by whom DICKENS was received with infinite courtesy and grace. The great writer then occupied a floor in a noble corner house in the Place Royale, the old quarter of NINON DE L'ENCLOS and the people of the regency, of whom the gorgeous tapestries, the painted ceilings, the wonderful carvings, and old golden furniture, including a canopy of state out of some palace of the Middle Ages, quaintly and grandly reminded us. HUGO was himself, however, the best thing we saw. Rather under the middle size, of compact, close-buttoned-up figure, with ample dark hair falling loosely over his close-shaven face, I never saw upon any features so keenly intellectual such a soft and sweet gentility, and certainly never heard the French language spoken with the picturesque distinctness given to it by VICTOR HUGO."

—M. ARMINIUS VÁMBÉRY, the author of one of the most interesting books of Eastern travel ever published, has been elected one of the honorary Corresponding Fellows of the London Royal Geographical Society.

—Miss AMANDA VANCILL is the name of a school-teacher in Indiana who has made $7000 by investing her salary in U. S. bonds, upon which a weak person of that State says there is a manifest disposition among the impecunious youth of Indiana, where they exist in vast multitude, to invest Miss A. VANCILL with the U. S. bonds of matrimony.

—Professor WEIR, of Yale, has secured for that college a large and handsome cast of the Ghiberti gates of Florence, of which only four casts are in existence. The dimensions are twenty by thirteen feet. It was brought over in sixty sections from the South Kensington Museum, where it was made, and its weight is so great that an extra foundation of brick has been provided for it.

—The late CHARLES KNIGHT spent on authors, art, wood-cuts, engravers, paper, and print something like $2,500,000. He started the Penny Magazine, published several editions of the Penny Cyclopedia, besides many valuable works of history and literature: yet he died poor.

—HENRY CORNELIUS AGRIPPA was a respectable sort of man in his day, and his curious old Latin work On the Superiority of Woman over Man has just been translated into English by a distinguished New York lady.

—Lady ELLENBOROUGH is believed to be alive, notwithstanding reports of her death. Her relatives have announced through the London Times that they "have the best reason to believe that the report of her death is as unfounded as the account of her career is false."

—Mr. ANTHONY TROLLOPE coincides with the natives of New Zealand that that country is "the cream of the earth—a happy land to which all good things have been given." He thinks it will ultimately become another Britain in the Southern Sea.

—LEOPOLD RANKE, the veteran historian, is about to publish a selection from the correspondence between BUNSEN and the late King of Prussia, FREDERICK WILLIAM IV., from their earliest acquaintance in Rome to near the end of the life of the king.

—On the anniversary of Professor DÖLLINGER'S seventy-fourth birthday an autograph letter of congratulation from King LOUIS was—as usual since some years—presented to the veteran canonist. The doctor will during the present year celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of his appointment to his professorship.

—Captain CARLSEN, the Norwegian navigator, who has recently reported his rediscovery of Spitzbergen, makes a curious revelation. Nearly three centuries ago, in 1596, WILLIAM BORENTZ, a Dutch navigator, sailed on his second voyage to discover the passage to Asia through the Arctic Ocean, reached the archipelago, and landed on the coast of Spitzbergen. He pitched his tents, built huts, and passed the winter there. When he abandoned the coast he left the huts and their contents as they were. From that time to the time that Captain CARLSEN landed on the coast, in the year 1870, no man had ever touched the same spot. Captain CARLSEN found the huts of the old Dutch navigator just as he had left them—the relics of the fire that had been extinguished 300 years before still lying on the hearth, the books on the shelves (including a work on navigation and a history of China which had been translated into Dutch), the jugs and dishes in which the food had been prepared and served, engravings, mathematical instruments, a pair of shoes, etc. Captain CARLSEN took all these things, and brought them back with him to Europe.

—In March next, according to the present understanding, the marriage of the Duke of Edinburgh is to take place with the daughter of the Emperor of Russia, prior to which Queen VICTORIA will visit St. Petersburg. It is among the unsolved conundrums whether the wedding shall take place in Russia or England.

Hosted by Google

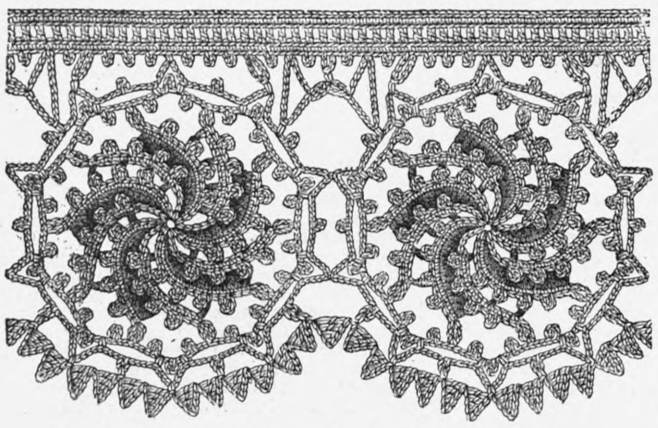

Fig. 1.—CROCHET GUIPURE EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

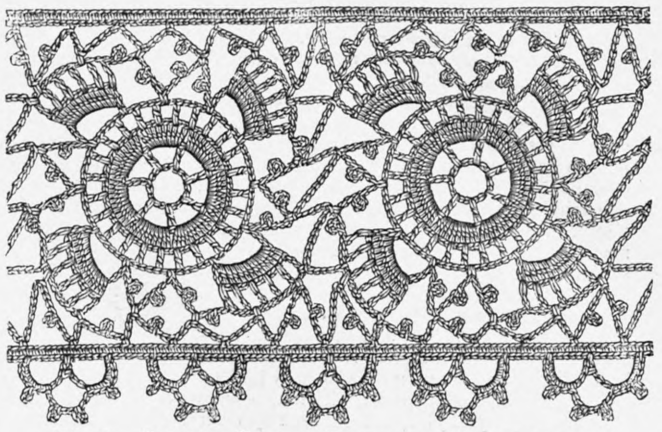

Fig. 2.—CROCHET GUIPURE EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

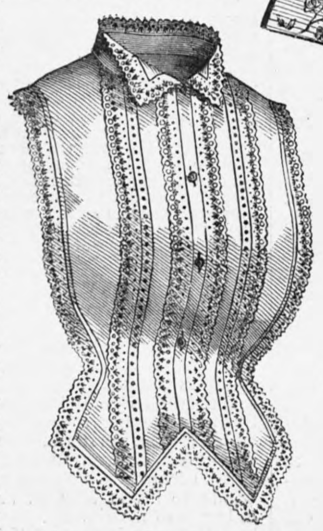
Crochet Guipure Edgings, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE edgings are suitable for trimming covers, négligé articles, linen, etc., according to the size of the thread or cotton with which they are worked. When worked with black silk they may be used for trimming dresses, wrappings, etc.

For the edging Fig. 1 first work the rosettes of each scallop separately, in rounds going back and forth, as follows: Begin from the middle with a foundation of 10 ch. (chain stitch), and passing over the last of these work the 1st round.—2 sl. (slip stitch) on the next, 2 sc. (single crochet) on the following foundation st. (stitch), 2 sdc. (short double crochet) on the next, 1 sdc. and 1 dc. (double crochet) on the following foundation st., 2 dc. on each of the following 2 foundation st., 1 dc. and 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the next, 2 stc. on each of the remaining 2 foundation st. 2d round.—T. (turn the work), 4 ch., 3 sc. on the next 3 st.; in working the sc. of this round always insert the needle in the front lower vein of the stitches of the preceding round; 1 p. (picot—that is, 4 ch. and 1 sl. on the front vertical vein of the last sc.); three times alternately 3 sc. on the next 3 st., 1 p.; 6 sc. on the next 6 st. 3d round.—T., 5 ch., 1 dc. on the sixth following st. of the first round (always inserting the needle in the upper free vein of the st.); three times alternately 3 ch., 1 dc. on the second following st. of the first round. 4th round.—Like the second round. At the end of this round fasten to the last (the 10th) foundation st. which was passed over in the beginning of the first round with 1 sl. Repeat these four rounds four times more; in repeating every first round the st. should, of course, be crocheted on the veins of the round before the last. To close the rosette join the foundation st. with the corresponding st. of the round before the last by means of sl. Now surround the rosette with the following two rounds: 1st round.—1 sc. on the p. at the point of one rib of the rosette, * 2 ch., 1 p. downward (to do this crochet 4 ch., drop the last ch. from the needle, insert the needle in the first of the 4 ch., and draw through the dropped st.), 1 ch., 1 p. upward (that is, 4 ch. and 1 sl. on the first of these), 1 ch., 1 p. downward, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the p. at the point of the next rib; repeat from *, always going forward; finally, 1 sl. on the sc. of this round, and 3 sl. on the next 3 st. 2d round.—2 sc. separated by 9 ch. at both sides of the middle p. of this ch. scallop, * 3 ch., 1 p. upward, 3 ch., 2 sc. separated by 9 ch. at both sides of the middle p. of the next ch. scallop; repeat from *, always going forward, at the same time fastening the rosettes together, as shown by the illustration, by means of 2 ch. scallops; finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round, and fasten the thread. The outer edge of the edging consists of one round of points, for which work, observing the illustration, * 1 sc. on the next corresponding p. of the second round, one point consisting of 4 ch., 1 sdc. on the second and 2 dc. on the first of the 4 ch., one point like the preceding, 1 sc. on the middle of the next 9 ch., two points; repeat from *; in the hollow between two scallops crochet as shown by the illustration. For the upper edge of the edging crochet four rounds as follows: 1st round.—3 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the next 9 ch. of a rosette (see illustration), 3 ch., fasten to the first of the preceding 3 ch. (to do this drop the last st. from the needle, insert the needle in the corresponding st., and draw through the dropped st.), * then work 3 ch., 1 p. downward, 1 ch., 1 p. downward, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the next 9 ch., 3 ch., 1 p. downward, 1 ch., 1 p. downward, 6 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the next 9 ch., 3 ch., fasten to the fourth of the 6 ch., 3 ch., 1 p. downward, 2 ch., 1 p. downward, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. before the next free p. of the rosette, 1 ch., fasten to the fourth of the 5 ch., 8 ch., fasten to the fourth of these, 5 ch., fasten to the ch. before the last p. downward, 3 ch., 1 p. downward, 6 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the loop consisting of 5 ch., 2 ch., fasten to the fourth of the 6 ch., 3 ch., 1 p. downward, 9 ch., 1 sc. on the same st. of the loop on which the preceding sc. was worked, 2 ch., fasten to the seventh of the 9 ch., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. after the first free p. of the next rosette; then 5 ch., 1 p. downward, 1 ch., fasten to the third of the 9 ch., 1 ch., 1 p. downward, 6 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the next 9 ch. of the rosette, 2 ch., fasten to the fourth of the 6 ch., and repeat from *. Work the 2d round, observing the illustration, all in sc., the 3d round in dc. and ch., and the 4th round all in sc. also.

For the edging Fig. 2, which may also be used for insertion, omitting the points on the outer edge, work the middle rosette - shaped parts separately, each in 4 rounds, as follows: Begin from the middle with a foundation of 12 ch., close it in a ring with 1 sl., and crochet the 1st round.—3 ch., which count as first dc. (work the first dc. in the following 2 rounds in a similar manner), six times alternately 5 ch., 1 dc. on the ring; then 5 ch. and 1 sl. on the last of the 3 ch. which count as first dc. 2d round.—10 dc. on each ch. scallop of the preceding round; at the end of the round work 1 sl. on the last of the 3 ch. which count as first dc. 3d round.—Always alternately 1 dc. on the next st., 2 ch., with



LINEN AND NEEDLE-WORK CHEMISETTE AND COLLAR.
For description see Supplement.

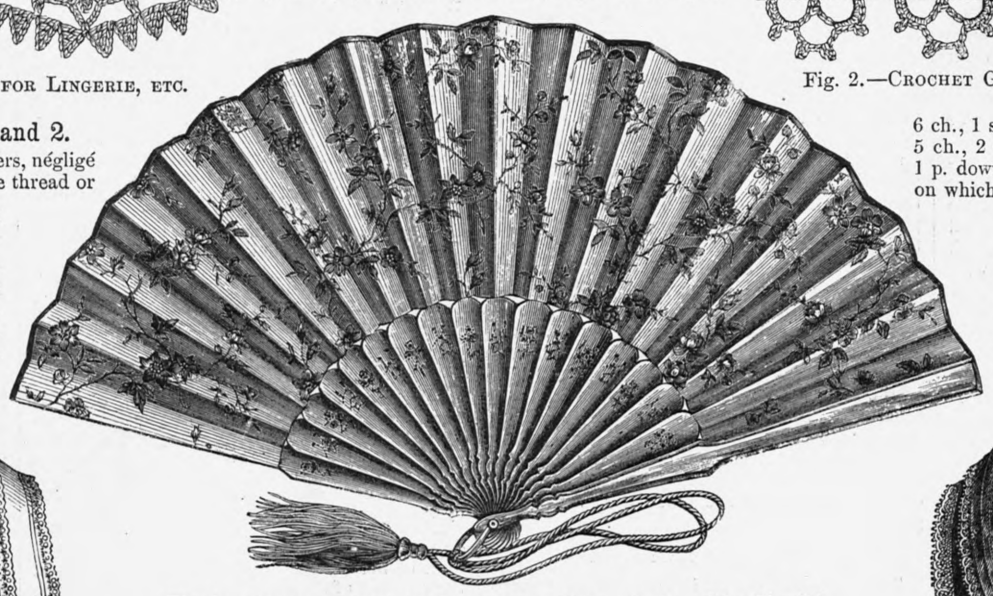


Fig. 1.—PRINTED PERCALE PROMENADE FAN.—OPEN.—[See Fig. 2.]
For description see Supplement.

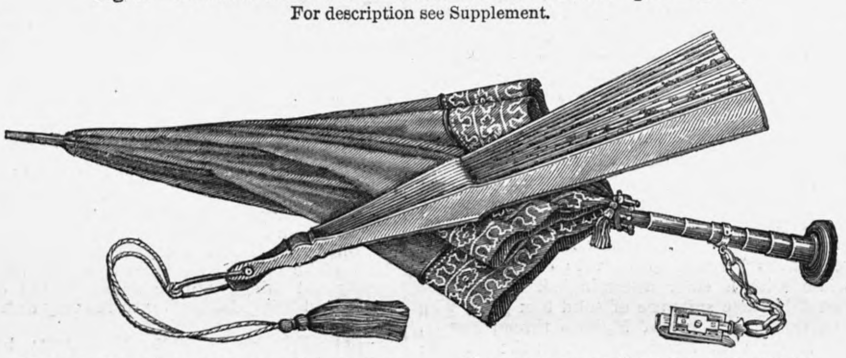

Fig. 2.—PRINTED PERCALE PROMENADE FAN.—CLOSED.—[See Fig. 1.]
For description see Supplement.

GROS GRAIN, INSERTION, AND LACE FICHU-COLLAR.
For description see Supplement.

PARASOL WITH CHAIN TO BE WORN AT THE BELT.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—WATER-PROOF CLOAK.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1, Page 277.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 37-41.

Fig. 1.—WATER-PROOF CLOAK.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2, Page 277.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 42 50.

Digitized by Google

the latter always pass over 2, and at the end of the round only 1 st. Finally, 1 sl. on the first dc. consisting of 3 ch. 4th round.—8 ch., t., 1 sc. on the second following ch. scallop, * 3 ch., t., 14 dc. on the scallop of 8 ch. just formed, 4 ch., t., going back on the 14 dc., work 1 dc. on each third following dc., after each of the first 4 dc. work 2 ch.; then work 1 ch., 1 p. (always 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first ch.), 2 ch., 1 p., 1 ch.; 1 sc. on the second following ch. scallop of the preceding round, 1 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 p., 1 ch.; 2 sc. separated by 8 ch. on every second following ch. scallop of the preceding round, and repeat from *, always going forward. Having worked the requisite number of rosettes in this manner, crochet for the upper edge of the edging a ch. foundation of the requisite length; on this foundation work one round of sc., and then one round, by means of which the rosettes are fastened on at the same time, as follows: 1 sc. on the next sc. of the edge, 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. between the 2 dc. before the last of the first scallop of a rosette consisting of close and open-work dc., * 5 ch., 1 sc. on the eighth sc. of the edge, thus passing over 7 sc.; 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. between the two picots of the next ch. scallop of the rosette; 5 ch., 1 sc. on the eighth sc. of the edge; 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch. scallop of the rosette; 5 ch., 1 sc. on the eighth sc. of the edge; 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. between the first 2 dc. of the next dc. scallop of the rosette; 5 ch., 1 sc. on the eighth sc. of the edge; 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. between the 2 dc. before the last in the same dc. scallop; 5 ch., 1 sc. on the eighth sc. of the edge; 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. between the 2 dc. before the last of the first dc. scallop of a following rosette; repeat from *. Every two rosettes side by side are also joined, crosswise, by means of ch. and p. scallops. To do this crochet 1 sc. on the scallop between two rosettes, consisting only of 5 ch., in the preceding round, 5 ch., 1 sc. between the middle 2 dc. of the

Fig. 2.—WATER-PROOF CLOAK.—FRONT.
[See Fig. 1, Page 276.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 42-50.

BROWN PONGEE OVER-SKIRT AND PALETOT IN TWO SHADES.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 8-20.

Fig. 1.—WATER-PROOF CLOAK.—BACK.
[See Fig. 2, Page 276.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 37-41.

Fig. 1.—FLANNEL WRAPPER.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—VIGOGNE WRAPPER.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—IRISH POPLIN WRAPPER.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-7.

FIGS. 1-3.—LADIES' WRAPPERS.

Hosted by Google

dc. scallop of the second rosette; 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. between the last 2 dc. of the next dc. scallop of the first rosette; 5 ch., 1 sc. between the first 2 dc. of the next dc. scallop of the second rosette; 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop of the first rosette; 5 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop of the second rosette; 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch. scallop of the first rosette; 5 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch. scallop of the second rosette; 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. between the first 2 dc. of the next dc. scallop of the first rosette; 5 ch., 1 sc. between the 2 dc. before the last of the next dc. scallop of the second rosette. Fasten the thread. Next work three rounds for the under edge of the edging. 1st round.—1 sc. between the 2 dc. before the last on the next free dc. scallop of the first rosette, * 2 ch., 1 p. downward, 7 ch., 1 sc. between the first 2 dc. of the same dc. scallop; 2 ch., 1 p. downward, 7 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop of the rosette, 2 ch., 1 p. upward, 7 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch. scallop; 2 ch., 1 p. upward, 7 ch., 1 sc. between the 2 dc. before the last in the next dc. scallop of the rosette; 2 ch., 1 p. downward, 7 ch., 1 sc. between the first 2 dc. of the same dc. scallop; 2 ch., 1 p. downward, 7 ch., 1 sc. between the 2 dc. before the last in the next dc. scallop of the following rosette; repeat from . 2d round.—Work 1 sc. on each ch. scallop of the preceding round, as shown by the illustration, and after each sc. work 7 ch. 3d round.— 12 sc. on the next 12 st., 5 ch., t., 1 sc. on the eighth of the 12 sc., 5 ch., 1 sc. on the third of the 12 sc., t., 5 sc., 1 p., 3 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 2 ch., 2 p. separated by 1 ch., 2 ch.; then 3 sc., 1 p., 5 sc. on the following ch. scallop, and repeat from *.

APRIL.

Ev'ry where, ev'ry where, spring-time is breathing
Fragrance and beauty to gladden the earth;
Garlands of daisies the young hands are wreathing,
'Mid glintings of sunshine and pealings of mirth.
Wild flowers choice and fair,
Blossoms from every where,
Blooming on hill-top, adorning each bough;
Primrose and snowdrop white,
Bluebells and roses bright,
Weave them—'tis only life's dreaming time now.

Waking time comes too soon, bringing us sorrow,
Sadd'ning the tints of your rose-colored sky,
Paling the brightness of earth's golden morrow
With the gloomy forebodings o'erclouding "good-by."
Weave, then, your garlands fair;
Spring-time is every where,
Smiling on mountain and valley and dell;
Summer will soon be here;
Autumn winds too are drear:
Weave, then, your garlands ere spring says farewell!

WIDOW M'BRIDE.

FARMER PRINDLE was a widower. He lived all alone in the old farm-house that had been his father's and his grandfather's before him, and how he lived there nobody knew. Farmer Prindle was not hospitable: since his wife had died—five years come next November—not a human soul or body had been allowed to enter the house of mourning. But if he was not hospitable, he was very sociable; not because he cared much for the society of his fellow-creatures, but because he wanted to grumble; and, as every one knows, good grumbling requires company.

Every pleasant evening Farmer Prindle visited some of his neighbors, and favored them with his views of life. These views were gloomy in nature and stern in expression. He could take up any bright subject and blacken it with one look. Sunshine was a delusion and a snare; flowers were an emblem of man's frailty; and a baby was a poor unfortunate little sinner, who didn't know what was before him.

True as were these remarks, they were not encouraging, and his neighbors got a little tired of his philosophy.

"You had better get married again; it will cheer you up a little," suggested a kind, motherly woman.

Farmer Prindle shook his head disconsolately. "No, I'll never do that. I have had one good wife, and that's enough for me. Marriage ain't such a cheerful state, either, when you look at it seriously. And if it wasn't cheerful with the best of women, as my Lizzie was, what would it be with one as wasn't so good? Answer me that, Mrs. Crane."

It was a difficult question to answer logically. But Mrs. Crane was ignorant of logic. "It is kind of lonesome for a man to be all alone in a rambling old house," she said, pityingly. "And the Bible says so too, you know," she added, trying to fortify her position.

Farmer Prindle smiled grimly. "Maybe so. But it is better to be lonesome than pestered, and there ain't a woman round here as is worthy to tie on my Lizzie's shoes, anyhow."

"I don't know," said Mrs. Crane. "There's Widow M'Bride; she is a nice, smart little body, and—"

"Widow M'Bride! she! I wouldn't have her for her weight in gold!" thundered Farmer Prindle.

"I ain't so sure as she would have you, either; there's plenty after her quite as good as you be."

"Widow M'Bride!" repeated the farmer. "To think of her comparing herself to my Lizzie! That beats all I ever heard in my life."

The truth was that it didn't "beat" any thing, for Widow M'Bride had never dreamed of comparing herself to his Lizzie. Had she done so, the comparison would have been entirely to her own advantage. Mrs. Prindle was tall, thin, sad, and meek almost to insanity. Mrs. M'Bride was short, plump, and jolly almost to levity, and had, besides, a very pretty will of her own. She had been a widow ten years, and during this period she had allowed several devoted suitors to console her and to lead her almost to the brink of matrimony. But having reached that point, she had always retreated, remembering, just in time, that "her heart was buried in the grave of John M'Bride."

The literal truth of this assertion need not be discussed here; a strict adherence to facts will be sufficient. And the facts were, that Mrs. M'Bride liked to be consoled; that she was rich, and liked to spend her money herself; that mourning was extremely becoming to her; and finally, that she considered herself young enough to wait and choose, being, as she affirmed, "between thirty and forty."

By marrying again she would have deprived herself of consolation, and would have been obliged to give up that bewitching widow's cap. "And I will never do that, never!" Thus vowed Widow M'Bride in her sorrow.

But Farmer Prindle was ignorant of that vow, and in his ignorance he grew wrathy as he thought of the pretty widow, and as he passed her house that night he silently called her by a peculiar name that would rhyme very well with "evil" in poetry, but can not be mentioned in prose. Having thus relieved his mind, and made room for pleasanter thoughts, he paid a tribute to his wife's virtues, and remembered all she had done, without the least reference to what she had left undone.

Yet, alas! it must be confessed that during Mrs. Prindle's lifetime what she had left undone had been uppermost in her lord's mind, and not in his mind only, but also in his heart and in his speech. Hard work, sour looks, unkind words, had been her earthly portion, and she had carried into practice her husband's theory that "this world is a vale of tears."

Mr. Prindle was not a bad man, and his wife was "the best of women," as he was in the habit of saying. Why, then, had they not been happy together? Because Mr. Prindle had made a great mistake: not being himself the best of men, the best of women had been too much for him. Her meekness had made him hard, her obedience had made him impatient, and her tears had made him angry.

"And if it was so with her, what would it be with another?" he asked himself, solemnly. "No, no! no Widow M'Bride for me!" Perhaps he was right. But why he so fervently objected to the widow remains an open question; for he met her but seldom, and on these occasions she did not pay the least attention to him, nor had she at any time annoyed or molested him by her smiles.

It so happened that, the very next day, Mrs. Crane, wishing to make griddle-cakes for supper, went to Mrs. M'Bride's to borrow some buttermilk, "if so be she had any to spare."

It so was that Mrs. M'Bride could spare some, and welcome. Then Mrs. Crane sat down to have a talk, a thing which most women can always "spare"—and welcome too.

Having mentioned this, that, and the other, they finally alighted upon Mr. Prindle's devoted head.

"How would you like him for a husband?" asked Mrs. Crane.

"Me? that old man!" laughed Widow M'Bride.

"He ain't so old, either; he ain't turned fifty yet; and he has got a nice place, and no children, nor nothing to bother."

"That's true; but somehow I don't fancy him; he is a hard man. And then there's so much work to be done on a farm."

"I guess there's no more work any where than a woman has a mind to do. You would know how to manage him, and get along with him. All men are hard enough, for that matter; yet it is kind of nice to have one in the house."

"But, my dear Mrs. Crane, I don't want a man in my house. I hate men!"

"Maggie M'Bride! And you a-flirting like mad!"

"I never flirt," said the widow, with awful dignity. "You know I don't; and I in my weeds yet! And as for Mr. Prindle—I wouldn't have him for his weight in gold."

"Them's the very words he said about you no later than last night," said Mrs. Crane, throwing prudence to the winds. "'Widow M'Bride!' said he, 'I wouldn't have her for her weight in gold.' Them's his very words, as true as I live."

"Good land! Did I ever?" exclaimed the widow. "No, I never did hear the like of that. Not want me! Did you ever! Well, I don't want him—wouldn't touch him with a pair of tongs! So we are even, you see."

Mrs. Crane departed, not entirely in peace. "I wish I hadn't said it," she thought. But she had said it, and it must remain said forever.

So thought Widow M'Bride, as she watched Mrs. Crane's retreating form. "You horrid creature! You won't come here again in a hurry. And as for that old man—I declare!" Then suddenly a smile shone in her black eyes, and spread all over her face, till she laughed aloud. "Yes, I will do it—see if I don't!" she said, shaking her plump little fist in the direction of Farmer Prindle's "place."

The next day, about noon, Mrs. M'Bride went to the bank with a fifty-dollar bill in her pocket. "Will you have the kindness to change this bill for me?" she asked Mr. Plum, in the most business-like manner.

"With the greatest pleasure," answered Mr. Plum. "How will you have it?"

"In fives and tens, if you please." And as she said so the widow looked up at him with a smile that was not at all business-like in itself, nor in its effect. Mr. Plum grew slightly rosy about the cheeks, and decidedly sweet about the eyes.

"It is a very pleasant day," he remarked. Then looking at the clock, and seeing that it wanted five minutes to twelve, he suddenly remembered that his landlady wished him to be punctual. "I believe I am going your way," he added, taking up his hat hurriedly, "and, if you will allow me—"

"Certainly," said Mrs. M'Bride. She knew as well as he did that Elm Street and Pine Street were as far apart as two streets can well be; nevertheless Mr. Plum's remark was perfectly true—he was going her way.

As good luck would have it, whom should they meet at the corner of Elm Street but that odious Mr. Prindle! At that moment Mrs. M'Bride was so deeply interested in Mr. Plum's conversation that she did not see Mr. Prindle. This made the farmer angry, for he had prepared his shortest nod and his sourest look for her special delectation, and he felt that he was defeated. Mrs. M'Bride felt that she was victorous so far, for she had prepared the meeting.

Arrived at her own gate, the widow said, gratefully, "I will not ask you to come in now, but I am always at home in the evening, and glad to see my friends."

Mr. Plum looked delighted, said he would be very happy, and actually took off his hat when he bowed himself away—an act of politeness seldom performed in Appletown, the creed of the Appletownians in this matter being that "a man is as good as a woman any day, and what was the use of bowing and scraping, any way? Why, it would wear out a hat in no time!" And when truth, reason, and economy combine to make things easy and comfortable, who would dare to complain?

Let no one take a wrong view of Widow M'Bride. As she had told Mrs. Crane, she never flirted—not consciously. Never in her life had she thrown a broadside glance at a man, or smiled at him too encouragingly. "Courting is men's work," she used to say. And there was something about her that helped men to do that work willingly, if not successfully.

With regard to young men, the fair widow considered herself in the light of a benevolent institution. In the evening her house was open to as many of them as chose to come to it, and she welcomed them cheerfully. It was one of her hospitable ways that, precisely at nine o'clock, tea was brought in, accompanied by golden wafers, brown crullers, and red-cheeked apples, which were partaken of in the most unceremonious manner. While they tasted the cup that cheers, stories, riddles, and witty anecdotes abounded; and how well the widow listened! how prettily she laughed!

Some of Mrs. M'Bride's female friends had remonstrated—as females friends will—but she had smiled at their wisdom. "Dear boys! they know I don't intend to marry them, and they feel perfectly safe. It only keeps them out of mischief." And that was why she called herself "the providence of young men."

Hitherto she had neglected Mr. Plum. He had lately come from a large town to fill the position of cashier in the Appletown bank, and it was said that "he didn't think much of country folks." To bashful young men Mrs. M'Bride was as tender as a mother; but pride was not to her taste, and she had been rather cool to Mr. Plum. However, at the beginning of her campaign he seemed to be exactly the man she needed to carry war into the enemy's camp.

Mr. Plum was in every thing the opposite of Farmer Prindle. He was a "city man," with city manners and language; he was handsome, too, with black eyes, black hair, and the blackest mustache in Appletown. It was not the style of beauty that Mrs. M'Bride admired; but then, as she said to herself, "that horrid old thing will think he is an Apollo."

Mrs. M'Bride was right there. The "horrid old thing," Peter Prindle by name, did think that Mr. Plum was "a handsome puppy—all hair and no brains." Mr. Prindle was rather bald, and prided himself on his brains; and immediately after that meeting on Elm Street he began to—despise Mr. Plum.

In a large town far away there lived a sweet little girl who honestly believed that Mr. Plum was "too good for this world," certainly too good for her; yet he had vowed that he loved her. But they were poor, and they must wait. While he waited Mr. Plum led a very endurable life, and once a week he wrote to his love, telling her how lonely he was without her. Mrs. M'Bride knew nothing of the little girl, but had she known, it would have made no difference in her plans, for she considered Mr. Plum much too young to fall in love with her.

This little war of the "weight in gold" began in May, and during the following summer Mr. Plum's devotion to Widow M'Bride was the general topic of conversation. "Did you ever!" said the women, forgetting what they had seen before. "She's hooked him!" said the men, with a knowing wink.

As for Mr. Prindle, he spent nearly all his evenings at Mrs. Crane's, smoking his pipe by the side of Mr. Crane, and freely expressing his disapprobation of Mrs. M'Bride's behavior. "It is a shame! and she that's old enough to be his mother! It is her money he is after."

He had said this so often that Mrs. Crane got tired of it at last; and as she had made up her little quarrel with the widow, she determined to stand up for her friend.

"And why should it be for her money?" she asked. "She is good enough for any man; and as long as you don't want her yourself, why don't you let her alone?"

"Of course I don't want her," growled the farmer.

"Oh, you needn't be afraid; she wouldn't have you if you wanted her. When I told her what you said about it—"

Then Farmer Prindle got up, and standing in the middle of the room, he forgot his mother's teachings, and—uttered profane language! after which he went away without saying good-night, and did not return for several weeks.

"And he was as mad as can be!" said Mrs. Crane to the widow, when she related that little incident to her.

"Men are so foolish," said Mrs. M'Bride, complacently.

Accidents will happen, and an accident happened to Mr. Prindle: he was invited to a tea-party.

"I won't go," he said to himself. "Yes, I will, too. Why shouldn't I? I ain't afraid of her, if she does know. I meant what I said, every word of it!"

So Mr. Prindle adorned himself and went. He looked very well in his black coat and clean shirt, but he did not know it. In the matter of good looks men are either too vain or too modest, and Mr. Prindle was a too modest man.

Widow M'Bride was there in her prettiest "weeds," looking like a full-blown rose in a bed of autumn flowers, for this was a middle-aged tea-party, and she was the youngest woman in the room. She had made herself agreeable to the ladies, as she always did; but when the gentlemen came in she felt relieved, and soon proposed a walk in the garden.

The proposition was accepted, and, by some fateful chance, Mr. Prindle found himself walking by the widow's side. At first he felt rather sheepish. Although he had meant what he had said, "every word of it," he could not help wishing he had not said it. Was she angry? he wondered.

Angry? No summer sky could be more softly serene than the widow's fair brow, crowned by the little white cloud she called her "widow's cap." "I suppose you have a great many flowers in your garden," she said, mildly.

"No; I don't care much for flowers," said Mr. Prindle.

"Don't you? I love them; I couldn't live in the country if it was not for flowers and trees and birds."

"Farm-work wouldn't suit your taste, I guess."

"Not at all; I should hate it so! It would make my hands so hard and brown." And she gazed at two white hands, on which dimples had taken the place of "knuckles."

Mr. Prindle looked at the hands too. "It would be a pity to spoil them by useful work, wouldn't it?" he said, not amiably.

"I think it would. A lady must have white hands, you know."

"And yet," said Mr. Prindle, speaking almost angrily, "I knew a woman, the best of women, who was as good as any lady in the land, if she did milk the cows and make her own butter and cheese. She didn't think of her hands!"

"She must have been a saint," said the widow, softly. "I hope she got her reward in this world. I am not like her."

"No, I shouldn't think you was! Farm life wouldn't suit you, would it?" said Mr. Prindle, revengefully.

"No indeed! If I had my choice I would live in New York, or Paris, or London," said Mrs. M'Bride, trying to remember which was the largest city in the world.

"Well, I think you have had your choice, as far as a city man goes. Allow me to congratulate you, Mrs. M'Bride."

"Congratulate me! Upon what, Mr. Prindle?"

"People say Mr. Plum is to be the happy man."

"The happy man? Oh, I see what you mean! I hope he will be happy, but not as people say."

"And why not? If I may ask."

"Oh yes, you may ask; it is no secret. Because, Mr. Prindle, I never intend to marry again. Never! Not if the Emperor of China himself should ask me!"

We all nurse an ideal of some sort. It appears that Mrs. M'Bride's ideal was the Emperor of China; and considering how impossible it was for that gentleman ever to fall in love with her, she might have been pardoned for confessing her weakness.

But Mr. Prindle was not in a forgiving mood. "You would make a fine empress, wouldn't you?" he said, scornfully.

Fortunately tea was ready. The guests were called in, and Mr. Prindle was directed to sit next to Mrs. M'Bride. He tried to think that he disliked that arrangement, and yet he felt that he liked it better than any other.

Mrs. M'Bride was as gracious as an empress, and strictly agricultural in her conversation. She was very fond of apples—of brown russets especially—and her apple-trees were not doing well; she was thinking of having some of them grafted. Did Mr. Prindle know how it was to be done?

Mr. Prindle kindly told her all he knew about grafting, and still more kindly offered to come and look at the trees.

When it was time to go home, Mr. Prindle, to his profound astonishment, heard himself offering to escort Mrs. M'Bride. The lady was so used to being escorted that she was not astonished in the least, but having to "hold up her dress," she declined Mr. Prindle's arm, and trotted independently by his side, chatting merrily as she went.

"What a cheerful little thing she is!" thought Mr. Prindle, "and so pretty too! She ain't so old, either—not near so old as my—" Then he stopped, and called himself "a fool," and Mrs. Crane an old—something else.

The next day he came to look at Mrs. M'Bride's apple-trees, and was politely received, but not asked into the house, the widow having met him at the gate. But these trees must have been very interesting trees, for he came several times to look at them. At the end of a month his perseverance was rewarded by a general invitation to "come in any time." And remembering that Mrs. M'Bride was one of his neighbors, Mr. Prindle called upon her once in a while. Gradually she seemed to be the only neighbor he had, for he came almost every evening, and never grumbled while he was there: so it must have improved his temper.

Digitized by Google

One thing amused and puzzled the widow—so she said—and that was that brown russets rained anonymously into her house. "And they are so nice! I wonder who sends them?" Whoever sent them would have been rewarded by seeing the widow's white teeth bite into them. "Don't eat too many of them, boys," she would say; "the red apples are just as good. These are mine, you know."

The merry month of May had returned. Looking out of her window one afternoon, Mrs. M'Bride beheld Farmer Prindle coming toward her house, dressed in his very best black suit. And as she looked she blushed, and her eyes sparkled.

The blush and the sparkle had both disappeared, however, when she greeted Mr. Prindle and invited him to sit down.

"No, thank you, standing will do as well. I will come to the point at once: Mrs. M'Bride, will you have me?"

"Dear me! No, indeed; I won't have any body."

"Don't say no without thinking. I am dreadfully in earnest about it—as you would know if you knew all."

"Then, Mr. Prindle, I am very sorry, but—I won't have you."

"Why not? Because of what I said?"

"Oh no, I didn't mind that in the least. But there are reasons—"

"What reasons? Tell me."

"In the first place, you don't love me."

"Don't I?"

"You didn't say so."

"No, nor I won't say it, because you know it."

"That is not the way, Mr. Prindle."

"It is my way, and I can't change it. Will you think about it?"

"No; it would be no use. I can not give up my weeds."

"Weeds? What weeds?"

"I mean my widow's cap. I will wear it till I die."

"Not if you are my wife, I can tell you."

"But I don't want to be your wife. Good-by, Mr. Prindle."

"Good-by. But I don't give it up; I will ask you again," said Mr. Prindle. And he may not have been far from the truth when he had called himself a fool.

Precisely a week from that day Mr. Prindle came again. "You may wear the cap if you like," he said, meekly.

"Thank you. But you are wasting your time. Please don't think any more about it."

Another week passed. "Will he come?" wondered the widow.

He came. "Now, Maggie, this is the last time. 'Three times and out,' you know. What shall it be—yes or no?"

"No, most decidedly!" said the obdurate widow.

"Not if I say I love you, as I didn't think I could love?"

"Not if you say any thing. I won't do it. There!"

"Then I must leave the place. I couldn't live here after this."

"And what would the farm do without you?"

"I will sell it. I don't mind that."

"Take my advice, Mr. Prindle, and don't do any thing foolish. Go away for a little while, if you like, then come back and be friends."

But Mr. Prindle wouldn't take the widow's advice, and he would do something foolish. So he went away, and for a whole month no one knew what had become of him.

Mrs. M'Bride spent that time in several frames of mind. She was glad, and she was sorry; it was a great pity, and yet it was very silly. She really missed Mr. Prindle, and she felt sorry for him. "But then I couldn't do it—the idea!"

About this time another idea dawned upon the widow's mind, and that idea was—Mr. Plum. She had been so accustomed to deal with young men on philanthropic principles that she was slow to admit the possibility of "such a dreadful thing." Yet if a man's eyes mean any thing when they look unutterable things, then Mr. Plum's eyes meant precisely "such a dreadful thing."

Mrs. M'Bride felt that an evil day was coming, and that she was powerless to ward it off. Coolness did not cool Mr. Plum, and she certainly could not "speak first." Then came the bitter thought, "It is my money he wants!" whereas she well knew that Mr. Prindle's love had nothing to do with her money.

Yes, it was her money Mr. Plum wanted; but he was perfectly willing to take her with it. He had reflected much on the subject. On one side was love and a salary of six hundred dollars—a small fence to keep off the wolf from the door. On the other side was Mrs. M'Bride and—well, why not?

It was to have this question answered that he came one evening. The widow was alone, and Mr. Plum, taking the tide of his affairs at the flood, rushed at once into melting eloquence. But Fortune refused to smile upon him. Mr. Plum persevered; he stated his case—part of it—in glowing language; all in vain. Then Mr. Plum forgot his manners, and asked "why had he been led on to hope?"

Poor sinful little widow! she had a hard time of it. But she stood firm, and explained matters very clearly—also in part. She was just in the middle of her closing argument when the door-bell rang with a peal that startled her. A sudden conviction flashed into her mind that Mr. Prindle had returned, and was waiting at her door. Not for the world would she be found by him alone with that angry, red-faced man!

With the energy of despair she turned to Mr. Plum and whispered, "You must go away—at once." She led him through the sitting-room into the kitchen, opened the door, and locked it after him. Then she went to the front-door.

No Mr. Prindle was there; only a boy with a yellow letter in his hand. "It is a dispatch for you, ma'am," he said.

Mrs. M'Bride took it. Who was it from? Had any thing happened to any body? And with trembling fingers she opened the envelope.

It was only a business communication, after all:

"I have a good offer for my farm. Shall I sell or keep? [Signed] PETER PRINDLE."

Bridget knocked at the kitchen door just then, and Mrs. M'Bride let her in. She was retreating to the parlor, when she saw her dispatch lying on the floor; she picked it up, and sitting down by her little table, she read it again. This time it began with "Dear James." "What!" said Mrs. M'Bride; and opening her eyes wider, she perceived she was holding a letter written by some woman to whom "James" was very dear.

"Poor little thing!" she said, not meaning dear James. "Ah, these men!"

Early the next morning Widow M'Bride took a walk. She went to the post-office and dropped a letter in the box. Then she went to the telegraph-office and sent the first message of the day.

The letter was addressed to Mr. James Plum, and contained only the sweet little missive.

The message was addressed to Mr. Peter Prindle, and contained only one word: "Keep."

And Mr. Prindle kept, from that day forward, for better and for worse.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The Government Crisis.—Mr. Lowe's Epigram.—A mysterious taking off.—Links with the Past.

THE political air of late has been heavy with rumor—the fogs that come of fogydom—as to what ministry we were to have, and for how long; but in the end Gladstone has resumed the management of the Theatre Royal, St. Stephen's, with precisely the same company as before, and for an indefinite period. In the mean time the opposition chief has been favoring Parliament with his views of "the crisis," as a government embarrassment is always called. He is ever greatest (and longest) when discussing some question of Parliamentary precedent, political technicality, or question of etiquette, and the House of Commons enjoys it, just as a debating society enjoys a personal squabble among its own members infinitely more than the discussion of the most important subject under heaven. In Disraeli's own novels you may read (if you can) the feverish interest which every body takes in a change of leadership in "the House;" but outside his novels and "the House" there is not really much interest taken in the matter. It is felt that whoever "comes in," the great measures that have been passed of late years by the liberals are safe, and that no attempt will be made to rescind them; and since the Tories have really no programme—no "platform" as you call it—it is quite as well that their leader should make as much as possible of "what her Majesty did me the honor to observe with respect to the formation of a cabinet," in place of telling us what he meant to do had he formed it. As a Parliamentary speaker Disraeli is still popular; he is also generally a personal favorite; but as a statesman he is absolutely "played out." Last week I gave you a list of four great things that Gladstone had done in his time. Looking back at his rival's political career, one sees absolutely nothing accomplished but the Reform bill that he stole almost verbatim from John Bright. In what "the wise do call convey" he is indeed not so much an adept as an audacious expert. No man has probably ever taken so many ideas from others without acknowledgment as our Benjamin. His gorgeous speech upon the death of the Duke of Wellington was stolen, word for word, from a funeral eulogium upon a French marshal. The most quoted phrase in his Lothair, in which he describes the Hansom cab as "the gondola of London," was cribbed bodily out of another man's novel not five years old. Perhaps he thinks, as in the case of Shakspeare, that genius sanctifies the use of other people's thoughts, and makes them his own. It is an immense advantage to such a man to be at the head of what John Stuart Mill calls "the stupid party," who can not discover these little flaws for themselves, and when they are pointed out by others, set them down as inventions of the enemy.

When any thing really good is said by any Free Lance employed by "the gentlemanly interest," we may be sure the most is made of it, which makes it the more surprising that even its political organs are almost invariably dull. It was supposed at one time that "Providence was on the side of the Tories," but certainly Wit has never been so, from which circumstance it arises, perhaps, that they are rather apt to call it wicked. Last week, however, in Judy (the Tory Punch) there appeared, on the fall of the government, a good epitaph on our Minister of Finance:

"Here lie the bones of Robert Lowe;
Whither he's gone I do not know:
If to the realms of peace and love,
Farewell to happiness above;
If to a place of lower level,
I don't congratulate the devil."

Now, instead of condemning this as a wicked slander, "Bob Lowe," as he is called by the public (not so much for love as for shortness), has himself rendered this into Latin. He is one of our best classical scholars, you know, though he sees the absurdity of a classical education for every body, and, "like another Philippe Egalité, goes about the country denouncing the arts by which he rose."

"Istâ continentur fossâ
Humilis Roberti ossa:
Si ad cœlum evolabit,
De concordiâ nil restabit;
Si in inferis jacebit,
Diabolum ejus pœnitebit."

This is surely a very graceful revenge to take, and would really seem to show, in the words of the Latin grammar, that the study of the classics "softens one's manners and prevents them from being ferocious," or rather, perhaps I should say, it shows the advantage of "a liberal education."

I heard another epitaph the other day, which, without being quite so classical, is even more amusing:

"Here lies the body of Sarah Crowder,
Who died through taking a Seidlitz powder;
She would not have gone to her heavenly rest
Had she waited till it had effervesced."

An occurrence happened last week in London which at one time threatened to become a second Bauer mystery. A solicitor in the country came to town to transact some business, and put up at a hotel. In the evening he went to the theatre, and did not return; but after a day or two his wife and family received letters from him to say that he had been "kidnapped on leaving the play, and was confined in a loathsome den," the locality of which he could not describe beyond stating that it was "within hearing of the steamboats and the under-ground railway," and consequently near the Thames Embankment. After no long time, however, he reappeared at home, stripped of his cash, and deprived of the most valuable contents of his portmanteau, but mysteriously silent as to the "loathsome den." The public are a little suspicious about his statements, being naturally slow to believe that any taste for thieving, however morbid, would induce folks to steal a solicitor, since they could not reasonably have expected a reward to be offered for his restitution. My own private impression is that the gentleman was not in a "loathsome den" at all, but in some company very much to his own liking, and that he did not intend the explanation made to the wife of his bosom to be made public. I would certainly rather believe that than credit the gentleman's strange story. Since folks that are reckless enough to kidnap a solicitor are just as likely to steal an author, would the crime be headed "Personal Plagiarism," I wonder? And a very great blow would it be to you, Mr. Editor, to hear that there would be no more "gossip" at present from yours truly, because he was confined in a "loathsome den." On the other hand, it is true, you might cruelly remark, "But how much more interesting you would be in print, Mr. K., when you emerged from it!"

It has often been remarked by travelers that the world is, after all, but a small affair; and every now and then it is made manifest that the time it has lasted—that is, the historical time—is but a short period. Generation, indeed, succeeds generation pretty rapidly, in a general way; but half a dozen Methuselahs would see them all out. For instance: the death was announced last Tuesday of Lady Acton, the grandmother of the present lord of that name, and the widow of a Sir John Acton who was born in 1736—one hundred and thirty-seven years ago! How old her ladyship herself was is not stated; but what a strong and immediate link with the past is broken by her decease! Yet even this dive into the past is outdone for depth by the following curious example of longevity:

The vicar of Pershore, on the Thames, states that there is an old man in his parish who can remember his grandmother who was born in 1697. She died in 1796, and he was born in 1792. "It is possible, therefore," remarks the rector, "that he might have heard from his grandmother a description of the personal appearance of William III." That is as much as to say that 166 years hence some ancient but intelligent inhabitant of New York might boast to your great-great-grandchild, Mr. Editor, that his grandmother had had a personal recollection (and I hope an agreeable one) of yours faithfully,

R. KEMBLE, of London.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CAMEO.—The symbolical language of gems is as follows: garnet, constancy and fidelity in all things; amethyst, a preservative against violent passions and drunkenness; blood-stone, courage and wisdom in perilous undertakings and firmness in affection; sapphire frees from enchantment, and denotes repentance and kindness of disposition; diamond expresses purity and integrity; emerald discovers false witnesses, and insures happiness in love and domestic felicity; agate makes its wearer invincible in all feats of strength, and insures long life, health, and prosperity; ruby discovers poison, and heals evils springing from the unkindness of friends; sardonyx insures conjugal felicity; chrysolite preserves from despair; opal denotes misfortune and hope; pearl signifies tears and pity; turquoise insures prosperity in love; and chrysoprase gives its wearer readiness of pen and fluency of speech. Each month is supposed to have a particular stone belonging to it, which governs it and influences the destiny of those born therein. Thus to January belong the garnet and jacinth; to February the amethyst; to March the blood-stone; to April the sapphire and diamond; to May the emerald; to June the agate and chalcedony; to July the ruby and onyx; to August the sardonyx and carnelian; to September the chrysolite; to October the opal and aqua marine; to November the topaz and pearl; and to December the turquoise, ruby, malachite, and chrysoprase.

INEXPERIENCE.—We have no cut paper patterns of short clothes, but can furnish Supplement papers containing them. It is the practice with most mothers to cut off long clothes to the right length, as they are usually made large enough for a six-months-old babe, and the part cut off makes another skirt for dress or petticoat.

DORA.—The model you mention is too elaborate for your gray and black striped Japanese silk, as the material does not wear well. Make a simple double-breasted redingote and ruffled skirt.

DESDEMONA.—The liquid you mention is said to be harmless by persons who profess to know its composition.

PANSY.—The sulphur-vapor bath is the most effective agent for removing wrinkles and freshening the skin. Try electricity after it.

MADGE.—Use carbolic-camphor soap and warm water every time you wash your face, to remove its roughness. Bathe often, and eat no fat food, but try oatmeal and cracked wheat for diet.

BUTTERCUP.—To improve your florid complexion bathe your face in water just as hot as you can bear it every day, take hot foot-baths, followed by a cool dip, and eat freely of oranges and other cooling fruits.

W. H.—The soda bath must be constantly repeated to keep bleached hair the color desired.

S. J. P.—All materials except cotton wash goods should be cut bias for narrow ruffles. Side pleating is pleats all turned one way. Put bias folds and side pleating on your brilliantine.

BETH R.—China crape costs as much as silk. A Swiss muslin over dress and flounces, or else a polonaise of black Spanish net, will be the most inexpensive to wear with a lavender silk.

A. F. R.—White ducking and white twilled linen sailor suits trimmed with bands and collars of blue linen will be worn by boys in summer. The twilled summer flannels of dark navy blue will not be too warm for your climate, as they were worn here all through last summer.

AN ADMIRER.—Grenadine trimmed with side pleating is suitable for mourning. Crape veils for bonnets are worn long, with a string in one end tied around the bonnet; square veils are on round hats. Mourning is worn for a father about two years. Make your tamise cloth with a double-breasted redingote, and put lengthwise folds down the front width with narrower rows of kilt pleating behind.

MISS M. G.—Trim your blue jacket with bias bands of the cloth piped on each side with lighter blue folds.

A. C. M.—Your subscription expired with Bazar No. 9, Vol. VI.

MRS. M. F. J.—Read about polonaises in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI.

G. A. L.—Buff, gray, and blue linen will be worn again, also thin linen batiste. Read hints about making in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 14, Vol. VI. Very small crinoline skirts are worn.

D. H. A.—Yak lace is used to trim silks and fine woolen goods like camel's-hair and cashmere, but is too expensive for low-priced empress cloth. We do not keep lace to sell.

EMMA.—Make your striped silk suit by tight basque pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI. Get a mantle made of black cashmere with inserted lace or passementerie.—We will send you an index on receipt of your address and postage stamp.

MRS. L. C. R.—Get gray cashmere faced with silk for a gentleman's dressing-gown.

JAS. H.—We can not furnish the pattern you want, and we do not reply by mail.

MRS. A. L.—Read about white dresses in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 16, Vol. VI. Swiss muslin washes better than organdy. Italian lace will cost from 25 to 50 cents a yard. Puffs look well if folded in the middle, ironed like a ruffle, and then opened out smoothly.

MISS L. C.—The Watteau wrapper pattern has been sent you. The money for "a yard of face curls" has been returned, as we do not make purchases for our readers.

LENA.—Guipure lace (or else fringe) with bias silk pipings or a band will trim your cashmere sacque prettily. Use the Sleeveless Jacket Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. VI., for your check silk. Get piqué, percale, and gray linen for girls' wash dresses. For church suit get a grenadine barége.

VINNIE.—The basque and upper and lower skirt patterns all together cost only 25 cents, and are not sold separately. Do not alter your piqué dress. The sleeves are in good shape, and braiding is becoming passée. Put ruffles of Hamburg embroidery on it with bands of insertion for heading.

IRIS.—Use the Highland Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 39, Vol. V., for your boy of two years. Make him white piqué and gray linen suits.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The revers are not lined. Two colors are used in suits. The sleeveless jacket suit pattern will make your eleven yards of gray goods available by combining with black.

MRS. A. E. T.—Your sample is too gay for city wear. Combine with another shade, and make a sleeveless jacket suit for afternoon and house dress.

COUNTRY COUSIN.—A black Spanish net or else grenadine polonaise will be stylish with your lavender and green silk skirt. Remodel the purple check by a sleeveless basque and over-skirt of solid purple.

MRS. A. R. W.—Drape your Marguerite polonaise as far back as possible, add square cuffs and pockets of silk, a belt and side sash, and have it fastened by large buttons.

A FOUR YEARS' SUBSCRIBER.—The cut paper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. VI., is what you need for a spring silk. Add flounces on the lower skirt if you choose.

M.—Black silks are seldom worn by widows of twelve months; but the plan you suggest is probably the best.

G. G.—A polonaise suit of mignonette or sage green tamise cloth will be pretty for a tall girl of fifteen. Gray, white, and colored polonaises over black skirts will be worn again. Dark blue tamise, foulard, and percale will be much worn by young girls.

A. B.—Knee-pantaloons, plain and buttoned above the knee or just below it, are more worn than knickerbockers by small boys.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Get light twilled cloth for your little girl's spring sacque, and make it short, double-breasted, and slashed. Make her white piqué dresses by the Princesse Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 25, Vol. V.; make her black alpaca with a sailor blouse, and have a square sailor collar, cuffs, pockets, sash, and folds of light blue cashmere.

F. L. E.—Full directions for arranging Sailor Blouse Suit are given in Bazar No. 13, Vol. VI. The sash is of the material with which the dress is trimmed.

INEXPERIENCE.—Get vigogne for traveling suit, also a linen polonaise. Blouse-waists will be worn again. Make your calicoes by the flounced wrapper pattern, and your percales with a loose-belted polonaise.

EDNA ST. E.—The bridal party stand facing the minister at the altar, with their backs to the congregation.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 1.—Embroidered Cashmere Mantelet.—Back.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern, design, and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 21 and 22.

Fig. 3.—Écru Ponge Dress and Gros Grain Mantelet.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—Embroidered Cashmere Mantelet.—Front.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern, design, and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 21 and 22.

Fig. 4.—Suit for Girl from 7 to 9 Years old.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 5.—Poult de Soie Walking Suit.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 6.—Toile de Soie Dress and Cashmere Mantelet.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 7.—Velvet Paletot.—Back. [See Fig. 8.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 23–29.

Fig. 8.—Velvet Paletot.—Front. [See Fig. 7.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 23–29.

Fig. 9.—Foulard Dress and Ladies'-cloth Paletot.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 17.—Green Cashmere Walking Suit.—Front.—[See Fig. 16.]
For pattern see description in Supplement.

Fig. 16.—Green Cashmere Walking Suit.—Back.—[See Fig. 17.]
For pattern see description in Supplement.

Fig. 18.—Camel's-hair Dress with Cashmere Mantelet.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 15.—Suit for Girl from 3 to 5 Years old.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 10.—Suit for Girl from 4 to 6 Years old.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 11.—Dress for Child under 1 Year old.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 12.—Poult de Soie Walking Suit.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 13.—Suit for Boy from 4 to 6 Years old.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 14.—Black Faille Walking Suit.
For description see Supplement.

Figs. 1–18.—LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SPRING AND SUMMER SUITS AND WRAPPINGS.

Hosted by Google

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE fashion seems well-nigh fixed for the coming summer. The wise party of eclecticism has prevailed, and in consequence there is room for all tastes. Those who choose can retain polonaises and over-skirts, while those who wish can free themselves from them. Liberty and inequality is the motto which fashion inscribes on her flag for 1873.

As I expected, demi-polonaises with long tabs in front and tight-fitting basques in the back are gaining many adherents, especially for light cotton fabrics, such as printed muslins and organdies. Suits of this kind are composed of a skirt, more or less flounced, the favorite style being a number of narrow flounces covering the back breadths from the bottom to the belt, and a demi-polonaise, adjusted in the front and back, and serving at once as waist and wrapping. To understand these demi-polonaises it is only necessary to fancy one of the large black silk mantillas that used to be worn twenty-five or thirty years ago, adjusted to the waist like a tight-fitting corsage. In this way a perplexing problem is solved with respect to the use of transparent figured goods. This same transparency is objectionable in double skirts, as the designs produce an inextricable confusion when placed one above another, which destroys all the effect, while a dress with a plain waist and single skirt, like that of a first communicant, is altogether too severe for the present fashion. These demi-polonaises, which are polonaises in front and basque-waists in the back, make a dressy costume which sets off the design.

The favorite wrapping, and one that will be universally worn for traveling and at the sea-side, and on the rainy days of summer, is a small mantelet, either of black or light gray cashmere; this accompanies all dresses, of whatever color or fabric, and is trimmed with woolen guipure of the same color as the mantelet. It is always fitted to the waist in the back by the aid of two ribbons, which are tied underneath. Many of these mantelets, which, by-the-way, have very short tabs in front, are furnished with a capuchin, or long and pointed hood.

One of the most universal fashions of the season will be black silk skirts, worn with polonaises, or basques and over-skirts, of every conceivable color and material. This combination, which our leaders of the ton have stamped with their approval, has the advantage of being both convenient and economical. Every lady has in her wardrobe a black silk skirt, or a dress from which the skirt can be detached, and there are few who have not in reserve a gored skirt of some other color or fabric such as has been worn during the last ten years, and which can be converted into an over-skirt with little expense.

The transparent silk fabrics, the appearance of which I mentioned in my last letter, have received another addition in the shape of a stuff with wide stripes of lace of the same color as the thick stripes. The effect is very beautiful. These fabrics are used for over-skirts and polonaises over a skirt of the same color (of plain silk or foulard), or a little darker shade, or else of black silk. The leaders of fashion propose to wear this summer, at the watering-places or their châteaux, white silk skirts under transparent polonaises or over-skirts of gray, bleu-ancien, rose-ancien, réséda, or mauve. But this will be a restricted style, which is not suited for Paris, or at least for our Paris pavements.

As a simple toilette, but in exquisite taste, I will cite a costume composed of a plain gros bleu foulard skirt, trimmed with a pleated flounce. Over-skirt and waist of gros bleu foulard, with large white dots. Mantelet of plain gros bleu foulard, with rather long rounded tabs, crossed in front and tied behind. Bonnet of gros bleu foulard, with large white dots, with revers of plain gros bleu velvet. The same combination in brown, green, or violet makes a very pretty traveling suit, to which is added a blue or brown water-proof, according to the color of the dress.

The lingerie in vogue, and which is universally worn, is represented by large fraises of ruched tulle. For summer they will be of ruched tarlatan, simply hemmed. The same ruches are worn at the wrists. They are clear, light, and very becoming to the face.

I must not omit to mention that for very hot weather, and with thin fabrics, scarfs of the same material will be worn. But these are no longer the straight scarfs of 1835; they are gathered perpendicularly in the middle of the back, beginning with the middle of the width of the scarf; this is fastened to the waist by cords or ribbons tied under the scarf; then several bows of ribbon to match are set on these perpendicular gathers, the lowest bow, or that nearest the belt, being furnished with two very long ends.

As to ribbons, those brocaded with large flowers of natural colors will be most worn for bonnets. The latter continue to expose the forehead, temples, ears, and nape of the neck, and are bonnets only in name. Straw or écru bonnets will be much in vogue. Écru is still in great favor for feminine apparel.

To be really in the fashion it is necessary to have a parasol and a fan to match every suit—that is, of the same material, the same color, and the same trimming. Both are suspended from the belt by chains and large hooks.

Striped fabrics of all kinds, cotton, wool, and silk, have long been in vogue; this summer they will be worn more than ever, but with a new trimming, which will give them quite an original and pretty effect. This is flounces pleated in such a manner that the stripe alone shows; that is, the stripe comes on the outside of the pleat, which is of exactly the same width as the pleat.

Bonnets are still edifices of which the wearer forms the pedestal: high, crenelated towers, which lack nothing but cannon to resemble the fortresses of the last century, church spires adorned with bouquets planted there by the workmen to show that their task is done, and massive domes, calling to mind that of the Pantheon. In a word, all these bonnets seem constructed by architects rather than devised by milliners. Such as they are, women rave about them, and think that they were never so pretty as now. But this opinion has been shared by all the generations that have gone, as it will be by all those that are yet to come, and therefore proves nothing, pro or con, concerning the present fashion.

For so-called simple toilettes ingenious combinations are formed of the different colors, uniting those that have hitherto been thought most opposed to each other. I do not, however, advise foreigners to attempt this delicate and difficult task, which demands a skillful eye, under penalty of producing grotesque effects. The Parisians, men and women (I do not even say Frenchmen), are born colorists in all professions. I have often heard distinguished painters say that they were in the habit of studying the dry-goods displayed in the shop windows, with a view to the knowledge of color effects shown in the harmonious arrangement of the different tints. This knowledge appears in all the details of the present toilettes. For instance, suppose it is necessary to make a trimming of blue and green, blue and violet, or any other two colors that were formerly thought hostile to each other: by choosing a faded-blue almost green and a green almost blue, or, in the second case, a blue shading on the violet and a violet with a bluish tinge, the Parisian colorists obtain extremely harmonious and original effects. In general the dress is of the darker color, and the lighter is used for the pipings edging the flounces, and other trimmings.

Flounces are very much worn; one, if not two, trims the bottom of the skirt; then the back is covered with them from top to bottom. The tablier, or front, is always trimmed in a different manner from the rest of the skirt, as it simulates a petticoat, over which the skirt opens.

Little girls' dresses are exact miniatures of those of their mothers. Misses from eleven to sixteen years old dress much more simply—skirts with very little trimming and polonaises quite plain, with a simple roll of a different color on the edge. A similar trimming edges the flounce of the skirt. In general the hat is of the two colors used in the dress, but in an inverse direction, the principal in one case becoming the accessory in the other—for instance, with a gray dress trimmed with blue the bonnet is blue trimmed with gray, and so on.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

HALIFAX HARBOR, considered one of the finest in the world, is a deep inlet of the sea, extending about fifteen miles inland from the Atlantic, with a channel nowhere less than half a mile broad, nor under six fathoms deep. In front of the city, where ships usually anchor, it is a mile broad. It is easy of approach, and quite accessible in all seasons, being seldom obstructed with ice, and large enough to accommodate many vessels in perfect safety. But the coast of Nova Scotia is rugged and rocky; half-sunken rocks, irregularly shaped islands, and dangerous shoals line the shore in many places, so that local knowledge is absolutely necessary to enable a vessel to be navigated safely through these perils. On the southwestern side of the entrance to Halifax Harbor is Sambro Island, surrounded by rocks and shoals, bearing the general name of Sambro Ledges, against whose dangers the mariner is protected by the fixed light upon the island, which is visible twenty miles distant, and which also guides into the harbor. Still farther to the westward, on the Nova Scotia coast, is Mars Head, the extreme point of a rocky cape, seventy feet high, and forming the western limit of Pennant Bay, whose entrance is encumbered by shoals and islands. It was upon this craggy rock, during a heavy gale, early in the morning of April 1, that the White Star ocean steam-ship Atlantic struck with deadly force. The night was yet dark, the steamer suddenly careened over, the pitiless waters swept over her, and, amidst bewildering confusion and scenes of indescribable horror, five hundred and forty-six human beings sank into their ocean grave. There were nearly 1000 persons on board the Atlantic when she went ashore; some swam through the angry waves and clambered up the rough rocks, others were rescued by boats and lines. But not a single woman was saved; and of all the children, only one little boy escaped from the wreck. A large proportion of the unfortunate victims (there were 760 steerage passengers) were emigrants who had left their own homes to seek their fortunes in America. The details of this fearful tragedy have spread through the land, carrying an appalling conviction of criminal recklessness somewhere, and of the great insecurity of human life in traveling. Investigations may place the chief blame of such a disaster where it belongs; but will that restore the dead to life? No investigations should be necessary to create a strong public sentiment that will demand certain securities to life in ocean travel—vessels built after the safest models, perfect machinery, a strict adherence to the least hazardous route, an abundant supply of coal, and skillful, careful, experienced commanders. In the case of the Atlantic the simple lack of sufficient coal was the original cause of the catastrophe: this made it imperative to seek the port of Halifax for a fresh supply; then followed the errors in the vessel's course which terminated so disastrously, and for which the commanding officer and the company seem directly responsible. From those 546 hapless victims there seems to come an agonizing remonstrance against criminal recklessness in all to whom is committed the charge of human life.

The Atlantic carried the full complement of boats prescribed by the English law—eight in all. She was built to accommodate 1200 passengers, and her officers and crew numbered about 150 men. At the time she struck the fatal rocks she had on board about 976 persons. Were eight boats an adequate provision for the escape of all these in any circumstances? Supposing there had been time after the first knowledge of the disaster for every individual to take refuge in a boat, and the sea had been calm, how many could the eight boats have carried?

A new vessel has been constructed somewhat like the famous Bessemer ship, except that the cabin literally floats in a kind of tank placed amidships, between the engines, instead of being attached to a pivot. The inventor is M. Alexandrovski.

A good thing has been done in London by opening a "Sunday Home," where poor girls, friendless and homeless, may spend the Sabbath with rest and kindly Christian care, instead of roving in the streets, exposed to temptation.

The reading-room of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York has been open on Sundays for about three years. It is usually filled with young men who value the privileges it affords. An abundance of suitable reading is placed at the disposal of all present. At five o'clock in the afternoon a large Bible-class gathers for instruction. Later, a plain tea is served in the parlors for those who wish, cards of admission having been previously obtained. Afterward there is a short prayer-meeting, and an evening service, consisting of singing and an address from some city pastor.

A touching circumstance connected with the ill-fated steamer City of Boston is related of a widow now living in Detroit. Her only son was on board the vessel, whose only recorded fate is "missing." She comforts herself with the fond delusion that her boy will yet return to her. Fancying that the Boston papers will first receive news of the steamer named for that city, she has subscribed for a Boston paper, reads it carefully, hoping her son's fate may be explained. His plate is always laid at the table, the hopeful mother saying to her friends, "I have not heard from Willie yet, but I hope to get news this week."

It is said that in early life Mr. Gillott worked privately as the employé of half a dozen different pen-makers. One day the manufacturers met together at dinner, and each asserted himself to be the possessor of the best workman. They severally wrote down the name of the special artisan who could make more pens in a day than any other man. "Gillott" was written on every paper. This led to the discovery that Gillott had invented and was using a machine for making pens, which enabled him to do the work of a dozen men with one pair of hands.

Ladies are included in some of the juries at the Vienna Exposition, and will be expected to give their best judgment in the distribution of awards and prizes to the exhibitors.

The American public will not have the pleasure of hearing Madame Patti next autumn. It appears that the people in the Russian capital are unwilling to part with their adopted favorite, Patti, as a large sum has been agreed to be paid by the government to M. Strakosch in compensation for deferring Madame Patti's American engagement.

Last year there was sold in London 7295 pounds of splendid bark from the cinchona-trees of the English plantation on the Neilgherry Hills, India. About 35,000 pounds were supplied to the Indian dépôts. The beneficent design of bringing this antidote of fever within reach of the poorest has been fully realized. On the Neilgherry plantations there are about 2,600,000 cinchona-trees, covering 950 acres of land.

Louis Napoleon had a fixed presentiment of his death. One day, not a month before he died, while in the church-yard at St. Mary's, Chiselhurst, smoking his cigarette and waiting for the Empress to finish her devotions after the mass, which they had, as usual, attended, the Emperor was observed to be looking attentively at four or five graves by the side of the narrow pathway. He seemed lost in thought.

"Sire, what are you looking at?" asked his aid-de-camp, the Count Davilliers.

With a sad smile the Emperor replied, "My dear Davilliers, I am only looking for the spot where you will soon place me."

A white marble statue of Queen Victoria, weighing seven tons, has recently been placed in the vestibule of the state apartments at Windsor Castle. The Queen is represented sitting, with a dog by her side.

On the 15th of May a culinary exhibition will be opened in Paris. The galleries will be spacious, and the public can order what they please, and see it cooked. The Chinese have applied for "space" to exhibit their skill. It is said they will serve a delicious pâté, consisting of a morsel of ice enveloped in a coat of flour, sugar, and minced meat—to be eaten at white heat!

Last fall a benevolent citizen of Boston placed $1000 in the hands of the chief of police to be loaned to working-girls having persons dependent upon them for support. The sums loaned are to be kept twenty years without interest, and no security but the word of the borrower is required. About fifty girls have thus far been aided in this way from the fund.

According to a recent act of Congress, "every place containing a population of not less than twenty thousand" will be entitled to the benefits of the free-delivery system by letter-carriers from July 1, 1873. Consequently this service will be introduced into Charleston, South Carolina; Scranton, Pennsylvania; Columbus, Ohio; Paterson, New Jersey; Kansas City, Missouri; Mobile, Alabama; Fall River, Massachusetts; Springfield, Massachusetts; Peoria, Illinois; Covington, Kentucky; Quincy, Illinois; Evansville, Indiana; Oswego, New York; Elizabeth, New Jersey; Savannah, Georgia; Poughkeepsie, New York; Camden, New Jersey; Davenport, Iowa; and St. Paul, Minnesota. Such other cities as may be able to show that they have reached the minimum population (20,000) since the taking of the last census will doubtless be included in the list.

Our national cemeteries, wherein lie the remains of many brave soldiers, are regarded with tender solicitude by thousands of families whom our civil war bereaved. And the proper care of them is a matter of general interest to all the people of our country. A large proportion of these cemeteries are in the Southern States. There are seventeen in Virginia alone, seven in Tennessee, five in Kentucky, four in Louisiana, four in North Carolina, three each in Mississippi, Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, and Maryland; two each in Texas, Georgia, South Carolina, the District of Columbia, and Kansas; and one each in New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Florida, Alabama, Iowa, and the Indian Territory, making sixty-nine in all. Congress recently appropriated $1,000,000 for head-stones to mark the graves of Union soldiers interred in these cemeteries. Some have previously been provided with appropriate head-stones; but the number still to be supplied is about 250,000. The names of nearly 150,000 of these are known. The law requires each head-stone to be marked with the number corresponding to its number in the register of burials, and also with the name of the soldier and the State to which he belonged, when these are known. The Secretary of War is to decide upon the size, form, color, and quality of the head-stones, and all must be of durable material and of appropriate size and weight; but he has authority to adopt different models and different kinds of stone for the various cemeteries.

(Continued from No. 16, page 251.)

LONDON'S HEART.

BY B. L. FARJEON,

AUTHOR OF "BLADE-O'-GRASS," "GRIF," AND "JOSHUA MARVEL."

CHAPTER XLV.

HOW MR. SHELDRAKE PLAYS HIS GAME.

MR. DAVID SHELDRAKE was a cool, calculating rogue, and was by no means of a sufficiently romantic or daring turn to plan and to carry out an abduction. If Lily had decided not to accompany him, he would, with an ill grace, have abided by her decision. The qualities of his mind were pretty evenly balanced, and he had no intention of placing himself in danger. What Lily did she did deliberately, and with her own free-will, and every move in the little game that he had played was testimony in his favor. Lily had come to him, had made it appear, by asking the landlady of the True Blue for the use of her parlor, that it was she who desired to confer privately with him, had smiled when she left the public-house, and had voluntarily entered the cab which was now conveying them along the Epsom road. He could prove that he had been a friend to her brother, and, according to the logic of figures, a heavy loser by him; he could prove that he had been on intimate terms with Lily, and that she had accepted favors from him. So far all was well. But, going a point farther, Mr. Sheldrake, carefully considering the position as the cab drove along, was puzzled. He had not definitely settled upon the next step. He had, in a vague manner, decided that to bring the brother and sister together, to make Lily clearly understand the desperate position in which Alfred was placed, and then to say to her, "And I am the only man that can save your brother," would be a fine thing for him. Setting aside the dramatic effect of the situation (Mr. Sheldrake, having an eye for dramatic effect, had thought of that), it would undoubtedly place him in a good light. But then, on what terms would he consent to save her brother? It was at this point he paused, and said to himself that he must consider seriously what was the best thing he could do; and while he was considering he heard Lily's voice calling to him. He bade the driver stop, and he alighted and went to the cab door.

"Have we much farther to go, Mr. Sheldrake?" she asked, in a weak, imploring tone.

"No, not a great way."

"I thought we should have been in London before now; but the road is strange to me; I do not recognize it."

"It is the road to Epsom," he explained. "I told you, if you remember, that your brother could not come home."

"Yes, but I thought you meant he could not come from London; he went straight to his office from us this morning."

"No, he did not, Lily; he went to the Epsom races."

She uttered a sharp cry of pain.

"Oh, why could he not have confided in me? Why did he deceive us?"

"I supposed you knew," said Mr. Sheldrake, gently; "I had no reason for supposing otherwise."

"I don't blame you, Mr. Sheldrake—"

"Thank you, Lily," he said. Kind words from her were really pleasant to him.

"But I am frightened of being on this road alone."

"Not alone; I am here to protect you."

Her tears fell fast.

"If I had known—if I had known!" she murmured, in great distress of mind. She had been thinking of Felix and her grandfather, and of their unhappiness at her absence. But there was some small comfort for her in the thought that she had written to them, and had explained as far as she dared.

"If you had known!" repeated Mr. Sheldrake, gravely. "Do you mean that if you had known, you would not have come? Surely you can not mean that, Lily! When I parted from your brother this afternoon he was flying to hide himself from the danger which threatens him, and from which only we can save him. And of course I thought you knew where he was. If there has been deceit, it has not been on my part. And even at this stage, I can not submit to be placed in a false light, or to be misjudged. I have endeavored to make you acquainted with the unhappy position of affairs: in the state of mind in which I left your brother, I would not answer for it that he would not commit any rash act. But if you can not trust me, you have but to say the word, and we will go back, and I will leave you within a dozen yards of your grandfather's door."

Digitized by Google

"No, no!" she cried. She was, indeed, almost helpless in this man's hands. "We will go on; I must see him and save him, if I can."

"You trust me, then?" he said, eagerly.

She was constrained to reply "Yes;" but when he took her hand, which was resting on the sash, and kissed it, she shivered as though she had been drawn into an act of disloyalty to Felix. Mr. Sheldrake had made up his mind by the time he had resumed his seat on the box: he would marry Lily—there was nothing else for it. "I'll sow my wild oats and settle down," he thought, as he lit a cigar: "a man must marry at some time or other, and it's almost time for me to be thinking of it. I couldn't do better; she's innocent and pretty, and—and every thing that's good; and she's not a girl that will impose on a man, like some of those who know too much." Then he fell a-thinking of the wives of his friends, and how superior Lily was in every way to any of them. "She'll do me credit," he thought. He was dimly conscious that Lily entertained a tender feeling for Felix; but that this would fade utterly away in the light of his own magnanimous offer he did not entertain a doubt. He mused upon the future in quite a different mood from that he was accustomed to; for the purifying influence of Lily's nature made itself felt even in his heart, deadened as it had been all his life to the higher virtues. And now they were nearing the end of their journey. In the distance could be seen the fires of the gypsy camps; the cold wind came sweeping over the downs. The best thing he could do, he thought, would be to stop at an inn; he knew of a quiet one, out of the town, where it was likely they would not be noticed; and he would leave Lily alone for a few minutes, and, on the pretense of going out to seek for Alfred, he would go to the Myrtle—the inn at which he had desired Mr. Musgrave to put up—and see if the old man was there. Then he would come back to Lily, and tell her they would not be able to see Alfred until the morning. There would be a little scene, perhaps, but he would be able to smooth matters over.

By the time he had matured this plan the cab drove up to the door of the inn. It was not yet midnight, and Mr. Sheldrake had no difficulty in obtaining admission. As they entered, and walked up stairs into a private room which Mr. Sheldrake ordered, Lily looked about, expecting to see Alfred. Mr. Sheldrake, attentively observing her, knew the meaning of those searching glances, and, against his reason, was mortified by the reflection that he occupied no place in her thoughts.

"You had best take off your things, Lily," he said, awkwardly; and, seeming not to notice the look of sudden distrust and surprise which came into her face at his words, proceeded, "It is chilly, but we will soon have a fire, and be comfortable."

Either his words, or the tone of familiarity in which they were spoken, came like a cold wind upon Lily's fevered senses. Felix seemed to stand before her, and to warn her against this man. But although, in the light of these new impressions, a veil seemed to be falling from before her sight, and although love for Felix, and the responsibilities it conveyed to her heart, gave her strength, the shock was too great and unexpected for her to find words to answer Mr. Sheldrake immediately.

"I will order some supper, Lily. Is there any thing particular that you would like?"

She steadied herself, resting her hand upon the table.

"Where is Alfred?" she asked, in a voice that was firm despite its tremulousness. "Where is Alfred?"

Mr. Sheldrake was discomposed by her unusual manner.

"Alfred is not here, Lily."

"Not here!" she echoed. "For what reason, then, have we stopped here?"

Mr. Sheldrake felt the difficulty of the situation, and with an embarrassment which he strove in vain not to express, proceeded to explain. But, disconcerted by the steady gaze with which she regarded him, he stumbled over his words, and for once in his life his assurance failed him. Had he been at his ease, and had he spoken with his usual plausibility, he might still have been successful in deceiving her; but he had betrayed himself, and it came upon her like a flash of light that he had set a trap for her. She waited until he had finished speaking, and then said, with an utter disregard of his explanation,

"You asked me to come with you to see my brother. Bring him to me."

"That is what I intend, Lily," he said, biting his lips; "I will go and search for him. But you want rest and refreshment first."

She stopped his farther speech.

"I want neither. I am here to see my brother. Bring him to me."

Amazed and confounded by the resolution of her manner, he hesitated. He could not leave her in the strange mood that had come upon her; he must strive to leave a more favorable impression behind him. But the words he wished to utter for the purpose of quieting and assuring her would not come to his lips. As he hesitated Lily stepped quickly to the window, and throwing it open, looked out.

"What are you looking for?" he asked, stepping toward her.

A sudden cry, almost hysterical, escaped from her, and she turned swiftly and confronted him.

"I am looking for the cab," she said, her cheeks flushing, showing such distrust of him by the action of her hands that he shrugged his shoulders, and sat down at a little distance from her. He had quietly ordered the driver to take the cab to the Myrtle Inn, and put up there; but he knew that even if the cab were still at the door she could not see it, for the window of the room looked out upon the back of the inn. As Lily leaned out of window Mr. Sheldrake fancied he heard a voice without, but he set it down to the account of some toper going from the inn; in another moment, however, he did hear Lily's voice, but could not distinguish what she said. He started up with a jealous exclamation, and as he did so, Lily closed the window, and sank into a chair in a fit of hysterical weeping.

"Why can you not trust me?" he asked, bending over her tenderly. "You are overwrought and overexcited. To whom were you speaking?"

She calmed herself by a great effort.

"The man said he could not see any thing of the cab," she answered; "nor could I. It is gone."

"The driver has put up his horse, I suppose. It is a long drive, remember, and the horse must be tired."

A knock came at the door, and the landlady entered.

"Do you stop here to-night, Sir?" she inquired.

"Yes," he said.

"No," said Lily, firmly. "This gentleman does not stop here to-night."

A threatening look came into his eyes.

"Wait outside a minute," he said to the landlady. The landlady obeyed, and Mr. Sheldrake closed the door. "What is the meaning of this?" he demanded of Lily, in a husky voice, almost throwing off his disguise.

"Can you ask me? You have brought me here to see my brother on a matter of life or death. I can not rest until I see him. Have you no pity for my anxiety? Do you know where Alfred is?"

"Yes," he was compelled to reply. "I will go and bring him to you. Will that satisfy you?"

"You know it will. But promise me one thing."

"You can't ask me any thing, Lily, that I will not promise," he said, hailing this small token of confidence with gladness.

"Give me your sacred word of honor that you will not return here to-night unless my brother is with you."

He felt that he had no alternative; but the fear that she wished to escape from him was upon him. In the light of this fear she became more than ever precious in his eyes. Urged to the desperate declaration, he said,

"Lily, listen to me. You know that I love you—that I love you honorably—"

"If you do," she interrupted, bravely, but with her hand on her heart, "you can not hesitate to give me the promise I ask."

"But you! What will you do?"

"I shall stop here in the hope of seeing my brother."

"I can depend on that? You will stop here to-night?"

"I will—by all that I hold dear!"

"And if I am unsuccessful in finding Alfred to-night, you will see me in the morning?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, I promise you," he said, gayly. "I will show you that you can trust me thoroughly. Good-night, Lily."

He held her hand tenderly in his for a moment, and deemed it prudent to say no more.

"Little witch!" he murmured, as he walked away from the inn. "I was afraid she was going to turn upon me. But I have her safely now, I think!"

CHAPTER XLVI.

FATHER AND DAUGHTER.

LILY listened to the sound of Mr. Sheldrake's departing footsteps as he went down stairs; heard him speak to some one in the bar, and heard the front-door open and close upon him as he walked out into the night. Then, with a grateful "Thank God!" she called the landlady into the room, and whispered to her, and put money into her hand. The landlady said,

"Very well, miss; I'll watch for him."

Whoever it was she was set to watch, it was evidently no enemy to Lily; for in less than five minutes she was talking to the person at the back-door, and telling him that the young lady was up stairs alone. Lily was waiting for him at the top of the stairs. She drew him into the room with eager haste, and clasping him round the neck, cried again, "Thank God! I am safe now! You will not leave me, will you? Stop with me—for my grandfather's sake, for Lizzie's sake!" and, overcome by emotion, could say no more, and swooned in his arms. When consciousness returned to her the landlady was standing by her side, and Mr. Musgrave was kneeling before her.

"There, there!" said the landlady, soothingly; "I told you she had only fainted. Do you feel better, my dear?"

"Much better, thank you," replied Lily, vaguely. But looking down upon the kneeling form of Mr. Musgrave, remembrance of what had passed came to her; and she clung to him in a passion of tears, and besought him again and again not to desert her. At a sign from him the landlady quitted the room, saying,

"You will find me down stairs if you want me."

"You are crying, Mr. Musgrave," said Lily, when they were alone. "I feel your tears on my hand."

"They are tears of joy and pain, my dear," he answered, rising from his knees. "Tell me now how you came here. When I saw you looking out of the window, I placed my finger on my lips, warning you to silence. It is as I suspected, is it not? Mr. Sheldrake brought you here?"

Briefly she told him of the means employed by Mr. Sheldrake to induce her to accompany him, and of what had passed between them on the road and at the inn. He listened attentively, and with varying shades of emotion; and when she ceased speaking, he told her to be comforted, that he would protect her, and that it was not Mr. Sheldrake she or Alfred had to fear.

"There is cause for fear, my dear," he said, "but not from him. When I return, I will tell you more—"

"You are not going?" she interrupted, entreatingly, clinging to him more closely.

"I must; you shall know my errand when I come back, and you will be satisfied. Then I will not leave you again. I shall be absent for half an hour, my dear; and while I am away the landlady will sit with you."

"But if Mr. Sheldrake returns—"

"You say he has gone for Alfred. Lily, trust one who would give his life for you. I would, my dear! I would lay it down willingly at your feet, if it were necessary for your safety or your honor!" What inexplicable passion, inwardly borne but not expressed, was it that caused his limbs to tremble as he held her to him for a few brief moments? What impulse caused him to loose her from his embrace suddenly, and to stand aloof from her as if he were not worthy of the association?

"Mr. Sheldrake will not come back to-night. Be patient for half an hour, my dear, and trust me thoroughly. Let me hear you say you have confidence in my words."

His earnestness carried conviction with it; but his humble manner pained her.

"You would not deceive me, Sir," she said. "I trust you thoroughly, and will wait patiently."

She raised her face to his, and with a grateful sob he was about to kiss her; but the same impulse restrained him.

"No," he murmured; "not until she knows all;" and left the room without embracing her.

At the appointed time he returned. During the interval the landlady had lit the fire, and had drawn a couch to the hearth, upon which she persuaded Lily to rest herself.

"Ah, that's good," Mr. Musgrave said. "Are you warm enough?" He arranged the rugs about her with a tenderness which surprised her, and then sat apart from her, with his head upon his hand.

"You have something on your mind, Sir. Come and sit near me. Are you troubled about me?"

He did not answer her immediately; but with a clumsy movement of his hand he overturned the candlestick, putting out the light, almost purposely as it seemed.

"We do not need to light it, child," he said; "we can talk in the dark."

"Yes, Sir, if you please," she answered, yet wondering somewhat; "but the room is not dark. I like the soft light of the fire; it brings rest to me. I shall be glad when day comes." She paused between each sentence, expecting him to speak; but he sat silent, watching the fitful shadows as they grew large and dwindled on the walls and ceiling. "What are you thinking of, Sir?"

"I am looking into the past," he replied, presently, in sad and solemn tones.

"And you see—"

"A wasted life. A life that might have been useful and happy, and good in making others happy."

"Not yours, Sir," she said, pityingly—"not yours. Ah, Sir, you speak as if your heart was troubled! Come closer to me, and let me comfort you, as you have comforted me."

"Not yet, child; I dare not. If, when you have heard what I have to say, you ask me to do that, I will fall at your feet and bless you! This wasted life that I see in the shadows that play about the room—may I tell you some passages in it?"

"It pains you to speak; it pains me to hear your sad voice—"

"Nay," he interrupted, "it relieves me. My heart will burst else; and I have waited for this so long, so long! You will listen in patience?"

"Yes, Sir."

"So gradual are the changes that we do not notice them during the time—we scarcely know how they come about, until, after the lapse of many years, we look back and wonder at the contrast between then and now. This wasted life that I speak of, how does it look now in the eyes of the man who has misused it? He sees his youth, as one standing at the foot of a great hill, where the shadows lie thick, might look up to the mount upon which the sun shines. That was before he was married, and when he was a young man. Reckless, uncontrolled, thirsting for the possession of things out of his reach, he did not stop to think or reason. He could not then have spoken of himself and of his desires as he speaks now, for he was arrogant, insolent, selfish, and inconsiderate to his heart's core. Bitter has been the fruit of these passions; but had he died a hundred deaths he could not have expiated the wrong he inflicted. And yet he did not awake to the consciousness of this until a few months since—until all the wrong was accomplished, and until he had sunk to a shameful depth—until a terrible retribution had ripened to fall upon him for his deeds. No one was to blame but he. Life presented fair opportunities to him. He had youth, he had strength, he had a wife who loved him; but the curse that lies heavy upon thousands, that wrecks the happiness of life, poisons its sweetness, turns smiles into tears, joy into despair—the curse of drink was upon him. It brought a blight upon his wife's fond hopes, and broke her heart. He sees now in the shadows a picture of that time. He sees himself covered with shame, flying from justice, saved from just punishment by one whom he has only lately learned to revere; he sees that man, the father of his wife, looking with aching heart at the prospect that lies before his child; he sees his wife, pale, dumb, heart-crushed, mourning the death of love and hope; he sees his two children, a boy and a girl, the girl almost a babe—"

He paused here, fighting with his grief. A long silence followed. Lily had raised herself upon the couch, and had followed his words with agonized interest. She could say nothing to comfort him; her emotion was too powerful for speech. In trembling suspense she waited for his next words. She felt that she was in some way connected with the story he was telling, but the light that shone upon her mind burned dimly as yet.

"So he left those who should have been dear to him, and never looked again upon the face of his wife. The time that followed—the long, long years during which he strove to forget the past—seemed to him like a dream. With the curse of drink still upon him, he grew old before his time. He had taken another name, and nothing of his former life was known. Mention of it never passed his lips. How he lived matters not now. It shames him to think of it. But after many years had passed, he awoke one day to a better consciousness of things. There came to lodge in the house in which he lived a bright and good girl, who obtained her living by dress-making. When he first saw her, and heard her pretty voice singing in the room next to his, it seemed as if a vision of the past had fallen upon him. This girl and he became friends, and he grew to love her, and loves her now. Often, as he looked upon her, he thought that his daughter, if she was living—his daughter whom he had not seen since she was a babe—would be something like this bright girl. One night the man's employer came to him and made a strange offer. On the condition that he could persuade this girl to live with him as his daughter or his niece, a small house near London was to be taken, of which he was to be the tenant and ostensible master. While they were talking over this proposition the girl came home; she had been to the theatre with her sweetheart; he accompanied her home, and the voices were heard in the adjoining room. The employer heard the young man's voice, and recognized it, and it seemed as if the recognition made him more desirous that the plan should be put into operation quickly. The old man that very night acquainted the girl with the proposition that had been made to him, and she consented to live with him. She told him the story of her life, and they sat up talking until late. Before she went to bed he asked her the name of her sweetheart. She told him. It was the name of his own son!"

He covered his face with his hands, unable to proceed. Lily rose from the sofa, and approached him tremblingly. She knelt at his feet, and said, in a voice that rose no higher than a whisper,

"Tell me his name, Sir."

The name came through his sobs.

"Alfred."

"And his sweetheart's name is Lizzie, is it not?"

"Yes."

"And the story you have related to me is your own?"

"It is my own, miserable man that I am!"

The silence that followed was very brief, but to him it was like a long and terrible oblivion. Then upon the darkness in which his soul was wrapped broke a silver line of light, so inexpressibly sweet, so exquisitely painful, that his heart almost ceased to beat.

"Father!"

Her arms were round his neck, but he fell on the ground at her feet, and cried humbly for forgiveness.

"Father, you have something more to tell me."

"Yes, my dear child. You must be made acquainted with what has passed, so that you may be prepared. You will hear what I have to tell bravely, will you not, my child?"

"It is about Alfred?" she cried, in great agitation.

"It is; I know where he is. I have seen him. I went to him when I left you a while ago."

She started to her feet, and looked about tremblingly for her mantle.

"I must go to him at once. Come! why do we stop here?"

"Dear child," he said, taking her hands in his, and striving to calm her, "you must be guided by me. For his sake, we must keep away from him."

"But he is alone and unhappy. What will he think if he knows that I am here? Oh, let us go to him, dear father! We should not be absent from him in his trouble."

"Lily, my child, you would not bring greater trouble upon him?"

"No, no!"

"You might, if you do not act as I tell you. A watch might be set upon your steps, and his safety depends upon his hiding-place being kept secret. For he is in hiding, my dear. Sit down, child, and be satisfied that for the present you are serving him best by remaining here. And do not be uneasy, my darling, that he is not being taken care of. He is not alone. Lizzie is with him."

"Lizzie with him!"

What strange wonders was this night bringing forth!

"He wrote to her, and although he did not

Digitized by Google

tell her where she could find him, she lost not a moment, but came here at once, the dear brave girl! Alfred was at the races to-day, as you already know, and lost not only his own money, but money that did not belong to him. What this false man who brought you here to-night told you about him is true. Alfred is in great peril, and the despair that seized him when he realized the full sense of his danger made him desperate, and drove him almost mad. I came to Epsom to-day especially to keep an eye upon him, for I feared that something bad would occur. Last week Lizzie overheard a conversation between him and Mr. Sheldrake—it took place in our cottage, and she listened at the door. She had not the courage until last night to tell me what she had heard, and I dreaded the consequences, and saw them in a clearer light than she. I have gone through such an experience myself, and have tasted the bitter fruit. I determined to come to Epsom, knowing, alas! that it was too late to undo the evil he was bringing upon himself, but hoping against hope that by a lucky chance (the gambler's forlorn-hope, my dear!) things would turn out well. They did not; and when the race was over I saw Alfred steal away from the course, ruined and almost lost—I saw it in his face—and I followed him to prevent worse occurring. His false friend saw me, and for a purpose of his own set me to watch my own son, little dreaming of the stake I held in his unhappy fortunes. But Alfred discovered that I was watching him, and he escaped me. I was frightened to think to what his agony and remorse might drive him, and I wandered every where in search of him. For six hours, my dear, I hunted for him in vain. I was distracted. It was a dark cold night, and I was worn out and wearied. At nearly eleven o'clock I was on the plains, near to some gypsy tents, about half a mile from here. I thought of Lizzie's misery at Alfred's absence, and I thought of you also, dear child. I did not know what it was best for me to do. Shall I return home? I asked of myself. And as I stood, uncertain and helpless, I heard a voice that was familiar to me. It was Lizzie's voice, my dear. She had been searching also, and with a woman's wit knew that it was useless to inquire at the inns or wander about the town in search of him. She guessed rightly where it was most likely he would try to find refuge. She went to every tent and every camping party on the plains, and made her way where I could not, and received answers and civil words where they were denied to me. At the gypsy tents, near which I had halted, she was told that a man with the horrors on him—don't tremble, child!—had come and wanted to camp with them; but they had turned him away, and would have naught to do with him. Lizzie described Alfred to them. Yes, they answered, it was some such sort of a man. She searched for him near those tents, and found him lying under a hedge in a state of delirium. Dear child, be calm! let us pray that he will get well, and that this great trouble may be tided over. It is not Mr. Sheldrake that he has to fear. But I haven't finished my story yet. Lizzie found him, and prevailed upon the gypsy women to give them shelter. She bribed them with money; she would have given them her blood

"SHE WAS, INDEED, ALMOST HELPLESS IN THIS MAN'S HANDS."

if they had bargained for it, for his sake. Ah, my child! I begin to see the beauty of a woman's love, and how unworthy we are! One of the gypsy women made some cooling drink for him, and it was while these two were talking outside the tent that I heard Lizzie's voice. You may imagine our sad pleasure at thus discovering each other. I remained with them some little time, and came to this inn for food and drink for them, and as I approached the place I saw your face at the window. You know now the errand which took me from you for half an hour. It is arranged that Alfred shall remain with these people, if necessary; they will conceal him if they are paid for it, and one of the women has taken a great liking for Lizzie. The dear girl would win her way any where. I told Lizzie you were here. She sends her dearest love to you, and says that she will contrive to see you to-morrow. She told me to tell you also that when Felix and your grandfather—God bless him for the care and love he has bestowed on my child!—find all of us absent, Felix will be sure, after the first shock of surprise, to guess where we all are, and that he will follow you to Epsom early in the morning, perhaps to-night. Felix, she says, knows more about Alfred than you are aware of. So, dear child, all that we can do is to wait until the morning, and to hope for the best. And now, before you lie down to rest, tell me if it is as I suspect and hope with you and Felix."

She hid her face on his shoulder, and told him all.

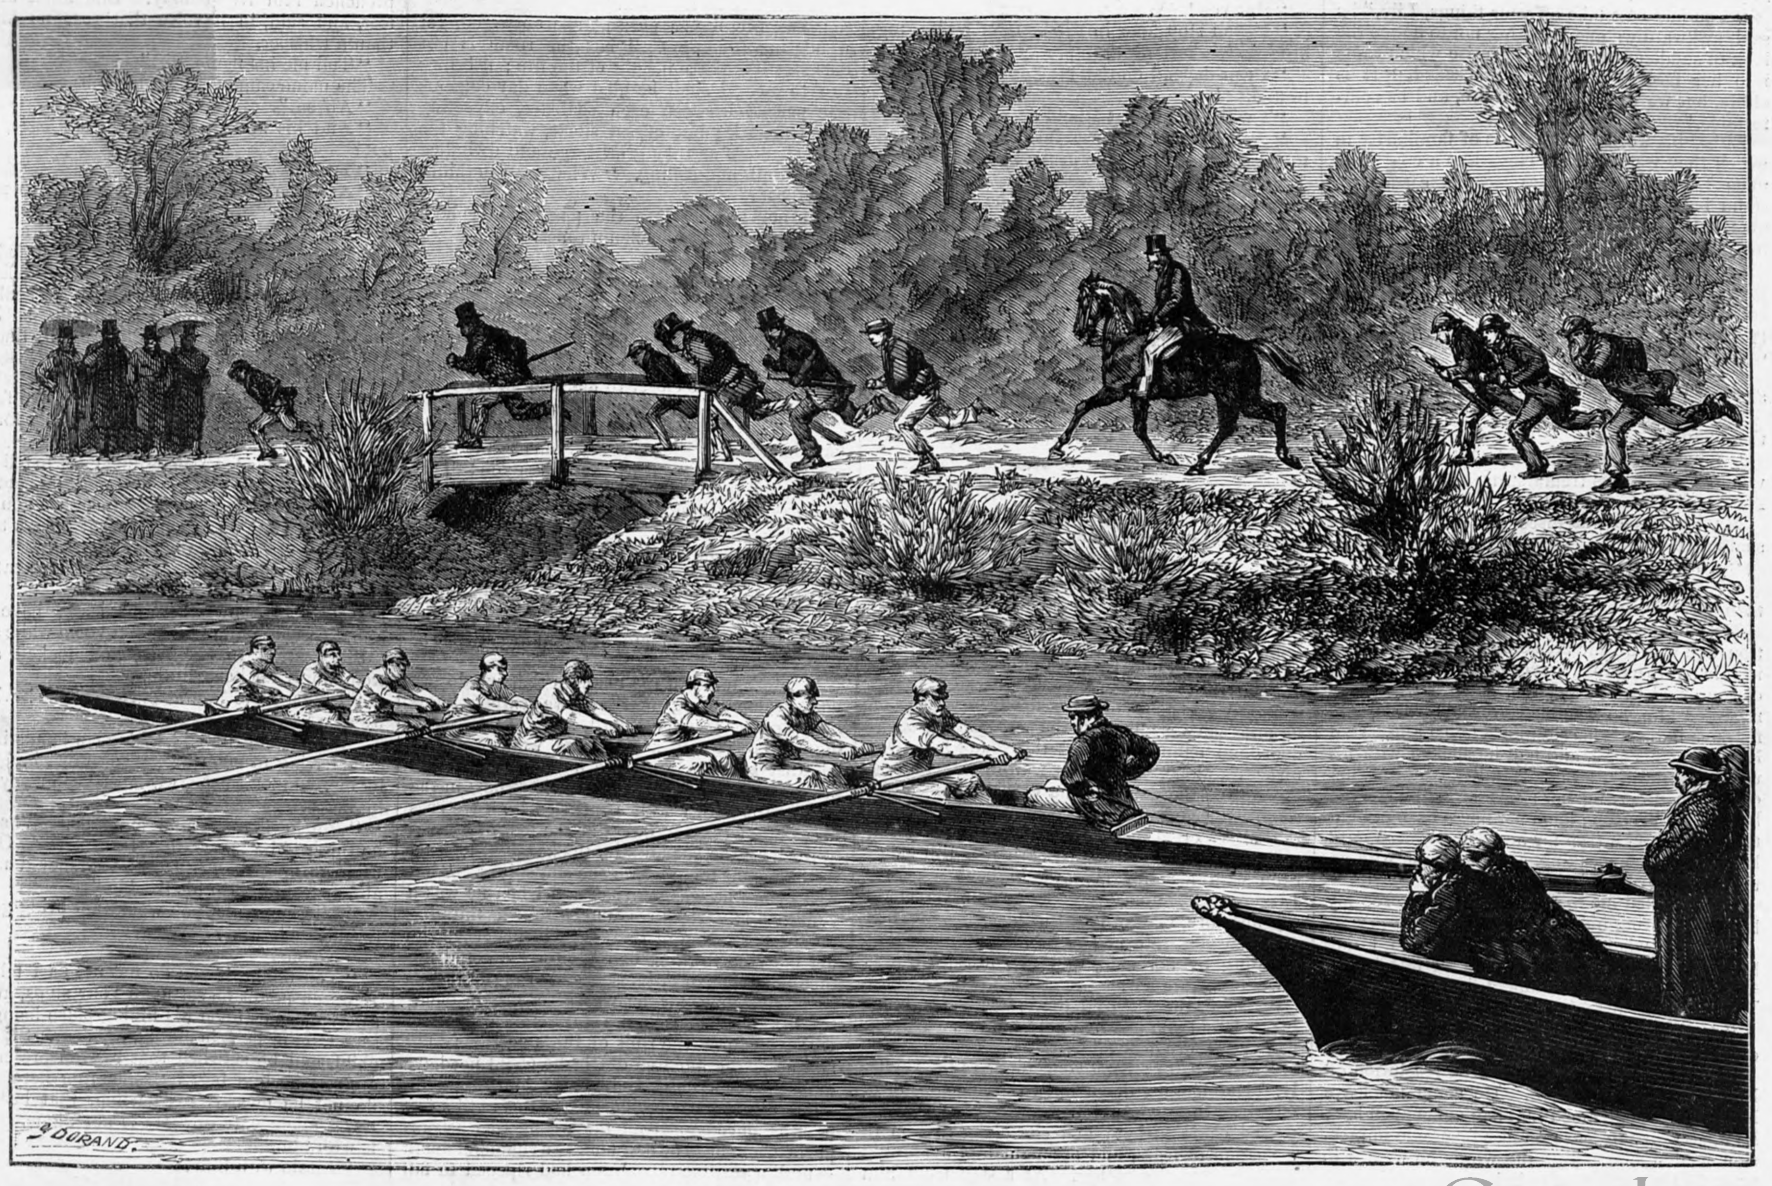
"God bless you both!" he said, solemnly.

He insisted on her lying down, and he sat by her side and watched her. When, presently, she pretended to fall asleep, he knelt by the couch, and with his face resting in her soft warm hand, prayed with humble heart.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

TRAINING FOR THE UNIVERSITY BOAT-RACE.

THE accompanying illustration shows the English students in training for the University Boat-Race, which in England is an affair of national importance, paralleled only by the Derby-day. This race between the rival schools of Oxford and Cambridge took place on the river Thames on March 29. Business in London was almost wholly deserted, and the river-banks were thronged from an early hour of the morning with dense masses of people, displaying the light blue colors of Cambridge or the dark blue of Oxford, according to their respective proclivities. At half past two the race began. The Cambridge crew took the lead from the beginning, and maintained it, except during a brief interval, through the entire course, winning by three boat-lengths. The race was from Putney to Mortlake, a distance of four miles and two furlongs, and lasted twenty minutes and thirty-five seconds. The Oxford crew rowed from thirty-nine to forty-three strokes per minute, and the Cantabs, or Cambridge men, from thirty-eight to forty-two strokes. The crowd of spectators was larger than any ever assembled on a previous occasion, the Prince of Wales being among the spectators. Formerly the Oxford crew won the race for many years in succession. The illustration is interesting as showing the precise kind of boats used and the style of rowing.



TRAINING FOR THE UNIVERSITY BOAT-RACE.

Hosted by Google

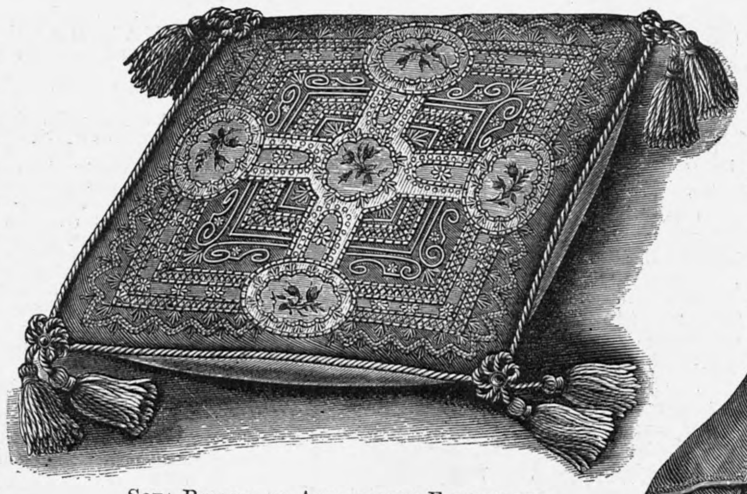
A NOTABLE FRENCHWOMAN.

THE Princesse Anne Marie Louise d'Orléans, Duchesse de Montpensier, but better known as Mademoiselle, and not unfrequently spoken of as La Grande Mademoiselle, the heroine of the Fronde, was of the most royal birth in France, being the only legitimate granddaughter of Henry IV., and the wealthiest heiress in Europe, succeeding as she did, even in the lifetime of her father, Gaston, Duke of Orleans, to the vast possessions of her mother, the representative of the house of Montpensier. As such, the arrangement of a marriage for her might naturally have been expected to have been among the first objects of solicitude not only to the relatives who could guide the disposal of her hand, but still more to those who might hope to obtain it; and never has so varied and royal a list of candidates been offered to any lady's acceptance. An emperor, three kings, and kings' brothers and cousins almost without number, had their pretensions to her favor successively discussed; but, chiefly through her own caprice or indifference, all the great matches which were proposed for her came to nothing. Though for a moment she favored one or two of the suggested connections, she admits frankly that in those instances she was attracted by the position of the proposed husband rather than by himself; and the first person who ever awakened her serious liking was no prince of any nation, but only a younger brother of a noble family, that of Lauzun, whom she eventually married. Even apart from her rank and wealth, her personal charms were sufficient to attract suitors enough, if her own description of them may be believed; for she undertakes to describe her appearance with as much minuteness and as much fidelity as her actions. In her description she certainly does not seem greatly to disguise her defects; and as candor on such a subject is perhaps more trying to female vanity than even a confession of faults of character or errors of conduct, and is certainly at least as rare, our readers may probably not be unwilling to see this portrait of the first lady of the French court in its most gorgeous age, drawn by herself.

"I am tall, neither fat nor thin; of a very fine and graceful figure. My neck is tolerably shapely; my arms and hands are not good; but my skin is fair. My legs are straight; my feet are well formed; my hair light, of a pretty ash-color. My face is long, its contour pretty; my nose large and aquiline; my mouth is neither large nor small, but symmetrical, and with a very agreeable expression. My lips are rosy; my teeth not good, but not very bad; my eyes blue, neither large nor small, but bright, soft, and commanding, like my countenance. I have a lofty manner, without being conceited. I am civil and familiar, but in a way rather to gain respect than to allow any one to fail in it. I am very indifferent about my dress, but never untidy; I hate slovenliness. I am always neat, and whether dressed carefully or carelessly, all I put on is in good taste. I do not mean that I do not look incomparably better when carefully got up; but carelessness is less injurious to me than to others, because, without flattering myself, while I do justice to all I wear, every thing I put on becomes me. I talk a great deal, without talking nonsense or using bad expressions, and I never speak of what I do not understand."

In other passages she gives us a little additional insight into the favorite amusements and tastes of her youth, and also into her disposition. She hated cards; she was very fond of dancing and of hunting; still more of laughing at people, though so far was she from thinking ridicule a mark of ill nature that she would rather be laughed at herself than pitied. She liked the company of all brave honest men, especially soldiers; she was fond of conversation on military topics. As for reading, to which she was addicted, in prose she preferred books on serious solid subjects; of poetry she liked all sorts, good, bad, and indifferent. Her disposition, as she paints it, was a pretty equal and not unusual mixture of good qualities with others not altogether commendable. She piqued herself on nothing so much as on the warmth and steadiness of her friendship, which, however, was shown rather in conferring great benefits than in paying petty attentions. She was an admirable keeper of secrets, and was incapable of any thing base. She was temperate in eating and drinking, and (though it was certainly not the virtue of that age) she was free from any propensity to gallantry. She was the most grateful person in the world. And if these are especially feminine virtues, she was not without those which commonly are rather the attributes of the sterner sex. She was ambitious, courageous, decided, resolute, and possessed of the most perfect self-command. On the other hand, she was hot-tempered, passionate, and spiteful as an enemy; and so self-willed, owing to the good opinion she had of herself, and her contempt for every one else, that she would rather spend her life in solitude than put the slightest constraint on her humor, even if her fortune depended on it. It will hardly be denied that such frankness of self-portraiture is so unusual as of itself to give a favorable impression of the artist, and the more so since the chief events of her career, as related by others besides herself, prove it to have been very fairly accurate and impartial.

Fig. 1.—POULT DE SOIE MANTELET.—BACK.
[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 51-54.



SOFA-PILLOW IN APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.
For design and description see Supplement, No. XII., Fig. 69.

LADIES'-CLOTH SACQUE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 55-63.

Fig. 2.—POULT DE SOIE MANTELET.—FRONT.
[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 51-54.

SKELETON LEAVES.

WINTER is a very bad time for making skeleton leaves. The leaves should be gathered when at their prime—that is, when the earliest leaves begin to fall from the trees—and all that are broken or damaged in any way should be rejected. In making a selection carefully avoid all leaves of a resinous nature, as those of the fir tribe, camphor-tree, laurel, bay, and most of the evergreen shrubs; and it is useless to try the leaves of the oak, chestnut, elm, willow, sycamore, walnut, hazel, and some others, which contain much tannin, as not only will they not decompose themselves, but the tannin impregnates the water and prevents the decomposition of any other leaves which may be under maceration at the same time. Those who have had the greatest experience in skeletonizing leaves generally prefer the slower process of maceration to the more speedy one of boiling in lime and soda. Having obtained your stock of leaves, seed-vessels, etc., take an open earthen pan that will hold a gallon or more, put the leaves into it, and pour over them sufficient rain-water to cover them. Let the pan remain exposed to sun and weather, without changing the water (gently and carefully stirring it now and then), until decomposition is sufficiently carried out, or until the outer coating or green part of the leaves is pulpy, and sticks to the finger. This will depend on the water, the weather, and the kind of leaf; some leaves, such as the magnolia and India rubber, require several months, others a few weeks only. They are then to be taken out and washed by shaking them about gently in water, and placed in a shallow earthenware pan, keeping each one steady by pressing the finger on the stalk, while the decayed portion is removed by a small, rather stiff, short-haired brush, when the woody fibre or skeleton will be displayed. When perfectly cleared from cuticle, etc., bleach the leaves in a solution of chloride of lime; one tea-cupful of the solution sold in the shops added to a gallon of water will be about the strength required. It is well, when you take the leaves out of the bleaching liquid, to put them into clean water for a short time, then carefully dry them, either between blotting-paper before the fire,

Fig. 1.—FAILLE AND LACE FICHU.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 64-68.

Fig. 2.—FAILLE AND LACE FICHU.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 64-68.

Hosted by Google

or in the sun, after which they may be pressed flat in books before arranging them in groups under glass shades. The best leaves for skeletonizing are those of the plane, pear, lime, poplar, sycamore, tulip-tree, different kinds of ivy, holly, box, St. John's wort, scarlet passion-flower, pepultree, Wistaria, Eryngium maritimum, Carduus benedictus, magnolia (ten sorts), alstrœmeria, thistles, barberry, and several of the nettles. Seed-vessels—stramonium, campanula, Carthamus tinctoria, sea-tree, mallow, honesty, hyoscyamus, lavatera, malope, Canterbury bell, poppy heads, and the winter cherry, which is particularly beautiful.

JEWELRY IN GENERAL.

IN those curious letters about the interior of Africa, which have of late excited so much attention, we read that the best currency for his daily wants which the traveler can take up with him from Zanzibar, is a quantity of brass-wire. This brass-wire, it appears, passes for jewelry in Africa, and is worn with much pride in twists and loops about their ankles and wrists by the nobles of that continent. We may laugh at this if we like. But Herbert Spencer has well shown that with the first desire of man for ornament, comes the first dawning of a possible civilization. And for the matter of that, we are by no means sure that the brass-wire of the Ujiji chiefs is of a very much lower epoch in taste than the cheap jewelry on which thousands of our own people persist in wasting their money, and with which they make grotesque their persons. A visit to the establishment of Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, 22 John St. (up stairs), will show how unnecessary it is, and how foolish on the score of economy in our people, to encourage the production of this tawdry and perishable stuff. There may be seen ornaments of all kinds for both sexes, wrought of materials intrinsically valuable, and with a taste and delicacy which make them fit to be worn in any society, yet actually no dearer in price, and relatively twenty-fold cheaper than the commonplace, coarse, and trivial peddler-work which has so flooded the land. What is the secret? Simply this, that Messrs. STARR & MARCUS have learned that taste is the cheapest of investments, and the most remunerative. How long must it be before our consumers lay to heart the same simple lesson?—[Com.]

TAKE YOUR DYEING AND CLEANING to the New York Dyeing and Printing Establisement, Staten Island; 98 Duane St., 752 Broadway, and 610 Sixth Ave., New York; 164 and 166 Pierrepont St., Brooklyn; 40 North Eighth St., Phila.—[Com.]

STILL THE CRY is for the Wilson Under-Feed Sewing-Machine. And why? Because it is the most perfect and desirable Sewing-Machine for family use yet invented, and is the cheapest. The constant demand for this valuable machine has made it almost impossible for the manufacturers to supply the demand. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

DRS. STRONG'S Remedial Institute of Saratoga Springs, N. Y., in addition to the facilities of ordinary practice in the treatment of ladies and gentlemen suffering from various chronic diseases, combines, also, the Turkish Bath, Electro Thermal Bath, Sulphur Air Bath, Russian Bath, Swedish Movement Cure, Vacuum Treatment, Health Lift, Oxygen, Gymnastics, Hydropathy, Inhalation, Mineral Springs. Rev. Dr. T. L. CUYLER says: "I know of no institution which I can so cordially commend to those who are suffering from the various ills that American womanhood is heir to." Bishop J. T. PECK writes: "Every appliance for the treatment of disease which skill can invent or money can furnish is at the disposal of their patients." Send for a circular.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

STEINWAY & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, & UPRIGHT

PIANO-FORTES,

109 & 111 East 14th St., New York.

☞ ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES, WITH PRICE-LIST, MAILED FREE ON APPLICATION.

CHENEY BRO'S

American Gros-Grain Silks,

IN BLACK STRIPES,

AND ELEGANT FALL COLORS,

Of Shades especially adapted for Suitings.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

Retailed at same price as I charge Hair Dealers. All First quality Hair. No short crimped hair in. Warranted not dyed.

32 in. long, weight 3 oz. only $9.00
32 " " " 4 " " 12.00
32 " " " 5 " " 15.00
32 " " " 6 " " 18.00

CORONET OR POMPADOUR BRAIDS—SOLID HAIR.
2 oz., 20 in. Hair, only . $4.50

Back or Waterfall Curls—full sets Naturally Curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails for in N. Y.
Medium,	$7.00	$10.00
Large,	8.00	12.00
Extra Large,	10.00	15.00

Long single Curls (heavy) natur'ly curly
22 in hair, only $3.00
24 " " " 3.50
26 " " " 4.50

BEST FRIZ WEFT OR FACE CURLS, . . . 50 cents per yard.
NATURALLY CURLY, FRIZ WEFT CURLS, . $1.00 per yard.
LATEST STYLE. — Spanish Comb, Imitation Shell, sent prepaid on receipt of $1.50...everybody wearing them.

I sell the hair just as I import it, without intermixing [as imitators of my advertisements do,] to make their Price Lists appear cheaper. I AM the only Hair Importer and wholesale dealer in this city who RETAILS at WHOLESALE Prices. I will send Switches PREPAID by REGISTERED MAIL, on receipt of P. O. Money Order, Draft, or Money in Registered Letter, or will send by Express to COLLECT ON DELIVERY. Remember money sent in advance saves ALL express charges.

Wreath with any Initial, Monogram, or word, or Bouquet, made of as many pieces or colors of Hair as you may send.

Almost every family possesses some hair of deceased relatives, which can be made into beautiful pictures, forming imperishable and unchangeable mementoes and handsome household ornaments. Either of the above designs appropriately framed 4 x 6 inches, sent prepaid on receipt of $10.00. The above is the very best method of preserving the hair in its original color, and is now being extensively adopted by all who wish to preserve such as relics to perpetuate the memory of the departed. Have one made. You will surely order others on seeing how really artistic the work is done. Will return all hair not used. Established 1843. CHAS. V. PECKHAM, Near Amity St. (Copyright secured.) 687 Broadway, N. Y. City.

When you write please mention HARPER'S BAZAR.

20 Sheets of Choice Music, $1 00.

Why throw away money on high-priced Music when you can select from our Catalogue of 700 pieces? Any 20 Half-Dime, or 10 of Dime Series mailed on receipt of One Dollar. Sold by all booksellers, and can be ordered through any newsdealer. Send stamp for Catalogue. Address

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
439 THIRD AVENUE, NEW YORK.

WEBSTER'S PATENT

Button-hole Worker.

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

It is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented! So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, together with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

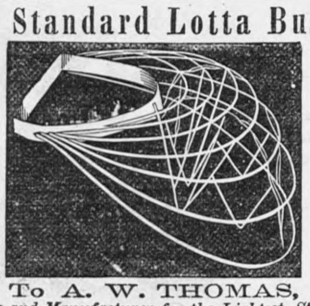
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 335 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

The Standard Lotta Bustle.

[DIPLOMA AWARDED BY THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE



To A. W. THOMAS,

Patentee and Manufacturer for the Lightest, Strongest, Most Durable, Comfortable, Elastic, and Cheapest Bustle in the Market.

The wearer can sit in any position whatever, without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree. It closes entirely up on sitting, and returns with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault).

No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. Wholesale Depots, 91 White St., N.Y.; 801 Race St., Phila.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

OUR NEEDLE-CASE is the best, sells fastest, pays best. Send 50 cents for sample. Agents wanted. H. N. McKINNEY & CO., Philadelphia.

TO CHANGE HAIR to beautiful Auburn, Golden Brown, Light Brown, or Blonde. $3 per bottle. Sent to any address on receipt of price. Samples of changed hair will be sent on receipt of 50 cents. Address J. O. NEIL, 52 John St., New York.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Are offering

UNUSUAL BARGAINS

In all qualities of PLAIN, BLACK, & FANCY SILKS, Grisaille Taffetas Stripes, 87½c.
This season's Colored Stripes and Checks, $1; value $1 50.
An immense stock of New and Choice Styles of Fancy Silks at $1 25 and $1 50 per yard, all below their present cost in Lyons.
Black Faille Silks, $1 75, $2, and $2 50 per yard, of unusually good value; the richer qualities from $3 to $6.
Plain Colored Silks at exceptionally low prices.

DRESS GOODS

In many new fabrics, ADAPTED TO THE HIGHEST TASTES, AND NOW FIRST EXHIBITED, viz.:
Gaze Aloes, Kabyic, Nid d'Abeille, Indon Cashmeres, Cluny Dentelle, Sheer Ecru, Baptistes, Plain, Spotted, &c., &c.
Also, a fresh assortment of their POPULAR DRESS GOODS, from 25c. per yard.
LARGE MESH SILK and WOOL GRENADINES at 50c., worth 75c.
The very best value in Alpacas, Lustres, and Brilliantenes, from 35c. per yard upward.
A fresh importation of filled, square, and Plain Centre

REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS.

Broche Long and Square Shawls, fully 25 per cent. below regular rates.
New designs and colors in Ottoman Stripe Shawls and Scarfs, from $4 upward.
Black Embroidered Cashmere Shawls, from $18 upward.

JOB RIBBON IMPORTATION,

Including COLORED GROS GRAINS, No. 4 width, 10c. per yard.

No. 5 width, No. 7 width, No. 9 width, } 15c.
No. 12 width, No. 16 width, No. 22 width, } 25c.

SASH RIBBONS, 6 inches wide, 75c.; worth $1.

THE MARSEILLES SASH

and other Novelties in Garniture Sashes.

A SPECIAL ATTRACTION LACE GOODS.

500 LLAMA POINTS, $5 upward.
500 LLAMA SACQUES, $12.
BLACK and COLORED YAK LACES.
TRIMMING LACES at a reduction of 33⅓ per cent.
A visit of inspection is requested.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

STERN BROTHERS,

SIXTH AVENUE AND TWENTY-THIRD STREET,
367 6th Ave. 110 W. 23d St.,

Are now offering unusually well selected lines of Goods in their various departments, comprising splendid assortments of

PASSEMENTERIE TRIMMINGS,
FRINGES AND ORNAMENTS,
REAL AND IMITATION LACES,
PARASOLS & SUN UMBRELLAS,
OXYDIZED FANCY GOODS.

With a comple stock of

MILLINERY GOODS.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S UNDERGARMENTS, from lowest to finest goods imported.
CHILDREN'S PIQUE DRESSES, SUITS, AND CLOAKS.
INFANTS' COMPLETE WARDROBES.
CORSETS & HOOP-SKIRTS.
And a very attractive stock of
LADIES' CASHMERE SACQUES, DOLMANS, CAPES, MANTLES, & POLONAISES, Ranging in price from $9 upward.
Imported and our own make
LINEN AND LAWN SUITS IN GREAT VARIETY.

To all of which we call attention, feeling convinced that our large assortments and EXTREMELY LOW PRICES
Can not fail to convince Ladies of the advantage of examining our Stock before purchasing.

STERN BROTHERS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

FRENCH, ENGLISH, AND AMERICAN
PARASOLS AND UMBRELLAS
OF THE LATEST STYLES.
LACE COVERS MOUNTED AT SHORT NOTICE.

INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR OPEN CENTRE SQUARE SHAWLS.
A fine assortment of all colors just received.

SUIT DEPARTMENT.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. have now open their SPRING IMPORTATION OF PARIS-MADE GARMENTS.
Also, of their own well-known manufacture,
BATISTE SUITS AND POLONAIS,
FRENCH SILKS, SUITS, IMPORTED SACQUES IN CLOTH AND CASHMERE, LACE AND LLAMA POINTES & SACQUES,
YAK SACQUES, &c., &c.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTING DEPARTMENT.

Misses and Children's SILK AND SERGE SUITS.
" " PIQUE "
" " LAWN & CAMBRIC SUITS.
" " CLOTH SACQUES.
A full line of LADIES' UNDERWEAR,
Paris-made and our own manufacture.
PARIS WALKING-SKIRTS,
LADIES' LAWN AND CAMBRIC WRAPPERS.
Also, a full assortment of
CORSETS, HOOP-SKIRTS, BUSTLES, &c.
INFANTS' WEAR
IN GREAT VARIETY.
LADIES' TROUSSEAUX and INFANT'S WARDROBES a specialty, and furnished at short notice.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

TO THE LADIES!

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.

No lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.

B. F. BROWN & Co., Boston.

WANTED! Agents to sell our Rubber Stamps and other novelties. Address U. S. Manufacturing Co., 97 W. Lombard St., Baltimore, Md.

1873. NOTICE. 1873.

OUR

CELEBRATED

BUFFALO

AND

OTTER

TRADE MARK PAT'D.

BRANDS

BLACK ALPACAS,

AND

BEAVER BRAND.

TRADE MARK PAT'D.

SILK FINISHED

Black Pure Mohairs

ARE HANDSOMER THAN EVER FOR SPRING WEAR.

These Beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Dry-Goods Retailers throughout the United States.

☞ Purchasers will know these goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece, bearing a picture of the Buffalo, Otter, or Beaver.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 and 429 Broadway,
305 Canal and 47 Howard Sts.,
New York.

SOLE IMPORTERS.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

SEND FOR

SPRING CATALOGUE

TO

EHRICH'S TEMPLE OF FASHION,

287 & 289 EIGHTH AVENUE, N.Y.

Ladies' and Children's Undergarments and Suits. Real Laces, Embroideries, Kid Gloves, Parasols, &c. Cheapest in the country.

Every C. O. D. package subject to examination before acceptance. EHRICH & CO.,
287 & 289 8th Avenue, New York.

PRATT'S

PATENT

LADIES' BRACE

AND

Skirt Supporter.

For sale by A. T. Stewart & Co., Porter Brothers & Co., H. B. Claflin & Co., Lewis, Scheile, & Co., New York; Field, Leiter, & Co., Chicago; by all first-class dealers, and at the Office of the Company, Cleveland, Ohio.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

Hosted by Google

HAIR!!!

L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,

Between 4TH and GREAT JONES STS.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

All Hair used in my establishment I import and manufacture myself, and is of the best quality only; and if any expert can prove that I use in my goods any other quality but the best, or mix it with Italian or Chinese Hair, which is generally applied to by other dealers, will refund the money in every case.

I can offer to the public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors.

All goods WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.

N. B.—Through the immense increase of business, we will remove to the more commodious building, 364 Bowery, cor. 4th St., after 1st of May, 1873.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER..... No. 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK..... " 11
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)..... " 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)..... " 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old).... " 29
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)..... " 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt).. " 35
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER..... " 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP..... " 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 48
LOW-NECKED EVENING DRESS, with Adjustable Court Train and Round Skirt..... " 49

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postlion Baqsue, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old).... " 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER..... " 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)..... " 6
PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 8
SLEEVELESS SACQUE AND CAPE, with French Blouse, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 13
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 20
VEST BASQUE, with Over-skirt and Kilt-pleated Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 21
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER.. No. 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)..... " 25
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt..... " 27
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)..... " 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT..... " 51

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)..... " 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT.... " 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 17

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

WORKING CLASS, MALE OR FEMALE, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Cortlandt St., N.Y.

A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.

CASHMERE BOUQUET

MADE BY COLGATE & COMPANY, NEW YORK.

CASHMERE BOUQUET

A DELICATE SOAP FOR THE TOILET.

FASHION'S Triple FAVORITE, "Le Plus Nouvelle."

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1873, by A. Burdette Smith, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington, D. C.

MAGIC COSTUME.—This is the Acme of Paris ingenuity!!!! This engraving represents two views of it. And there is still another, viz.: a draped apron front. THREE Entirely different Costumes in one! It can be changed from a Polonaise to a Redingote or Waterproof in less than one minute, by simply adjusting one button. The original is made in dark blue ladies' cloth, trimmed with Hercules braid.

As a Polonaise. As a Waterproof.

This pattern is Particularly desirable for wash goods, because when unbottoned it falls into a beautifully shaped Wrapper without pleat or gather, making it easy to laundry. The Traveler, especially the Voyager, will find it an indispensable convenience. It is very simple and easy to make. Complete instructions are printed upon each pattern, besides a Cloth Model. (See below.) Requires five yards Waterproof. All Sizes. Price of pattern and cloth model, One Dollar. See Premium below.

We furnish it "READY MADE" in Linen or Batiste, from $5 to $15; in Waterproof, $10 to $20; in any color of ladies' cloth, handsomely trimmed, $25. SEND STAMP for our CATALOGUE of STYLES.

We give a CLOTH MODEL with each pattern, which SHOWS every seam, pleat, gather, loop, etc., how to put the garment together by the pattern, and how it will look when completed. By the use of our Cloth Models any person who can sew can FINISH the most difficult garment as easy as the plainest. They are PERFECT GUIDES.

SUBSCRIBE NOW FOR

SMITH'S ILLUSTRATED PATTERN BAZAAR—ONLY One Dollar a Year!

Sample copy mailed for 25 cents.—BEST AND CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD!!!!

PREMIUM. Every subscriber is entitled to select Patterns to the value of ONE DOLLAR, FREE. By enclosing ONE DOLLAR and Stamp to A. BURDETTE SMITH, you will be made a YEARLY SUBSCRIBER, and the pattern of the above engraving, with a Cloth Model, will be mailed to you FREE! OR, if you prefer to select your premium after you receive the Bazaar, he will mail to you a receipt for your subscription, and a "PREMIUM COUPON," which will entitle you to select patterns to the value of ONE dollar FREE at any time. When you send your subscription, please state which you prefer.

Address, A. BURDETTE SMITH,
P. O. Box 5055. Smith's Pattern Bazaar, 914 BROADWAY, N. Y.

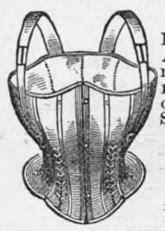
MADAME FOY'S CORSET SKIRT SUPPORTER,



For Health, Comfort, and Style,

Is acknowledged THE BEST ARTICLE of the kind ever made. Numerous Testimonials in its favor are being received from all parts of the United States.

LADY AGENTS WANTED.

HARMON, BALDWIN, & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers,
New Haven, Conn.
ARNOLD & BANNING, New York; D. B. FISK & Co., Chicago, Agents.

DANIEL D. YOUMANS, HATTER,

719 & 1103 BROADWAY.

IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS.

Ladies' Riding-Hats in Variety.

DR. LYON'S TOOTH TABLETS

For Cleansing the Teeth.

TRUE TIME FOR $1. 50,000 SOLD.

Magnetic Time-Keeper, Compass, and Indicator. A perfect GEM for the pocket of every traveler, trader, boy, farmer, and for EVERY BODY desiring a reliable timekeeper, and also a superior compass. Usual watch-size, steel works, glass crystal, all in a neat OROIDE case. WARRANTED to denote correct time and to keep in order—if fairly used—for two years. Nothing like it! This perfect triumph of mechanism will be sent in a neat case, prepaid to any address, for only $1; 3 for $2. Circulars sent free. Try one. Order from the manufacturers' Agents. Eureka Manufacturing Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

SEYMOUR'S SHEARS & SCISSORS.

"The Best are the Cheapest."

Extra Quality. Crocus Polish.

Sold Everywhere. State where you saw this when you write.

Family Size, - - $1.50
Ladies' Scissors, - 1.00
By mail, prepaid. Send P. O. Order or Draft.
HENRY SEYMOUR & CO., 29 Rose St., New York.

WILHELM & ZACHMAN,

IMPORTERS AND DECORATORS OF

CHINA, GLASSWARE, & CROCKERY,

CLOCKS, BRONZES, PLATED-WARE, &c.,

1152 Broadway, N. Y.

Beautiful inventions for marking Clothing and printing Cards, &c. One will do for a whole family. Movable Type. Profitable, amusing and instructive for the young. Jet Printer $1. Silver $1.25, with Ink, Type and neat Case, delivered by mail anywhere. 4 Alphabets extra 60c. Agents wanted. Golding & Co, 14 Kilby St, Boston.

A PAIR OF BEST TWO-BUTTON KID GLOVES sent postpaid for $1 00. Three pair for $2 75; Twelve pair for $10 00. Every color and size. Real Laces, samples of Sash Ribbons and Dress Trimmings sent free on application.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 Eighth Ave., Bet. 27th and 28th Sts., New York.

A LADY OF REFINEMENT and ABILITY, about to proceed to Europe for the purpose of completing the education of her only daughter, would be glad to undertake the charge of other three young ladies with a similar object, to whom she would afford the watchful care of a mother. Unexceptionable references. Apply by letter to
A. G. C., P. O. Box 959, N. Y. City.

BAZAR Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE

Manufactured by the Florence Sewing Mach. Co. The simplest, cheapest, and best in use! Has but one needle! A Child can run it. Agents wanted in every town. Send for Circular and Sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. Co., Bath, Me.

NOVELTY PRINTING-PRESSES.

The Best yet Invented FOR AMATEUR & BUSINESS PURPOSES,

And Unsurpassed for General Job Printers.

OVER 8000 IN USE.

BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer,

And Dealer in Every Description of

PRINTING MATERIAL,

349-351 Federal & 152 Kneeland Sts., Boston; Branch Store, 543 Broadway & 88 Mercer St., N. Y. Agents, Kelly, Howell, & Ludwig, Philadelphia; J. F. Edwards, St. Louis, Mo.; A. C. Kellogg, Chicago, Ill. Send for Pamphlet.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

$72 EACH WEEK. Agents wanted every where. Business strictly legitimate. Particulars free. Address J. WORTH & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON: Its Negotiation, Execution, and the Discussions Relating Thereto. By CALEB CUSHING. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

 A fresh supply of this popular book will be ready next week.

2.

LITTLE KATE KIRBY. A Novel. By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "Christie's Faith," "Mattie: a Stray," "No Man's Friend," "True to Herself," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

3.

THE FISHING TOURIST: Angler's Guide and Reference Book. By CHARLES HALLOCK, Secretary of the "Blooming-Grove Park Association." Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

4.

BY THE LATE LORD LYTTON:

THE COMING RACE. 12mo, Paper, 50 cents.

GODOLPHIN. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

LEILA; or, The Siege of Grenada. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

KENELM CHILLINGLY: His Adventures and Opinions. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; 12mo, Cloth, $1 75. (In Press.)

5.

TURNING-POINTS IN LIFE. By the Rev. FREDERICK ARNOLD, B.A., of Christ Church, Oxford. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

6.

TO THE BITTER END. A Novel. By Miss M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Dead-Sea Fruit," "Birds of Prey," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

7.

SANTO DOMINGO, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti. By SAMUEL HAZARD. Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

8.

STUDENT'S HALLAM'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND. The Constitutional History of England, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II. By HENRY HALLAM, LL.D., F.R.A.S. Incorporating the Author's Latest Additions and Corrections, and adapted to the Use of Students. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D. 12mo, 747 pp., Cloth, $2 00.

9.

RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

10.

GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50. Popular Edition, 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

11.

HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

12.

ROBIN GRAY. A Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, "Author of "For the King," and "For Lack of Gold." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

13.

THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

This work embraces in one volume:

ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.

ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Boston, Mass.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

WHAT a conceited thing Tennyson's Brook must be, when he says, "Men may come and men may go, but I go on forever," etc. As if he would not be dried up by a good hot summer!

What would you do if you had some land that would not grow trees?—Why, have it measured, and I would then have some poles and perches.

The anchor is said to be the emblem of Hope. It can't be very safe to trust in it when it only holds by a fluke.

What to do if you split your sides with laughter: run till you get a stitch in them.

When is a blundering school-boy like a fraudulent shop-keeper?—When he makes a false quantity.

CHIFFONIERS—Men who live by hook and by crook.

HOW TO MAKE ONE'S SELF OBNOXIOUS—To walk down a crowded thoroughfare carrying a ladder on your shoulder, and to turn round every other minute to see if any one is looking at you.

RELATIONS.—In answer to the question of a correspondent who signs himself "Medical Student," we may safely say that Sal Volatile is no connection of Ann O'Dyne's. At the same time, Sticking Plaster may be the next of-Gold-Beater's-kin.

A SLOVEN'S PLEA.—Comfort before ostentation. Your outward appearance necessarily affects the consciousness only of other people; but by no reasoning whatsoever can you dismiss bodily sensations from your own.

SOMETHING NEW.

"We've got something new at our house!" gleefully exclaimed an errand-boy one day last week, as he entered the shop where he was employed.

"What is it?" blandly inquired his master, thinking, perhaps, it was a baby or something of the kind.

"Oh, my sister's all broke out with the small-pox!" was the delighted reply.

The firm have secured the services of a new errand-boy.

INSUFFICIENT REASON.—In an English church, recently, after the publication of the bans of marriage by the minister, a grave elder, in a stentorian voice, forbade the bans between a certain couple. On being called upon for an explanation, "I had," he said, pointing to the intended bride—"I had intended Hannah for myself." His reason was not considered sufficient.

"Kitty's going to join our Sabbath-school; she's coming with me next Sunday; ain't you, Kitty?"

"Oh, I don't know—I've never been to Sabbath-school. What do you have to do?"

"Why, you get saved, of course; and books, and albums, and—"

"I mean, what do you have to do? Have to study any thing?"

"Oh, it isn't like that. It's like church, you know. When you first go in, you have to put your head down and pray."

"But I can't pray," says heathen Kitty. "I don't know how to bow."

"Oh, well, do as I do: shut your eyes and count fifty."

TOWN MOUSE AND COUNTRY MOUSE.

UNSOPHISTICATED COUSIN. "What do you mean to be when you grow up, Jack?"
JACK. "Oh, I mean to be a Policeman, and you shall be my Nurse."
UNSOPHISTICATED COUSIN. "Well, but Policemen don't have Nurses, Jack!"
JACK. "Oh, don't they, just! That shows you've never been in the Parks. Why, I don't think I ever saw a Policeman without one!"

A paper, speaking against strikes, says, "You never hear of farmers striking." Now it occurs to us that we have known of such things. We fancy if you should let one of them catch you in his orchard "borrowing" apples, or sampling his cider through a straw, we just hint that you would be apt to see him "strike," or, at all events, you might feel him striking.

A missing man was lately advertised for, and described as having a Roman nose. He won't be found. Such a nose as that will never turn up.

NATURAL ERROR.—A young doctor spends his leisure hours in practicing on the cornet, and passers-by, thinking an amputation is going on inside, are deluded as to the number of the man's patients.

A lady with an unmusical voice insisted upon singing at a party.

"What does she call that?" inquired a guest.

"The Tempest, I think," answered another.

"Don't be alarmed," said an old sea-captain present. "That's no tempest; it is only a squall, and will soon be over."

A man who has a red-headed sweetheart addressed her as "Sweet Auburn, loveliest of the plain." Sweet Auburn got mad about it. She objected to being classed among the "plain," even though called the loveliest of them.

"Mary, my dear," said a doting husband to the lady that owned him, "if I turn Mormon and marry another helpmate, she shall be a Mary too, for your own dear sake!" "Be content with one Mary, my duck," said the loving wife; "in my opinion another would be merely a super-new-Mary."

ETIQUETTE.

Of all the themes my soul that fret,
In which I'd fain instruct myself,
The very worst is Etiquette,
And how I should conduct myself.
Of mysteries
My twister is
Just how I should conduct myself.

I, though a youth of humble birth,
The Stock Exchange blew bubbles on,
Until some thousands I was worth—
Which launched me all my troubles on;
Success it was—
Oh yes, it was—
That launched me all these troubles on.

I pease by knife-loads once enjoyed,
Nor dreamed of impropriety.
I'm told now knives are not employed
In that way in society:
To be exact,
They don't, in fact,
Use knives so in society.

I once could swig of gin and beer
Whate'er I got a friend to stand;
It's very name (dog's-nose), I hear,
Makes people's hair on end to stand!
Oh, I can swear
To cases where
I've known folks' locks on end to stand.

To smoke a pipe was once my boast;
I always had some Port thereto:
Now when I smoke my weed my host,
Forbids me to resort thereto.
No well-bred man,
He tells me, can,
While smoking, have resort thereto.

These nice distinctions vex me yet;
Society will frown on me;
Where'er I turn, this Etiquette
Is always coming down on me;
Till I could swear
I'd see—but there,
For swearing 'twill be down on me.

THE PLEASURES OF CHILDHOOD.—Mr. Milliken's little boys asked him this morning to take them to the circus. Mr. Milliken refused kindly but firmly, but said if they were good he would take them around this afternoon to see their grandmother's grave.

A woman out West interfered with her brother's courtship, and begged him to stay at home evenings. He waited until the evening when she expected her own lover, and complied, and she says that fraternal affection is a heartless mockery.

A BLIND BEGGAR'S MONEY BOX—"The harvest of a quiet eye."

A little Concord chap, who lived next door to Emerson, was engaged one day in digging a hole by the road-side. A worldly trifler, passing by, asked him, "What are you digging after, little boy?"

With gravity he answered, "After the Infinite."

"Mister, will you lend pa your newspaper? He only wants to send it to his uncle in the country."

"Oh, certainly; and ask your father if he will just lend me the roof of his house. I only want the shingles to make the kettle boil."

Our friend Coombs was out in India, and having read that any wild beast could be frightened into flight merely by opening a parasol suddenly in its face, Coombs determined to test the truth of the assertion. So he sallied out to the jungle with his largest green gingham umbrella to hunt for a tiger. After a while he found one. That tiger observed Mr. Coombs. It was a sympathetic tiger. It approached Mr. Coombs with velocity. Mr. Coombs thought he had never seen a tiger that seemed so exceedingly anxious to become sociable right away. But he stood his ground bravely while the animal approached; and just as it reached him, and prepared to spring, Mr. Coombs flung his gingham umbrella open suddenly in the tiger's face. It may perhaps be unnecessary to say that the monarch of the jungle did not betray any symptoms of alarm. On the contrary, it merely leaped over Coombs's umbrella, came down on the other side, and prepared to assimilate Coombs. In fact, that infatuated experimenter in the regions of zoological science was eaten; and he held the hooked handle of the umbrella so tightly in his hand that the tiger ate the handle with the hand, and for four weeks wandered round in that jungle with its head buried in Coombs's open umbrella. It was convenient for that tiger in case of rain, but it obstructed his vision; and so he walked into town and was killed, and Coombs had a Christian burial.

At a spirit meeting the other night a gentleman requested the medium to ask what amusements were most popular in the spirit world. The reply was, "Reading of obituary notices."

A true American is too proud to beg and too honest to steal. He gets trusted.

A king's fool who was condemned to die was allowed to choose the form of death, and chose old age. An Iowa girl being asked what form of death she preferred, remarked that if she must die she preferred to be smothered—with kisses.

If a miss is as good as a mile, how much better is a Mrs.?

The child who cried for an hour didn't get it.

"I'm so thirsty," said a boy at work in the corn field.

"Well, work away," said his industrious father. "You know the prophet says, 'Hoe every one that thirsteth.'"

(It is very difficult to know exactly the right thing to say to an Artist about his Pictures. We recommend unlimited praise; but do not enter into details.)

"Oh, Mr. Robinson! your Pictures are quite—too—more than Lovely! Surely you are the greatest Artist that ever Lived! Are you not? Candidly!"

"Well, I don't know. There was Michael Angelo, you know, and Hogarth, and—and—"

"Oh, your Pictures have all the ineffable Refinement and Purity of Hogarth, all the irresistible Humor of Michael Angelo, and—and—something quite your own, which I have never perceived in the Works of either of those Masters!"

COUSIN KATE (to Cousin Tom). "Now, Tom, I am just going to run in and order a few Cakes. If you have a liking for any particular kind, I wish you to mention it."

COUSIN TOM (to Cousin Kate). "Well, if you wish to order for my special taste, I think" (pointing to sign in window) "something in That Style would suit me."

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 19.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

A CITY RAILROAD CAR.—DRAWN BY JENNIE BROWNSCOMBE.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Hosted by Google

A CITY RAILROAD CAR.

See illustration on first page.

THE scene depicted by the illustration on our first page will be unpleasantly familiar to all of our readers who are accustomed to depend for locomotion on the street cars of this or most other cities. It is no fancy sketch, but one most faithfully drawn from nature. Day after day these cars go up and down with their seats on each side crowded with well-dressed gentlemen and ladies wedged helplessly among drunken and dirty men, women and children, baskets and bundles, while the middle of the car is filled with a dense mass of human beings clinging to greasy straps or vainly attempting to poise themselves by leaning on their neighbors. All these elements the artist has reproduced in the sketch, with a fair-faced girl struggling to make her way to the door against the ragged market-baskets, children's muddy boots, and clamorous newsboys that bar her path. Truly our people are a much-enduring race, or such pictures would be impossible among us.

PREMONSTRATION.

BY HOWARD GLYNDON.

LAST night I saw him in my dreams,
So pale, my heart was almost broken!
I read within his eyes the thought
His sad, sad lips had left unspoken—
"I love you!" In my sleep I said,
"And left me!" laughing bitterly;
And suddenly the phantom turned
And hid its pleading face from me.
But still around me, in my sleep,
"I love you!" seemed to stir the air;
To which I, laughing bitterly,
Made answer from my hard despair:
"Ah, God! if I had never known
Such love as yours has proved to me!"

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1873.

☞ THIS Number of HARPER'S BAZAR contains the opening chapters of a new serial story, entitled

"LADY ANNA,"

by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Orley Farm," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," etc. Few novelists enjoy a wider popularity in this country than ANTHONY TROLLOPE, and the readers of the BAZAR have a rich treat in store for them in the pages of this new story.

☞ WITH the next Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent out gratuitously a splendidly illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing a choice variety of exceedingly interesting reading matter.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of patterns, descriptions, and illustrations of Ladies' and Children's Spring Walking and House Suits; Bonnets, Parasols, Fichus, Caps, Cravats, Petticoats, Tournures, etc.; with choice literary and artistic attractions.

FRILLS AND FURBELOWS.

THERE is constantly a great deal of invidious remark going the rounds of the press, and, for the matter of that, the rounds of society as well, upon the subject of feminine dress and all its appurtenance of frills and furbelows.

In a season of dull politics one would suppose that the chief end of man was to attend censorially to the costume of the weaker sex, and to spare no slur or fling, ill-natured or good-natured gibe, that can be made concerning it, and we imagine that now that the Presidential campaign is over, we shall be called upon to undergo a new exhibition of the thing.

Endeavor to conciliate these evil-minded critics seems to be useless, for no fashion pleases them, let it be what it may: they have no patience with the pure antique; they laugh to scorn the ruff and fardingale; they pronounce the dress of the First Empire indecent, the dress of the Second Empire senseless; nothing is more frivolous than the dress that WORTH designs, nothing more barbarous than the dress of an Englishwoman, nothing more rag-baby-like than the dress of the harem, nothing more wasteful than the dress of the American woman.

When, a few years since, hoops appeared, these critics compared a lady to the planet Saturn within his rings; when hoops began to go out, and paniers and ruffles and sashes to come in, they compared her to a scarecrow, with her rags fluttering round her. When bonnets were large, they flung their pellets at the faces that were seen down the vista of "a Leghorn lane;" when hats were adopted, they wondered how soon the rest of the masculine garb would follow; when the face was hidden in a calash, they were gay over mock-modesty; when bonnets became a mere rose and ribbon, they had their sneer for the brazen face of the wearer; when youth and beauty went about in prunella, there was not enough praise to be accorded to the sensible high heels of our ancestresses; as soon as high heels were accepted, it was discovered that they produced incurable diseases of the spinal cord. The Puritans found it necessary to enact a law against puff-combs; the present generation hailed with delight the vermin in the jute. In short, there is not a fashion from fig leaves to crinoline that has not been the subject of their animadversions; and the only particles of feminine attire that go scot-free at present are, for some unaccountable reason, the two-buttoned glove and the thick-soled shoe.

It seems to us, when these facts are remembered, that it would in reality be a great pity to have women dress in any faultless and unexceptionable way, since it would quite deprive these critics of their occupation, and throw them on the cold charity of a world of uncongenial items. But we wonder that it never occurred to them to notice how little women regard their caviling, or to perceive that they are in truth themselves mere parasites of fashion, drawing their sustenance from the very things they flout—for to the conversational critic these variations of the vanities in vogue are an inexhaustible wealth, and to the newspaper critic the manmilliner WORTH, as he is called, is equivalent to a certain yearly stipend.

It would require a great effort of the imagination to picture any period in the future when fashion shall not be at the same time variable and arbitrary. So long as human nature is what it is; so long as it is the office of either sex to please the other; so long as the fresh tint of a fabric will display the perfect tint of a skin; so long as, in the absence of fur and feathers, we depend somewhat for our beauty and altogether for our comfort upon our apparel—so long will that apparel be the subject of costly outlay and of the change that follows weariness.

Perhaps in ancient times Helen did not tire of her peplos or her veil, because her needle-work varied it from Iphigenia's, or because her home life and limited intercourse with other women prevented her from seeing the same garment every where repeated to satiety. But now in the multiplication of people and of facilities of communication, in the different social life and the open life of the streets, a single season gives one an absolute weariness of a fixed design that has been reduplicated as if from a reflector whose mirrors were infinite; and one craves for a change in the design as much more eagerly than one craves for a change in the diet as the eye and the fancy happen to be nobler and more active things than the appetite.

We have received advices lately that a reactionary movement is under way in Italy, whose object is to restore the primitive and pure costume of the country. Exactly at what period the primitive and pure costume reigned we are not told; and as opinions will have a wide range upon the subject, we suppose that we may see the revival, according to taste, of the old Etrurian robes, of the Pompeian négligé, of the Roman matron's sandals and shoulders, and of the somewhat savage splendor of the medieval era—perhaps more of the last than of the others, since the paintings from which the dresses are to be copied are chiefly of medieval manufacture; and thus an evening party in Rome or Florence or Naples will be quite as fine as a fancy ball, and will give us LAVINIA and TARPEIA and CALPURNIA and LUCREZIA BORGIA chatting amicably together, while, if their lovers and husbands follow suit, ROMULUS and HILDEBRAND and MACCHIAVELLI will stand in waiting, a little ashamed of the figure they present. But we do not believe that any one of them all will long stay satisfied with the peculiar and particular adoption of the individual; and we doubt not that LUCREZIA will be stealing a bracelet from TARPEIA, and CALPURNIA will find LAVINIA's head-dress the more becoming; and innovation once begun, the whole thing can only drift back to WORTH.

It is true that among those who are not the advocates of such rather romantic ideas as this and kindred propositions involve we have many who in a slavish submission carry every fashion to excess. But that matter has become so largely a question of good taste or the reverse that it can be left to regulate itself, since the better portion of the fashionable world leaves excess to its inferiors, though never allowing itself to be behind the times.

For the fact is that the real lady desires above all things to be inconspicuous; notoriety and the staring eye of the passer are things utterly objectionable to her; and she knows that she would find herself as marked and conspicuous a being by neglecting to follow the fashions in a certain degree as she would be by running in advance of them; and she therefore preserves that golden mean that all philosophy approves—her dress is the outward expression of an inward refinement, and she does not presume to erect her individual opinion against the combined opinion of the rest of womankind.

But, when all is said, we can not but marvel at the effrontery of the male critic who dares to meddle with fashion, and charge its abuses exclusively to the feminine account. Does he forget that his dress-coat of this year has quite a different cut across the hip from the dress-coat of last year? Does he forget that his waistcoat is open or close according to a whim of the ruling tailor? that his pantaloons have a power of expansion and contraction around his instep, as if they were made of India rubber? and that his silk hat, that a winter or two ago bade fair to taper away into a Puritan cone, now flares out in a bell-crown worthy of Beau BRUMMEL himself? And above all, when he cites the feminine frivolity and love of gauds, does he forget the lofty manner with which the male fraternities of secret societies cover themselves all over on parade days with silk embroideries and cheap jewels, and the air of ineffable satisfaction with which the majors of militia, and other members of that noble home-guard who never smelled powder, strut in their crimson sashes, their gold-lace, and epaulets, and waving plumes, through rain and mud, through hot and cold, repaid only by the barren glory of the admiration they excite along the streets?

We admit, for the sake of our own purposes, that women are at present the inferior half of the human animal. Naturalists tell us that the male in almost all cases is the finer and handsomer creature; that it is he who has the gay plumage, the noble mane, the great stature; that the pea-hen is a poor little object, with nothing but her breast to recommend her, while her mate trails the splendor she admires; that the hind misses the regal antler of the stag; that it is the male nightingale whose melody is so entrancing; and so by all analogies that it is the man who has the beauty and majesty and strength, and not the woman. What, then, more natural and pardonable than that the woman should seek to piece out her deformity by artificial means, and call in the ostrich and the silk-worm, the oyster and the madrepore, to assist her? All the more when she sees the value that men set on such decorations, as evinced by the strut of the soldier and the gold-lace of the official? And for the rest, in all seriousness, if women give these things undue attention and consideration, men must remember that they have themselves to thank for it; for as long as they award their adoration to the wearer of the superb toilette, so long will most other women raise heaven and earth—or what stand to them for those bodies, the promise of heaven and the comfort of earth—to obtain the same toilette. Meanwhile, frivolous as fashion may be, the perpetual criticism of it seems to us more frivolous still; and if the larger intellect is dissatisfied with the feminine result, we advise it to turn its powers to inventing something that shall not be open to such criticism.

AN EXCELLENT WAY.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

WHEN Truth says, confidently, "Work"—meaning physical labor—"is not for women," Incredulity replies, Yankee-like, "How are you going to help it?" and Truth, being truthful, must reply, "I don't know;" but, just the same, she goes on, calm and confident, singing her eternal song, "For woman tranquillity, leisure, large spheres, and social and mental scope."

There is a great deal to be done, and alas! a great deal to be suffered, before those larger spheres swing into reach; but much is gained if women, while toiling and moiling in the swamp lands of the lower world, can hear far off their majestic music, or even know that somewhere in the circling heavens they are sweeping on to sure attainment. Work, work, work—from weary chime to chime—but, all the same, the true life is to live not according to your necessities, but according to your aspirations; to live not in constant repression, but in constant growth; to work not by will, but by instinct; to do what you must not from outward force, but inward fervor.

It is no argument against success that you see not how it is to be accomplished. Settle what success is to be, and then work up to it. The children are brimful of lessons in the way to do it. Star-flower is the most useless little blossom that ever opened, and no queen is more loyally attended. Baby-in-breeches never earned a pinch of salt, yet he is the very salt of the earth. When Star-flower presents herself at the door, blooming from her bath, her face radiates smiles all over the universe at the welcome she is going to receive, although not a word is spoken, nor perhaps a look cast in her direction. Her confident soul plucks its triumph beforehand. She assumes fidelity and homage, and is never disappointed. She has no self-conceit; is not concerned with the impression she produces; is intent only on accomplishing her objects. What if her single-mindedness and simple faith could go on through life? What if she could rise upon the world each morning, as smiling, as undaunted, as straightforward, as unsuspecting? What if she could always be content to be, and leave to the hard, striving, masculine world the task to know?

Or look again: the strong man armed comes into the room, and Little Breeches, aware what such shoulders were made for, climbs by short and easy stages to a seat thereon, and rides aloft in triumphant silence. Star-flower, peering amidst the forbidden ruins of the overturned work-basket, suddenly catches a glimpse of the performance, and immediately her soul rises above rubbish; by vigorous use of her two little hands, and an emphatic double back action, she gains her two little feet, trots out to front the centaur, stretches up her chubby arms and steepest tiptoes, and with an inarticulate but most significant outcry of mingled entreaty and imperiousness, claims her right to the other shoulder. Perched on the desired summit, peace settles on her brow, joy shines in her eyes, and riding up and down beneath the chandeliers, she coos out an Io triumphe as soft and sweet as the gurgling of a hidden brook in the leafy woods of June.

That is all she wants—her share of the goods of life. She claims no pre-eminence, only her portion. When Little Breeches descends, she writhes spontaneously downward. When Little Breeches does not mount, the shoulders are free from her incursions. But the altitude and the freedom that please him, by that token please her, and with no thought of propriety, and no drawback from consequences, she asserts herself, and is not only justified but glorified.

Now if Star-flower will but bloom into her womanhood, and glow through her womanhood, on the same direct and simple principle, how fragrant will be the hedge-row where she springs! Not submission, not aggression, neither self-surrender nor self-obtrusion, but clearness to see and quickness to claim, and resolution to secure and grace to compel, what is by divine right and human courtesy hers, and what it is to the world's enjoyment and advantage to award: for the whole house is brightened and bettered because Star-flower will have the other shoulder!

Will it make her selfish and exacting? Is it for a woman to be always withdrawing herself to the centre of obscuration lest she be relegated thither by force of dislike? Why look at Star-flower again. "Come to me, Star-flower, come to me!" says Little Breeches, standing across the room, and bending toward her with outstretched arms, all the commanding sweetness of love in his tender voice; and as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end, the little willful woman hears and heeds the tone of love, and speeds swiftly to the close-clasping arms of the little man, and all their joy bubbles up in merry musical laughter. Submission, obedience, duty, subordination—no, it is none of these; let not such things be once named among you, as becometh saints. It is something better. It is spontaneity reaching farther toward the heavenly goal than duty can ever be spurred. Ah! be sure, with all her ignorance Star-flower knows what is what. She has never mapped out her course but by the divine instinct, as yet unwarped; she knows when to impel and when to accord—and her following is all the dearer because she is not slow to lead. Perhaps when Star-flower grows a woman the woman-world will be but little easier than now, but I think it will be that little easier. The only peace of the present is the fore-gleam of that tranquil future. There needs only to be the same rate of progress as in the past, and we can see that the millennium is not unattainable, even in this world. By the conquests of mechanical power many a burden has been lifted from both men and women. It is not a heroic, not a poetical, but it is a very effective way of overcoming the world. It is difficult to find romance in a cheese factory, but a cheese factory lightens the load on many a weary shoulder. When we look back and see how much used to be done in every house by one woman's hands that is now done in one house by many iron fingers, from how many forms of manual service the poorest women are now freed, is it Quixotic to think that ingenuity is not yet exhausted? Since man has already taken upon his own hand, still more upon his own brain, so much of the work that used to weigh upon women, is it idle to think that he will go on assuming, devising, combining, through the slow, swift years, till, silently, a revolution is accomplished, and without sound of hammer or axe, without so much as intent of reconstruction, but only by the instinctive working out of destiny—the man his, and the woman hers—behold, a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness!

Hosted by Google

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BLACK TAFFETA SILKS.

LUSTROUS smooth taffeta silk is now the first choice in black silks for summer dresses. This is far lighter and more pleasant to wear than gros grain; does not catch dust, or cut and crease readily. It is not yet the most popular silk, but is preferred by ladies who lead the fashions. Bonnét's taffetas range from $2 50 a yard upward; the quality most used by modistes costs $3; it may be found as high as $4 or $5 a yard.

SUMMER GROS GRAINS.

Among gros grains the fine-grain small reps are more sold than heavy reps at this season. Bonnét's summer gros grains are of very light quality, with small reps, and have almost as full lustre as taffeta. They cost from $3 upward. Ponson's glossy black summer silks are sold for $2 25 or $2 50 a yard, the lowest price ever asked for these grades. Stewart's family silk is a light, lustrous summer gros grain, sold for $2 85 a yard. Watered silk, plain and in stripes, is sold for parts of dresses and for trimming: price $5 a yard. Silks are cheaper this year than last, and the object now is to get pure silks of the best quality, with fine gloss, instead of those demi-lustre heavily repped silks that are filled in with inferior silk.

HOW TO MAKE BLACK SILK DRESSES.

Black silk costumes are the most important part of a modiste's importations, as almost every customer buys at least one such suit a year. Among those examined at the best houses we find the lower skirt made usually with two side gores and one full back breadth, though there is still a fancy for using only one side gore and two full back breadths. These skirts are not lined, as it makes them too heavy, but are faced with crinoline three-eighths of a yard deep, with a narrow overfacing of silk, and the edge is bound with worsted braid in the old-fashioned way. The top of the skirt is sewed to the belt with scarcely any gathers in the three front breadths, but a deep pleat is laid under the side seams; the back breadths are fulled in French gathers or ganging. The skirt is made long enough to lie on the floor at least a quarter of a yard, but French dress-makers have an excellent and simple plan for shortening the dress for the street, as Parisian ladies have too much good taste to wear long dresses on the sidewalk. Their plan is to sew a tape casing inside the skirt, beginning an inch below the belt on each front seam, extending it gradually lower backward, so that it will be a quarter of a yard below the belt at the placket opening in the middle of the back. A drawing-string is then put in each casing, and when the skirt is put on these are tied tight behind the person; this draws the skirt up in a puff on the tournure, and shortens it gracefully, without hooping or dipping. For skirt trimming the caprice is to arrange the front in wrapper fashion by putting six or seven lengthwise bias bands or puffs from the belt to the foot on the three front widths, while the back is covered with flounces. A band down the second side seam does away with the use of bows to conceal the ends of flounces. Four straight breadths of silk are enough for a flounce on the three back breadths. The lower edge of flounces is finished by a bias facing over an inch wide, with one or two very small piping folds put in the upper part of it; these are sewed in with blind stitches. All sewing-machine-work is objected to on silk dresses, and the entire costume, not excepting the skirt seams, is sewed by hand. Over-skirts of silk, and polonaise skirts, should not be lined, as their soft drapery is their beauty; to make them bouffant they must be worn over a tournure. The round apron over-skirt has strings low down in the second side seam to tie it backward; a sash loop and end made of part of a width of silk are put in each of the second side seams, while larger loops with two ends are behind. There is an attempt to do away with all wrinkled apron fronts, making three flat straight breadths tied smoothly down; large square pockets are set on such aprons. Basques have less pleating behind than formerly, and are more nearly square below the waist. Two tiny folds of piping edge the basques of elegant black silk suits that are elaborately trimmed elsewhere with jet and lace. Instead of vests and moiré antique collars, the stylish trimming for the front of basque-waists is now a Medici fraise of the silk, bias, double, and side-pleated, to stand upright around the neck. It stands three inches wide just behind where the pleats turn and form a box-pleat, and is graduated narrower half-way down the front of the corsage, where it slopes in to a bias band that passes up the fronts in vest shape. This standing fraise is very becoming with the high coiffures now in fashion. Coat sleeves are close and tight, and very simply trimmed with bias bands like straps, or else with a plain silk cuff, lined with stiff foundation. Jet trimmings on French dresses are showy and very light, being made of silk net with fine cut beads set in the meshes; jet ribbons, galloons, and laces sprinkled with jet are more stylish than the vine passementeries so long in use. The goffered fringe—a kind of crimped silk tape—and the fringes that are tied in the edge of the garment are most fashionable. Lace is used for trimming the stately princesse dresses. Modistes require from thirty to thirty-five yards of silk for a flounced costume or a house dress. $200 is asked for black taffeta suits made of silk worth $3 or $4 a yard; if lace and jet are added, the price is $300 or more.

MODEL BLACK SILK COSTUMES.

A stylish suit of black taffeta, simple enough to be easily copied, has the skirt trimmed with two groups of three bias lapping ruffles, each a finger length wide; a shell heading is above each group. Over this is a châtelaine redingote, also of black taffeta, trimmed with goffered tape fringe, headed by a bias band with two piping folds on the upper edge. Sash drapery on the left side and behind. Tight coat sleeves, with plain small cuffs, stiffly lined, and piped on the edge, with a row of piping and three buttons crossing them diagonally.

A most lady-like French suit of summer black gros grain has been copied in taffeta in all its small and dainty details, and is an excellent model for a young lady's spring suit. It consists of a basque with a Medici fraise, a round apron over-skirt, and a flounced skirt. The basque has no pleating behind, and is edged with two tiny folds. Two buttons (moulds covered with silk) define the waist behind, and two bias bands, piped on the edges, hang in loops from these buttons. The doubled silk Medici fraise has a bias piped band at the foot of it, and this band extends down each front in vest shape, and hangs in a point below. The tight sleeves have two bands above the wrist, hanging in a point below, with a button on each band. The full round apron over-skirt is edged with a bias band that has two pipings in its upper edge; the second side seam is caught up in four large pleats, that are covered with a sash loop and bias end of silk. Around the lower skirt is a ten-inch bias flounce, edged with a band and pipings, and headed by three narrow ruffles, a flat band, and an erect ruffle. Down the second gore are three long bias bands from the belt to the middle of the deep flounce.

A house dress of black taffeta is trimmed in "wrapper fashion" with six bias bands two inches wide, piped on one side, and a tiny ruffle on the other, straight down the front breadth and half of the first side gore; at the foot of these bands is a six-inch ruffle; two clusters of three gathered ruffles trim the back breadths, and an elaborate sash drapery of a width of silk with a bias band on the edges trims the upper part in lieu of an over-skirt. The basque is edged with two bias pipings, has two bias bands outlining a vest, and five piped bands on the tight sleeves.

Black silk suits glistening with jet and lace have kilt pleating from the knee down on the three front breadths, and two deep flounces, made of four straight widths, behind. The apron of the over-skirt is three gored breadths tied down flatly, without a wrinkle, edged with light jet galloon and thread lace, and ornamented with two immense pockets nearly square; the long back breadths of the over-skirt are pointed and very bouffant. These basques are also simply edged with two folds, and have lace passing up the front and standing like a fraise behind. Coat sleeves with cuffs.

Most superb of all is a princesse dress of richly repped black faille made by Worth. The waist and skirt behind are all in one, like a polonaise, and the front has a basque opening over an elaborate tablier of jet and lace, with lace flounces below headed by bands of jet net to which fringe is attached. The back breadths are caught in long slender puffed points to show flounced spaces between like an under-skirt. These stately dresses for grande dames are new, and too intricate for description; when they are simplified they will probably become the leading fashion. Empress dresses they are sometimes called.

The handsomest mourning silks with English crape trimmings are made after designs sent the widowed ex-Empress Eugénie. One specimen has seven bias crape bands piped with silk extending down the three front breadths; these are narrow at the top, but gradually widen to five inches below, where they are pointed, edged with goffered fringe, and fall in a pleated silk flounce at the foot. On the back are two straight gathered flounces of four breadths, half a yard deep, edged with a bias crape band an eighth wide. The top of the back width forms a panier puff, while in front is a short apron entirely of English crape, with the edge cut in squares and fringed. Plain long square basque, with crape Medici fraise, and close sleeves with square cuffs. White crêpe lisse pleating should trim the neck and wrists.

VARIETIES.

Imported cravat bows have black faille straps across China crape loops of pale rose, blue, lemon, or green; one slanting wide end of crape hangs below, trimmed with a black band, on which is laid Valenciennes insertion and a lace frill.

Among French lingerie are linen collars that stand curving outward, with a Medici fraise of lace inside. Linen cambric is pleated in fraises, and the perfection of white neck-ties is bias linen cambric with a deep frill of pointed Valenciennes. Among small details we notice square ends of neck-ties are newer than pointed ones. Pale India silk neck-ties are trimmed with white lace and appliqué needle-work. Malines thread lace is preferred to Valenciennes. Napoleon blue silk ties with white dots are worn with black dresses.

Darkest green grenadine squares are in fashion for veils. They are grateful to the eyes, and a pleasant change from the pale gray shades so long worn.

A rose at the throat is worn in black lace strings of bonnets, or else in the black lace scarf that now takes the place of fur boas. A flower cluster is worn low behind the hat in the lace veil draperies.

New cambric handkerchiefs have two wide hems, the upper one being appliquéd, and both hem-stitched.

For information received thanks are due Miss SWITZER; Mrs. CONNELLY; and Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

THE new novel by WILKIE COLLINS, entitled The New Magdalen, now in course of publication in Harper's Magazine, is deemed to possess such sharp points as to be made available for the stage, and several playwrights are engaged in adapting it for public representation. Mr. COLLINS himself, it is intimated, is preparing a version for Miss CARLOTTA LE CLERC.

—Should Professor AGASSIZ exist until the 28th of May, he will complete his sixty-ninth year. He has been in this country since 1846, and during the last forty years has contributed as many new facts to natural history as any naturalist, not excepting CUVIER. We regret to hear that the professor is not in robust health.

—That clever and versatile man, M. H. VILLEMESSANT, whose Mémoires d'un Journaliste have just appeared, in two volumes, founded in thirty years no less than seventeen papers. He naïvely asserts, after all this experience, "I see things as a philosopher, and am certain that I see right."

—Lord HOUGHTON, formerly Mr. MONKTON MILNES, has written a new work, to be published in a few days, under the title of Monographs: Personal and Social, which will give sketches and anecdotes of the most prominent men of the time. Of the late WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR he writes that during some portion of his last six years' residence in Italy he lived with the family of Mr. STORY, the American sculptor, who declares that "his visit has been one unalloyed delight to them, and this quite as much from his gentlemanliness and simple habits, and evident readiness to be pleased with the least attention, as from his conversation, which would be attractive under any circumstances. He may be managed with the greatest ease by civility alone. To some inquiry respecting his deficient sleep he replied, 'I ought not to complain; I shall very soon sleep twenty-four hours out of the twenty-four.'" Lord HOUGHTON's account of the Rev. SYDNEY SMITH presents a side of the witty divine's character which his humor has thrown into the shade. It is hardly known that he was one of the most eloquent and impressive pulpit orators known to the English pulpit within this century, only surpassed—in the opinion of good judges who had heard both—by the late F. W. ROBERTSON.

—Mrs. FOGGO, wife of the rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia, has presented to Independence Chamber, in that city, one of the chairs that were in the chamber at the time they did the Declaration. This is the eighth that has been restored to the old hall. It passed into the hands of FRANCIS HOPKINSON, one of the Signers, and the lady who gives it is his great-granddaughter.

—Miss MARY HEALY, the author of the pleasant stories, A Summer Romance and Lakeville, has accepted the invitation of the Princess of Wallachia to pass the summer in that romantic region, which has hitherto been little explored by tourists. Her father, the American artist, GEORGE HEALY, has painted the portraits of the Wallachian Prince and Princess, and is to complete the group by that of the Crown Prince, while his daughter takes notes of the picturesque court and people, which we shall probably some day see in print. It is pleasant to know that Miss HEALY, despite of, or perhaps in consequence of, her years of foreign residence, remains ardently American, and proclaims every where that there's no place like home.

—Miss EMMA L. HUBBARD, daughter of Superintendent E. A. HUBBARD, late of Springfield, has just graduated from the law school of Michigan University, at Ann Arbor, with the title of "Bachelor of Laws." Why not "Mademoiselle of Laws?"

—Curious scene: English Court of Justice: Judge Baron MARTIN, of the Norwich City Assizes, was recently presented with a pair of white gloves as a symbol of a blank calendar. The performance of this ceremony has been balked by criminals for more than forty years. It never occurred in this metropolis.

—From the Rev. Dr. ANGUS, of Sheffield, comes word that the work of revising the New Testament will be completed in seven years, and the Old Testament in twelve years, if the committee continue, as at present, to devote forty days a year to the work. He also says that the Americans have appointed two committees, to whom the English work is referred for suggestion. The completed work will, therefore, represent the united scholarship of the English-speaking people.

—A man somewhat notable among notabilities has recently died in Paris—M. GOSCHLER. For thirty years he assisted M. THIERS in his historical compositions, and during that time was always in his anteroom at five in the morning. Endowed with an extraordinary memory, learned in all the principal living languages, and as skilled in reading obscure manuscripts as in collecting documents and condensing dispatches, every morning he brought to the historian the materials for his work of the day. It was M. GOSCHLER who opened the overwhelming correspondence of M. THIERS, and replied to the numerous letters asking for assistance; and he has often said that he knew no one more generous or more discreet in his generosity than the great historian.

—New York is offering pecuniary bait to some of Boston's best church singers, and they take it. Mr. F. PACKARD, now tenor at St. Paul's, comes to Christ Church, Fifth Avenue, at $2500 a year. Mr. NELSON VARLEY, the tenor who sang with Madame RUDERSDORFF, is to be added to the same choir, of which Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, basso, is a $3000 member. Other good Boston singers have their eyes turned this way.

—When BISMARCK saw his son disappear where the battle of Gravelotte was fiercest, he left the royal party and went into a tent to hide his expression of grief. Unfortunately the tent was too small, and it is implied that the grave Premier's legs stuck out, and ludicrously evinced by their action the emotion of their possessor.

—Few men were more acute in business than Lord LYTTON. He drove close bargains with his publishers. His agreement with Messrs. ROUTLEDGE for cheap issues of his novels was a profitable thing for him. They had the power of bringing out the works in two forms, and in return were to pay him a sum annually. In nineteen years they have paid him $150,000.

—Concerning the pronunciation of his name, some people pronounce it as DISRAELI, others Disrahli, others Dizrelly (the accent on the first syllable), others pronounce it Disrayli (the accent on the second syllable). In the course of a recent speech the owner of the name had to repeat it, when quoting the letter which he wrote to the Queen, and he adopted the last pronunciation, which is the one always given to it in society, except when "Dizzy" is used.

—Mr. WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, in a recent letter describing St. Augustine, Florida, says: "Since I visited it thirty years ago a great change has taken place in the constitution of society here: the slaves have been set free. I then observed that the negro race in the town had a sleek, well-fed look, and were for the most part neatly attired. In both respects it has seemed to me that there is a change for the worse."

—The King of Denmark has done a little compliment to Professor WATSON, of Michigan University. The professor in roaming over the firmament discovered a new asteroid, which he named Thyra, in honor of the King's daughter; so the Majesty of Denmark, in a neat and graceful letter, acknowledged the compliment, the Princess adding her signature.

—Baron HUBNER, the Austrian diplomatist, does not like America, and means to state it in a book. He traveled in a sleeping-car over some of our railways, and thus acquired an insight into our institutions. His impressions were not favorable; thinks that the United States are already on the down grade, and will by-and-by proceed to immortal smash.

—Two very old people are mentioned in late London papers, one alive, the other dead. The former is Count De Waldeck, who has just celebrated the 107th anniversary of his birth, and is building a theatre in Paris, of which he is to be the director. The other is Lady ACTON, recently deceased, who was born in 1756—137 years ago.

—Mr. G. H. LEWES is pronounced by a correspondent of the Tribune to be the ugliest man in London, and the most brilliant. He makes you forget his face in fifteen minutes, and at the end of an hour you pronounce him one of the most interesting men you ever met. When he and his wife, "George Eliot," lead conversation, their drawing-room becomes the most attractive in London. Mr. and Mrs. LEWES have a pretty house near Regent's Park, and, receiving every Sunday, collect around them the cleverest of men and women. Nothing can exceed the retiring manner of "George Eliot," whose voice is soft and low. She can not bear any reference to her own writings, and though her friends long to express their gratitude, they never dare outwardly to hint at inward emotion. Composition is no easy task to "George Eliot." She labors unceasingly to produce her results.

—There dwells on the banks of Lake Ontario, in this State, an earl—an unmitigated Scotch earl—the Earl of Mar—and every body in his town knows it. The title descends to him on the maternal side from PHILADELPHIA MONTEITH, Countess of Mar and Kellie. His father was an old Champlain steamboat captain. It is not known what freak brought him to this country, but he died here, leaving two children, the present heir to the title, which he refuses to accept, and a daughter in Philadelphia, named after her grandmother, the old countess. She is married to a wealthy man named BAYARD. Young MONTEITH married a farmer's daughter. He is a thorough American, caring only to hide his title, and refusing to be called any thing but Squire MONTEITH, though constantly receiving letters from the nobility abroad in full blazon of his rank. He also refuses all emoluments belonging to his earldom, such as tithes of fishery and woodland and grange, except those resulting from the crown.

—The last hours of the late Bishop M'ILVAINE were of that almost heavenly character that might have been looked for in a man so proverbial for saintliness of life. His disease was pulmonary apoplexy. On the day of his death he asked for three hymns to be read to him—"Just as I am," "Rock of Ages," and "Jesus, lover of my soul." He was then full of quiet joy at the prospect of soon seeing his dear Lord, and said, "I suffer no pain; the Lord is most merciful; this is dying in the Lord, and falling asleep in Jesus." And so the venerable and beloved bishop went to his rest. It is now over forty years since he was consecrated to his office in St. Paul's Chapel in this city, and his remains, when they reach this country, will be first conveyed to that place.

—The Baroness JAMES DE ROTHSCHILD has made a donation of 50,000 francs to the Jewish hospital built near Vienna by Baron NATHANIEL DE ROTHSCHILD.

—Miss ABBY HUTCHINSON, for many years the bright particular star of the "Hutchinson Family," has "changed her local habitation and her name," and become the wife of Mr. S. G. ANDERSON, of Minnesota.

—A man whose career has been a remarkable one has recently died in Bengal—Dr. WILLIAM BRYDON, C.B., of the Bengal Medical Service. He was the one solitary individual of the 13,000 soldiers and camp followers of the British army at Cabul who was neither killed nor taken prisoner in the memorable retreat from Cabul in January, 1842. Dr. BRYDON, after some hair-breadth escapes from the Afghans, reached Jellalabad alive, though wounded and exhausted, all the other persons composing the British force having been either killed or taken prisoners. Dr. BRYDON went through the rest of the siege of Jellalabad with the garrison under the command of Sir ROBERT SALE, and it was his singular fate to be again shut up, with Sir HENRY LAWRENCE, at Lucknow, and to pass uninjured through that long and trying siege.

—BEETHOVEN'S grand-nephew has become a newspaper man. The Berlin Journal says the family is destitute. It is also stated that Madame MARIE DE BEETHOVEN, wife of the composer's nephew, is a music-teacher at Rochester, New York.

Hosted by Google

Worsted Edging for Dresses, Wrappings, etc.—Imitation Guipure.—Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS edging is suitable for trimming dresses, paletots, Dolmans, mantelets, etc., and may be worked with black or colored—for instance, gray, brown, or écru—worsted or silk. Directions for working such edgings are given in Harper's Bazar, No. 45, Vol. V. The illustration Fig. 2, page 293, plainly shows the different layers of thread of the design figures.

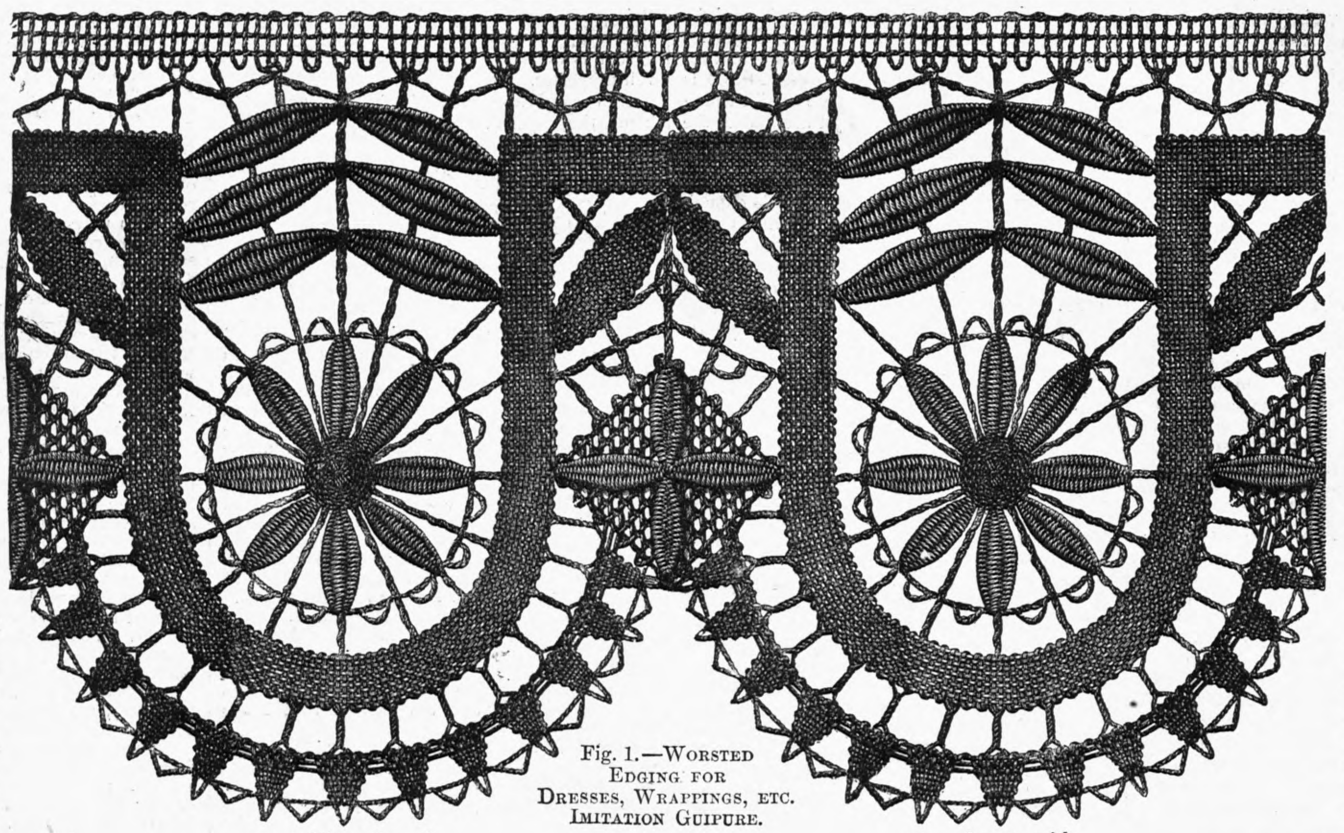

Fig. 1.—WORSTED EDGING FOR DRESSES, WRAPPINGS, ETC. IMITATION GUIPURE.

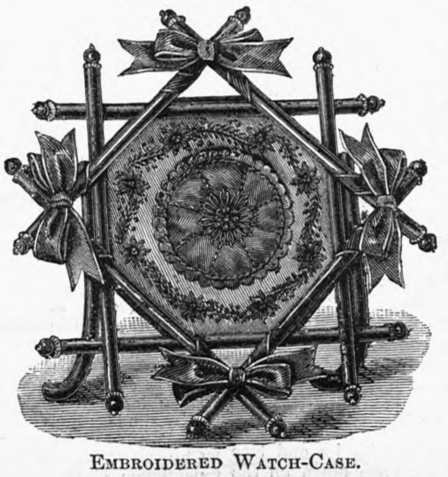
Basket Work-Stands, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—This stand is made of bars of light and dark bamboo, and is furnished with an open basket at the bottom, and another with a flat lid at the top, as shown by the illustration. Each basket is lined with red satin, which is wadded and quilted in diamonds with red silk. On the inside of the medallion-shaped lid is set a flat cushion covered with red satin, which is ornamented in satin and half-polka stitch embroidery with gray silk in several shades and with gold thread. Black and red knotted silk cord and tassels complete the trimming for the stand.

Fig. 1.—BASKET WORK-STAND.

The stand Fig. 2 is made of brown varnished bamboo, and is furnished at the top with an oblong four-cornered basket with a high curved lid, which is lined with light blue faille. At the lower part of the stand is a foot-board of bamboo sticks covered with a cushion of blue faille. Blue silk tassels trim the stand as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—BASKET WORK-STAND.



EMBROIDERED WATCH-CASE.

Embroidered Watch-Case.

THE frame of this watch-case is made of bars of fine varnished black cane, fastened together, as shown by the illustration, with small pins, and ornamented at the ends with black beads. Into this frame is fastened a piece of card-board, which is covered with gray faille ornamented in point Russe embroidery with brown and blue silk, and bound with blue silk. On the middle of this foundation sew a circular piece of double blue silk and wadding interlining, so as to form a pocket for the watch. Ornament this pocket in the middle with point Russe and knotted stitches, as shown by the illustration, stitch it with blue silk, and button-hole stitch the outer edge. Bows of blue silk ribbon complete the watch-case.

Cover for keeping Boiled Eggs warm, Figs. 1–3.

THE foundation of this cover, of which Fig. 1 shows a section reduced in size, is of white Java canvas covered with geometrical figures worked with coarse white cotton in point Russe and with gray cotton in Gobelin stitch, as shown by the illustration. The border is worked in a similar manner, and is edged with button-hole stitches forming points. Figs. 2 and 3 show each a full-sized section of the figures of the foundation and the manner of working them. For the fringe on the edge of the cover crochet two rounds with gray cotton as follows: 1st round.—* 2 sc. (single crochet) on the next 2 button-hole stitches of the edge (see Fig. 1), 4 ch. (chain stitch), pass over 4 button-hole stitches, 2 dc. (double crochet) separated by 1 ch. on the following 2 button-hole stitches, 4 ch., pass over 4 button-hole stitches; repeat from . 2d round.— 2 sc. on the next 2 sc., 5 ch., 2 dc. separated by 1 ch. on the ch. between the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, 5 ch.; repeat from *. On each ch. between 2 dc. in this net, always with the same number of st., 30 rounds, always going forward, and then draw the foundation thread out of the st. For the rim which joins the bottom and bag of the net crochet alternately with gray and white twisted cotton (the latter No. 30) seventeen rounds, always going forward, as follows: 1st round.—With gray cotton always alternately 4 sc. (single crochet) on the next st. of the last round of the bottom, 3 ch. (chain stitch). 2d round.—This and the following 2 rounds with white cotton. On each st. of the preceding round work 1 sc. 3d round.—1 stc. (short treble crochet) on every second following st., after each stc. 1 ch. 4th round.—On each st. work 1 sc. 5th to 10th rounds.—With gray cotton. Always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 2 ch., with the latter pass over 2 st. The dc. of these five rounds come on each other. 11th round.—This and the following round with white cotton. On each st. work 1 sc. 12th round.—Like the 3d round. 13th round.—With gray cotton. On each st. work 1 sc. 14th round.—This and the following round with white cotton. On each st. 1 sc., but after every 3 st. always crochet on 1 foundation st. of the upper netted part with the following 4 st. 15th round.—Like the third round. 16th round.—With gray cotton. Always alternately 3 sc. on the next 3 st., 1 picot (5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first ch.), with this pass over 1 st. Crochet the 17th round on the other side of the rim on the lower veins of the first round like the 14th round, then the 18th and 19th rounds like the 15th and 16th rounds. These two rounds project free over the netted parts at each side of the rim. The middle 6 dc. rounds worked with gray cotton are darned with white knitting cotton as shown by the illustration. Edge the outer edge of the bag with crochet ch. scallops of gray cotton, working on each netted st. 5 sc., 7 ch., 1 sc., three times alternately 11 ch., 1 sc., then 7 ch. and 5 sc.; in every following scallop fasten the first loop of 7 ch. to the last loop of the preceding scallop. Fold the last eight rounds of this netted part on the outside so that they form a kind of ruffle, and on the upper edge of the net work two rounds with gray cotton for the shirr. 1st round.—Crochet, fastening the st. of the 21st and 22d rounds of the netting together, * 2 sc. before, 2 sc. back of the next netted knot, between these work 2 ch., then 3 ch., and repeat from *. 2d round tie fringe tassels of white cotton, as shown by the illustration. If a heavier cover is desired, furnish it with a quilted lining of colored muslin, which is removed when it is washed.

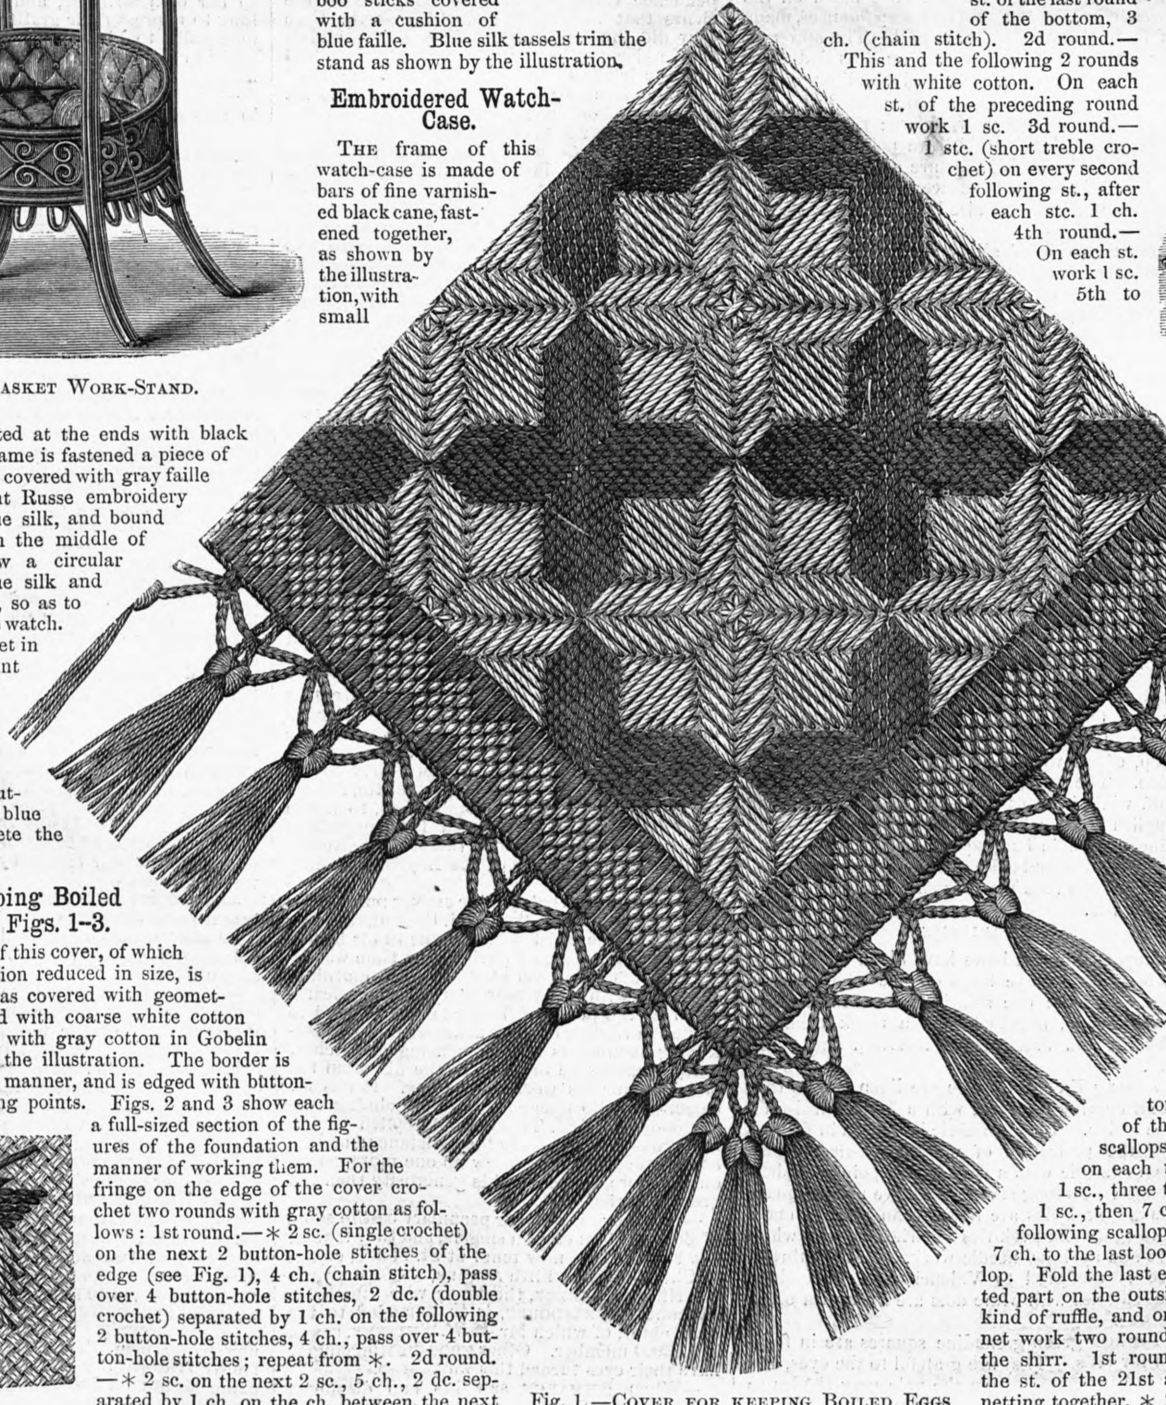


Fig. 1.—COVER FOR KEEPING BOILED EGGS WARM.—QUARTER SECTION.—REDUCED SIZE.

[See Figs. 2 and 3, and Fig. 2 on Page 293.]

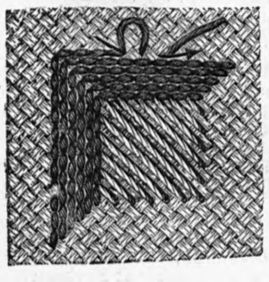

Fig. 2.—DETAIL OF COVER, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

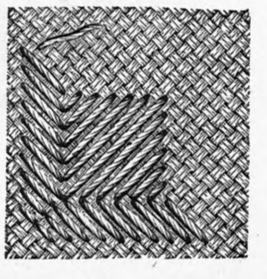

Fig. 3.—DETAIL OF COVER, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

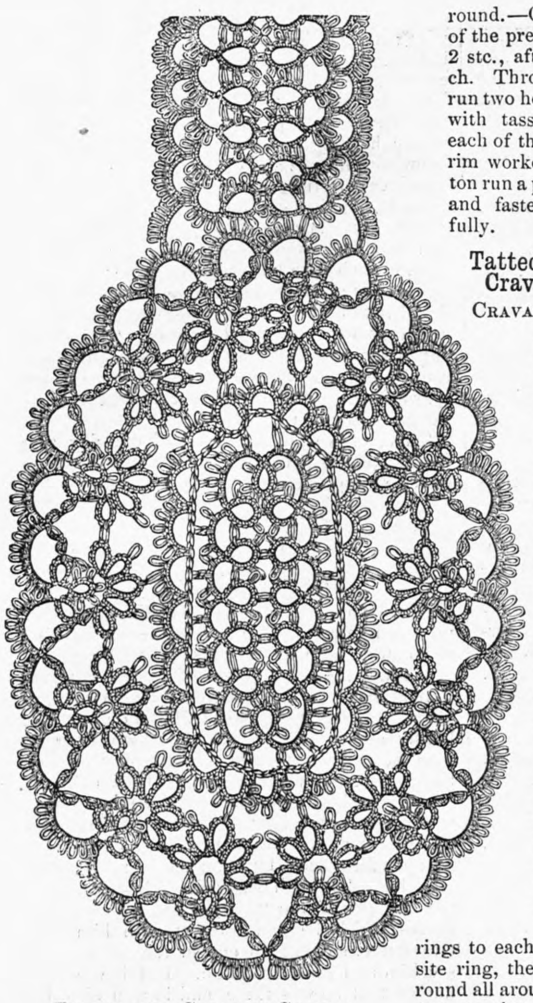
Netted and Crochet Net for boiling Eggs.

See illustration on page 293.

THIS net is worked partly in netting with coarse knitting cotton and partly in crochet-work with twisted white and gray cotton. To make it work with Estremadura, No. 2, first the bottom on a mesh seven-eighths of an inch in circumference, and net 31 st. (stitch) on a foundation thread, close these in a ring, and on the same mesh work nine rounds more, always going forward; in the 5th round, however, widen 1 st. at every third following st. Push the st. of the first round close together, and tie the ends of the working thread together. For the bag at the top cast on 41 st. on the same mesh, close them in a ring, and round.—On each ch. scallop of the preceding round work 2 stc., after these always 2 ch. Through the last round run two hemp cords trimmed with tassels, and through each of the dc. rounds of the rim worked with white cotton run a piece of whalebone, and fasten the ends carefully.

Hosted by Google



TATTED AND CROCHET CRAVAT OR BARBE.

Tatted and Crochet Cravat or Barbe.

CRAVATS or barbes of this kind may be worked with tatting cotton, No. 120, or else with fine black saddler's silk, and underlaid with black velvet or colored gros grain ribbon. Work alternately with one thread (shuttle) and with two threads: the scallops always with two threads, and the rings with one—the foundation thread. For each medallion-shaped end, beginning from the middle, work four rounds, as follows: 1st round.—∗ One ring of 3 ds. (double stitch—that is, one stitch left, one stitch right), 5 p. (picots) separated each by 3 ds., 3 ds., t. (turn the work so that the ring or scallop is turned downward), one scallop of 3 ds., 3 p. separated each by 3 ds., 3 ds.; t., three times alternately one ring and one scallop like the preceding; instead of forming the first p. in each ring, however, fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring; t., one ring like the preceding, t., one scallop of 3 ds., 6 p. separated each by 3 ds., 3 ds., t., one ring like the preceding, but instead of the middle p. fasten to the corresponding p. of the last ring, t., one scallop like the last, t.; repeat once more from ∗. Fasten the rings to each other and to the middle p. of each opposite ring, then fasten the threads. Border this tatted round all around with one crochet round, working, as shown by the illustration, always 1 sc. (single crochet) on the corresponding p., after each sc. 5 ch. (chain stitch). 2d round.—Fasten the threads to a middle stitch of a scallop of the crochet round, one scallop of 2 ds., 5 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., fasten to the middle stitch of the next ch. scallop, and so on; observe the illustration in working at the ends. 3d round.—∗ One ring of 6 ds., 1 p., 6 ds., close to this one ring of 8 ds., 1 p., 8 ds.; then one ring of 10 ds., fasten to a middle p. of a scallop of the preceding round, 10 ds.; one ring of 8 ds., 1 p., 8 ds.; one ring of 6 ds., 1 p., 6 ds.; t., six Josephine knots (for each of these work seven stitches right, and draw the row of stitches together, leaving a very narrow interval); t., repeat from ∗, but fasten the first ring of every following figure consisting of five rings to the last ring of the preceding figure. 4th round.—∗ One ring of 6 ds., fasten on between the fifth and sixth Josephine knots of a figure consisting of six such knots in the preceding round, 6 ds.; one ring of 2 ds., 5 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds.; one ring of 6 ds., fasten on between the first and second Josephine knots of the following figure, 6 ds.; t., one scallop of 2 ds., 10 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., fasten on between the middle two Josephine knots of the same figure, one scallop like the preceding, t., and repeat from ∗. In connection with the medallion (end) of the cravat finished in this manner work the middle part lengthwise in equal halves; each half counts two rounds—the first round consisting of rings and scallops, and the second round of scallops only. They are worked as plainly shown by the illustration. The middle of the cravat may be made of Swiss muslin and edged with tatted scallops.

FIG. 2.—MANNER OF MAKING CROCHET GIMP FOR CRAVAT, FIG. 1. FIRST DETAIL.

White Embroidery and Crochet Cravat or Barbe, Figs. 1–4.

THIS cravat or barbe is worked with white cotton or thread, or else with black silk. The middle of each of the medallions forming the end is worked, as shown by the illustration, in satin and half-polka stitch on Swiss muslin, or on black crape or net with white embroidery cotton or with black silk. For the inner part of the medallion, which is connected with the embroidered part, crochet a row of gimp of the requisite length. This gimp is worked on a metal needle or coarse hair-pin, as follows: First form a loop of the working thread, hold the loop and the hair-pin between the thumb and forefinger of the left hand, lay the working thread around the right prong of the hair-pin, as shown by Fig. 2, and over the forefinger of the left hand, and crochet 1 ch. (chain stitch). This forms one loop. ∗ Draw the crochet needle out of the stitch, turn the hair-pin from right to left so that the thread lies on the right prong, crochet 1 ch. and then 1 sc. (single crochet) on the upper layer of thread of the loop on the left prong. The place for this sc. is marked ● on Fig. 3. Repeat from ∗. When the hair-pin is closely covered with loops over half its length, slip off the finished part of the gimp from the hair-pin, and only take up the last two loops on the hair-pin to continue the work. After finishing the gimp, edge it on one side with one round of ch. and sc., always fastening together three loops of the gimp with 1 sc., after every sc. 4 ch.; overseam the ends of the gimp together, work a similar crochet round on the other side, in which work only 2 ch. after each sc., however, and then join the gimp there with the embroidered part by means of close button-hole stitches, as shown by the illustration. The outer edge of the medallion, and the middle part of the cravat at the same time, are formed of similar gimp, which is worked, however, with long loops on one side and short loops on the other side, as shown by Fig. 4. On the side of the gimp furnished with long loops crochet always 1 sc., with which fasten together three loops, after each sc. 4 ch. For the other round, which forms the outer edge, work always alternately 1 sc., with which two loops are fastened together, 5 ch. Join the gimp with the middle part of the medallion, overseaming the corresponding stitches together from the wrong side, as shown by the illustration. The middle of the cravat may also be made of a hemmed strip of Swiss muslin.

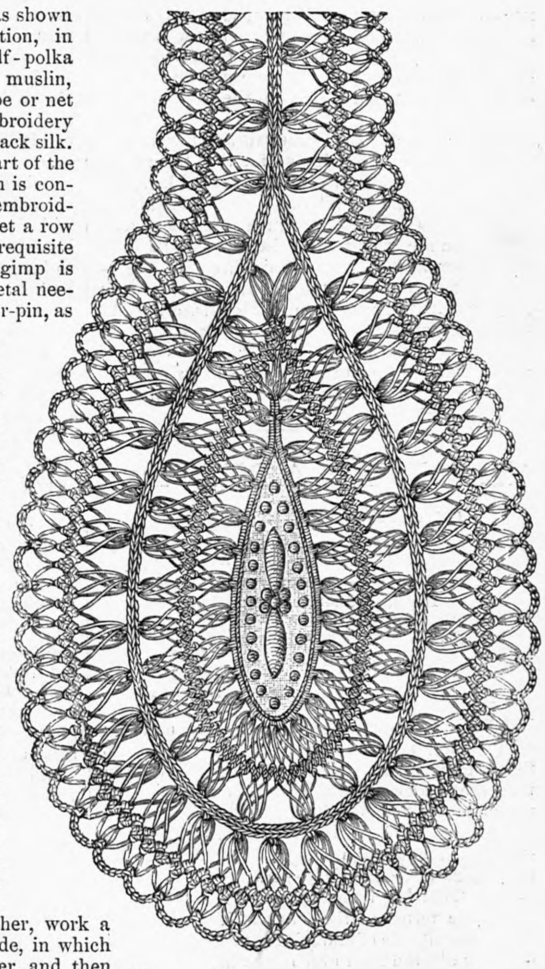

FIG. 1.—WHITE EMBROIDERY AND CROCHET CRAVAT OR BARBE.—[See Figs. 2–4.]

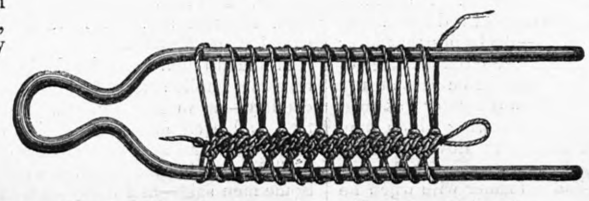

FIG. 4.—MANNER OF MAKING CROCHET GIMP FOR CRAVAT, FIG. 1.

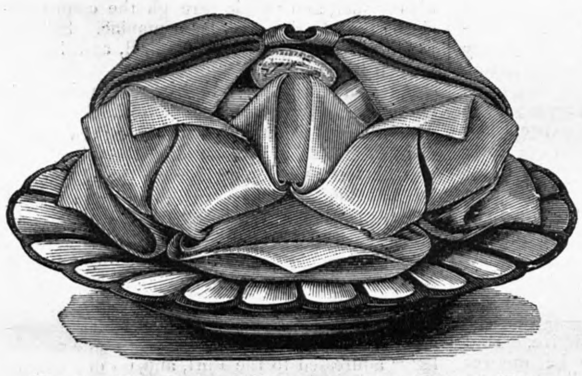

FIG. 1.—FOLDED NAPKIN FOR KEEPING BOILED EGGS OR POTATOES WARM.—[See Fig. 2.]

NETTED AND CROCHET NET FOR BOILING EGGS.

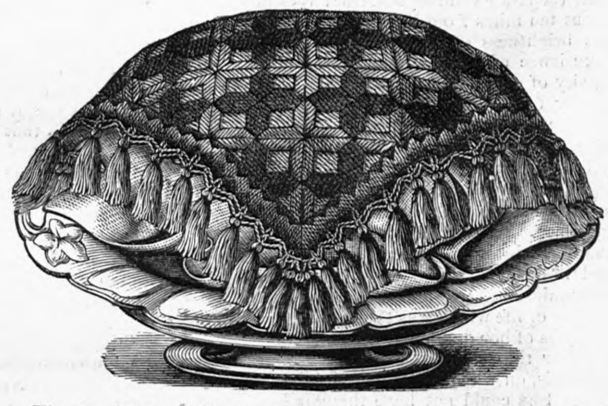

FIG. 2.—FOLDED NAPKIN FOR KEEPING BOILED EGGS OR POTATOES WARM (WITH COVER).—[See Fig. 1, Page 292.]

Open-work Silk Fichu.

THIS fichu is made of red open-work woven silk. It consists of a piece of material seventeen inches and three-quarters square, into which is knotted all around silk fringe six inches wide of the color of the fichu.

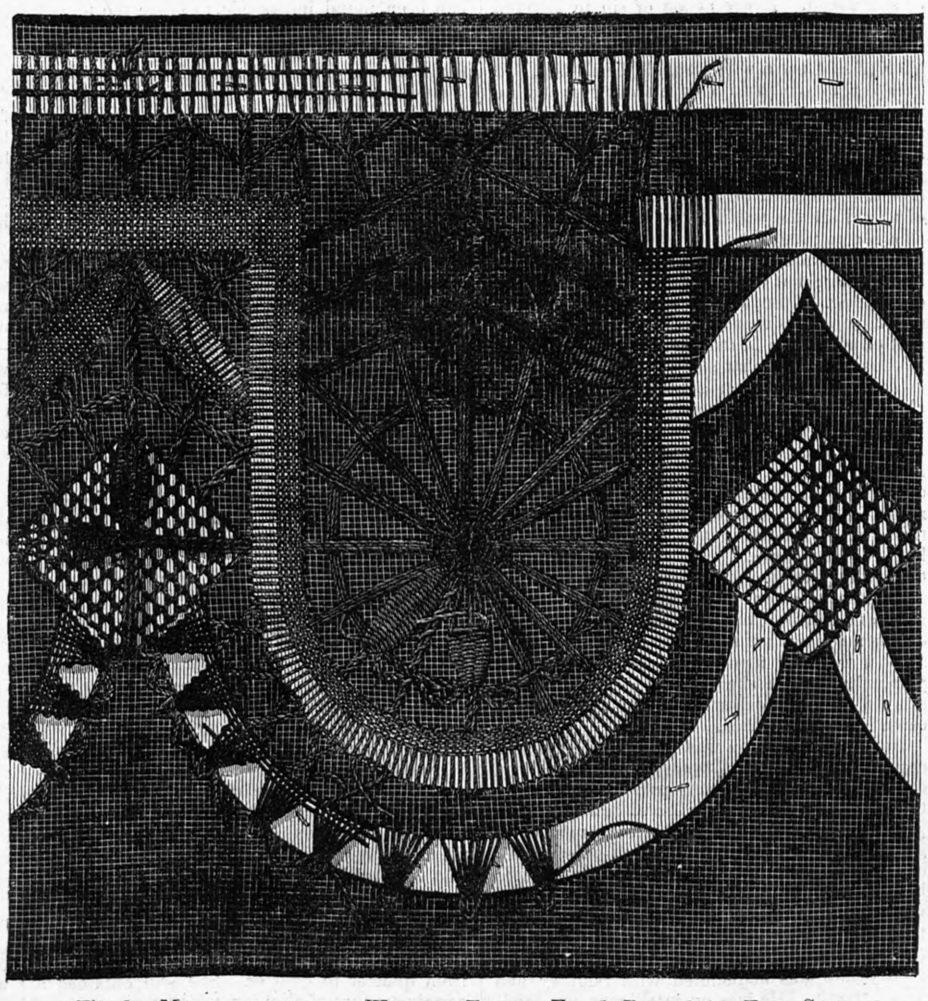

FIG. 2.—MANNER OF MAKING WORSTED EDGING, FIG. 1, PAGE 292.—FULL SIZE.

Folded Napkin for keeping Boiled Eggs or Potatoes warm, Figs. 1 and 2.

To make a holder of the kind shown by Fig. 1 take a square napkin, moderately starched and slightly damp, which should be as straight and rectangular as possible on the sides. Spread this napkin flat, turn down the four corners on the upper side so that they meet exactly in the centre, and repeat this proceeding twice with the several layers of the napkin, so that the upper side thus shows twelve corners alternating threefold above each other. Turn the napkin, repeat the same proceeding on the other side twice, in doing which eight alternate corners or points are brought together in the centre; hold the corners together with the left hand, and with the right hand draw out each of the four corners on the under side to the outside; the napkin now forms on the upper side four connected squares of equal size. It is well to lay the napkin, arranged in this form, in a press or under a heavy article for a time, and in turning down each corner the fold should also be pressed firmly. Then raise one of the outer four corners slightly with the thumb, press with the fore and middle fingers of both hands the upper layer of the corner turned toward the centre out on the outside so far that the raised corner forms a kind of standing, arched leaf (see illustration), and repeat this with the remaining three corners. Next draw out also the next four corners on the wrong side, raise them similarly to the former, at the same time arching them slightly, and fasten each in the middle with a pin on the inner leaves, which, in doing this, are gathered together as close as may be desired. Finally, also raise the remaining four corners on the wrong side, and turn them up. In serving eggs or potatoes the napkin is laid on a flat plate.

FIG. 3.—MANNER OF MAKING CROCHET GIMP FOR CRAVAT, FIG. 1. SECOND DETAIL.

Hosted by Google

LADY ANNA.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER I.

THE EARLY HISTORY OF LADY LOVEL.

WOMEN have often been hardly used by men, but perhaps no harder usage, no fiercer cruelty, was ever experienced by a woman than that which fell to the lot of Josephine Murray from the hands of Earl Lovel, to whom she was married in the parish church of Applethwaite —a parish without a village, lying among the mountains of Cumberland—on the 1st of June, 181–. That her marriage was valid according to all the forms of the Church, if Lord Lovel were then capable of marrying, no one ever doubted; nor did the Earl ever allege that it was not so. Lovel Grange is a small house, surrounded by a small domain—small as being the residence of a rich nobleman, lying among the mountains which separate Cumberland from Westmoreland, about ten miles from Keswick, very lovely, from the brightness of its own greensward and the luxuriance of its wild woodland, from the contiguity of overhanging mountains, and from the beauty of Lovel Tarn, a small lake belonging to the property, studded with little islands, each of which is covered with its own thicket of hollies, birch, and dwarfed oaks. The house itself is poor, ill built, with straggling passages and low rooms, and is a sombre, ill-omened-looking place. When Josephine Murray was brought there as a bride she thought it to be very sombre and ill-omened; but she loved the lakes and mountains, and dreamed of some vague mysterious joy of life which was to come to her from the wildness of her domicile.

I fear that she had no other ground, firmer than this, on which to found her hopes of happiness. She could not have thought Lord Lovel to be a good man when she married him, and it can hardly be said that she loved him. She was then twenty-four years old, and he had counted double as many years. She was very beautiful, dark, with large, bold blue eyes, with hair almost black, tall, well made, almost robust, a well-born, brave, ambitious woman, of whom it must be acknowledged that she thought it very much to be the wife of a lord. Though our story will be concerned much with her sufferings, the record of her bridal days may be very short. It is with struggles that came to her in after-years that we shall be most concerned, and the reader, therefore, need be troubled with no long description of Josephine Murray as she was when she became the Countess Lovel. It is hoped that her wrongs may be thought worthy of sympathy; but it can not be said of her that her marriage was founded on affection.

The Earl, when he found his bride, had been living almost in solitude for a twelvemonth. Among the neighboring gentry in the lake country he kept no friendly relations. His property there was small, and his character was evil. He was an English earl, and as such known in some unfamiliar fashion to those who know all earls; but he was a man never seen in Parliament, who had spent the greater part of his manhood abroad, who had sold estates in other counties, converting unentailed acres into increased wealth, but wealth of a kind much less acceptable to the general English aristocrat than that which comes direct from land. Lovel Grange was his only English property, and when in London he had rooms at a hotel. He never entertained, and he never accepted hospitality. It was known of him that he was very rich, and men said that he was mad. Such was the man whom Josephine Murray had chosen to marry because he was an earl.

He had found her near Keswick, living with her father in a pretty cottage looking down upon Derwentwater—a thorough gentleman, for Captain Murray had come of the right Murrays—and thence he had carried her to Lovel Grange. She had brought with her no penny of fortune, and no settlement had been made on her. Her father, who was then an old man, had mildly expostulated; but the ambition of the daughter had prevailed, and the marriage was accomplished. The beautiful young woman was taken away as a bride. It will be unnecessary to relate what efforts had been made to take her away from her father's house without bridal honors; but it must be told that the Earl was a man who had never yet spared a woman in his lust. It had been the rule, almost the creed of his life, that woman was made to gratify the appetite of man, and that the man is but a poor creature who does not lay hold of the sweetness that is offered to him. He had so lived as to teach himself that those men who devote themselves to their wives, as a wife devotes herself to her husband, are the poor lubberly clods of creation who had lacked the power to reach the only purpose of living which could make life worth having. Women had been to him a prey, as the fox is a prey to the huntsman and the salmon to the angler. But he had acquired great skill in his sport, and could pursue his game with all the craft which experience will give. He could look at a woman as though he saw all heaven in her eyes, and could listen to her as though the music of the spheres was to be heard in her voice. Then he could whisper words which, to many women, were as the music of the spheres, and he could persevere, abandoning all other pleasures, devoting himself to the one wickedness with a perseverance which almost made success certain. But with Josephine Murray he could be successful on no other terms than those which enabled her to walk out of church with him as Countess Lovel.

She had not lived with him six months before he told her that the marriage was no marriage, and that she was—his mistress. There was an audacity about the man which threw aside all fear of the law, and which was impervious to threats and interference. He assured her that he loved her, and that she was welcome to live with him; but that she was not his wife, and that the child which she bore could not be the heir to his title, and could claim no heirship to his property. He did love her—having found her to be a woman of whose company he had not tired in six months. He was going back to Italy, he said, and he even offered to take her; but he could not permit the farce of her remaining at Lovel Grange and calling herself the Countess Lovel. If she chose to go with him to Palermo, where he had a castle, and to remain with him in his yacht, she might for the present travel under the name of his wife. But she must know that she was not his wife. She was only his mistress.

Of course she told her father. Of course she invoked every Murray in and out of Scotland. Of course there were many threats. A duel was fought up near London in which Lord Lovel consented to be shot at twice—declaring that after that he did not think that the circumstances of the case required that he should be shot at any more. In the midst of this a daughter was born to her, and her father died—during which time she was still allowed to live at Lovel Grange. But what was it expedient that she should do? He declared that he had a former wife when he married her, and that therefore she was not and could not be his wife. Should she institute a prosecution against him for bigamy, thereby acknowledging that she was herself no wife, and that her child was illegitimate? From such evidence as she could get, she believed that the Italian woman whom the Earl in former years had married had died before her own marriage. The Earl declared that the Countess, the real Countess, had not paid her debt to nature till some months after the little ceremony which had taken place in Applethwaite Church. In a moment of weakness Josephine fell at his feet and asked him to renew the ceremony. He stooped over her, kissed her, and smiled. "My pretty child," he said, "why should I do that?" He never kissed her again.

What should she do? Before she had decided he was in his yacht sailing to Palermo—sailing, no doubt, not alone. What should she do? He had left her an income sufficient for the cast-off mistress of an earl—some few hundreds a year—on condition that she would quietly leave Lovel Grange, cease to call herself a countess, and take herself and her bairn—whither she would. Every abode of sin in London was open to her for what he cared. But what should she do? It seemed to her to be incredible that so great a wrong should befall her, and that the man should escape from her and be free from punishment, unless she chose to own the baseness of her own position by prosecuting him for bigamy. The Murrays were not very generous in their succor, as the old man had been much blamed for giving his daughter to one of whom all the world knew nothing but evil. One Murray had fired two shots on her behalf, in answer to each one of which the Earl had fired into the air; but beyond this the Murrays could do nothing. Josephine herself was haughty and proud, conscious that her rank was greater than that of any of the Murrays with whom she came in contact. But what should she do?

The Earl had been gone five years, sailing about the world she knew not where, when at last she determined to institute a prosecution for bigamy. During these years she was still living at the Grange, with her child, and the courts of law had allotted her some sum by way of alimony till her cause should be decided; but upon this alimony she found it very difficult to lay her hands—quite impossible to lay her hands upon the entirety of it. And then it came to pass that she was eaten up by lawyers and tradesmen, and fell into bad repute as asserting that claims made against her should legally be made against the very man whom she was about to prosecute because she was not his wife. And this went on till further life at Lovel Grange became impossible to her.

In those days there was living in Keswick a certain Mr. Thomas Thwaite, a tailor, who by degrees had taken a strong part in denouncing the wrongs to which Lady Lovel had been subjected. He was a powerful, sturdy man, with good means for his position, a well-known radical in a county in which radicals have never been popular, and in which fifty years ago they were much rarer than they are now. At this time Keswick and its vicinities were beginning to be known as the abodes of poets, and Thomas Thwaite was acquainted with Southey and Wordsworth. He was an intelligent, up-standing, impulsive man, who thought well of his own position in the world, and who could speak his mind. He was tall, massive, and square; tender-hearted and very generous; and he hated the Earl of Lovel with all his heart. Once the two men had met since the story of the Countess's wrongs had become known, and the tailor had struck the Earl to the ground. This had occurred as the Earl was leaving Lovel Grange, and when he was starting on his long journey. The scene took place after he had parted from his Countess—whom he never was to see again. He rose to his feet and rushed at the tailor; but the two were separated, and the Earl thought it best to go on upon his journey. Nothing further was done as to the blow, and many years rolled by before the Earl came back to Cumberland.

It became impossible for the Countess and her daughter, the young Lady Anna, as she was usually called, to remain at Lovel Grange, and they were taken to the house of Mr. Thwaite, in Keswick, as a temporary residence. At this time the Countess was in debt, and already there were lawsuits as to the practicability of obtaining payment of those debts from the husband's estate. And as soon as it was determined that the prosecution for bigamy should be instituted the confusion in this respect was increased. The Countess ceased to call herself a countess, as she certainly would not be a countess should she succeed in proving the Earl to have been guilty. And had he been guilty of bigamy the decree under which alimony was assigned to her would become void. Should she succeed, she would be a penniless, unmarried female with a daughter, her child would be unfathered and base, and he —as far as she could see—would be beyond the reach of punishment. But, in truth, she and her friend the tailor were not in quest of success. She and all her friends believed that the Earl had committed no such crime. But if he were acquitted, then would her claim to be called Lady Lovel, and to enjoy the appanages of her rank, be substantiated—or, at least, something would have been done toward substantiating those claims. But during this time she called herself Mrs. Murray, and the little Lady Anna was called Anna Murray.

It added much to the hardship of the woman's case that public sympathy in distant parts of the country—up in London, and in southern counties, and even among a portion of the gentry in Cumberland and Westmoreland—did not go with her. She had married without due care. Some men said—and many women repeated the story—that she had known of the existence of the former wife when she had married the Earl; she had run into debt, and then repudiated her debts; she was now residing in the house of a low radical tailor, who had assaulted the man she called her husband; and now she was living under her maiden name. Tales were told of her which were utterly false—as when it was said that she drank. Others were reported which had in them some grains of truth—as that she was violent, stiff-necked, and vindictive. Had they said of her that it had become her one religion to assert her daughter's right — per fas aut nefas—to assert it by right or wrong; to do justice to her child, let what injustice might be done to herself or others—then the truth would have been spoken.

The case dragged itself on slowly, and little Anna Murray was a child of nine years old when at last the Earl was acquitted of the criminal charge which had been brought against him. During all this time he had been absent. Even had there been a wish to bring him personally into court, the law would have been powerless to reach him. But there was no such wish. It had been found impossible to prove the former marriage, which had taken place in Sicily—or, if not impossible, at least no adequate proof was forth-coming. There was no real desire that there should be such proof. The Earl's lawyers abstained, as far as they could abstain, from taking any steps in the matter. They spent what money was necessary, and the attorney-general of the day defended him. In doing so the attorney-general declared that he had nothing to do with the Earl's treatment of the lady who now called herself Mrs. Murray. He knew nothing of the circumstances of that connection, and would not travel beyond his brief. He was there to defend Earl Lovel on a charge of bigamy. This he did successfully, and the Earl was acquitted. Then, in court, the counsel for the wife declared that his client would again call herself Lady Lovel.

But it was not so easy to induce other people to call her Lady Lovel.

And now not only was she much hampered by money difficulties, but so also was the tailor. But Thomas Thwaite never for a moment slackened in his labors to make good the position of the woman whom he had determined to succor; and for another and a longer period of eight years the battle went on. It went on very slowly, as is the wont with such battles, and very little way was made. The world, as a rule, did not believe that she who now again called herself the Countess Lovel was entitled to that name. The Murrays, her own people—as far as they were her own people—had been taught to doubt her claim. If she were a countess, why had she thrown herself into the arms of an old tailor? Why did she let her daughter play with the tailor's child—if, in truth, that daughter was the Lady Anna? Why, above all things, was the name of the Lady Anna allowed to be mentioned, as it was mentioned, in connection with that of Daniel Thwaite, the tailor's son?

During these eight weary years Lady Lovel—for so she shall be called—lived in a small cottage about a mile from Keswick, on the road to Grassmere and Ambleside, which she rented from quarter to quarter. She still obtained a certain amount of alimony, which, however, was dribbled out to her through various sieves, and which reached her with protestations as to the impossibility of obtaining any thing like the moderate sum which had been awarded to her. And it came at last to be the case that she hardly knew what she was struggling to obtain. It was, of course, her object that all the world should acknowledge her to be the Countess Lovel, and her daughter to be the Lady Anna. But all the world could not be made to do this by course of law. Nor could the law make her lord come home and live with her, even such a cat-and-dog life as must in such case have been hers. Her money rights were all that she could demand; and she found it to be impossible to get any body to tell her what were her money rights. To be kept out of the poor-house seemed to be all that she could claim. But the old tailor was true to her —swearing that she should even yet become Countess Lovel in very truth.

Then, of a sudden, she heard one day that Earl Lovel was again at the Grange, living there with a strange woman.

CHAPTER II.

THE EARL'S WILL.

NOT a word had been heard in Keswick of the proposed return of the old lord—for the Earl was now an old man, past his sixtieth year, and, in truth, with as many signs of age as some men bear at eighty. The life which he had led no doubt had had its allurements, but it is one which hardly admits of a hale and happy evening. Men who make women a prey, prey also on themselves. But there he was, back at Lovel Grange, and no one knew why he had come, nor whence, nor how. To Lovel Grange in those days, now some forty years ago, there was no road for wheels but that which ran through Keswick. Through Keswick he had passed in the middle of the night, taking on the post-horses which he had brought with him from Grassmere, so that no one in the town should see him and his companion. But it was soon known that he was there, and known also that he had a companion. For months he resided thus, and no one saw him but the domestics who waited upon him. But rumors got abroad as to his conduct, and people through the county declared that Earl Lovel was a maniac. Still his property was in his own control, and he did what it listed him to do.

As soon as men knew that he was in the land, claim after claim was made upon him for money due on behalf of his wife, and loudest among the claimants was Thomas Thwaite, the tailor. He was loudest and fiercest among the claimants, but was loud and fierce not in enmity to his old friend the Countess, but with a firm resolve to make the lord pay the only price of his wickedness which could be exacted from him. And if the Earl could be made to pay the claims against him which were made by his wife's creditors, then would the law, so far, have decided that the woman was his wife. No answer was made to any letter addressed to the Earl, and no one calling at the Grange could obtain speech or even sight of the noble owner. The lord's steward at the Grange referred all comers to the lord's attorneys in London, and the lord's attorneys simply repeated the allegation that the lady was not the lord's wife. At last there came tidings that an inquiry was to be made as to the state of the lord's health and the state of the lord's mind, on behalf of Frederic Lovel, the distant heir to the title. Let that question of the lord's marriage with Josephine Murray go as it might, Frederic Lovel, who had never seen his far-away cousin, must be the future earl. Of that there was no doubt—and new inquiries were to be made. But it might well be that the interest of the young heir would be more deeply involved in the marriage question than in other matters concerning the family. Lovel Grange and the few mountain farms attached to the Cumberland estate must become his, let the frantic Earl do what damage he might to those who bore his name; but the bulk of the property, the wealth of the Lovels, the great riches which had enabled this mighty lord to live as a beast of prey among his kind, was at his own disposal. He had one child, certainly, the Lady Anna, who would inherit it all were the father to die intestate, and were the marriage proved. The young heir and those near to him altogether disbelieved the marriage —as was natural. They had never seen her who now called herself the Countess, but who for some years after her child was born had called herself Mrs. Murray—who had been discarded by her own relations, and had taken herself to live with a country tailor. As years had rolled by, the memory of what had really occurred in Applethwaite Church had become indistinct; and though the reader knows that that marriage was capable of easy proof—that there would have been but little difficulty had the only difficulty consisted in proving that—the young heir and the distant Lovels were not assured of it. Their interest was adverse, and they were determined to disbelieve. But the Earl might, and probably would, leave all his wealth to a stranger. He had never in any way noticed his heir. He cared for none that bore his name. Those ties in the world which we call love, and deem respectable, and regard as happy, because they have to do with marriage and blood relationship as established by all laws since the days of Moses, were odious to him and ridiculous in his sight, because all obligations were distasteful to him—and all laws except those which preserved to him the use of his own money. But now there came up the great question whether he was mad or sane. It was at once rumored that he was about to leave the country, and fly back to Sicily. Then it was announced that he was dead.

And he was dead. He had died, at the age of sixty-seven, in the arms of the woman he had brought there. His evil career was over, and his soul had gone to that future life for which he had made it fit by the life he had led here. His body was buried in Applethwaite church-yard, in the further corner of which long straggling valley parish Lovel Grange is situated. At his grave there stood no single mourner—but the young lord was there, of his right, disdaining even to wear a crape band round his hat. But the woman remained shut up in her own chamber—a difficulty to the young lord and his lawyer, who could hardly tell the foreigner to pack and begone before the body of her late—lover had been laid in the grave. It had been simply intimated to her that on such a date—within a week from the funeral—her presence in the house could not longer be endured. She had flashed round upon the lawyer, who had attempted to make this award known to her in broken French, but had answered simply by some words of scorn, spoken in Italian to her waiting-maid.

Hosted by Google

Then the will was read in the presence of the young Earl—for there was a will. Every thing that the late lord had possessed was left, in one line, to his best-beloved friend, the Signorina Camilla Spondi; and it was stated, and very fully explained, that Camilla Spondi was the Italian lady living at the Grange at the date on which the will was made. Of the old lord's heir, the now existing Earl Lovel, no mention was made whatever. There were, however, two other clauses or parts in the will. There was a schedule giving in detail the particulars of the property left to Camilla Spondi; and there was a rambling statement that the maker of the will acknowledged Anna Murray to be his illegitimate daughter; that Anna Murray's mother had never been the testator's legitimate wife, as his real wife, the true Countess Lovel, for whom he had separately made adequate provision, was still alive in Sicily at the date of that will; and that by a former will, now destroyed, he had made provision for Anna Murray, which provision he had revoked in consequence of the treatment which he had received from Josephine Murray and her friends. They who believed the statements made in this will afterward asserted that Anna had been deprived of her inheritance by the blow with which the tailor had felled the Earl to the earth.

To Camilla Spondi intimation was given of the contents of the Earl's will as far as they concerned her; but she was told at the same time that no portion of the dead man's wealth would be placed in her hands till the courts should have decided whether or no the old lord had been sane or insane when he signed the document. A sum of money was, however, given her, on condition that she should take her immediate departure—and she departed. With her personally we need have no further concern. Of her cause and of her claim some mention must be made; but in a few pages she will drop altogether from our story.

A copy of the will was also sent to the lawyers who had hitherto taken charge of the interests of the repudiated Countess, and it was intimated that the allowance hitherto made to her must now of necessity cease. If she thought fit to prosecute any further claim, she must do so by proving her marriage; and it was explained to her, probably without much of legal or precise truth in the explanation, that such proof must include the disproving of the assertion made in the Earl's will. As it was the intention of the heir to set aside that will, such assurance was, to say the least of it, disingenuous. But the whole thing had now become so confused that it could hardly be expected that the lawyers should be ingenuous in discussing it.

The young Earl clearly inherited the title and the small estate at Lovel Grange. The Italian woman was prima facie heiress to every thing else—except to such portion of the large personal property as the widow could claim as widow in the event of her being able to prove that she had been a wife. But in the event of the will being no will, the Italian woman would have nothing. In such case the male heir would have all if the marriage were no marriage, but would have nothing if the marriage could be made good. If the marriage could be made good, the Lady Anna would have the entire property, except such portion as would be claimed of right by her mother, the widow. Thus the Italian woman and the young lord were combined in interest against the mother and daughter as regarded the marriage; and the young lord and the mother and daughter were combined against the Italian woman as regarded the will; but the young lord had to act alone against the Italian woman, and against the mother and daughter, whom he and his friends regarded as swindlers and impostors. It was for him to set aside the will in reference to the Italian woman, and then to stand the brunt of the assault made upon him by the soi-disant wife.

In a very short time after the old Earl's death a double compromise was offered on behalf of the young Earl. The money at stake was immense. Would the Italian woman take £10,000, and go her way back to Italy, renouncing all further claim? and would the soi-disant Countess abandon her title, acknowledge her child to be illegitimate, and go her way with another £10,000—or with £20,000?—as was soon hinted by the gentlemen acting on the Earl's behalf. The proposition was one somewhat difficult in the making, as the compromise, if made with both, would be excellent, but could not be made to any good effect with one only. The young Earl certainly could not afford to buy off the Italian woman for £10,000, if the effect of such buying off would only be to place the whole of the late lord's wealth in the hands of his daughter and of his daughter's mother.

The Italian woman consented. She declared with Italian energy that her late loving friend had never been a day insane; but she knew nothing of English laws, and but little of English money. She would take the £10,000—having had a calculation made for her of the number of lire into which it would run. The number was enormous, and she would take the offer. But when the proposal was mentioned to the Countess, and explained to her by her old friend, Thomas Thwaite, who had now become a poor man in her cause, she repudiated it with bitter scorn—with a scorn in which she almost included the old man who had made it to her. "Is it for that that I have been fighting?" she said.

"For that in part," said the old man.

"No, Mr. Thwaite, not for that at all; but that my girl may have her birth allowed and her name acknowledged."

"Her name shall be allowed and her birth shall be acknowledged," said the tailor, in whose heart there was nothing base. "She shall be the Lady Anna, and her mother shall be the Countess Lovel." The estate of the Countess, if she had an estate, then owed the tailor some five or six thousand pounds, and the compromise offered would have paid the tailor every shilling, and have left a comfortable income for the two women.

"For myself I care but little," said the mother, taking the tailor's hand in hers and kissing it. "My child is the Lady Anna, and I do not dare to barter away her rights." This took place down at the cottage in Cumberland, and the tailor at once went up to London to make known the decision of the Countess—as he invariably called her.

Then the lawyers went to work. As the double compromise could not be effected, the single compromise could not stand. The Italian woman raved and stamped, and swore that she must have her half million of lire. But of course no right to such a claim had been made good to her, and the lawyers on behalf of the young Earl went on with their work. Public sympathy as a matter of course went with the young Earl. As against the Italian woman he had with him every English man and woman. It was horrible to the minds of English men and English women that an old English earldom should be starved in order that an Italian harlot might revel in untold riches. It was felt by most men and protested by all women that any sign of madness, be it what it might—however insignificant—should be held to be sufficient against such a claimant. Was not the fact that the man had made such a will in itself sufficient proof of his madness? There were not a few who protested that no further proof could be necessary. But with us the law is the same for an Italian harlot and an English widow; and it may well be that in its niceties it shall be kinder to the former than to the latter. But the Earl had been mad, and the law said that he was mad when he had made his will, and the Italian woman went away, raging, into obscurity.

The Italian woman was conquered, and now the battle was open and free between the young Earl and the claimant Countess. Applications were made on behalf of the Countess for funds from the estate wherewith to prove the claim, and to a certain limited amount they were granted. Such had been the life of the late Earl that it was held that the cost of all litigation resulting from his misdeeds should be paid from his estate; but ready money was wanted—immediate ready money, to be at the disposal of the Countess to any amount needed by her agent, and this was hardly to be obtained. By this time public sympathy ran almost entirely with the Earl. Though it was acknowledged that the late lord was mad, and though it had become a cause of rejoicing that the Italian woman had been sent away penniless, howling into obscurity, because of the old man's madness, still it was believed that he had written the truth when he declared that the marriage had been a mock marriage. It would be better for the English world that the young Earl should be a rich man, fit to do honor to his position, fit to marry the daughter of a duke, fit to carry on the glory of the English peerage, than that a woman, ill reputed in the world, should be established as a countess, with a daughter dowered with tens of thousands, as to whom it was already said that she was in love with a tailor's son. Nothing could be more touching, more likely to awaken sympathy, than the manner in which Josephine Murray had been carried away in marriage, and then roughly told by the man who should have protected her from even every harshly blowing wind of heaven that he had deceived her, and that she was not his wife. No usage to which woman had ever been subjected, as has been said before, was more adapted to elicit compassion and energetic aid. But nineteen years had now passed by since the deed was done, and the facts were forgotten. One energetic friend there still was—or we may say two, the tailor and his son Daniel. But public belief ran against the Countess, and nobody who was any body in the world would give her her title. Bets were laid, two and three to one against her; and it was believed that she was an impostor. The Earl had all the glory of success over his first opponent, and the loud boasting of self-confident barristers buoyed up his cause.

But loud-boasting barristers may nevertheless be wise lawyers, and the question of a compromise was again mooted. If the lady would take thirty thousand pounds and vanish, she should have the money clear of deduction, and all expenses should be paid. The amount offered was thought to be very liberal, but it did not amount to the annual income that was at stake. It was rejected with scorn. Had it been quadrupled, it would have been rejected with equal scorn. The loud-boasting barristers were still confident; but— Though it was never admitted in words, still it was felt that there might be a doubt. What if the contending parties were to join forces, if the countess-ship of the Countess were to be admitted, and the heiress-ship of the Lady Anna, and if the Earl and the Lady Anna were to be united in holy wedlock? Might there not be a safe solution from further difficulty in that way?

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Dark and light Blue.—Whewell's Life and Letters.—A poetical Cipher.

THOSE of your countrymen who have been in London toward the end of March this year will have observed with wonder half its population decorated with ribbons of dark and light blue, as though they were horses for sale or recruits for the army. The explanation of this is that every class of the population has identified itself more than ever with that great struggle for aquatic supremacy which takes place upon the Thames, a little before Easter, between our two universities, and every one wears their respective colors accordingly. It is, when you reflect upon it, a very remarkable fact that eighteen young gentlemen, in no way gifted above their fellows, should have the power to give so great a gratuitous entertainment to the largest city in the world. For weeks before the race comes off whole columns of the daily press are devoted to the "practice" of the crews, and even the state of health of individual members of it. If No. 5 of the Cambridge boat chance to develop a whitlow on his thumb, there is more sorrow expressed than at a national epidemic. If No. 3 of the Oxford boat is said to be "not a good stayer," or "touched in the wind," there is more universal gloom than when a southwester has sunk half the shipping in the Channel. One of the most enviable, but by no means the most creditable, positions in our elder university is to become a fellow of New College, the statutes of which demand that such shall be bene nati, bene vestiti, et mediocriter docti—well born, fashionably dressed, and moderately learned. But even these by no means exacting conditions are not required in "a university oar;" he is certainly not bene vestitus, since, when he meets the public eye, he has nothing on to speak of save a flannel waistcoat and trowsers to match; and I believe, as a general rule, he is not even moderately learned. Yet for a single afternoon half the population of London crowd bank and bridge and boat to do him honor. The heir-apparent with his two sons is on board the steamer which carries the umpire, all the nobility and gentry are in their carriages or on horseback by the river-bank, and the shoe-black leaves his post at the street corner—his occupation gone—and with a scrap of blue ribbon tied to his rags, repairs thither also. The ordinary traffic on the railways which tend Thamesward is suspended, while the numbers carried by the "specials" are stupendous. A friend told me yesterday he waited for thirteen trains upon the "underground" line, and yet could not wedge himself into one of them, so crowded were they from door to door. On the other hand, no train is allowed to pass over Barnes Bridge at all (a great coigne of vantage from which to watch the race), but 1500 persons are carried there and back again by the railway company at the handsome figure of fifteen shillings a head. For a house that commands a view of the spectacle from seventy to thirty pounds is asked for the afternoon, and for even a window from thirty pounds to five. The telegraph is almost monopolized by tidings of the result of this great event. By the banks of the Ganges it is known in ten minutes which has won between the banks of Thames. Before the sun goes down our fellow-countrymen in the under-world will have had the news flashed to them by Puck his girdle. Yesterday (March 29) was the thirtieth contest that has taken place, and the enthusiasm was greater than I have ever beheld it. Cambridge—laus Deo! (it is my own university)—won by three lengths, the time taken in doing the four miles and a quarter being the shortest on record—namely, nineteen minutes thirty-seven seconds.

During the week there have been all sorts of other inter-university matches, attracting more or less of the world of London—chess matches, billiard matches, racket matches, and athletic sports of all kinds—but the boat-race is our Aaron's rod, and swallows up what Mr. Wilkie Collins would term all the other serpents. It would be worth while to go and see Man and Wife acted—his dramatic protest against too much athletics—on some night after this great contest has been decided; and I only hope it will be played into next year, as it deserves, that I may have the chance.

Of course there is a great deal of monetary speculation upon the chances of dark and light blue, and the "market" is quoted in all the papers except the Times as regularly as the odds at Tattersall's. The leading journal has in this case taken upon itself the office of paterfamilias, and does its endeavor to "exclude the element of gambling from this honorable contest;" but still, I observe, on the morning of the race it published, for the benefit of such of the community as it might unhappily concern, the fact that the betting was two to one upon those who afterward proved the winners. This is rather ridiculous, for your betting men will bet, of course, on every thing, whether it be a horse-race or a race between two drops of rain upon a window-pane; and as for the university men themselves, they know a great deal more about the probabilities of success than any writer in the Times is likely to tell them.

Speaking of the university reminds me that Dr. Whewell's life and letters are shortly to be published. He "rose from nothing," as the phrase goes, to a great position, and corresponded with all the men of science of his time. "Science," as you remember Sydney Smith wrote of him, "was his forte, and omniscience his weakness." Of this last foible many anecdotes are related. A number of scholars who were engaged to dine with him on a certain day agreed to read up various abstruse and out-of-the-way subjects, wherewith to puzzle him; but they found he knew a great deal more of them than they did. At last one tackled him upon the principles of Chinese music, and here he thought he had an advantage. "You do not appear to be acquainted with the treatise upon this subject in the Encyclopedia Britannica." "Nay, Sir; I ought to be so, since I wrote it myself, though I have since found reason to change my opinions."

Dr. Whewell was very fond of ladies' society, and in it dropped his somewhat Abernethyan (not to say bearish) manners. When ciphers were the rage some fair charmer asked him to invent a cipher for her—a large order, which did not, however, embarrass him in the least. He sat down on the very spot and wrote her one:

"U 0 A 0 but I 0 thee:
O 0 N O 0 but O 0 me."

Being a poet among his other accomplishments (indeed, he won the university prize for English verse), he afterward put this achievement into verse:

"You sigh for a cipher, but I sigh for thee:
Oh, sigh for no cipher, but oh, sigh for me!"

The Prince of Wales went recently to see the ministers lampooned at the Court Theatre. There was a Nemesis awaiting him for this, it seems; for some of the opening lines of the burlesque, which the actor had not the wit or the presence of mind to omit, had very pointed reference to the inhospitality of the Queen, through which our foreign guests are driven to take up their abode at Claridge's Hotel and elsewhere.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

SELECTED FROM "ADAM BEDE."

PERHAPS there is no time in a summer's day more cheering than when the warmth of the sun is just beginning to triumph over the freshness of the morning—when there is just a lingering hint of early coolness to keep off languor under the delicious influence of warmth.

I've seen pretty clear ever since I was a young un, as religion's something else besides doctrines and notions. I look at it as if the doctrines was like finding names for your feelings, so as you can talk of 'em when you've never known 'em, just as a man may talk o' tools when he knows their names, though he's never so much as seen 'em, still less handled 'em.

I like to read about Moses best, in th' Old Testament. He carried a hard business well through, and died when other folks were going to reap the fruits: a man must have courage to look at his life so, and think what 'll come of it after he's dead and gone. A good solid bit o' work lasts: if it's only laying a floor down, somebody's the better for it being done well, besides the man as does it.

I can't abide to see men throw away their tools i' that way the minute the clock begins to strike, as if they took no pleasure i' their work, and was afraid o' doing a stroke too much.....I hate to see a man's arms drop down as if he was shot, before the clock's fairly struck, just as if he'd never a bit o' pride and delight in's work. The very grindstone ull go on turning a bit after you loose it.

A foreman, if he's got a conscience, and delights in his work, will do his business as well as if he was a partner. I wouldn't give a penny for a man as ud drive a nail in slack because he didn't get extra pay for it.

We are led on, like the little children, by a way that we know not.

Family likeness has often a deep sadness in it. Nature, that great tragic dramatist, knits us together by bone and muscle, and divides us by the subtler web of our brains; blends yearning and repulsion; and ties us by our heart-strings to the beings that jar us at every movement. We hear a voice with the very cadence of our own uttering the thoughts we despise; we see eyes—ah! so like our mother's—averted from us in cold alienation; and our last darling child startles us with the air and gesture of the sister we parted from in bitterness long years ago. The father to whom we owe our best heritage—the mechanical instinct, the keen sensibility to harmony, the unconscious skill of the modeling hand—galls us and puts us to shame by his daily errors; the long-lost mother, whose face we begin to see in the glass as our own wrinkles come, once fretted our young souls with her anxious humors and irrational persistence.

Trouble comes to us all in this life: we set our hearts on things which it isn't God's will for us to have, and then we go sorrowing; the people we love are taken from us, and we can joy in nothing because they are not with us; sickness comes, and we faint under the burden of our feeble bodies; we go astray and do wrong, and bring ourselves into trouble with our fellow-men. There is no man or woman born into this world to whom some of these trials do not fall.

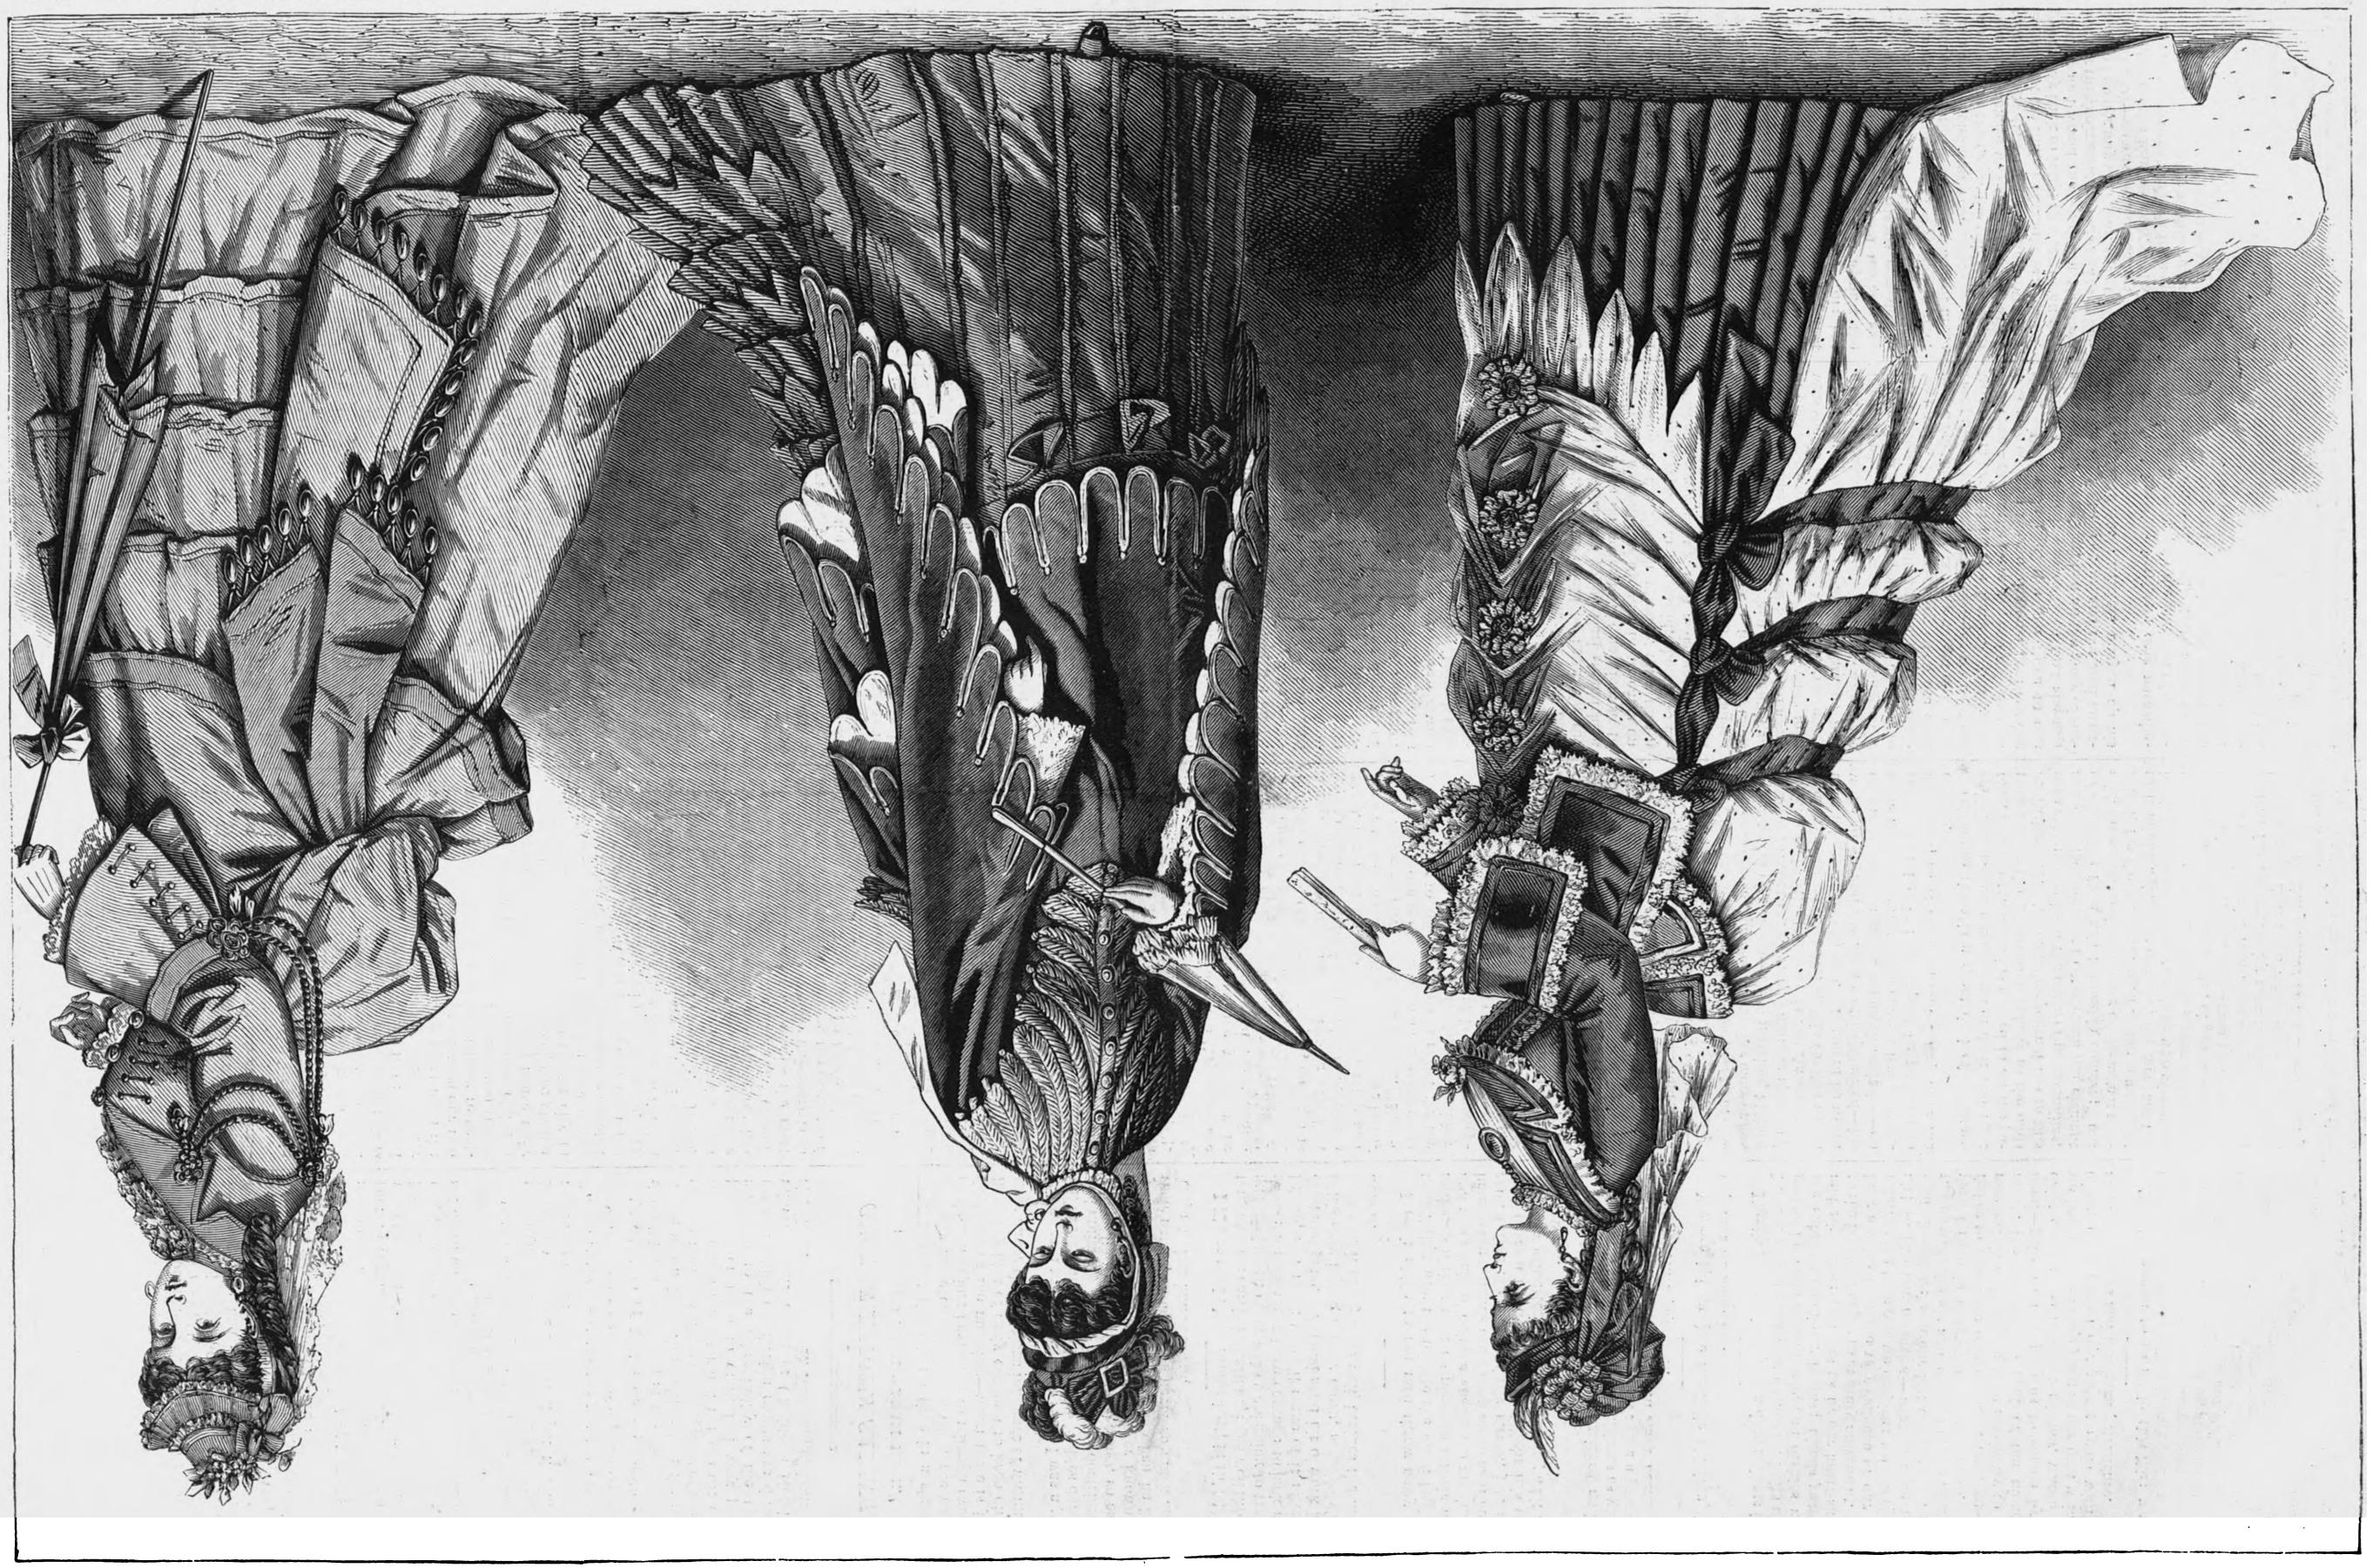
Trouble's made us kin.

Hosted by Google

SPRING VISITING SUIT.—[See Page 298.]

CARRIAGE COSTUME.—[See Page 298.]

RECEPTION COSTUME.—[See Page 297.]

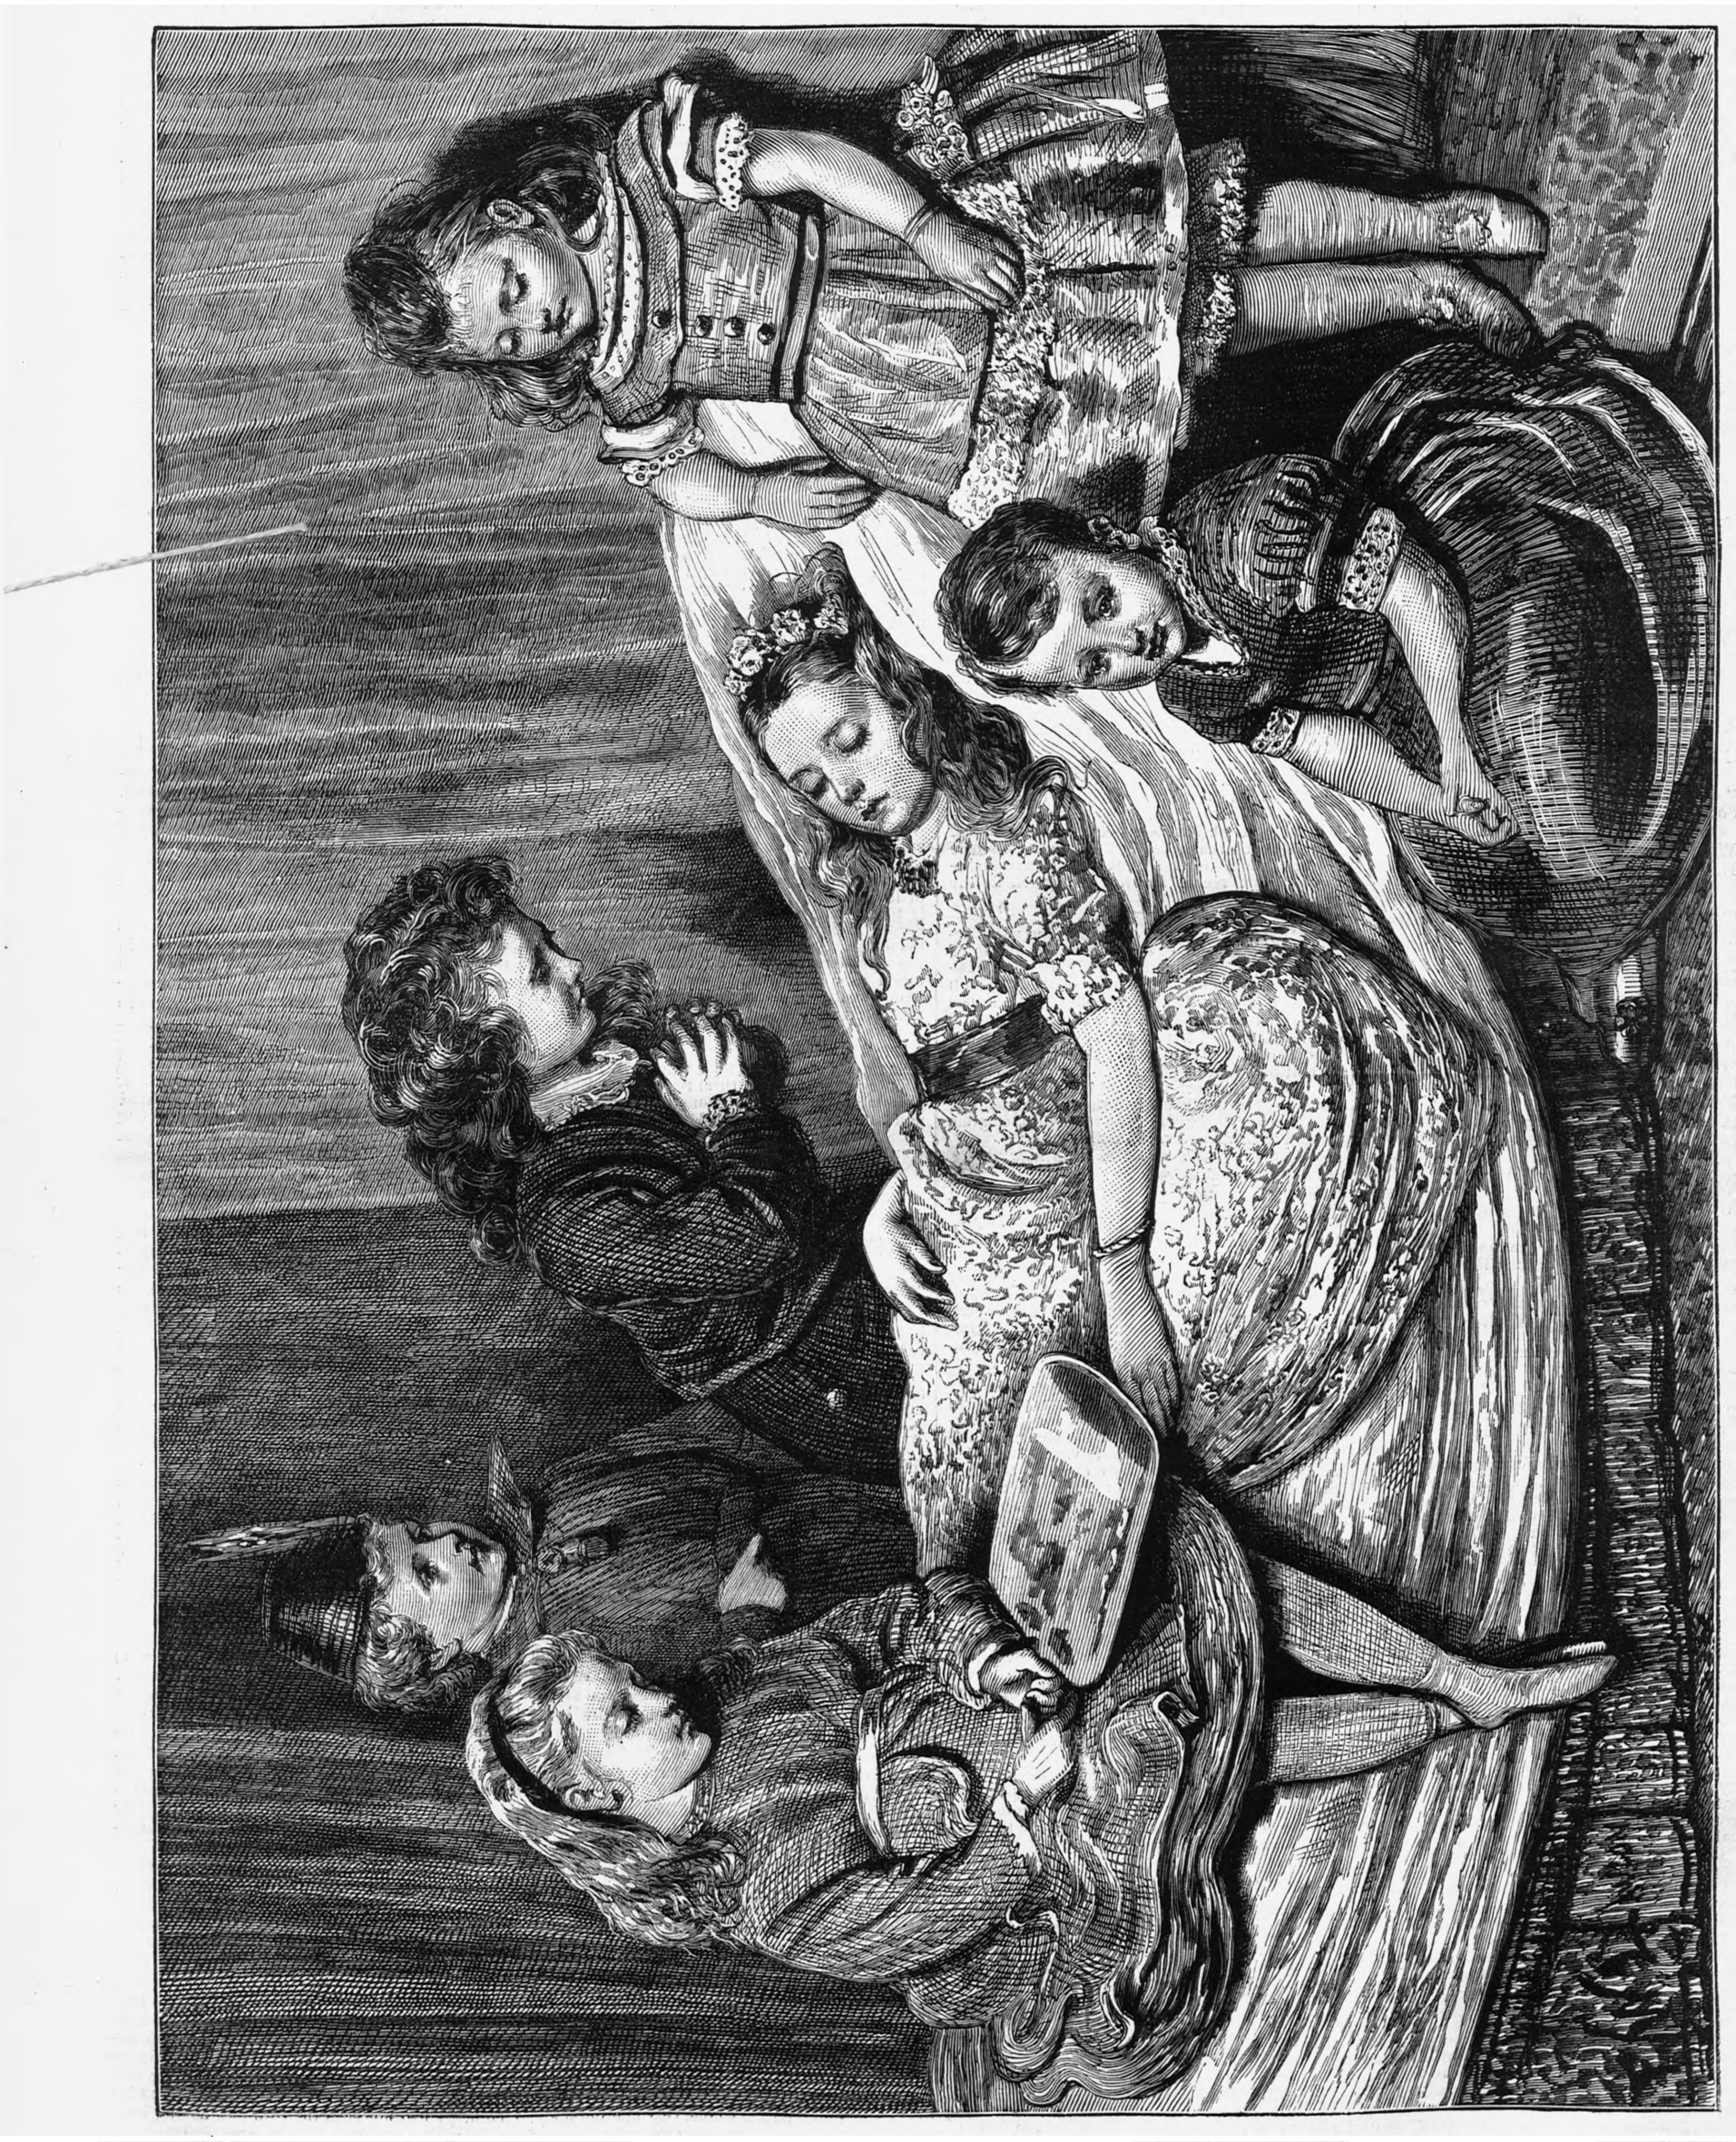


Hosted by Google

TABLEAUX VIVANTS IN THE NURSERY.

THIS sort of entertainment, which used to be fashionable some thirty years ago, but has subsequently been elbowed out by the acting of charades and plays, promises again to come into vogue. In England they are very fashionable. A very elaborate performance of this kind was recently given at South Kensington, London, in the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh, for the benefit of sundry deserving charities. The entertainment, which had been preceded by weeks of posing and arranging, was arranged by the artists Millais and Augustus Lumley. Among the more effective pictures represented were "A Venetian Fête," after Watteau, the "Black Brunswicker," the "Retreat from Moscow," after Horace Vernet, and scenes from the prison life of Marie Antoinette.

Tableaux vivants possess advantages and disadvantages. They enable persons who can pose gracefully, but who have no histrionic gifts, to play a part on the stage, and they are likely to be popular with the rich on account of their costliness. But for people of modest means and scanty leisure they are less suitable, as they cost a good deal of money and preparation, and yet are necessarily of the briefest possible duration when finally presented to an audience. For such persons a smart, bustling farce or simply mounted burlesque is less expensive and more effective. In the nursery, however, as our picture shows, matters are altogether different. Children are naturally more picturesque than adults, a very little dressing up goes a long way, and, moreover, they possess, in far greater measure than their elders, that glorious and heavenly gift of imagination which sheds a glamour over surroundings the most commonplace and prosaic. Depend upon it, that little lady who lies extended on the sofa feels for the time being that she is the Sleeping Beauty, that she has slumbered for a century, and that she is going to be very much in love with the handsome prince who is about to wake her up, and to sue for her hand directly.



TABLEAUX VIVANTS IN THE NURSERY.—THE SLEEPING BEAUTY.

RECEPTION COSTUME.

See illustration on page 296.

THE kilt skirt, basque, and ribbon trimmings of this costume are faille of the blue-purple shade called pervenche. The square lapels of the basque, with its revers collar and broad cuffs, are trimmed with darker cords and white lace. The trained over-skirt is white gauze with black polka dots; the front is cut in Gothic points, and has pervenche rosettes down the middle; the back is caught in puffs by sash ribbons. Rabagas bonnet of pervenche faille, with rosettes of the same, cock's feathers, and streamers of polka-dotted gauze. Medallion at the throat, and a tea-rose on the bosom.

Hosted by Google

CARRIAGE COSTUME.

See illustration on page 296.

THIS artistic costume for the carriage has a skirt of leaf brown faille; the three front breadths have a wide flounce in double box-pleats that are turned over at the top to form their own heading; the back breadths have narrower flounces, alternately pleated and gathered, with pointed edges. Dolman polonaise of deep green camel's-hair, with antique châtelaine vest wrought in feather-like embroidery of dull gold-color; the edge is cut in deep scallops, and bound with gold-colored silk. Hortense bonnet of brown faille, with white roll for face trimming; green bows outside, held by gold slides; brown and white ostrich tips. Buff gloves and white parasol. Brown shoes.

SPRING VISITING SUIT.

See illustration on page 296.

THIS suit is of wood brown faille, with violet sash and revers. In front of the skirt are four straight silk flounces, with the edge turned up in an inch-wide hem, and piped with violet. The over-skirt has a short round apron, with long back breadths arranged in a panier puff and flounce behind, and revers on the side. Ball fringe edges the revers and sash. The double-breasted basque is very short, and has violet revers fastened by large buttons, and ornamented with smaller ones, and simulated button-holes. Half-flowing sleeves. Swinging cords on the right shoulder. Valenciennes ruff and jabot. The hat is a calash, made of the dress silk, with a branch of tea-roses laid across the crown. Alpine parasol.

MY GRANDMOTHER'S PICTURE.

THE look, the light, the sparkling mien,
The glow, the bloom, of sweet sixteen
Radiant from every feature;
A living beauty in the face,
A more than painter's pictured grace—
What was the bonny creature?

"Depinxit seventeen seventy-two,"
So runs the epigraph: but who
The artist, or his sitter,
What she was then, no word to tell:
Her name, her birth, both know I well,
For she—yet seems it fitter

To fancy that I now behold,
While gazing on those locks of gold,
Some bright immortal being,
Dowered with the gift of deathless youth,
Than own the dull domestic truth,
And tell myself I'm seeing

An erewhile habitant of earth,
Of human substance, mortal birth,
In yonder picture, pendent
From yonder oaken wainscot worn;
A woman, and of woman born—
And I—just her descendant.

Ah, grandame mine! when first did care
Wrinkle that smooth brow pictured there?
When darkened first life's landscape fair?
For, as I gaze, it rather Seems right, methinks, that in our race
We each should change our lineal place,
And I, O maid of sunny face!
Grizzled and gray, and void of grace—
And I be your grandfather!

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IT is restful to turn aside from current reports of theft, violence, and murder, political wrangles and startling developments of crime, and from the ever-recurring evidences of selfishness with which the world abounds, to a consideration of enterprises designed solely for the benefit of mankind. It is well known that Professor Agassiz has devoted his life to science; and his recent application to the Massachusetts Legislature for aid to carry on the necessary operations of the Museum of Comparative Zoology at Cambridge shows how deeply his heart is in the work. His enthusiasm is manifested in all that he has done for that institution, which will bear favorable comparison with any collection of natural history in the world. Recently Professor Agassiz organized a plan by which teachers of natural history, and others who desire to prepare themselves for teachers, may obtain a thorough and comprehensive course of instruction in the various branches included under the general term natural history. Books do not afford the means for such study—naturalists must learn to read nature. Arrangements were made for a course of practical scientific study during two or three months of the coming summer. Nantucket was first suggested as a convenient and suitable place; but when the project became publicly known, a permanent location for the scientific school was tendered by Mr. John Anderson, of New York city. Penikese, an island of the Elizabeth group, in Buzzard's Bay, includes about one hundred fertile acres, several springs of fine fresh-water, and sundry dwelling-houses and buildings, and is an attractive location for a summer residence. This island was offered as a free gift, whereon to establish the proposed naturalists' school, with the addition of $50,000 in cash as a nucleus for a fund for the support of the school. Professor Agassiz gladly accepted the liberal gift of Mr. Anderson. Other private gentlemen interested in the progress of scientific research have generously contributed toward necessary expenses of the undertaking, such as a laboratory, aquaria, boats and dredges, and other apparatus needful in scientific investigation. About twenty leading scientific men of the country have agreed to co-operate in this enterprise, and give personal aid and instruction without compensation. The time of opening the school and the terms of admission will soon be made public. Those actually engaged in teaching natural history will have the preference; next those who design to become special students. Probably such a unique and thorough course of instruction was never before offered to the scientific student. Every opportunity will be afforded for investigating the nature of animals, plants, birds, fishes, insects; for learning the practical use of the microscope; for understanding the chemistry of air, earth, and sea, as well as scores of other important subjects—and all under the supervision of competent, well-known scientific men.

The destruction of the city of San Salvador by an earthquake, and the terrible loss of life in connection, is a repetition of similar disasters which befell that city in 1659 and 1854. The proximity of the volcano of San Salvador, which is about three miles southeast of the city, must certainly give rise to some feeling of insecurity among the inhabitants. Yet it presents a beautiful appearance, with a gently sloping summit, crowned to the highest peak with thick forests. The crater, which rises about one thousand feet above the surrounding table-lands, is partially filled with water, and more than half a league in circumference. The recent disastrous earthquake was preceded by a series of shocks, which so alarmed the inhabitants that many fled from the city. The telegraphic reports announced that eight hundred perished in the ruins of the devastated town.

"Unknown" is the sad record made concerning many bodies recovered from the wreck of the Atlantic. But across the ocean scores of friends mourn for the "unknown" dead.

Egypt will soon become a famous resort for invalids. It is said that many English persons whose tenure of life at home was not worth more than a few months' purchase have gone to Egypt, and returned free from the symptoms that threatened them with death.

The visit to Europe of Shah Nusser-ed-Deen, ruler of Persia, has awakened a good deal of interest and curiosity among those who hope for a sight of the Eastern monarch. The absolute sovereign of something like four millions of people may be supposed also to look with considerable curiosity upon other nations with different forms of government. The private fortune of Nusser-ed-Deen is reported above four millions sterling. But the government of Persia is free from debt, the Shah having in 1856 paid the sum of £200,000 which was then due Russia. Much of the treasure of Persian sovereigns consists of valuable jewels, especially of diamonds. It is believed that most of the famous historic diamonds and other stones which have disappeared from recent records are buried in the treasury of Teheran.

One telegraphic word sent over the wires recently turned a house of mourning into one of gladness. When the news of the loss of the Atlantic became known, the family of Mr. Benjamin B. Richmond, of Detroit, Michigan, were in a state of extreme anxiety. He had written them he should sail on the Atlantic, and up to the afternoon of the day following the disaster no information could be obtained of him. His name had not been reported as among the saved. The day closed gloomily around the anxious family; but just as evening came, the following telegram turned their sorrow into thankfulness:

"HALIFAX, April 2.

"To A. Richmond, Detroit:
"Saved! B. B. RICHMOND."

New Granada furnishes a plant which is valuable for the manufacture of ink. The juice, called "chanhi," is reddish, but changes after a few hours into a deep black, and is then ready for use. The "chanhi" has less destructive influence on steel pens than common ink. Experiments made in Spain demonstrate that the ink was not even spoiled by sea-water, which is invariably deleterious to ordinary ink.

Not long ago an advertisement was printed in the proper English newspapers for "counter-women" in connection with the General Post-office. Eleven situations were vacant, and this being stated, candidates were directed to apply personally at the offices of the Civil Service Commissioners, in London, on two specified days. In response to the advertisement about 1500 applicants presented themselves on the first day mentioned, and about 600 on the second day. The extraordinary spectacle of such a number of young women collected in the vicinity of the usually quiet locality of Canon Row attracted much attention, and in fact suspended business for a time in the immediate neighborhood. The Commissioners actually examined over one thousand candidates for these eleven vacancies. The Times, in commenting upon the causes for the appearance of such a competitive host, remarks: "Is it not remarkable to find 1500 young women applying at Canon Row for eleven vacant posts, while St. Thomas's Hospital and every other training institution for nurses are calling in vain for women, who, I suppose, are exactly of the kind and position of these applicants? Can nothing be done to make the honorable and well-paid and thoroughly womanly work of nursing more widely known and appreciated?"

It would seem to be a matter too plain to admit of argument that an essential qualification of every captain of a transatlantic steam-ship is a practical familiarity with all the principal ports east of New York. Especially should the harbor of Halifax be well known, both because it is one where stop is frequently made, and also because its outer surroundings are rough and dangerous to the inexperienced.

Boston organ-grinders have taken a step ahead of New York performers. They plant themselves and their instruments on the platform of the street cars, and grind out "tunes" during the whole trip. How very pleasant for passengers!

Among the lost crew of the Atlantic was a young woman about twenty or twenty-five years old. Her sex was not known until the body was washed ashore and the rude clothing removed preparatory for burial. She had served as a common sailor for three voyages, and was a favorite shipmate with all. This woman was an American, and was about the only one of that nationality belonging to the crew. Who she was, and where she came from, and her motive for leading such a strange life of hardship, probably will never be fully known.

A penalty of $250 is now imposed in England upon the person who sells an adulterated article, for the first offense, and six months' imprisonment with hard labor for the second offense. If a similar law were carried into execution in this country, we fear most of our grocers, all of our milk dealers, and an immense number of other respectable people would be serving their time out in the confinement of prison life.

It is a singular fact that while the various benevolent institutions of New York city provide for the permanent protection of very young women, the aged, very young girls, the infirm, the outcast, and the degraded, there is no place where a destitute woman can obtain a night's lodging, save in the station-house. To meet this want the Ladies' Christian Union, composed of a band of the most estimable ladies of the city, design to open a temporary house, where women of all ages, married or single, irrespective of creed or nationality, may find transient shelter. This deserving charity appeals strongly to the generosity of the public; and as it will be wholly or partially free, calls for liberal contributions, which will be used with the strictest economy by the ladies in charge. Such contributions may be sent to the treasurer, Mrs. Russell Sage, 506 Fifth Avenue; to Mrs. Edward S. Jaffray, 615 Fifth Avenue; or to the "Young Women's Home," 27 Washington Square (North).

When will people learn that poisonous articles should not be kept lying around in exposed and frequented places? Recently a man died in Binghamton, New York, from having eaten of a pie into which arsenic had been accidentally dropped. The deadly drug had been for months upon a pantry shelf, with no mark upon it to denote its character. A child in the same town found a bottle of disinfecting fluid in a closet, drank of it, and was killed. Articles of this nature, if needful to be kept in the house, should be put in a secure place, out of the way of children, servants, and all who are not instructed in regard to them, and should be so conspicuously labeled that no mistake in respect to their use can easily occur. There is great carelessness frequently in keeping unlabeled bottles of medicine in the household.

"The man in the moon" is an expression which from time immemorial has been applied to spots on the moon visible to the naked eye, but which a telescope shows to be the shadow of lunar mountains. One ancient superstition is that a man who stole a bundle of sticks on Sunday was confined in the moon, and we see his figure. Another supposes Cain to have been the offender, who was eternally placed in the moon as a punishment for his crime. This would really be a very appropriate retreat for murderers.

The Hawaiian Islands are in a neglected, declining condition. The climate is fine, the country rich in agricultural resources. But the population is small, and constantly decreasing, and the land unoccupied and uncultivated. More people and skilled labor are the great wants on the Sandwich Islands.

PARIS GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

WE have talked over many of the social and domestic difficulties attending a residence in Paris, and I hope it has not been all idle discourse, but that you will have laid by some useful notes from our gossips together. Now I am going to touch upon another part of the system—upon some of the moral characteristics of French society and its rules, and discuss with you the advisability of conforming to those rules or setting them at defiance. We are all ready to quote the saying, "When you are in Rome, do as the Romans," when it falls in aptly with our tastes and inclinations; but beyond this we do not recognize it as a theory which in any way compels our allegiance. Englishmen and Americans are proverbial in their spirit of non-conformity to the ways and customs of other countries; they pique themselves on being impervious to the ridicule of all outer barbarians, and go forth in the sturdy pride of individuality and nationality to entertain the laughter-loving Parisians by the sight of their melons and Jerry hats, and cut-aways and knickerbockers, and all manner of outlandish outer gear, parading the exhibition on the Boulevards with contempt and satisfaction. They know they are being laughed at, and they glory in the fact. It is one way of displaying their respective patriotism, of saying to the Frenchman, "I am a British subject.—I am a citizen of the United States.—You may laugh at me. You are fools." The Times has bullied and lectured the offenders on this side the Atlantic into some modification of this stiff-necked rebellion against the dictum we have quoted above, and of late years Englishmen do not run so violently against the feelings of the Romans, when they are among them, as formerly. But those dreadful Americans have no virago of a Times to scold them into reform, and so they go on multiplying their sins from year to year, and refusing to be converted. I must, in fairness, say that their sins are less on the side of the ridiculous than the same class of sins among their fellow-sinners from England. The men dress, on the whole, very appropriately. It is the women who are the chief criminals. I have hammered so often on the same note that I fear you have either got quite hardened to the sound, or else that it exasperates you, and you will turn a deaf ear, and refuse to hear any more about it. But really this time it is pure advice, not scolding, I have in store. So once more, "friends, countrymen, and lovers, lend me your ears!"

Let us begin at the beginning. At New York, Boston, any where in America you choose—I believe the system is the same all over the free surface of the States—it is understood that ladies, young ladies especially, have almost unlimited freedom; they pay and receive visits like married women; they give and accept invitations; they make acquaintances on their own hook, quite irrespective of their parents; they walk out and drive out alone; nay, I have been told, but I dare not vouch for the truth of the statement, that they walk and drive out with gentlemen, unattended by parents or guardians. Let it not be supposed that in enumerating the privileges of my American sisterhood I mean to blame or even to criticise them or the state of society that tolerates them. I admit, on the contrary, that the fact of young girls enjoying such an amount of liberty without let or hinderance to their dignity and to the respect of the masculine part of the population is eminently creditable to that society, and says more for the high tone of morality among both men and women than any number of volumes on political economy could say to the same effect.

It is undoubtedly to the honor of American gentleman that they should be regarded in the light of brothers and protectors to the young unmarried sisterhood, rather than in the light of enemies or evil counselors. The chivalry which characterizes the manhood of the United States is one of the noblest and purest attributes which their women can boast of. It redounds as much to the honor of the one as of the other. It is said, we may hope without serious foundation, that the constant intercourse of the rising generation of Americans with France, and the example of the demoralized and effeminate youth of that unhappy country, is slowly but surely undermining the chivalrous respect for women which characterized their fathers. At any rate it would seem that in America such is not yet generally believed to be the case. Young girls still look to the men of that country with a proud sense of their superiority on this point—no doubt on all others—to the rest of mankind. They trust fully to them for protection wherever their weakness or their isolation needs it. They treat them, in fact, as women ought always to feel justified in treating honorable men—with unhesitating confidence. Now, grievous as it sounds, it is a fact, that they must leave this ideal standard of intercourse behind them when they set sail toward fair France. It would be idle to discuss the whys and the wherefores of the case. The result must be accepted without understanding the cause—at least without discussing it. But few intelligent persons could live long in Paris without being able to trace the evil, as it exists in the present state of society, to those causes which must lie deep at the root of things before their effects can come so universally to the surface as we now see them. Let it be understood, therefore, by young Americans when they start for the delights of a tour in Europe, that the price they must pay for it is the renunciation of their individual liberty in little things. On the whole, it will not be found too high a price; they will find abundant reason to console them for paying it. In Paris it is that this bargain will press hardest on them—that is to say, it will do so if they frankly enter into the compact, and choose to take their place among the daughters of French gentlemen, as lady-like, modest, and well-behaved young ladies. Too many American girls simply shrug their shoulders and say they don't care enough for that distinction to pay so dear for it. This is a pity. They insist, for instance, on walking out by themselves. In France no girl above the rank of a shop-girl is seen in the street without a chaperon, either a married woman or a servant. The custom is extremely irksome. It often involves a girl's having to stay at home when she has a great desire to go out; but no French girl who cared one straw for her reputation would infringe this rule. Its violation would be as impossible to them as for us to go out without boots or a bonnet. It is extraordinary how self-sacrificing their elders are in the matter of chaperoning; but the law is so stringent that it naturally evokes this self-devotion out of sheer pity for young girls. English girls of late years have broken through the circle of conventionality to the point of going out in pairs unattended; but then only in what is understood to be the English quarter—the Champs Elysées and the neighboring streets. Then, again, they dress very quietly. "They dress like guys!" I hear some dainty little American maiden exclaim. Well, granted! They do make guys of themselves; but if generally from want of taste, in this case it is in self-defense. A girl, or two girls, may glide along without being noticed if they are plainly and unattractively dressed, whereas an elegant and fashionable attire would inevitably attract attention, and this is what any young girl, who has proper dignity and self-respect, must seek to avoid in Paris. If she is remarked, she is certain to be followed, spoken to, and sometimes the annoyance will not end here.

I was not long ago out walking with two friends, an English and a French lady, when a very showy carriage, an open one, dashed down the Champs Elysées, with a very showily dressed lady sitting in it alone. My English friend exclaimed at the gaudy finery of both the equipage and its occupant, but an expressive shrug and one word from the Frenchwoman accounted for both. I had not seen the turn-out, having been looking into a shop at the moment. But presently the carriage came flying up the Champs Elysées, and as it drew near the lady kissed hand familiarly to me, and called out to the men to pull up. I own I felt rather ashamed of my fine acquaintance, though I was glad to have the opportunity of setting my companions right about her. She was a young American heiress, who was, in the innocence of her heart, taking an airing, and showing off Worth's last costume on the same occasion. Had she not come back and enabled me to testify to her thorough respectability, my friends would have pointed her out the next time they saw her as any thing but what she really was. Now it would have been very easy to avoid this unpleasant consequence by either putting on a quiet morning dress fitted for driving out alone, or getting a friend to share her drive. But she would have laughed either precaution to scorn. Again, American girls are fond of going alone to the flower market beside the Madeleine, and this is the very last place they ought to be seen in unaccompanied. I will not multiply illustrations, but I assure you if American fathers and mothers suspected the comments to which this reckless disregard of social customs exposes their daughters, they would mutiny, and assert for once the right to command where they are used to obey. It is looked upon, moreover, as the very height of vulgarity to walk out in Paris in showy clothes, or any thing but the quietest; the empire did a good deal to destroy the old graceful simplicity of women's dress, but it never sanctioned the gaudy street attire which is adopted by young American girls in Paris. Even married women never wear when on foot the elegant toilettes which they wear in a carriage. Let young Americans also avoid driving unaccompanied or handsomely dressed in those low open carriages which are on the stands in Paris. Now no more lecturing for to-day. COMET.

Hosted by Google

LONDON'S HEART.

BY B. L. FARJEON,

AUTHOR OF "BLADE-O'-GRASS," "GRIF," AND "JOSHUA MARVEL."

CHAPTER XLVII.

FELIX CHECKMATES MR. DAVID SHELDRAKE.

MR. DAVID SHELDRAKE, calling at ten o'clock the next morning to see Lily, receives from the landlady a message that the young lady has passed a bad night, and can not receive him until noon. Somewhat surprised, but compelled to acquiesce in the arrangement, he walks away from the inn, consoling himself with the thought that all girls are capricious, and that Lily, having seen how deep was the passion he entertained for her, and having made up her mind to accept him as her lover, was disposed to coquet with him a little. "The bewitching little jade!" he muses. "They like to hold on and off. But I'll soon bring her to the point." He has not been idle during the morning; he has been hunting after Mr. Musgrave, to give him information of Alfred's movements. But Mr. Musgrave has not made his appearance at the Myrtle Inn, and Mr. Sheldrake, although he has been about the neighborhood making inquiries, has been unsuccessful in finding any trace of him or Alfred. Mr. Sheldrake has settled with himself that this dereliction of duty must not be overlooked. "The old man must go," he thinks; "Ivy Cottage has served its turn. It is getting rather warm there, and old Muzzy is beginning to know too much." The reflection that Ivy Cottage is getting too warm is not entirely new; certain victims who had been fleeced by Mr. Sheldrake and his agents had been writing threatening letters to him and Con Staveley addressed to Ivy Cottage, and the secret of their connection had in some way leaked out. Now Mr. Sheldrake did not desire a public exposure; such a thing would be annoying and expensive, perhaps dangerous. He knew well enough that some of his transactions would not bear the light. How it had come about he did not know, but in one or two instances the boundary line within which roguery can safely trade had been overstepped. He thinks of this during the interval between ten and twelve o'clock, and resolves to go to the cottage that very evening and destroy all the letters and papers it contains; they are the only evidence against him. At noon he presents himself again at the inn. The landlady informs him that the young lady is up, and will see him. She leads him to the parlor. "We shall be private here?" he says, before he enters. "Oh yes, Sir," the landlady replies, and retires. He sees at a glance that Lily has passed a disturbed night, but she receives him with a singular mixture of composure and nervousness. When he tells her that he has not brought Alfred with him, she does not cry and make a scene, as he anticipated. She is very pale, and she listens, without interrupting him, to the reason he gives for Alfred's absence.

"It looks as if I had broken faith with you, my dear Lily," he says, confidentially; "but the fact is, Alfred must keep out of the way until his accounts are squared. The detectives are on the look-out for him, but you and I will be able to pull him through. You see, he has made a mess of it all round. He owes me money; he owes a person of the name of Con Staveley money. Of course what he owes me does not matter, but this Con Staveley is a hard nail, and insists on having his money down, or he'll prosecute. Even that wouldn't be so bad; but Alfred has done worse. He has taken money from his office—in plain terms, he has been embezzling the money of his employers—and they are determined not to let him escape. I heard it an hour ago from the best authority—from one of the detectives, indeed, that I managed to square. So you see how the matter stands."

As yet Lily has not spoken a word, and he pauses here, expecting her to say something. She does not disappoint him.

"Will you tell me exactly, Mr. Sheldrake, how much money Alfred owes?"

"He owes me and Con Staveley about three hundred pounds. In a sort of way, I am friendly with Con Staveley. He is stopping in the town for the races, and hearing I was here, he came to see me. I thought I'd best set to work at once, and I got him to give me an account of the debt. Well, he puts confidence in me, and he not only gave me the figures, but the bills as well, with Alfred's name on them. Here they are." He takes some papers from his pocket, and shows them to her. "I told Con I would pay them."

"And you will?"

"You have but to say the word, and I'll make things straight for Alfred at his office, as well. Lily, do you remember the conversation we had when we came home from the theatre, when that young puppy" (her color rose here) "interrupted us? I have a right to call him so, for I know what he is made of. Would he do for you what I would do, what I am ready to do this very day? I think not. Think! I am sure not." He strives to read her face, but she has turned from him, and her eyes are toward the ground. "Ah," he thinks, "she knows what is coming;" and says aloud, "The very first night I saw Alfred I told him I would be his friend for his pretty sister's sake, and I have kept my word. He would have had to cave in long ago if it hadn't been for me; but again and again, when he was going to the bad, you stepped in and saved him. He knew this all along. He knew that it was for your sake I helped him through his troubles. You sigh! You think he is in a worse trouble to-day than he has ever been before. Well, you are right. I warned him repeatedly; I told him twenty times to pull up, but he wouldn't listen to me; and still I stuck to him like a man for his pretty Lily's sake. I can save him now, and will, if you but say the word. To-morrow, this afternoon, in another hour, it may be too late. His fate hangs upon you, and you only. Say but the word, and I'll bring him to your arms again."

"What word?"

Although she is almost falling to the ground, and although she speaks in a whisper, as if the words were forced from her, he hears her.

"Say that you love me."

Bending forward in his eagerness, with his eyes fixed upon her drooping form, with his arms outstretched to receive her, he does not see that a door which communicates with an inner room is swiftly and softly opened. Emboldened by her silence, which he interprets favorably, he is approaching nearer to her exultantly, when he is put aside with a firm hand, and old Wheels steps between him and her. His face turns white as he sees the old man, who regards him steadily.

"You were saying—" says old Wheels, gently.

Mr. Sheldrake bites his lips, and accepts the situation.

"That I love your granddaughter. I was about to ask her to be my wife."

Old Wheels, with his arms round Lily, kisses her, and strokes her hair fondly.

"My darling!" he murmurs. She hides her face on his breast. He directs his clear bright eyes to Mr. Sheldrake, whose own eyes shift and waver, and seem to shrink, as falsehood shrinks in the light of truth. "I will answer for her, Mr. Sheldrake. She declines."

"What!" exclaims Mr. Sheldrake, a white fury gathering about his lips.

"It is true, nevertheless," says the old man.

"She shall answer with her own lips," cries Mr. Sheldrake, with a menacing gesture.

"She will never again open her lips to you. I speak for her."

"Old dotard! But she shall answer!"

The arm he raises to put the old man aside is seized by a stronger hand than his, and he is thrust back violently.

"Oh!" he sneers, as he recognizes Felix. "Are there any more of you?"

"One other," replies Felix, with a smile. "You shall see him presently."

For a moment Mr. Sheldrake measures himself with Felix; the conclusion he arrives at in this hasty glance is not assuring. Felix stands before him as firm as a rock, and with a kindling light in his eyes which warns him to be careful of himself. He heeds the warning, and says, in as calm a voice as he can command,

"This is a plot, then!"

"If you please to call it so," is the answer. "Plot against plot, we will say. Yours has failed."

"We shall see."

"We shall."

Felix is supremely calm; Mr. Sheldrake's passion breaks against him as the sea breaks against a rock and recoils upon itself.

"And you came here, I suppose, to play the hero, and to trick that young lady with fine speeches. But if she knows what's good for her, she will be wise in time."

"I hope she will. Lily!"

She does not answer in words, but creeps into his arms. Then Mr. Sheldrake shows his full meanness. "Take her," he says, with a toss of the hand, as discarding a worthless thing. "She came with me from the old man's house last night. How many hours ago? Ah, thirteen! Take her. I have done with her!"

Felix laughs cheerily, and holds Lily closer to his breast.

"It was a lucky chance," he says, not addressing Mr. Sheldrake, "that caused us to put up at the Myrtle Inn; for going into the stable to look after my horse, I saw another horse, which had been put up but a very short time before we arrived. I have driven that horse more than once, and I knew the livery-stables to which it belonged. It was by another lucky chance that I inquired of the hostler at the Myrtle whether a man of the name of Thompson, a man with a crooked nose and a harelip, had driven that horse down. But it was by the luckiest chance of all that we found Thompson in bed at that very inn, and that we induced him, without much trouble, to tell all about the pleasant drive he had had, and where he had set his passengers down."

"You have been very lucky," sneers Mr. Sheldrake; "but all your luck will not avail you to save Master Alfred from the hulks. It is my mission now to assist him to that desirable retreat for fools and thieves. I have you there, my lucky hero."

"I think not. You have not heard all our luck yet. A friend of mine, a detective—oh yes, I have detective friends, as well as you!—has in his possession certain letters and documents concerning transactions in which the names of Sheldrake, Staveley, and half a dozen aliases assumed by each to serve his turn, suspiciously occur. I think the law is not inclined to treat with leniency the miserable tricksters whose knavery leads many poor creatures to ruin. Some public attention has been drawn to the class to which Mr. Sheldrake and Mr. Staveley belong, as you may have observed. The law hitherto has been comparatively powerless because of the want of sufficiently direct evidence: the rascals are a cunning set. But I and my detective friend have in our possession documents by which we shall be able to prove distinct fraud; and as those who administer the law wait but for the opportunity to convict, you may depend that the punishment will not be light. Nay, we have not only documents; we have witnesses. Knowing what kind of man we had to deal with, knowing what kind of knavery we had to expose, we set traps, not yesterday, nor last week, but months ago, and the evidence we can bring forward will be sufficient. Temptation has proved too strong for you in one or two instances, and you have overstepped the mark, as we shall prove to you to your cost."

Inwardly disturbed as he is—for he does not know what proofs may be in Felix's hands, and whether Felix is speaking truth or gasconading—Mr. Sheldrake snaps his fingers scornfully.

"That for your evidence and witnesses!" he says. "You can do your best and your worst!"

But he begins to lose courage when Felix plays his next move.

"You asked me when I came in whether there were any more of us. I told you there was one more, and that you should see him presently."

Felix goes to the door which leads to the inner room and opens it, and Mr. Musgrave comes forward. Then, for the first time, the consideration whether it will not be advisable to make terms occurs to Mr. Sheldrake.

"You drunken old thief!" he exclaims, with an oath. "Are you in this plot?"

"And has been for some time," answered Felix, in a pleasant voice. "We will excuse any hard words you may use. We are in confidence, and what passes between us is, as the lawyers say, without prejudice. But you have not seen all the cards in our hands yet. I speak, you see, in a language you can understand. Shall I show you another trump card that we hold?"

"Go on."

"I heard you say before I entered that you had seen Mr. Con Staveley this morning. That is not true. But it is true that my detective friend has seen him, and we have made terms (this is without prejudice, mind) with him. If we are compelled to make this case public, he appears against you. We hold him harmless, and he is satisfied to get out of a serious scrape without a scratch. In no one instance was he your partner in any of the transactions you have had with the young gentleman whom you tried to lead to ruin. We have this down in black and white. Do you think we have trumps enough to win the game?"

"I don't know. What stakes are we playing for?"

"Those bills and acceptances you hold with Alfred's name to them, and a full quittance from you to him for all money directly or indirectly advanced to him by you and Con Staveley. We know almost to a sovereign what they amount to. You have a list in your pocket. I also have a list from Con Staveley."

"What if I refuse?"

Felix smiles.

"Why, then, I suppose, we must be Quixotic enough to pay to Mr. Sheldrake such of those bills as bear his name. Those bearing Mr. Staveley's name we should be able to settle with that gentleman direct. We should pay your bills under protest."

"We pay!" interrupted Mr. Sheldrake, incredulously.

"Well, say instead that I pay. I am able, I assure you; and I assure you also that I am able to prove how many of the checks bearing Mr. Sheldrake's name for which bills were given came back to Mr. Sheldrake through Mr. Staveley, and never passed through the bank. Here is a suspicion of fraud which it might be worth while to prosecute. But we should not want it, I believe. We shall be able to keep Alfred's name out of the proceedings. The other cases we have against you are, in my detective friend's opinion, amply sufficient. And be sure of this"—and here Felix's voice grew stern—"that unless the terms I have stated are accepted by you, I will make the name of Sheldrake famous in criminal records, and will so gibbet you in public opinion that your very friends and acquaintances shall think it prudent to know you no more. Excuse me for using strong language; all that passes is without prejudice, and we are here in private conference."

His earnestness and determined manner carry conviction with them. Mr. Sheldrake does not hesitate.

"And if I give you those bills and the quittance, as you desire—"

"We wash our hands of you."

"You will give me back those documents and letters, you dog, you"—with a dark look at Mr. Musgrave—"which you say you have?"

"We might be prevailed upon to do as much."

"On those terms I accept: I can have my revenge another way."

"Any other way you please. This is all I stipulate for."

"Can we arrange the business now?"

"At once. I will call my detective friend in."

The next half hour is passed in the settlement of the affair, and Felix conducts himself in so calm and business-like a manner as to intensify the bitterness with which Mr. Sheldrake regards him. Lily and her father and grandfather do not speak, but they worship Felix with their eyes; and now and then he turns and gives them an encouraging smile, which does not escape Mr. Sheldrake's notice. But he seems more eager than Felix to conclude the affair, having something in his mind of which he is burning to deliver himself.

"On your word and honor as a gentleman," he says, as he receives certain letters and papers from Felix, "these are all that you have?"

Felix, who has been carefully examining the bills, and who has been very particular in the wording of the paper which releases Alfred from liability, places the documents in his pocket carefully, and says:

"On my word and honor as a gentleman, these are all that we have. I can not honestly put the same form of words to you; but I am satisfied that the bills tally with the list, and that the amount is correct. Here, then, our acquaintanceship ends. I wish you good-day."

"I am going," says Mr. Sheldrake, energetically buttoning his coat—"where to, do you think?"

"I haven't the slightest interest in knowing," Felix replies.

"You will alter your note when you hear I am going to Messrs. Tickle and Flint, Alfred's employers, to tell them where it is likely they will find the runaway clerk who has embezzled their money. You thought the game was over, did you? Here is an unexpected check for you."

Mr. Sheldrake, with a wicked smile, is hurrying from the room, when Felix, in his brightest manner, says, with a pleasant laugh,

"I checkmate you. I have myself been to Messrs. Tickle and Flint, and have arranged with them. This is in strict confidence between you and me, as men of—well, we will say of honor. If you go you will find that they have nothing to say against Alfred. But I should advise you to beware of Tickle and Flint; they are my lawyers in the little matter in which you were very nearly putting in an appearance in the dock. Shall I call 'checkmate' again, for the game is over?"

He turns his back upon Mr. Sheldrake, who takes his leave with no good feelings in his heart, you may be sure. Felix takes Lily's hand, and looks fondly into her eyes.

"This last piece of news is true, my darling. I have made myself responsible to the firm for Alfred's debt; and Messrs. Tickle and Flint have accepted fifty pounds on account. It was not an easy matter to persuade them; but I pleaded with them effectually, and it is a satisfaction to them to know that they will not be losers. Alfred, of course, will not be employed in the office again; but he is free, and let us thank God."

Her heart is too full for words; she can only press his hand to her trembling lips, and bid God bless him. He looks round with a happy smile.

"All selfishness, Sir, believe me!" he says to old Wheels. "I would not change my lot with that of the best man in England!"

A scene of another description took place at the same time between two women, mother and daughter. Felix brought Martha Day from London, after his visit to Alfred's employers. Before he returned to the inn to play the principal part in the scene just described he took Martha to the tent in which Lizzie was nursing Alfred, and said,

"You will find your daughter in there. Keep with her until I come for you."

As Martha timidly entered the tent Lizzie turned with a low cry, and threw her arms round her mother's neck.

"I sent a letter to you this morning, mother; but you could not have received it."

"I came home last night, my dear," Martha replied.

"Last night! How anxious you must have been! If I had thought you were coming back, I would have left word."

"I was almost distracted, Lizzie. Felix found me at the house this morning in a sad state, and told me all."

Lizzie moved to where Alfred was lying. A bed had been made up for him on the ground, and he was murmuring feverishly in his sleep. She knelt by his side, but could not make sense of the words that came from his lips. Names of horses and jockeys and prophets, with expressions of fondness for Lizzie and Lily, were strangely mingled together.

"He would have died, mother, if I had not come last night! I found him lying under a hedge in a strong fever. He has not recognized me yet. If he dies, my heart will break! You will help me to nurse him, mother?"

"Yes, dear child."

They gazed at each other wistfully. Lizzie's eyes were heavy and weary with watching. Filled as was Martha's heart with yearning love for her child, there was an expression of misery in her face. Lizzie saw it, and a sad smile played upon her lips.

"I want all your love, mother!"

"You have it, dear child!"

"And yet you are unhappy."

Martha did not reply: and after a pause Lizzie continued, in a low, sweet voice,

"Mother, I am going to make you happy."

"Lizzie!"

"Lying there as Alfred is lying now—dying,

Hosted by Google

perhaps—I may consider myself absolved from my promise. Ah, mother, you are not tender to him; you have not kissed him; you have no kind thoughts in your heart for him! Is it not so? You do not answer, and I love him so! Mother, kiss Alfred."

Martha leaned toward the sleeping man; but fast-flowing tears came from her eyes, and she wrenched herself away from him, and said, in a choking voice,

"I can not, child; I can not!"

"Ah, mother, you wrong him," said Lizzie, tenderly. "And me. You spoke some words to me last evening. They are in my mind now. Look at me, mother. Place your hand in mine."

Martha placed her hand in Lizzie's, and Lizzie's other hand stole forward and imprisoned it. An eager light flashed into Martha's eyes as she looked down on the hand that lay uppermost.

"Lizzie! A wedding-ring!"

"We were married six months ago, mother. But Alfred made me promise solemnly to keep it secret until he gave me permission. He wanted to make his fortune first, poor dear! I have broken my promise, but I don't think he would blame me. Mother, will you kiss Alfred now? Will you kiss my husband?"

It is so short a time since this last scene was acted that there is but little more to tell. All those persons who have taken part in the story are living now. Alfred went through a very severe illness, but has almost recovered his strength. He is very humble; let us hope that the bitter experience he has undergone will make him a better man. His mind is filled with good resolves as he looks at Lizzie, who sits at his side with a baby at her breast.

Mr. David Sheldrake prospers. Will the law ever give him his proper position in society, and deprive him of the means of lawful wrong-doing? Let us hope that it will—and soon.

The Reverend Emanuel Creamwell still reigns at Stapleton. The justices of the peace, who are ruled by him, and who speak their sentences out of his mouth, pursue the crooked tenor of their way. Last week a woman nearly eighty years of age, whose antecedents are good, was charged before them with damaging a fence to the amount of one penny. The owner of the fence, a farmer, would not appear against her, and a policeman was the only witness. The woman is nearly stone-deaf, and could not hear a word of the evidence. She and her aged husband depended upon parish relief for support, and between them would have found it difficult, after their long battle of life, to muster sufficient money to pay for one day's food. The policeman said he charged the woman with the terrible offense, and that she denied it, and said she had merely broken a bit of dead wood with her foot. The woman being deaf, could not examine the witness. The magistrates pronounced the sentence, as dictated by the clergyman. She was found guilty, and was condemned to pay one penny for the damage done to the property of a man who was too merciful to prosecute; was fined fivepence in addition to the penny; and was required to pay the cost of the trial, amounting to thirteen shillings and sixpence. In default of these payments she was condemned to prison for seven days. The old deaf woman was sent to prison. And the clergyman, on the following Sabbath, preached God's love and mercy to his flock. Will the government ever recognize that it belongs imperatively to its duty to be careful that only capable* men—men with hearts as well as heads—shall sit on the magisterial benches to dispense justice? Let us hope this also.

"LIZZIE! A WEDDING-RING!"

Pollypod's accident was not a very serious one; but it was discovered that she had hurt her knee, and she will never be able to walk without a limp. Sometimes when Jim Podmore looks at her as she limps along it seems to him as if she is treading on his heart. Jim has obtained a situation in which he is enabled to earn a living by working ten hours a day: quite hours enough to work for a decent living.

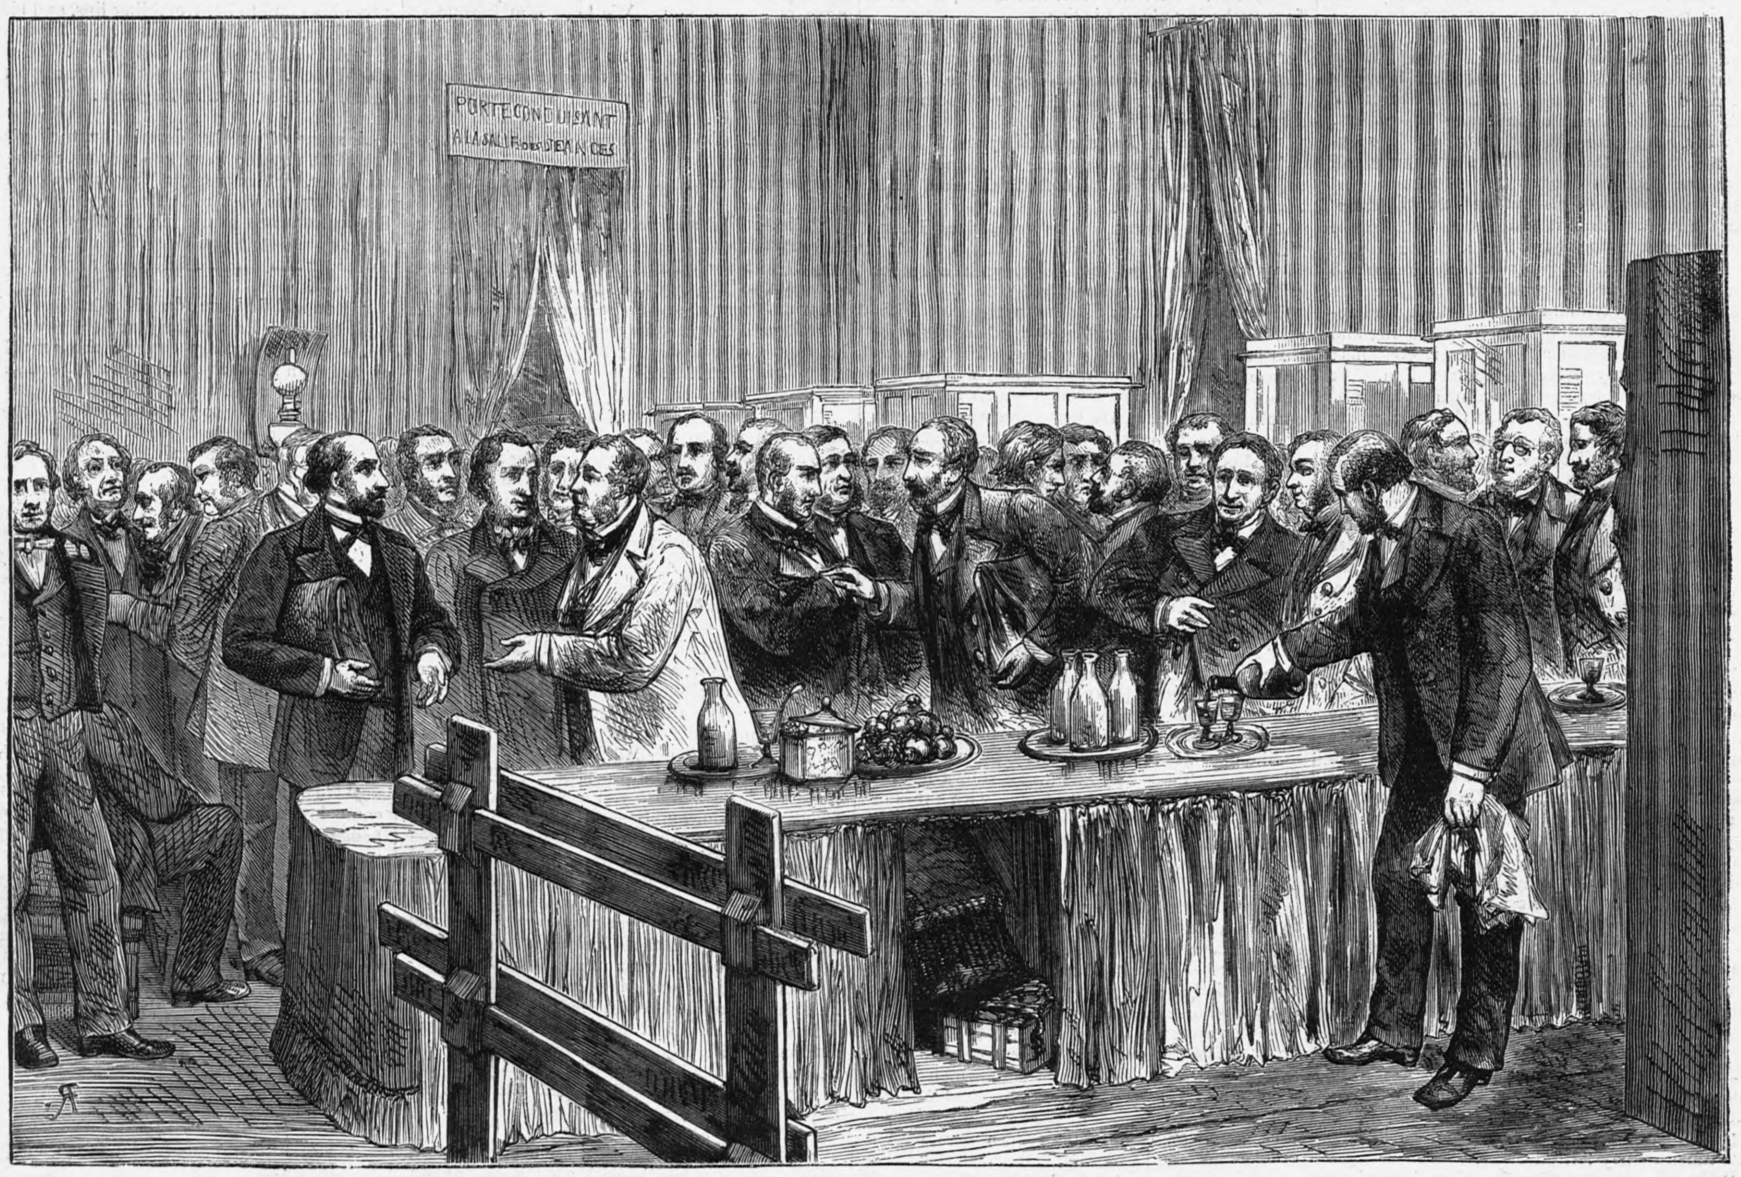
Felix and Lily are married. He is working bravely, modestly, cheerfully, and they are very happy. Old Wheels and he have many quaint conversations together, and Lily and Pollypod listen with delight to their discussions about this and that. They have but little of the world's wealth; but they are very rich notwithstanding.

THE END.

DEPUTIES AT VERSAILLES IN THE REFRESHMENT-ROOM.

IN the accompanying illustration we see the deputies of the Versailles Assembly refreshing their inner man in the pauses of the legislative session. The refreshment-room is the common rallying ground for all parties: here royalist jostles against radical, and legitimist against imperialist, each eying the other with scathing glance as he viciously mashes up the sugar in his glass, as though demolishing his opponent as completely as he intends to do by-and-by in the tribune. In old imperial days, when the Assembly sat in the Palais Bourbon, the buffet was very abundantly and delicately furnished, and entailed a large additional sum to support it beyond the dollar a month which is deducted from the allowance of each deputy for its maintenance. Times have changed, however, and so has the buffet, which, in accordance with the régime, is now severely Republican. "The choicest luxury," wrote recently a correspondent of the London Times, "is a basin of bouillon, but even that delicacy has acquired such a reputation that nothing but the most imperious necessity induces the deputies to avail themselves of this Spartan hospitality." Thus, though the deputies, wearied out with shouting down an inimical orator, or with taking part in one of those mouvements prolongées, in which the 750 members all talk and none listen, are glad enough to slake their thirst with a soothing sirop at the buffet of the Assembly, for a more solid meal they are compelled to adjourn to the Hôtel des Reservoirs, that now historical hostel, the rendezvous of all the élite of Prussia during the German siege of Paris.

* In a disreputable gambling action which was tried at the Court of Queen's Bench in February, 1873, the Lord Chief Justice of England, speaking of "the pernicious and fatal habit of gambling," declared "that the habit was one so demoralizing and degrading that it would, like some foul leprosy, eat away the conscience, until a man comes to think that it is your duty to yourself to 'do your neighbor as your neighbor would do you!'" The defendant in this disreputable action was twenty-four years of age, and a magistrate! The case of the poor woman who was charged with committing a penny's worth of damage to a fence was tried before three magistrates—all of them clergymen. Are such men as these fit administrators of justice?

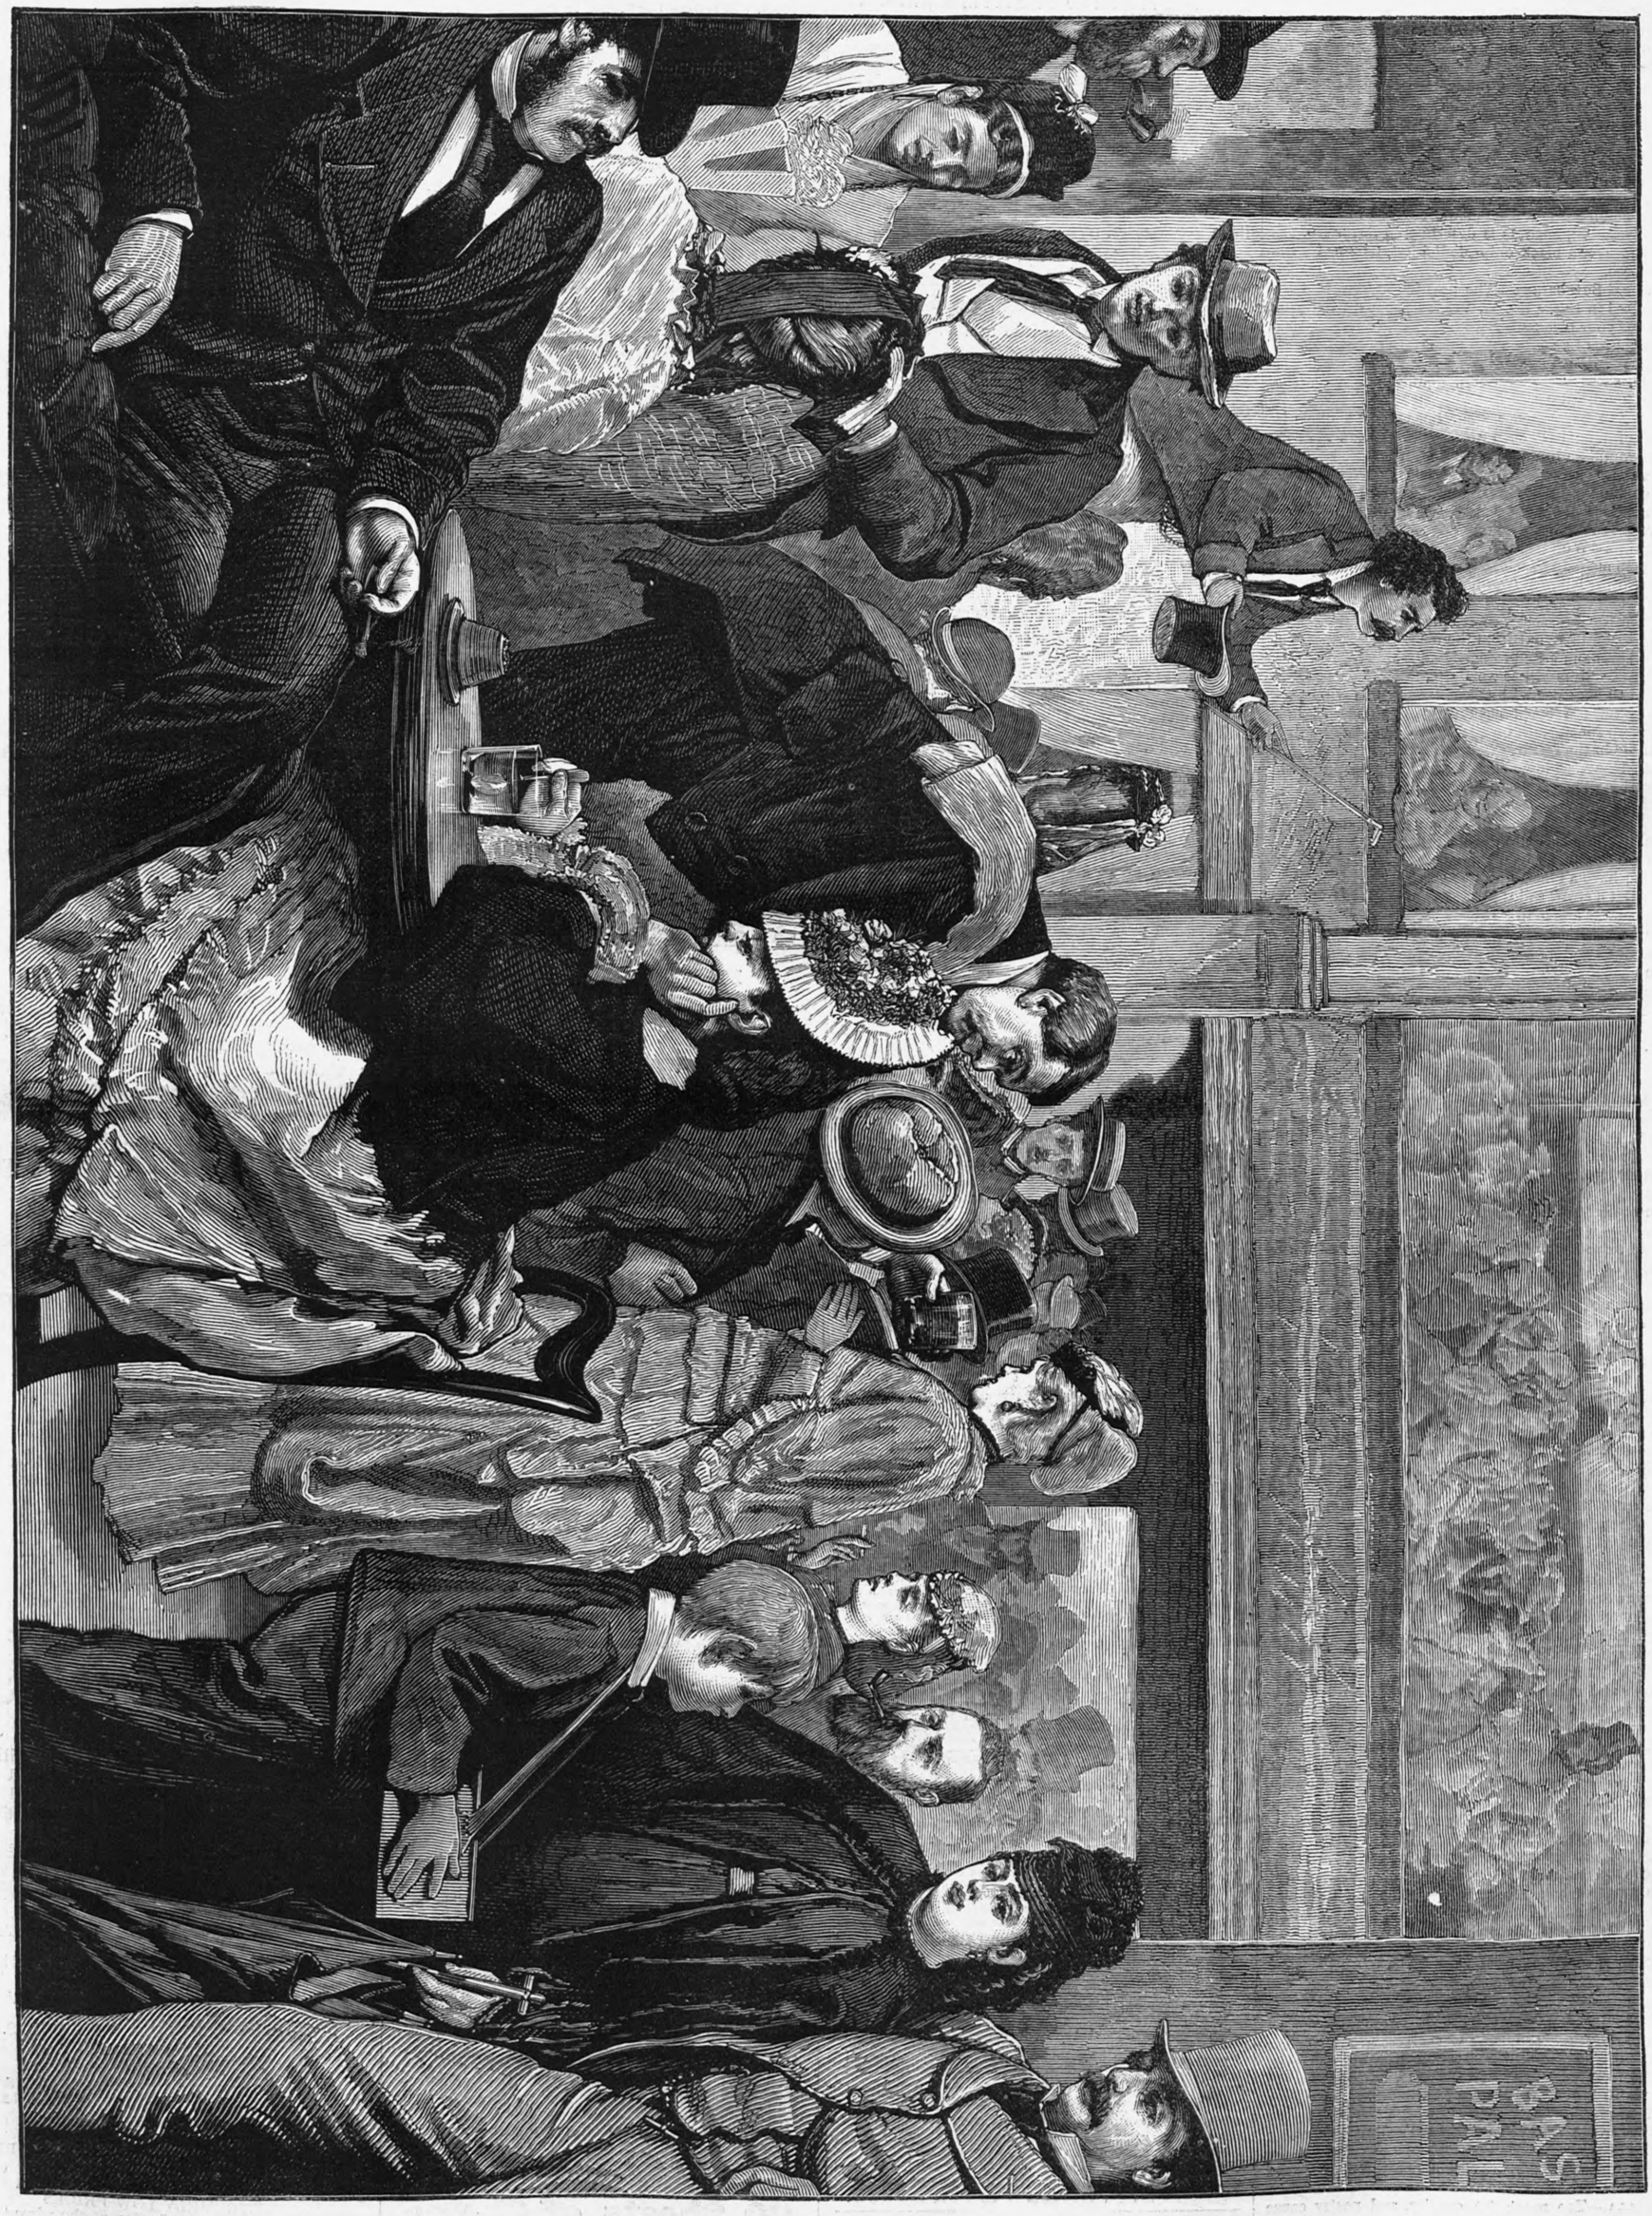


DEPUTIES AT VERSAILLES IN THE REFRESHMENT-ROOM.

Hosted by Google

SCENE AT A LONDON MUSIC-HALL.

THE peculiarly English institution represented in our engraving, which will be remembered by the readers of London's Heart, has, we believe, no parallel in this country. It is, in fact, a very common sort of concert-hall, where popular ballads and songs are sung by professed vocalists, while the audience smoke, drink, and talk at their leisure. It seems to have been called into existence for the benefit of the English sailors, who, when ashore, like nothing better than a glass and a song, and who liberally patronize this sort of entertainment. It must be said, however, that the London music-halls are decidedly superior to the so-called concert-saloons of American cities. Although, as in all places of public resort, persons of indifferent character are to be found in the audience, riotous or unbecoming behavior is rare, and the songs (though the words are too often both insipid and vulgar) are almost without exception so free from all other offense that they may be heard in the drawing-rooms of persons who consider themselves to be in the very best of society.



SCENE AT A LONDON MUSIC-HALL.

COMPANY MANNERS.

NOTHING marks more sharply the difference between the thorough-bred and the half-bred than the fact that the latter have company manners, and the former have not. Or rather, that the company manners of the former go all through —their own firesides and their friends' drawing-rooms seeing no difference between them, while with the latter they are temporary and removable, put on with the company clothes, and, like them, unaccustomed in the cut and uneasy in the fit. Any one used to society—and observation—can recognize in an instant the difference of the manner that has been put on for company from that which is worn in the daily life of home. It is as unmistakable as my lady's court train or Joan's Sunday best; and Joan and my lady are equally self-betrayed. You do not know by sight the battered old sun-bonnet with which Joan covers her ragged locks when she goes to feed the pigs, but you can evolve it out of your consciousness. At all events, you know she does not go through the sleet and snow in that smart hat. And though you are not up in the manifold diversities of my lady's wardrobe, you are very sure she does not play hide-and-seek with her babies in the nursery in a plume of feathers and a velvet train. So of the company manner. There is no need to be familiar with the home manner to be quite convinced that this is not it. Whatever the one may be, the other decidedly is not; and so far your knowledge is sufficient and satisfactory. The best-bred people have no company manners, because they are always in company at home or abroad. In all technical subtleties they are educated from the beginning; hence are always at ease. From the beginning, too, they are taught self-suppression, politeness, personal grace; and their self-consciousness is that ars celare artem which manifests itself only in the most courteous attention to others.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ROCK CITY.—For your short tour in Europe the most important dresses are, first, a traveling suit of English water-proof and a plaid flannel dressing-gown and hood. These will be serviceable on shipboard. After these a black silk suit and the dresses that now belong to the young lady's wardrobe. Take very few clothes, and make your purchases there rather than preparatory ones here.

MARION.—Your blue-gray silk sample is pretty and stylish, but is dark for an evening dress. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI.

GROGNON.—You did not inclose sample.

FLORENCE.—Information found in late numbers of the New York Fashions will assist you better than any suggestions we can make, since you know the state of your wardrobe and we do not. Read up the new materials, foulard laine, cashmere, vigogne, and the polka-spotted percales, also the new colors and the styles of making described in Bazar No. 11, Vol. V., and apply them to your own case.

ROSE EVALINE.—Make your black grenadine barége with a polonaise and a silk skirt covered to the knee with trimming, such as is described in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI. Get a black chip Medici hat, trimmed with wild roses.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—The new Tight Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI., is just what you want for your black silk.

CHARLOTTE LEE.—You can use either of the Dolman patterns the Bazar has given for your black cashmere mantle, as they are found in quantities among the spring importations.

A. W.—A barrow-coat, sometimes called a pilch, is a yard of flannel attached to a waistband and used to wrap around an infant's feet.

LAURA.—Get a réséda tamise cloth suit for spring. For summer have a black grenadine suit with blue watered ribbon sash. The furnishing houses have embroidered Swiss muslin and piqué dresses.

INVALID.—White cross-barred and plain nansook wrappers made in Watteau style would be pretty summer wear for you. Have blue or pink watered ribbon bows down the front, and a long Watteau bow hanging from back of neck. Three pleated or fluted ruffles sweep down the front from the neck and grow wider on the sides and around the train.

MOLLIE.—Suits will be worn all summer, consequently you can dispense with a lace sacque, but will occasionally need a black cashmere talma, mantilla, or scarf wrap for warmth on cool days. See illustrations and hints in the Bazar.

J. Q. U.—A widow should have her own name on her card—not her dead husband's name.

PUSS O.—Read reply above to "Rock City." Navy blue English water-proof is probably the material you mean. Get a black Rubens straw hat with black scarf lined with blue, tied on the side and held by a silver buckle; have a black and blue ostrich plume.

T.—Get a straw sailor hat for your boy for summer. Read answer above to "Invalid."

SARAH J. B.—Your lace-striped samples are for polonaises and for flounces on skirts of plain goods of the same shade. Line the waist and sleeves of the polonaise with white silesia.

INQUIRER.—The kissing of the bridegroom at a wedding by any one whomsoever would be a novel spectacle. We advise you not to try it.

AMBITION AND OAK HALL.—We can not answer questions concerning MSS. in this column.

E. W.—The pictures to which you refer are probably executed in papier-maché.

M. S. D.—We have not time to verify your curious calculations, but take them on trust. According to them Inauguration-day falls on Sunday every twenty-eight years, and will next do so in 1877, when the inaugural ceremonies will naturally take place on the day following.

E. GEORGE STONEY.—Pompeii is pronounced Pompa'-e.—A child is said to be named after its mother.

KATIE.—We know of no royal road to learning. If you have not patience to practice more than a quarter of an hour at a time, you will never become a musician, whatever natural talent you may have, and it depends on yourself to acquire the perseverance necessary to conquer your impatience. We think that if you really loved music your heart would be in your task, and you would have no difficulty. Your other questions are too trivial to merit attention.

BROOKLYN.—Take the fine white ashes that gather on ledges of the chimney where wood fires burn, and mix with a little water till it will stir easily. Apply to superfluous hairs.

A CONSTANT READER.—Apply the tar and olive-oil every night till the skin is smooth enough. It brings out pimples where the blood is impure, but, if continued, heals these and renews the complexion.

SWEET SIXTEEN.—Have some one carefully clip the eyelash once a month, cutting the smallest possible tip off, and no more.

ANXIOUS INQUIRER.—The young woman who eats white-lead to make her pale will find herself white enough and cold some morning, if not with death, with paralysis. The pallor you admire is the result of slow but sure poisoning, and we can not reprobate such foolish vanity with the terms it deserves.

EMMA G. A.—Try the paste of wood ashes given above, also bathe your face daily in strong camphor, to kill the hair. Keep this up for months if necessary. Use blood purifiers, and eat dry meats and fruit, avoiding fat and salt.

C. C.—Read answer to "Emma G. A."

JUNO.—Try a wash of chloride of soda, one spoonful to a quart of boiling water, to whiten your switch. Dip it quickly, let it drain a moment, and dip into a cold bluing water. Let it hang and drip till dry.

D.—The alum and egg paste is to be found in No. VIII. of the "Ugly Girl" papers.

MOTHER G.—Your first query was not received.—The long thimble is a private invention made to order in this city. The nose machine is a London patent.—Coarse flour bread is made of coarsest ground wheat containing most of the bran with or without molasses, but always without Indian meal. The article on the hair is in type, but we refer you to No. II. of "Ugly Girl" articles meanwhile.

BEAUTY.—A few doses of Epsom salts taken under advice of your physician will remove pimples. Bathe at least thrice a week, use carbolic soap, and eat coarse bread.

STELLA.—Too much fat, gravies, and pastry cause the pimples you speak of. Follow advice to "Beauty."

TAKE YOUR DYEING AND CLEANING to the New York Dyeing and Printing Establisement, Staten Island; 98 Duane St., 752 Broadway, and 610 Sixth Ave., New York; 164 and 166 Pierrepont St., Brooklyn; 40 North Eighth St., Phila.—[Com.]

CAMEOS.

THE fashion which some years ago seemed for a time on the point of establishing itself, of using shell cameos instead of stone cameos as the material of parures, has happily passed away. These shell cameos, the best of which were then made, and still are made, in Rome, had at the most the charm of mere curiosities. The layers of the shells used in them were for the most part superposed in hard and cold contrasts of pink with white, or of a chilly brown with a chilly cream color. How different are the warm, rich harmonies of color which belong to the onyx and the sardonyx, the vehicles from the earliest times to our own days of so much sculpturesque genius and knowledge. Bissenger of Paris, whose close and loyal work is done exclusively now, we believe, for Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, of 22 John St. (up stairs), in this city, uses these bases of color like a painter, while he shows the hand and fancy of a sculptor in the reliefs which he summons up from the stone into life. Some of the portraits in sardonyx to be seen now at this establishment are simply marvels of expression and of handling. He has been especially successful with his feminine heads. He seems to delight in mastering the amazing difficulty of treating successfully within so restricted a compass, and in so hard and hostile a substance, the infinite delicacy, the shadowy and evanescent expressions, the subtle shades of the character, and the physiognomy of woman.—[Com.]

"OUR FAVORITE SEWING-MACHINE.—The cheapest and best Sewing-Machine now manufactured for family use is probably the New Wilson. We certainly would use no other. It works with equal facility on muslin, cloth, cambric, tarletan, flannel, and leather. It does not paralyze the spine or wear out the operator in any way; neither does it demand an incessant stoppage to find out where the difficulty is. There is no difficulty. It runs smoothly and evenly, hems, fells, tucks, gathers, and binds. It does the finest and most beautiful work on cambric and linen. It also has the merit of being cheaper than any other first-class sewing-machine, as it can be purchased for $50. The feeding device is an improvement on all other machines, and is a special patent of the Wilson. It does not get out of order, nor break needles, nor slip, nor pucker the cloth. So complete has the Wilson Sewing-Machine been made, by a skillful combination of brain and muscle, that it has left nothing to be desired." Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

Retailed at same price as I charge Hair Dealers. All First quality Hair. No short crimped hair in. Warranted not dyed.

32 in. long, weight 3 oz. only $9.00
32 " " " 4 " " 12.00
32 " " " 5 " " 15.00
32 " " " 6 " " 18.00

CORONET OR POMPADOUR BRAIDS—SOLID HAIR.
2 oz., 20 in. Hair, only . $4.50

Back or Waterfall Curls—full sets Naturally Curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails for in N. Y.
Medium,	$7.00	$10 00
Large,	8.00	12.00
Extra Large,	10.00	15.00

Long single Curls (heavy) natur'ly curly
22 in hair, only $3·00
24 " " " 3.50
26 " " " 4.50

BEST FRIZ WEFT OR FACE CURLS, . . . 50 cents per yard.
NATURALLY CURLY, FRIZ WEFT CURLS, . $1.00 per yard.
LATEST STYLE. — Spanish Comb, Imitation Shell, sent prepaid on receipt of $1.50...everybody wearing them.

I sell the hair just as I import it, without intermixing [as imitators of my advertisements do,] to make their Price Lists appear cheaper. I am the only Hair Importer and wholesale dealer in this city who RETAILS at WHOLESALE Prices. I will send Switches PREPAID by REGISTERED MAIL, on receipt of P. O. Money Order, Draft, or Money in Registered Letter, or will send by Express to COLLECT on DELIVERY. Remember money sent in advance saves ALL express charges.

Wreath with any Initial, Monogram, or word, or Bouquet, made of as many pieces or colors of Hair as you may send.

Almost every family possesses some hair of deceased relatives, which can be made into beautiful pictures, forming imperishable and unchangeable mementoes and handsome household ornaments. Either of the above designs appropriately framed 4 x 6 inches, sent prepaid on receipt of $10.00. The above is the very best method of preserving the hair in its original color, and is now being extensively adopted by all who wish to preserve such as relics to perpetuate the memory of the departed. Have one made. You will surely order others on seeing how really artistic the work is done. Will return all hair not used. Established 1843. CHAS. V. PECKHAM,
Near Amity St. (Copyright secured.) 687 Broadway, N. Y. City.

When you write please mention HARPER'S BAZAR.

TO THE LADIES!

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.

No lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.

B. F. BROWN & Co., Boston.

REMOVAL.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Announces to her patrons that on May 1st she will remove from her present residence, 335 Fifth Ave., corner of 33d St., to 39 East 33d St., where she will continue to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of Reference. If samples are wanted, 25c.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

HAIR!!!

L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,

Between 4TH and GREAT JONES STS.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

All Hair used in my establishment I import and manufacture myself, and is of the best quality only; and if any expert can prove that I use in my goods any other quality but the best, or mix it with Italian or Chinese Hair, which is generally applied to by other dealers, will refund the money in every case.

I can offer to the public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors.

All goods WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

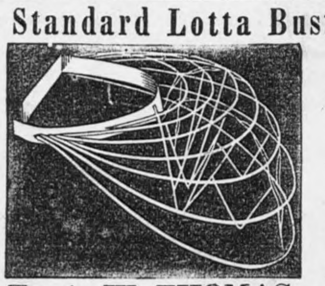
BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE, Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.

N. B.—Through the immense increase of business, we will remove to the more commodious building, 364 Bowery, cor. 4th St., after 1st of May, 1873.

The Standard Lotta Bustle.

DIPLOMA AWARDED BY THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE



To A. W. THOMAS,

Patentee and Manufacturer for the Lightest, Strongest, Most Durable, Comfortable, Elastic, and Cheapest Bustle in the Market.

The wearer can sit in any position whatever, without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree. It closes entirely up on sitting, and returns with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault).

No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. Wholesale Depots,
91 White St., N.Y.; 801 Race St., Phila.

STEINWAY & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, & UPRIGHT

PIANO-FORTES,

109 & 111 East 14th St., New York.

☞ ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES, WITH PRICE-LIST, MAILED FREE ON APPLICATION.

SEND FOR

SPRING CATALOGUE

TO

EHRICH'S TEMPLE OF FASHION,

287 & 289 EIGHTH AVENUE, N. Y.

Ladies' and Children's Undergarments and Suits. Real Laces, Embroideries, Kid Gloves, Parasols, &c. Cheapest in the country.

Every C. O. D. package subject to examination before acceptance. EHRICH & CO., 287 & 289 8th Avenue, New York.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CIRCULAR

THE McKEE M'F'G CO. 309 BROADWAY N.Y.

FLUTING & EMBROIDERING MACHINE

Price $2,00.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

20 Sheets of Choice Music, $1 00.

Why throw away money on High-priced Music when you can select from our Catalogue of 700 pieces? Any 20 Half-Dime, or 10 of Dime Series mailed on receipt of One Dollar. Sold by all booksellers, and can be ordered through any newsdealer. Send stamp for Catalogue. Address

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher, 439 THIRD AVENUE, NEW YORK.

MOURNING DEPARTMENT.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.,
Have now open a choice and complete assortment of

MOURNING GOODS
SUITABLE FOR SPRING AND SUMMER WEAR.
ENGLISH and FRENCH BOMBAZINES,
SERGE IMPERIAL, CASHMERES, POPLINS,
ALPACAS, BRILLIANTINES, HENRIETTA,
TAMISE, CREPE, BARATHEA, CANTON,
AND BOMBAZINE CLOTHS.

NOVELTIES IN SUMMER FABRICS.
PLAIN, STRIPED, and BROCADED
SILK and SILK and WOOL GRENADINES.
BYZANTINES, FLORENTINES, Gaze CHAMBRAIS.
ENGLISH TAMARTINES, LAWNS,
ORGANDIES, CAMBRICS, GINGHAMS, PRINTS,
ENGLISH VEIL & TRIMMING CREPES,
MOURNING H'D'K'FS, CREPE, LACE,
AND MUSLIN COLLARS, SETS, &c., &c.

RICH LACES & PARIS EMBROIDERIES.
REAL POINT LACE SHAWLS.
FLOUNCINGS, H'D'K'FS, BARBES, and TRIMMING LACES, all widths.
BLACK THREAD BARBES, PARASOL COVERS, and TRIMMING LACES.
BLACK THREAD LACE FICHUS, with and without SASHES.
BLACK & COLORED "YAK" TRIMMING LACES.
PARIS EMB'D SETS, COLLARS, HANDKERCHIEFS, BANDS, EDGINGS, and INSERTINGS.
Also, a fine stock of
PLAITINGS, RUFFLINGS, &c., &c.

INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR OPEN CENTRE SQUARE SHAWLS.
A fine assortment of all colors just received.
ALSO, AN ELEGANT STOCK OF
PLAIN AND STRIPED WOOL SHAWLS,
REVERSIBLE OTTOMAN SCARFS & SHAWLS,
SUMMER SHAWLS,
SHETLAND, BAREGE, GRENADINE, PLAIN, AND STRIPED CHALLIES,
GENTLEMEN'S TRAVELING SHAWLS,
RUGS, LAP-ROBES, &c., &c.
N. B.—Cloth and Linen Lap-Robes made and initialed to order.

SILKS.
STRIPED, PLAIN, AND CHINE, OF THE LATEST STYLES AND COLORINGS.
Also, BLACK SILKS of all the popular makes.
AND AT THE LOWEST PRICES.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Invite attention to their Novelties in

UPHOLSTERY GOODS.

New and choice designs in
FURNITURE COVERINGS, CURTAIN MATERIALS, elegant TAPESTRY and EMBROIDERED TABLE and PIANO COVERS, NOTTINGHAM, GUIPURE, and LACE CURTAINS,
AT PRICES UNUSUALLY ATTRACTIVE.

They have just opened in their

CARPET DEPARTMENT

a large line of entirely new designs of English Body Brussels, at $1 75 per yard; former price, $2 25.

Also, a large line of Scotch Axminster, at reduced prices.

A choice and full line of
FRENCH VELOUETTES,
in SQUARES and by the yard, in new and exclusive designs.

AUBUSSON, AXMINSTER,
AND TURKEY CARPETS,

of their own patterns, entirely new in style and of very bright colors, wove to suit rooms ranging from 18 to 30 feet.

RUGS TO MATCH.

RUGS, MATS, MATTINGS, OIL CLOTHS, &c., in great variety and at very low prices.

A visit of inspection is requested.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

STERN BROTHERS,

SIXTH AVENUE
AND TWENTY-THIRD STREET,
367 6th Ave. 110 W. 23d St.,

Are now offering unusually well selected lines of Goods in their various departments, comprising splendid assortments of
PASSEMENTERIE TRIMMINGS,
FRINGES AND ORNAMENTS,
REAL AND IMITATION LACES,
PARASOLS & SUN UMBRELLAS,
OXYDIZED FANCY GOODS.
With a comple stock of
MILLINERY GOODS.
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S UNDERGARMENTS, from lowest to finest goods imported.
CHILDREN'S PIQUE DRESSES, SUITS, AND CLOAKS.
INFANTS' COMPLETE WARDROBES.
CORSETS & HOOP-SKIRTS.
And a very attractive stock of
LADIES' CASHMERE SACQUES, DOLMANS, CAPES, MANTLES, & POLONAISES,
Ranging in price from $9 upward.
Imported and our own make
LINEN AND LAWN SUITS IN GREAT VARIETY.
To all of which we call attention, feeling convinced that our large assortments and EXTREMELY LOW PRICES
Can not fail to convince Ladies of the advantage of examining our Stock before purchasing.

STERN BROTHERS.

JAPANESE WONDER! Just out, the most wonderful, curious, and novel article ever invented, eclipsing the 7th wonder of the world. Sample, post-paid, on receipt of 60c. Address all orders to SEGA & WALLACE, Sole Agents for U. S., New Orleans, La. ☞ Live Ag'ts wanted immediately all over the country.

Hosted by Google

WEBSTER'S PATENT

Button-hole Worker.

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

It is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented! So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, together with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

DANIEL D. YOUMANS, HATTER,

719 & 1103 BROADWAY.

IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS.

Ladies' Riding-Hats in Variety.

Write for a Price List to J. H. JOHNSTON,

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS

179 Smithfield St., Pittsburgh, Pa.

Breech-Loading Shot Guns, $40 to $300. Double Shot Guns, $3 to $150. Single Guns, $3 to $20. Rifles, $8 to $75. Revolvers, $6 to $25. Pistols, $1 to $8. Gun Material, Fishing Tackle, &c. Large discounts to dealers or clubs. Army Guns, Revolvers, etc., bought or traded for. Goods sent by express C.O.D. to be examined before paid for.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

SEYMOUR'S SHEARS & SCISSORS.

"The Best are the Cheapest."

Extra Quality. Crocus Polish.

Family Size, - - $1.50
Ladies' Scissors, - 1.00

By mail, prepaid. Send P. O. Order or Draft.

HENRY SEYMOUR & CO., 29 Rose St, New York.

Sold Everywhere. State where you saw this when you write.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

NOVELTY PRINTING-PRESSES.

The Best yet Invented FOR AMATEUR & BUSINESS PURPOSES,

And Unsurpassed for General Job Printers.

OVER 8000 IN USE.

BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer,

And Dealer in Every Description of

PRINTING MATERIAL,

349-351 Federal & 152 Kneeland Sts., Boston; Branch Store, 543 Broadway & 88 Mercer St., N. Y. Agents, Kelly, Howell, & Ludwig, Philadelphia; J. F. Edwards, St. Louis, Mo.; A. C. Kellogg, Chicago, Ill. Send for Pamphlet.

EUREKA

AIR BUSTLE.

Endorsed by all the leading fashionable circles in the country. The lightest, most fashionable, and most durable Bustle ever made. Sent by mail on receipt of retail price, $2 50, or by Express, C. O. D., by EUREKA BUSTLE CO., 778 Washington St., Boston.

A PAIR OF BEST TWO-BUTTON KID GLOVES sent postpaid for $1 00. Three pair for $2 75; Twelve pair for $10 00. Every color and size. Real Laces, samples of Sash Ribbons and Dress Trimmings sent free on application. J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 Eighth Ave., Bet. 27th and 28th Sts., New York.

Perforated French Patterns, for Stamping.

Madame LEON CENDRIER, No. 636 Broadway, New York,

Offers for sale the largest collection of Perforated Patterns for Stamping in the United States.

M. CENDRIER is from Paris; and, adding eight years' experience in the Rue de la Paix, as a designer for patterns, to a successful experience in New York, feels confident that the present stock of patterns offered by Madame CENDRIER is unsurpassed for beauty of design or variety.

Arrangements have been made to procure designs of the most fashionable patterns from Paris and London. Mad. CENDRIER invites attention to her PATTERNS and work in BRAIDING, EMBROIDERING, & QUILTING.

For the accommodation of those about introducing Stamping as a business, I have made three assorted lots (each pattern of a separate design), all adapted for Machine Braiding and Embroidery, each sufficient to do a small business in Stamping, and containing full instructions.

No. 1.—Price $15, by P. O. Order or by Express. No. 2.—Price $10, by P. O. Order or by Express. No. 3.—Instruction Package proper, with enough Patterns to learn, Price $2.

ALL KINDS OF DESIGNS MADE TO ORDER. CRESTS, COATS OF ARMS, EMBLEMS, AND SYMBOLS. MONOGRAMS, NAMES, & INITIALS EMBROIDERED TO ORDER. STAMPED GOODS. EMBROIDERY, BRAIDS, COTTON, SILK, AND WORSTED. EMBROIDERED & BRAIDED GOODS. AGENTS WANTED. ORDERS FOR STAMPING SOLICITED.

Contracts taken for Stamping, Braiding, and Embroidering in any quantities, large or small.

Call or send for Circular with PRICE-LIST OF PATTERNS.

MARK YOUR CLOTHING

WITH

PAYSON'S INDELIBLE INK

and Crystal Marking-Pen.

Put up in portable case, with full directions. Sold by all Druggists & Stationers. Sample sent, postpaid, for 75c. Traveling Canvassers wanted by F. H. STODDARD & CO., Northampton, Mass.

WILHELM & ZACHMAN,

IMPORTERS AND DECORATORS OF

CHINA, GLASSWARE, & CROCKERY,

CLOCKS, BRONZES, PLATED-WARE, &c.,

1152 Broadway, N. Y.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	No. 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)	" 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)	" 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)	" 29
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)	" 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt)	" 35
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER	" 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP	" 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 48
LOW-NECKED EVENING DRESS, with Adjustable Court Train and Round Skirt	" 49

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Baqsue, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER	" 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)	" 6
PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 8
SLEEVELESS SACQUE AND CAPE, with French Blouse, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 13
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 20
VEST BASQUE, with Over-skirt and Kilt-pleated Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 21
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER	No. 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)	" 25
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt	" 27
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)	" 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old)	" 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)	" 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt	" 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOUBLE-TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT	" 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT	" 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)	" 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT	" 51

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT	" 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)	" 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT	" 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 17

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

BAZAR Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE

Manufactured by the Florence Sewing Mach. Co. The simplest, cheapest, and best in use! Has but one needle! A Child can run it. Agents wanted in every town. Send for Circular and Sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. Co., Bath, Me.

$20 A DAY FOR MEN AND WOMEN who take the money for "THE LADIES' CASKET"—a beautiful Box with gold edges and clasp—4 by 2¼ inches—Book style—contains $1 12 worth of articles of daily use. Is new—sells at sight. One sample for 60 cents, or two styles for $1 00, postpaid, with circulars. Address

CITY NOVELTY CO., 1505 Pennsylvania Ave., Philadelphia, Pa.

WANTED.—BOOK AGENTS are wanted to sell popular Standard Works by subscription. Some of them, viz.: M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclopœdia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature; The Life of Christ; The Land and the Book; and Tyerman's Life of Wesley are admirably adapted for Theological Students and others to sell during their coming vacations. The subscriber also wants energetic and successful Canvassers to sell the NEW and popular books, just published, viz.: Farm Ballads, by Will Carleton; The Treaty of Washington, by Caleb Cushing; Santo Domingo, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti, by Samuel Hazard; and Nordhoff's California. Energetic persons can make the business very lucrative. For further particulars, address

AVERY BILL, Care of Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Beautiful inventions for marking Clothing and printing Cards, &c. One will do for a whole family. Movable Type. Profitable, amusing and instructive for the young. Jet Printer $1. Silver $1.25, with Ink, Type and neat Case, delivered by mail anywhere. 4 Alphabets extra 60c. Agents wanted. Golding & Co, 14 Kilby St, Boston.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

WANTED! Agents to sell our Rubber Stamps and other novelties. Address U. S. Manufacturing Co., 97 W. Lombard St., Baltimore, Md.

OUR NEEDLE-CASE is the best, sells fastest, pays best. Send 50 cents for sample. Agents wanted. H. N. McKINNEY & CO., Philadelphia.

$72 EACH WEEK. Agents wanted every where. Business strictly legitimate. Particulars free. Address J. WORTH & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.

BY THE LATE LORD LYTTON:

KENELM CHILLINGLY: His Adventures and Opinions. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

THE COMING RACE. 12mo, Paper, 50 cents.

GODOLPHIN. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

LEILA; or, The Siege of Grenada. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

2.

FARM BALLADS. By WILL CARLETON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Ornamental Cloth, $2 00.

3.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON: Its Negotiation, Execution, and the Discussions Relating Thereto. By CALEB CUSHING. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

4.

LITTLE KATE KIRBY. A Novel. By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "Christie's Faith," "Mattie: a Stray," "No Man's Friend," "True to Herself," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

5.

THE FISHING TOURIST: Angler's Guide and Reference Book. By CHARLES HALLOCK, Secretary of the "Blooming-Grove Park Association." Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

6.

TURNING-POINTS IN LIFE. By the Rev. FREDERICK ARNOLD, B.A., of Christ Church, Oxford. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

7.

TO THE BITTER END. A Novel. By Miss M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Dead-Sea Fruit," "Birds of Prey," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

8.

SANTO DOMINGO, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti. By SAMUEL HAZARD. Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

9.

STUDENT'S HALLAM'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND. The Constitutional History of England, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II. By HENRY HALLAM, LL.D., F.R.A.S. Incorporating the Author's Latest Additions and Corrections, and adapted to the Use of Students. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D. 12mo, 747 pp., Cloth, $2 00.

10.

RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

11.

GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50. Popular Edition, 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

12.

HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

13.

ROBIN GRAY. A Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, "Author of "For the King," and "For Lack of Gold." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

14.

THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

This work embraces in one volume:

ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.

ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

WORKING CLASS, MALE OR FEMALE, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Cortlandt St., N.Y.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Boston, Mass.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

5000 AGENTS WANTED. Samples sent free by mail. Two new articles, salable as flour. Address N. H. WHITE, Newark, N. J.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

SOME people are never contented. After having all their limbs broken, their heads smashed, and their brains knocked out, they will actually go to law and try to get further damages.

A retired sea-captain, who had made the tour of continental Europe and the Holy Land, was asked how he was impressed by his visit to Jerusalem.

"Jerusalem," said he, "is the meanest place I ever visited! There is not a drop of liquor in the whole town fit to drink."

THE LETTER H AGAIN.—It sometimes happens that when a man's heir thinks he ought to die, he thinks he ought to dye his hair.

At a late Conference session a clergyman gave a reason why the Baptist Church is like a beaver's hut: "There is only one entrance to it, and that is under water."

What goes most against a farmer's grain?—His reaping machine.

Do singers measure their time with the compass of the voice or with the scales?

"Who are the peacemakers?" asked a minister of his Sunday-school class.

"The police," quickly replied one of the lads.

Why do bees like to come out on a bright summer day?—Because it's honey (sunny) weather.

A cockney conducted two ladies to an observatory to see an eclipse of the moon. They were too late, the eclipse was over, and the ladies were disappointed. "Oh," exclaimed our hero, "don't fret! I know the astronomer well. He's a very polite man, and, I'm sure, will begin again."

Of all the birds that please us with their lays, the most popular is the hen.

A Nebraska conductor, when he finds a man on his train without any money to pay for his ride, punches three holes in his hat, and "passes him along."

A sentimental young man thus feelingly expresses himself, "Even Nature benevolently guards the rose with thorns: does she endow women with pins?"

A Western critic, noted for his softness of style, speaks of an "Indian poet who was recently sent to the penitentiary for three years for plagiarizing a horse."

DESPOTISM.

LEADING LADY (stoutish—with just indignation, on reading cast of next performance). "What! I not play Juliet? After having played it thirty years!"

[No wonder there's no chance for real talent nowadays!

WRONGFUL IMPRESSION.—"You are wrong, my dear Simpletonius, in supposing the Irish to be cannibals from the mere fact of their having 'the broth of a boy' so frequently in their mouths."—Extract from some elegant correspondence.

A school inspector, while lately examining the young children, asked them the following questions:

"Are there any mountains in Palestine?"

"Yes," replied the children.

"How are they situated?" inquired the examiner.

"Some are in clusters, and there are some isolated ones," they answered.

"What do you mean by the word 'isolated?'" asked the examiner.

"Why, covered with ice, of course!" quickly replied one of the children.

THESE GOOD PEOPLE ARE NOT CRAZY. THEY ARE ONLY AMUSING BABY, SO HE WILL ALLOW NURSE TO WASH HIM.

SPRING.

The sun is warm, the sky is blue,
The buds are full, the grass is growing;
I wonder if the signs are true,
And winter really is going!
'Tis too good news, it seems to me,
That gentle spring at last is coming.
This very morn I saw a bee—
But he was humming!

The seeds don't seem to show as yet—
I fear they've rotted altogether;
The winter's been so very wet—
But shall we have more settled weather?
Those fleecy clouds on high that wing
Can weep like Niobe's sad daughters;
And we perchance may find the spring
A spring of waters.

O gentle spring! betray us not;
We can be dry, and yet hilarious;
And, pray, give back the watering-pot
To January's old Aquarius.
Where'er your tiny foot shall touch,
Bid blossoms spring, the greensward fretting—
For we've an appetite for such
That needs no whetting.

INSULT TO INJURY.—A rogue was charged with obtaining goods by false pretenses. He pleaded that he failed to see how a pretense could be other than false.

HORTICULTURE AND HYMEN.

"As you have made your bed, so you must lie upon it."

"I sha'n't," replied the youthful bridegroom, to whom this observation was addressed by an aged relative; "I'm a gardener."

AGED, BUT AFFABLE.—A lady asked Mr. Scrudgells if he liked children. "Don't know, ma'am," answered that crabbed old gentleman; "never tried 'em; am not an ogre." On another occasion Scrudgells remarked that infants were not innocents. "Quite the reverse," said Scrudgells; "a baby is a crying evil."

"A JOB'S COMFORTER."

IRISH EX-MAJOR. "So, me boy, you're going to India? Unhealthy place, you know. The last station I was at coff'ns were issued with annual clothin' to the men, and kept as necessaries in store; and, bedad, I had a friend who was on a firing party over a man of his company in the morning, and who fired over himself in the evening, Sor!"

A young lady being asked by a boring politician which party she was in favor of, the conservative or the liberal party, replied that she preferred a wedding party.

CIRCUITOUS.

PASSENGER. "Quite the sort of weather for your business, these April showers, I suppose?"

RED-FACED DRIVER. "No, Sir; gi' me fair weather; 'cause if it ain't fair, no one gets up outside; and if there ain't no one to get up outside, there ain't no one to say, 'Driver, get yourself something warm to drink!'"

TO ALMANAC-MAKERS.—Can a year remarkable for its hideous fashions be remembered as a year of grace?

Somebody who is bored with the enthusiasm for the poem called Beautiful Snow writes this pretty stanza in reply:

"Beautiful snow! when a delicate thaw
Makes the air chilly and damp and raw!
Beautiful snow! they may sing whom it suits—
I object to the stuff 'cause it soaks through my boots."

A young preacher having tried to preach a sermon from the text, "Remember Lot's wife," and made a failure, a venerable doctor remarked that he "had better thereafter let other people's wives alone."

The report that the Modoc Indians had been engaged to put whoops on barrels of army stores has been contradicted.

A PHOTOGRAPHER'S EPITAPH—Taken from life.

They tell of a woman in Baltimore who has provided herself with two hundred pairs of stockings, woolen and cotton. She is evidently intending to organize a hose company somewhere.

An Oregon town got on a land-slide recently, and deposited itself in another county. And now the dishonest residents of that peripatetic village coolly refuse to pay their taxes, on the ground that they don't belong in that county.

REVIVALISM.—That was a good though rather a severe pun which was made by a student in a theological seminary (and he was not one of the brightest of the class either), when he asked, "Why is Professor —— the greatest revivalist of the age?" and, on all "giving it up," said, "Because at the end of every sermon there is a great awakening."

Why is a nice young unmarried lady an anomaly?—Because, although she's always a miss, still she's never amiss.

At a concert the other day one of the vocalists found her voice thick: she strained it, but without any good effect.

THE FIRST SHEPHERDESS—The Queen of She (bah).

A revengeful traveler on a certain railroad in this State packed a carpet-bag full of loaded revolvers, and handed it to a gentlemanly baggage-smasher, who had ruined three or four trunks for him already. The smasher flung the bag up against the wall savagely, and then threw it on the floor and stamped on it, and jumped up and down on it, as usual. At about the fourth jump firing began along the whole line. Forty-six revolvers went off in rapid succession, distributing bullets around the car with disgusting carelessness of the legs of the smasher, who was shot in six places before he could get out of the car. He rode upon the platform during the whole of that trip; and when he did enter the car he incased his legs in stove-pipe, and ran an iron-clad snow-plow in front of him to push the baggage out with. He smashes, perhaps, fewer carpet-bags now than he once did in the blissful past—much fewer; and he is filled with gloom. The only boon he craves is that he may be present when the carpet-bag owner calls with his check. He says there will then be a conflict which will make the Franco-German war appear perfectly ridiculous.

The misery of being called upon suddenly to make a speech was got over by a mathematician, who delivered himself in this fashion: "Gentlemen, a morbid desire for originality prevents me from saying, 'This is the proudest moment of my life,' and it does not occur to me to say any thing else."

A minister examined his school-boys thus:

"What is the meaning of the word 'repentant?'"

"Please, Sir, don't know."

"Now, if I had stolen a loaf of bread, what should I be?"

"Please, Sir, locked up."

"Well, should I feel sorry?"

"Yes."

"Well, why should I feel sorry?"

"Please, Sir, cos you was cotched."

A minister in a Highland village recently, in discoursing to his hearers upon the subject of Jonah and the whale, portrayed in bold imagery the whole scene. He said: "I seem to see Jonah passing along the road to Nineveh; I seem to see him paying his passage-money; I seem to see him walk upon the vessel; I seem to see them lift their anchor, and the stately ship move gradually out from the Clyde upon the ocean!"

A SMART YOUTH.

COUSIN MILLICENT (with smothered indignation). "Good-by, Robert! And since it seems you found nothing fitter than my favorite bit of Japanese Enamel to drop your Cigar Ashes in last night, perhaps you'll accept it as a Gift. It has no further Value for me after such Desecration!"

COUSIN ROBERT. "Tha-anks, Millicent! And if that's the way Articles of Priceless Value are disposed of in your branch of the Family, I can only Regret I didn't make an Ash-Pan of your Hand!"

THE FORCE OF EXAMPLE.

"Now, Jessie, Say your Prayers like a good little Girl!"

"Mamma dear, why mayn't I kneel down, and Hold my Tongue, as Papa does!"

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 20.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

MAY PARTIES.

THE young girls' May party combines, more than any recreation with which we are acquainted, the constituents of the beautiful, innocent, and agreeable.

The veritable 1st of May, with the manner of whose observance in England Washington Irving's sketches have made us all so delightfully familiar, can no longer be kept in our climate with appropriate accompaniments of flower and leafy bough. Each year spring seems to retard her coming, and gives not forth of her floral treasures until toward the middle or last of the month, so that it is only by courtesy that we still consider this style of festival as the welcomer in of May.

Generally children of one school or neighborhood, for the most part girls of from ten to sixteen years of age, club together, and designating a suitable time and place, elect their queen by vote. She may be the most beautiful, but is more often the best beloved among her companions. Next is chosen a crowner, who should be rather taller than the queen; then a garland-bearer, who is to encircle with her wreath the new-made queen, throwing it over the right and under the left arm; then from among the smaller girls are chosen a sceptre-bearer and page, the latter to be in appropriate costume, and supplied with a magnificent bouquet for presentation to her majesty. After these selections are made the rest of the girls are divided into two bands, viz., the maids of honor, to be uniformed in white dresses with blue sashes, and the Floras, in white, with pink sashes.

Some owner of a suitable grove or ample grassy lawn is generally found generous enough to throw open his grounds for the May-day celebration. A large wooden platform is then erected for a throne underneath some overarching shade tree. The throne must be carpeted, and should be large enough to admit of holding an arm-chair, with space on either side for all to stand who are to take an active part in the ceremony, the rest of the girls ranging themselves on each side of the steps, which ought to furnish an easy ascent to the structure. The throne should be provided with such floral decorations as taste may suggest. A large crimson-covered arm-chair, surmounted by an arch of white lilies and evergreens, contrasts prettily with the snowy, airy muslins of the little girls.

At the hour appointed, invited guests being assembled on the green, and a small band of stringed instruments playing lively strains of music, the procession should draw near in the following order: two marshals, with batons three or four feet long, wrapped in ribbons or wreaths of flowers, lead the way; the Floras follow, two and two, holding baskets of flowers, whose contents they scatter along the pathway as they advance, reciting,

"Happy, happy, happy day,
—— —— is Queen of May;"

two and two come the maids of honor; and lastly, the queen, simply attired in pure white, arm in arm with her crowner. At the foot of the throne stairs the marshals pause, and crossing their batons, form a triumphal arch, through which defile the little train.

Having taken their positions, the crowner advances and performs her office, using a poetical form of address. Having been invested with sceptre, garlanded with flowers, and presented with a gorgeous nosegay, the donors in each case reciting a short poetical address, the queen rises and responds. Her speech over, the coronation is deemed complete.

The May-pole, at some point near, which has meanwhile been flaunting to the breeze its gay streamers and pendent wreaths, now claims "all honor due;" and the queen, attended by her mimic court, descending from the throne, resorts thither. Joining hands, all dance round and round till wearied with the sport, when the ring is broken and ceremony is at an end. The guests mingle freely, and give themselves up to the innocent merriment called forth by the occasion. Refreshments of ices, cake, and fruit may be handed or not, as convenient, to be partaken of in picnic style under the trees.

Five o'clock in the afternoon is the primitive hour usual for the gathering together of these assemblies. This circumstance supplies no slight recommendation in the eyes of careful mammas, since by night-fall the party has dispersed, and the young folks are again domiciled.

These entertainments are not only to be commended as furnishing young people with a delightful mode of spending a half-holiday, but in this work-a-day world the good done is incalculable, when hard-worked men and women can be thus drawn out of themselves for a while into an enjoyment of nature and sympathy with children's pleasures.

Let not the May party, then, be reckoned out of date, but be perpetuated, as giving refined and poetical expression to feelings deep-seated in the soul and beneficent in their exercise, sanctioned by the customs of the past, and suited to the exigencies of the present.

Among us, Decoration-day, on the 30th of May, is fast taking the place of the traditional May-day. Falling, as it does, at the end, instead of the beginning of the month, at the time when the spring flowers are in their fullest bloom, this touching festival in commemoration of our heroes, which is kept alike

Fig. 1.—FOULARD DRESS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 19–21.

Fig. 2.—DRESS FOR CHILD UNDER ONE YEAR OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—FAILLE WALKING SUIT.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—TOILE DE SOIE WALKING SUIT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 22–28.

FIGS. 1–4.—LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S HOUSE AND STREET DRESSES.

Hosted by Google

in all sections of the country, is more akin to the spirit of our people than either the May-day of old England or the carnival of Southern Europe.

THE OLD MAN IN THE PALACE CAR.

BY JOHN H. YATES.

WELL, Betsey, this beats every thing our eyes have ever seen!
We're ridin' in a palace fit for any king or queen.
We didn't go as fast as this, nor on such cushions rest,
When we left New England years ago to seek a home out West.

We rode through this same country, but not as we now ride—
You sat within a stage-coach, while I trudged on by your side;
Instead of ridin' on a rail, I carried one, you know,
To pry the old coach from the mire through which we had to go.

Let's see: that's fifty years ago—just arter we were wed;
Your eyes were then like diamonds bright, your cheeks like roses red.
Now, Betsey, people call us old, and push us off one side,
Just as they have the old slow coach in which we used to ride.

I wonder if young married folks to-day would condescend
To take a weddin'-tour like ours, with log-house at the end?
Much of the sentimental love that sets young cheeks aglow
Would die to meet the hardships of fifty years ago.

Our love grew stronger as we toiled; though food and clothes were coarse,
None ever saw us in the courts a-huntin' a divorce;
Love leveled down the mountains and made low places high;
Love sang a song to cheer us when clouds and storms were nigh.

I'm glad to see the world move on, to hear the engine's roar,
And all about the cables stretchin' now from shore to shore.
Our mission is accomplished; with toil we both are through;
The Lord just lets us live a while to see how young folks do.

Whew, Betsey, how we're flyin'! See the farms and towns go by!
It makes my gray hair stand on end; it dims my failin' eye.
Soon we'll be through our journey, and in the house so good
That stands within a dozen rods of where the log one stood.

How slow—like old-time coaches—our youthful years went by!—
The years when we were livin' 'neath a bright New England sky:
Swifter than palace cars now fly our later years have flown,
Till now we journey hand in hand down to the grave alone.

I can hear the whistle blowin' on life's fast-flyin' train;
Only a few more stations in the valley now remain.
Soon we'll reach the home eternal, with its glories all untold,
And stop at the blest station in the city built of gold.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1873.

☞ WITH the next Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent out gratuitously a splendidly illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing a choice variety of exceedingly interesting reading matter.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' Elegant Traveling Suits, Walking Dresses, Wrappings, Caps for Elderly Ladies, Traveling Conveniences, Fancy-Work, etc., etc., together with choice literary and artistic attractions.

FANCY-WORK.

THERE has always been an outcry, from a certain branch of the Gradgrinds, as to the folly and idleness of fancy-work, so called, and the total depravity of the same in any relation to art.

We confess that we have never been altogether able to agree with those earnest souls who cry havoc and let loose the dogs of war upon this poor little prey; for to our thinking fancy-work is by no means at all times an unworthy occupation, and, moreover, those employed upon it being usually those whose time hangs heavily on their hands, we must believe that any work for them is better than no work at all.

Certain it is that fancy-work is often a great delight, and answers a craving otherwise unappeased, for with almost every one there is a desire to create the beautiful; and if nature has not been impartial in her gifts of genius, of eye, and hand for the execution of outline and color and form—if it is not given to every one to draw and paint, and carve and model—the unassuming bit of fancy-work may afford opportunity of seeing delicate shapes and tints grow beneath the touch, and give to the worker a degree of satisfaction which, if it be not the highest there is, is still valuable.

The idea of saying that because a person can not do all that is desirable, that person shall be debarred from doing even what is possible—that if she can not paint flowers in water-colors, for instance, she shall not work flowers in flosses, is, with all deference to those that differ, simply absurd. One might as well say that nobody should sing a lullaby that could not sing a cavatina—that nobody should write ballads because there are Iliads. One star differs from another in glory, we are told; and if this star's particular influence is shed upon fancy-work, we do not know why the fancy-work should be ignored because that star's influence is shed upon something better still.

Of course the day of embroidering pink-eyed and impossible poodles asleep in impossible meadows is over; and though some may attribute its abolition, in a degree, to the hue and cry against fancy-work in general, we prefer to consider it due to the universal improvement in the public taste which has taken place with added culture, education, and intercourse with the world at large. Nowadays designers of real merit are employed upon nearly all the designs for Berlin wool; and those who do not see any thing lovely in a baby's blanket lying over him like a lapful of blossoms, or do not think an unsightly chair is bettered by a tidy whose vines and leaves are crocheted as whitely and frostily as winter stamps them on the pane, or do not prefer to have a cumbrous and ungainly wooden mantel-shelf covered and fringed by a lambrequin whose foliated outlines mingle in graceful arabesque—those who choose rather the plain blanket, the ugly chair, the naked shelf, before the same objects decorated into cheerfulness and comeliness, have, to say the least, a very singular taste themselves.

But taste, indeed, is an arbitrary affair. The Circassians and the Mongolians have very different rules and standards regarding it. That only can be the best whose results are the best, and those results only are the best which produce the greatest happiness and virtue. And it seems to us, unequivocally, that in the house where fancy-work prevails there is an evident desire to civilize and adorn that house, an evident interest in it, and therefore a probable happiness and virtue; for where people have interest in their homes there is apt to be happiness there, and there can not be happiness unless there is virtue too.

It is possible that here and there a young girl wastes herself over her embroidery needle who might do something else to more purpose, but we doubt if it is a frequent case. The usual young woman is not a MARY FAIRFAX or a MARIA MITCHELL. She would not be ciphering out logarithms if there had never been a stitch of fancy-work invented. She would most likely be gadding and gossiping and making shocking patchworks; and we imagine that if to-day she feels any decided tendency to editing, or teaching, or bone-setting, or book-keeping, or the cure of souls, the meshes of no worsted-work would be strong enough to restrain her. In our own experience we have seen the novel-writer take it up to refresh her tired fancy, and find it do so, the female preacher resort to it on social evenings when casual guests forbade more serious employment, and the shop-girl fly to it after her tedious day with rapture. Perhaps it was to them what the cigar and the meerschaum are to their brothers; for it would seem as if there were something in the delicate ivory and steel implements, and the soft and bright hues of the materials used, that is gratifying and soothing not only to the nerves, but to that artistic sense which is inherent in every woman's nature, even if not carried to any creative point.

Nor is it merely as a soothing and refreshing occupation that we look at fancy-work. It is, more often than not, something positively useful. When out of shreds of old woolens one has fringed and crimped a lamp-mat, from which the globe of flame shall rise as if from a bed of moss, one has done something useful; when one has wrought a vine of the reddened October blackberry wreaths to lay over the tiny corner shelf that was needed to hold vase or bust, but could not be afforded of richer wood than the plain unvarnished pine, one has done something useful; when one has made a rustic frame of twigs and acorns and cones for the print that never could have been hung on the tiresome bare wall if it waited for the costly frame from the picture-dealer, one has done something useful; when one has embroidered or painted or spatter-worked a book-cover that shall still be as pleasant to the sight as the original binding, and shall preserve the rich book from soil, one has done something useful. And who can say that fire-screen, or chair-cover, or sofa-cushion is not useful, or that every simple decoration of the house that makes it more attractive to father and brother and husband, makes it a more desirable place for them to invite their friends and linger in themselves, is not, above most things, useful? And are all the little tokens of affection, the holiday and birthday gifts which can be had at the expenditure of a few cents and a few hours, and otherwise could not be had at all—slippers and traveling-bags and shawl-straps and pen-wipers—things that assure the recipient of some pleasant concern—are they, after all, so absolutely useless? Indeed, we know nothing more useful.

But we have met with cases where the frivolity of fancy-work has been turned to excellent profit, where young ladies who had learned its arts in their idle moments practiced it to provide themselves with the wardrobe that their restricted purses could never buy. We have known of a still more striking case where a widow has paid off the mortgage on her city house, and supported herself and child for many years, almost altogether with her swift crochet needle. And all of our readers have recently heard of the new point d'art which, long the amusement of noble ladies in France, has now become, if not their industry, at least a source of income to a conquered people. There is not an opponent of fancy-work to be found who would not consider fragments of certain tapestries to be worth more than their weight in gold, and yet those tapestries were nothing but the fancy-work of queens and princesses eight hundred years ago!

In fact, whenever we enter a house where there is store of fancy-work to be seen, we know that other wholesome things are to be found there also; we know that there is love of beauty, however inadequately fed, that there is skill and deftness and industry and lovely patience—all comfortable qualities to have in those about you—and we fancy that there is a certain delightful femininity in the spirit of such a household as it promises, not always to be found in dwellings where costlier splendor dispenses with such small adornments, or where dry intellectuality scorns them. And while we are sure that none but those who would carry any thing else to excess would ever manifest so silly a devotion to the thing as to use upon it the hours belonging to other occupations, we can not but consider that the effect of fancy-work in general, not only upon the worker, but upon the frequent beholder, is refining and beneficial in many ways.

MAY MARKETING.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

THIS month is the most favored of the year for new and tender vegetables, as the list below will show. Shad and veal are also in their prime. Fruits are not plentiful yet, but the few kinds that are in season are most excellent.

FISH.

Sea bass, black-fish, halibut, kingfish, lamprey, mackerel, white and black perch, porgies, salmon, scup, shad, sheep's-head, sturgeon, trout, turbot, weak-fish, and frogs and turtles.

SHELL-FISH.

Lobsters, prawns, craw-fish, crabs.

MEAT.

Beef, veal, mutton, spring lamb, kid.

POULTRY.

Chickens, capons, spring chickens, turkeys, ducklings.

GAME.

Brand-goose, black duck, curlew, lapwing, brown lark, plover, rail, snipe.

VEGETABLES.

Asparagus, Bermuda potatoes, Bermuda onions, new cabbages, young beets, cauliflowers, chervil, chives, cucumbers, dandelion, dock, Limas, mint, nasturtium, pease, pepper-grass, radishes, poke, rhubarb, purslane, sprouts, string-beans, tomatoes, water-cress, wild chiccory.

FRUITS.

Bananas, gooseberries, cherries, peaches, pine-apples, strawberries.

We gave last month lists of different kinds of food that are found in the markets and in stores during the whole year.

Frying.—There are two very different ways of frying; one is to have enough boiling fat to immerse the objects fried, and the other is to have just enough of it to merely cover the bottom of the frying-pan, and prevent the objects therein from burning.

Inexperienced housekeepers or cooks often make mistakes on that account. They hear or read that such an article of food is excellent fried; they try it, not knowing in which way it ought to be fried, either with little or much fat, and just as often spoil the article as cook it well.

To guard our readers from mistakes of this kind, we shall call frying with much fat (when the objects are immersed) to fry, which is the real name for it, and we shall call frying with little fat (when there is only enough of it to merely cover the bottom of the pan) to sauté, which is its French and right name, there being no corresponding word to it in English. For instance, small fish is fried, but an omelet is sauté; potatoes are fried, but parsnips are sautés.

How to fry.—If there is not enough fat in the pan to completely immerse the objects fried, they will certainly taste greasy. It will be the same if the fat is not heated enough. Fat is heated enough when jets of smoke ooze out of it, or when, on throwing drops of water into it, a crackling noise is heard.

When the fat is hot enough, the article that is to be fried is dropped into it, and stirred gently now and then with a skimmer. When done, it is taken off the pan with the skimmer, and turned into a colander, which should rest on a dish or bowl to receive the fat that may drop.

If the article to be fried be tender and somewhat brittle, it is put in a wire basket made for that purpose, and the basket is placed in the fat. When done, the basket is raised, held over the pan for a few seconds to allow the fat to drop, and the articles fried are carefully taken out of it, and served, after having been sprinkled with salt.

If the article to be fried is not completely immersed in the fat, the part not immersed will absorb fat and, as stated above, will taste greasy; but when there is fat enough to entirely cover them, the intensity of the heat closes the pores (carbonizes them, as it were), and no fat is absorbed.

Fat (be it beef suet, lard, or oil) can be heated to a degree three times higher than water.

It is no more expensive to have plenty of fat than to have only a little; for, as soon as the articles are taken off the fat, the pan is put away to cool for a few minutes, then the fat is poured into a stone jar, gently, so as to retain what particles of solid matter may be on the bottom of the pan, and is kept for another time.

After having used the fat several times it may turn somewhat dark; a few slices of bread dried in the oven may then be put into it and boiled gently for about twenty minutes; the whole is then turned into another pan, with about as much water; two or three boils are given, it is suffered to cool, and the fat is skimmed off from the surface, when all the particles that may have been in it will be found in the bottom, in the water. The every-day fat coming from skimming, trimmings, etc., as explained before, is added to this, so that there is at all times fat enough in a well-kept kitchen for frying purposes.

Butter should never be used to fry, but always to sauté, because in sautéing the fat is absorbed, and butter has a much more delicate flavor than any other fat, except chicken, goose, and turkey fat or grease, which are preferred by many to sauté omelets.

Calf's Brain, Fried.—The brain is put in cold water and a few drops of vinegar for two or three hours before cooking; then the thin skins and bloody veins are removed. It is split in four or six slices, according to size; each slice is dipped in batter, and fried. The batter is composed of two yolks of eggs, two table-spoonfuls of flour, a pinch of salt, and cold water enough to make the mixture rather thin; then the whites of the eggs are beaten to a stiff froth with an egg-beater, and well mixed with the rest. Milk may be used instead of water, according to taste.

Brain with Brown Butter.—When the brain is cleaned as above, put it in a pan with cold water, a wine-glassful of vinegar, a few whole peppers, parsley, salt, and a clove; boil for from four to six minutes, according to size; take it off carefully with a skimmer, split each half in two lengthwise, and place the slices on a warm dish; turn a brown butter all over, put the stalks of fried parsley around, and serve quickly.

Calf's brain is quite a relish for invalids.

Calf's Head.—When you buy a calf's head, see that the eyes are full. Have it split in two lengthwise by the butcher. When in the kitchen, remove the two halves of the brain without breaking them, and also the tongue. See that no hairs have been left on the skin, especially around the eyes, the ears, the lips, and the nostrils. Put it in cold water for a few hours, and clean and wash it well. Put the head and tongue into a good-sized saucepan, with cold water, half a gill of vinegar, two onions and two carrots quartered, two cloves, two bay leaves, a few stalks of parsley, a pinch of thyme, and a tea-spoonful of whole peppers. Simmer for two hours and a half if small, for three hours if of middling size, and for three hours and a half if large. It is then taken from the fire, and left in the liquor until used: being gelatinous, it gets dry and hard if exposed to the atmospheric air for any length of time.

Head for Breakfast.—The head is taken out of the water when cold, boned, and cut in small pieces or in dice, and put in a dish; then beat together in a bowl about a tea-spoonful of chopped parsley, salt, pepper, oil, mustard, and vinegar; turn over the pieces of head, and it is ready. An onion or shallot, chopped fine, may be added to the mixture, if liked. When for breakfast it is generally cooked the day before. A small family can easily have a dish for dinner and one for breakfast out of a calf's head, besides the brain and tongue.

For Dinner.—When cooked as above, put the head in cold water to cool, and while cooling cook a table-spoonful of flour with about the same of butter, then add water or broth, give one boil, add also chopped pickled cucumbers, salt, and pepper, and simmer the whole about ten minutes. Put in the mixture two or three yolks of hard-boiled eggs whole, also the whites, and give one boil. Cut the head in pieces, put them in the mixture, keep about ten minutes on the corner of the range, and it is ready. It must not be allowed to boil when the head is in. The tongue may be put with the head.

Hosted by Google

It is also broiled, fried, and prepared in several other ways, but for the present we shall confine ourselves to the most useful and practical directions. Hundreds of different dishes are made with veal, and there are between fifteen and eighteen hundred ways of serving eggs; but as the majority of people could not or would not live on bobolinks' eggs, thrushes' brains, and nightingales' tongues, we propose to give to our readers more practical and common-sense directions.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SUMMER BONNETS.

FASHIONABLE milliners have opened their last importations for the season. The choice in bonnets remains between chip and black net. Écru chip is an undressed sewed braid, very soft and light, and altogether different from the chalk-white stiff chip formerly worn; besides, its whiteness is so nearly concealed by trimming that all objections to it are removed, and it is considered a most dressy summer hat. The trimming is always bias repped silk, and the color is chosen with reference to the principal costume on the wearer; but so much black lace and such varied flowers are used on the bonnet that it becomes generalized enough to suit various dresses. Black chip is also much worn, and is almost as light as a lace bonnet.

The latest caprice on elegant French hats is to put a great deal of trimming all around underneath the brim, to lie on the braids of hair that are now worn high around the head. This trimming consists of a flat band of folded ribbon, on which is laid part of a wreath of leaves or roses on the left side, with a coquettish bow on the right. The band lies close to the head around the crown braid; and the hat brim above it is lined with silk, and turned upward, or else outward, in most capricious fashion. Another stylish fancy is to have the upturned brim of white chip hats thickly studded with finest jet; below this is then placed a coil or band of ribbon of becoming color. The most simply trimmed bonnets have a flower cluster just in front of the brim, or one side, or else a bow with turned-up ends is perched coquettisly on the plain smooth facing. Pink or blue ribbon rolls and puffs under the brim are veiled with black lace, on which is placed a fine jet ornament. For half wreaths under brims, pale pink sweet-brier, with its thorny stem and glossy leaves, a row of dwarfed roses, and the bright blue garden pinks, seem to be the favorite flowers. Clustering white elder flowers, tea-roses, and vines of ivy leaves, grape leaves, and the colored nasturtium, are on stately bonnets for elderly ladies; blue forget-me-nots mixed with pink wild roses are for fresh, youthful faces.

The back of the crown is also another objective point for trimming, especially for bunches of long-stemmed rose-buds tied together carelessly, showing the cut, pointed ends of their flexible stems, and the string with which they are held. These rose-bud clusters are sometimes all pink, but are oftener pink, red, and yellow together. They droop over the edge of the crown in Spanish fashion, and are prettier and wear better than the long trailing vines that are soon tangled and broken. Two nodding ostrich plumes at the back of Rabagas bonnets add much to their style. Black chip Rabagas with black plumes are especially admired with stylish black costumes.

The small space still undescribed between the brim and the rose cluster on the crown usually shows the clear outline of the soft chip, simply banded with lapping folds of bias silk, with a knot or loops on the left side. It is a matter of fancy about ribbon or lace drapery behind. The prettiest lace drapery is a three-cornered piece of dotted net edged with lace, and folded back and forth like the spirals of a jabot, or else a square in a great double box-pleat like a Watteau fold. Two hanging ends of lace behind are not now worn, but long ribbon ends are much used. It is not, however, a matter of taste about strings, as they are now added to every thing, round hats and bonnets alike; and the principal difference between hats and bonnets lies in the way the strings are tied, viz., under the chin for bonnets, and under the coiffure for hats. Two-and-a-half-inch ribbon strings are most used, but these are soon soiled by perspiration; the first warm days will see revived the cool and pretty fashion of black lace strings loosely held under the chin by a rose-bud and leaves.

One of the prettiest Rabagas bonnets is a soft white rice chip with sky blue repped band under the brim, on which is laid a vine of green rose leaves with a pink bud cluster on the right. Blue bands and an aigrette trim the outside. Another Rabagas, made for the President's fair-haired daughter Nellie, is of black dotted net with pale pink faille on the brim, and a black lace ruche with coquettish pink bow for face trimming. A wreath of blue forget-me-nots fills the space back of the brim, and long-stemmed pink rose-buds droop from the crown. Black and pink ribbon pendants, and black ribbon strings. A chip Hortense bonnet, with ample crown and coronet brim, receding on the sides and turned down behind, was chosen by a tall, stately blonde. The brim was faced with black velvet, and had a turquoise blue roll beneath. Turquoise folds, a blue pompon, glossy green leaves, and brown berries, with black lace strings, completed the trimming. Price $42. A white chip from Paris is to be worn with an olive costume. The brim is faced with pale blue, and a blue band lying on the high braid of hair supports a wreath of ivy leaves, tiny stems of cedar, some pink rose-buds, a yellow rose, and a pale blue garden pink. Olive brown silk of two shades is folded around the crown, and two ostrich plumes nodding on the crown are shaded from dark to light olive. A fine black chip has the turned-up brim thickly incrusted with jet, and a pink roll underneath. Soft tulle is puffed over the crown, and two ostrich tips droop backward over a cluster of pink hedge roses. A square of lace falls like a jabot behind. A white chip from Virot's has pale creamy brown repped silk facing the brim, and a darker olive roll beneath, with pink rose-buds just in front. Loops of cream-color trim the crown, and two shaded brown plumes surmount it. Long olive ribbon streamers behind.

RIDING-HABITS.

Among imported riding-habits those made in London are preferred by equestriennes. These English habits are exceedingly plain this season, and black habits are more decidedly favored than ever. The basque is a short jockey with postillion pleats behind, pressed flatly, and held in place by a lengthwise row of small buttons. The front of the basque is short, and is often merely two soft points. The edge of the basque is simply bound with twilled silk braid; there are nine flat buttons up the front, and the high neck has a round turned-over collar of velvet. The coat sleeves are very tight, and have a button and button-hole at the wrist to widen them for the hand to pass through. Cuffs and all fancy braiding are banished from the most expensive London-made habits. The skirt is not regularly gored, but is shaped out from the wide cloth so that it has but one or two seams. It is cut to bulge out on the right side to make it fit smoothly over the knee that is thrown over the pommel, and this makes the right side ten inches longer than the left. It is not so scant as has been the fashion lately, nor so wide and long as formerly, but is a medium between these, measuring four yards at its greatest width, while the length is fifty-two inches in front and sixty-two behind. The front is sewed to the belt without gathers, but there are six pleats behind; the placket is on the left side, and very deeply lapped, with a pocket underneath. Seven yards of cloth at $6 a yard are used for such habits. They cost when completed $78. Lighter cloth at $3 a yard is preferred by some ladies for summer wear. Glossy broadcloth and tricot wear better than ladies' cloth, which roughens by usage, and gets a furred, nappy surface. Furnishing houses ask from $50 to $100 for stylish habits. Tailors trim them with fine camel's-hair braid, put on à la militaire, in tiny waves and curls beside a band of wider Hercules braid.

NEWLY DRAPED LACE POINTS.

Modistes are draping lace points to form stylish round mantles of pretty talma shape, with armholes and a slender pointed hood. This is done without cutting or stretching the lace, and utilizes the points, which, notwithstanding their fineness and value, have an old-womanish look, and are very difficult to wear gracefully. The lace point is turned upside down, so that the straight top forms the bottom of the talma; the point below is then at the top, and is turned over from the neck and folded into the perfect shape of a hood, which is held in place by watered ribbon bows down the middle. The long ends at the sides are then each caught up high on the breast under a ribbon bow, and this leaves an open slit for each arm to pass through. To drape a mantle in this suitable way requires very little ingenuity after once being told, and the stylish effect is excellent.

THE NEW KILT PLEATING.

A pretty change is given to the long worn and still fashionable kilt pleating by arranging the pleats in groups. For instance, on a flat flounce five-eighths of a yard deep put a cluster of four kilt pleats, each an inch and a half wide, and all well lapped; then let a plain space of two inches intervene between this cluster and the next. This is a very pretty trimming for alpacas, or for the black taffeta silk skirts that ladies are ordering to wear under polonaises of cashmere and of batiste. The flounce is straight, has a half-inch hem on the lower edge, is stitched on an inch below the top, leaving a standing frill for heading, and is tacked to tapes underneath, about an eighth above the lower edge of the flounce; this lower edge then hangs loose from the skirt like a ruffle.

A row of buttons down the front of the dress from neck to toe is part of the fancy for trimming in wrapper style. Plain kilt pleating around skirts is turned on the front breadth to form a box-pleat, and bows of ribbon are set down the middle of the box-pleat.

For information received thanks are due Misses PAGE; SWITZER; and GEDNEY; and Madame FERRERO.

PERSONAL.

GENERAL GRANT is one of three Presidents who have passed their fiftieth birthday in office, the other two being Mr. POLK, who entered office about seven months before he was fifty years old, and General PIERCE, who became President in his forty-ninth year. General WASHINGTON was in his fifty-eighth year when he became President, JOHN ADAMS was in his sixty-second, JEFFERSON in his fifty-eighth, MADISON in his fifty-eighth, MONROE in his fifty-ninth, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS in his fifty-eighth, General JACKSON in his sixty-second, VAN BUREN in his fifty-fifth, General HARRISON in his sixty-ninth, TYLER in his fifty-second, General TAYLOR in his sixty-fifth, FILLMORE in his fiftieth, BUCHANAN in his sixty-fifth, LINCOLN in his fifty-third, and JOHNSON in his fifty-seventh year. General HARRISON was the oldest man ever elected to the Presidency, and General GRANT is the youngest. WASHINGTON, JEFFERSON, MADISON, and JOHN QUINCY ADAMS were in their fifty-eighth years when they entered the Presidency, and Mr. MONROE completed his fifty-ninth year only fifty-five days after he became President, and JOHNSON was in his fifty-sixth year when he succeeded President LINCOLN. The President who lived longest was JOHN ADAMS, who died in his ninety-first year. The next oldest was MADISON, who died in his eighty-sixth year. JEFFERSON died in his eighty-fourth year, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS in his eighty-first year, VAN BUREN in his eightieth year, General JACKSON in his seventy-ninth year. The youngest retiring President was General PIERCE, who went out of office not quite four months after he had completed his fifty-second year. Mr. POLK retired in his fifty-fourth year, and died in a little more than three months later, at the age of fifty-three years seven months and thirteen days—the youngest of all our Presidents in death.

—The Rev. Mr. HEPWORTH'S new church organization starts off under the brightest possible prospects. The first choice of pews was bought by Mr. ANTHONY at a premium of $1000.

—The magnificent jewels belonging to the wife of Mr. LIZARDI, who absconded a defaulter for nearly a million of dollars, were recently sold in London. The largest prices fetched were $6000 for a necklace, $6400 for a brilliant brooch, $10,000 for a brilliant tiara, and $13,500 for a pearl necklace studded with brilliants. The total receipts of the sale were about $55,000.

—The valuable library of Dr. S. AUSTIN ALLIBONE, having done its work in furnishing material for his Dictionary of Authors, is to be sold at auction in this city.

—At a recent fair held in Boston a few choice autographs were sold—among them the following interesting note from the Duchess of Sutherland to FANNY KEMBLE:

"DEAR MRS. KEMBLE,—I had to look at your signature more than once before I persuaded myself that you wrote to me so formally, and if this has a little of the tone of remonstrance, pray so take it. I think I admire you too much, and that we have too much sympathy, to be the least on a stranger-like footing. I know you will be sorry to hear that I have been an invalid and a sufferer since July last, and that I am not recovered, though my sufferings have diminished. I inclose my signatures, and will send some from the ARGYLES, if you desire them. Believe me, dear Mrs. KEMBLE, Yours very truly,

"HARRIET SUTHERLAND."

—The widow of Hon. ICHABOD WASHBURN, of Worcester, Massachusetts, has recently given to Washburn College, at Topeka, Kansas, $2000, in addition to the previous large benefaction of her late husband.

—Señor CASTELAR'S work on Rome is being translated into English by Mrs. ARTHUR ARNOLD, a highly cultivated lady, wife of the editor of the London Echo.

—It having been stated that the Mrs. DAVIDSON whose name is mentioned as having been lost in the Atlantic was "Miss ARABELLA GODDARD," who was at GILMORE'S Jubilee, it is proper to state that it can not be true. Madame GODDARD married Mr. DAVIDSON, the musical critic of the London Times, since her return to England, and has but one child, and that a son by her former husband. She was reported to have sailed for Australia on a professional tour some time ago. The Mrs. DAVIDSON who was drowned was probably the wife of the late Professor DAVIDSON, of the University of California. She was accompanied by a grown-up daughter, who also was lost.

—The London Globe, criticising CHARLES READE'S description of the Oxford and Cambridge boat-race, published in the London Observer, says, "The subtle flattery of trying his hand at a newspaper article, and not disconcerting the average manufacturer of a topical paper by any brilliant tokens of the great powers he possesses, should be appreciated by us all."

—EMILY FAITHFULL, writing of ANNA DICKINSON, remarks that "she was wayward and willful in the nursery, and gave more trouble than all the other children put together," but adds, "for the encouragement of parents afflicted with 'incorrigible' children, that long before she reached the age of thirty (born October 28, 1842) she was not only her mother's pride, but had achieved an independence which enabled her to surround her family with every comfort."

—A son of G. P. R. JAMES, the English novelist, is local editor of the Eau Claire Free Press. In his items he seldom mentions the legendary and lonesome steed so much affected by his parent.

—They get to be very old in New England. There is PETER GAY, of Augusta, Maine, who is ninety-seven; born in 1776; came in with the republic. He has a little son, ELIJAH, who is seventy-one, with fair prospect of attaining to a good old age. In Molunkus, same State, dwells good Mrs. RELIEF HAYDEN, who is eighty-five; has eleven children, all living, ranging from thirty-eight to sixty-four. From June 20 to December 31, 1872, she spun 160 skeins of yarn, knit 39 pairs of stockings, 20 pairs of mittens, and did quilting enough to make a Fifth Avenue miss go raving mad.

—Here is something for that bright young scientist, AUSTIN FLINT, Jun. Mr. BRUTCHER, of Evansville, Indiana, has a boy five years old who has slept constantly for three months. A violent shaking rouses him enough to take nourishment, and he has not fallen away during the nap, but he has lost the power of speech, and never moves unless shaken up.

—If Mr. WATTS, of Sheffield, can make practicable for general use his new invention for light and heat, he will be one of the world's great benefactors. He has invented a machine by which atmospheric air in passing through a charged battery is carbonized, and thus combustible gas is produced which burns brighter than coal gas, and, when mixed with air, has a heating power which can melt copper wire.

—Dr. A. H. VINTON, formerly rector of St. Mark's Church, but now of Boston, and a decided Low-Churchman, has, oddly enough, undertaken to establish in his parish a sisterhood, similar to those connected with the Episcopal churches of this city. Mr. SIDNEY EVERETT, eldest son of EDWARD EVERETT, came from his estate at Newport, and read before the Episcopal Church Association a very learned and interesting essay on the sisterhood topic. The congregation do not see it entirely by the lights of Dr. VINTON—objecting in a mild way to the "Sisterhood" title: so they have compromised on "Training School for Nurses." It doesn't sound so pretty as the other, but it means about the same style of thing.

—Mr. GREELEY'S life-insurance—$100,000—has been paid. The policies were issued three years ago to the Tribune Association for its own benefit. $20,000 was paid by the North American, $20,000 by the Mutual, $10,000 by the Globe, and the rest by out-of-town companies.

—Mr. ODGER, the representative man of the British laborer of to day, and the advocate of republican institution for England, is described as a short, stiff, clean shaved man, with a head and countenance that suggest the hardest type of John Bull, with dog attached. But he is popular with the toilers.

—Speaking of the reception address of the Duc d'Aumale, on the character of MONTALEMBERT, at the French Academy, the London Spectator says it was evidently a distinguished literary, perhaps a political, success. The Assembly adjourned for the day. All the talent of France filled the historic hall of the Forty Immortals. It is noted that M. THIERS yawned and nodded—M. GUIZOT, on the contrary, was wide awake, applauded, and no doubt reflected. The duke did well in striking as the key-note of MONTALEMBERT'S character its dauntless courage, the heritage of a race of soldiers, for, as MONTALEMBERT said of himself, he was the first of his house who had fought with the pen, and not the sword; and the duke was also happy in tracing the extent to which MONTALEMBERT'S English birth and education, and his youthful worship of O'CONNELL, influenced his mind.

—M. THIERS, who, as chief executive of France, has experienced the financial difficulties that confront a nation just emerged from war, spent ten days in England in 1833, and pledged himself to LOUIS PHILIPPE to learn in that time all that was worth knowing of the politics, commerce, revenues, religion, arts, sciences, and social economy of that country. While in London he wrote to a gentleman connected with the Treasury the following note:

"MY DEAR SIR,—Would you give me a short quarter of an hour to explain to me the financial system of your country? Always yours, T."

—Kaiser WILLIAM'S subjects, according to the census last taken, amount to 41,058,000, including Alsace and Lorraine. The females are in excess of the males 768,000.

—Mr. E. M. THOMPSON, of the British Museum, is editing for the Camden Society a series of letters written by Dr. PRIDEAUX, dean of Norwich, the author of the Connection of the Old and New Testament. The letters run from 1674 to 1722. Up to 1681 they are written from Oxford, and present an amusing picture of Oxford life two hundred years ago. They touch upon a variety of interesting social and political topics.

—Chief Justice ISAAC A. VERPLANCK, of the Superior Court of Buffalo, who died suddenly on the 16th ult., had been on the bench from the organization of the court, some twenty years ago. He was a man of marked ability, of high personal character, and was identified with all the principal public and benevolent institutions of the city.

—Mr. PEABODY, who left some few millions of dollars to the poor of London, left also a plot of ground of about five acres at Brixton, an agreeable southern suburb. His idea was that on this ground should be erected dwellings for the poorer classes, but it has been doubted whether the idea would be carried out. There is doubt no longer. The erection of baths and wash-houses has been commenced, with a restaurant, billiard-rooms, etc. Surely the poor of London are looking up and becoming luxurious when they can have a warm bath, retire to the restaurant, and wind up with a game at billiards.

—Mr. GILBERT A. PIERCE, in his Dickens Dictionary, gives the following summary of the characters portrayed by DICKENS in his novels: Actors, 17; actresses, 10; actuary, 1; adventurers, 2; aeronauts, 2; alderman, 1; amanuensis, 1; Americans, 25; apprentices, 6; architects, 4; authors, 8; babies, 3; bachelors, 10; barbers, 4; bar-maids, 2; beadles, 6; blind persons, 3; boarding-house keepers, 3; boobies, 2; boots, 4; brokers, 9; circus performers, 7; church, 1 (Little Bethel); clergymen, 13; clerks, etc., 47; corporations, etc., 8; cricketers, 6; cripples, 6; dancing-masters, 3; detectives, 12; editors, 4; emigrants, 7; fairies, 2; farmers, 4; footmen, 6; fops, 3; Frenchmen, 23; Germans, 5; governesses, 3; grocers, 3; invalids, 7; Jews, 3; lawyers, 35; M.P.'s, 7; misers, 9; murderers, 10; nurses, 13; old maids, 16; pawnbrokers, 3; physicians, 15; plasterer, 1; pony, 1; policemen, 12; pugilist, 1; reporter, 1; raven, 1; resurrectionist, 1; sextons, 3; showmen, 7; shrews, 12; surgeons, 7; spies, 2; swindlers, 14; thieves, 12; toadies, 10; tobacconist, 1; tramps, 2; turnkeys, 6; undertakers, 6; vagabonds, 8; vessels, 7; vestrymen, 6; waiters, 13; widowers, 3; and widows, 39.

—College "personal." On the 1st of April, when Professor GREGORY, of Genesee (New York) Academy, rose to read the Bible at morning prayers, he found that a dictionary of similar appearance had been substituted for the sacred volume. Not at all disconcerted he took from his pocket a Greek Testament and read the original text, expounding each verse in Latin, for colloquial readiness in which language he is somewhat distinguished. The students listened attentively, but to what extent they were edified has not transpired.

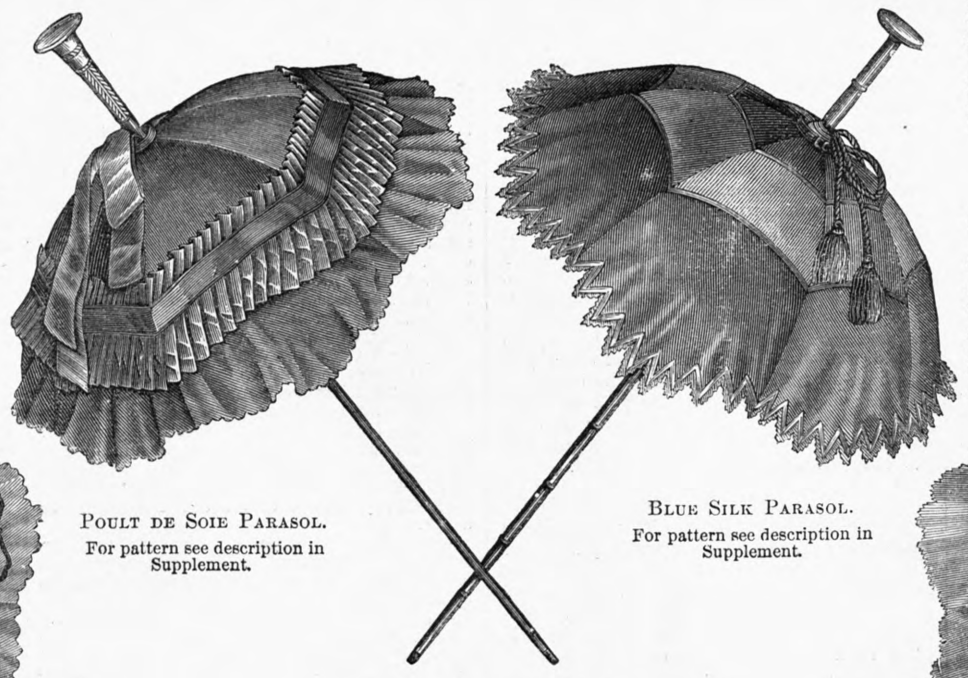
—Lord LYTTON'S chapter in Kenelm Chillingly on the responsibilities of parents in naming their children, suggests the reproduction of the remark of a lecturer who was talking of affectations, and particularly the one which induces people to sign the initial of the first with the whole of their middle name. He convulsed his audience with an incongruity of which at the moment he seemed almost unconscious, saying: "Sometimes this sounds well enough, but these cases are exceptional. We all like E Pluribus Unum, but who could stand P. Jonathan Pillsbury?"

—The endurance of woman is illustrated in the fact that of the first company of missionaries who went to the Sandwich Islands in 1819, the three that survived latest were the widows of THURSTON, WHITNEY, and RUGGLES. Two of these have recently died, leaving only Mrs. THURSTON to tell the story of that wonderful year.

Hosted by Google

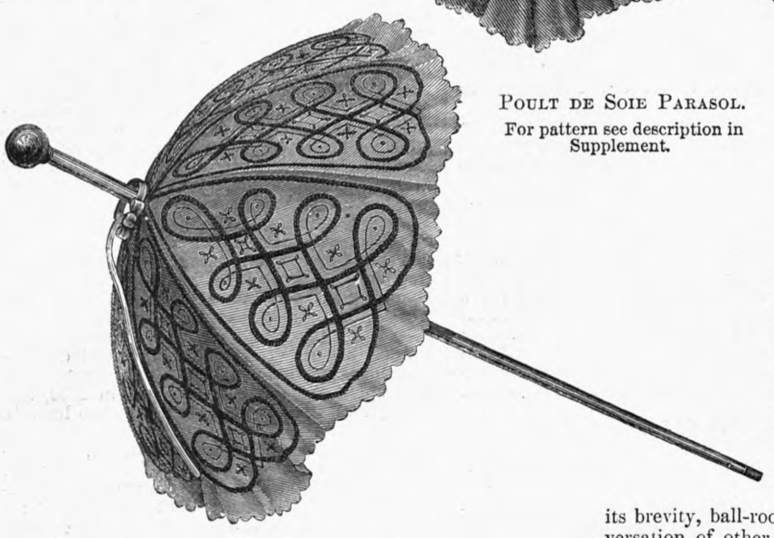
Embroidered Crêpe de Chine and Lace Cravat.

THIS cravat is made of a bias piece of blue crêpe de Chine forty inches long and five inches and three-quarters wide, which is embroidered on the ends in satin stitch with white silk, and trimmed with a gathered ruffle of the material, white lace insertion seven-eighths of an inch wide, and gathered lace edging an inch and three-quarters wide. Cut away the material underneath the insertion. Of course both the material and the trimming may be varied to suit the individual taste. Fig. 18, Supplement, gives the design for the embroidery in full size, which can readily be executed with the help of the illustration. The same design may also be worked in colors, and used for ornamenting various fancy articles, such as card-racks, mats, work-baskets, etc.



POULT DE SOIE PARASOL.
For pattern see description in Supplement.

BLUE SILK PARASOL.
For pattern see description in Supplement.



GRANITE GROS GRAIN PARASOL.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Fig. 17.

GRAY CRÊPE DE CHINE PARASOL.
For pattern see description in Supplement.

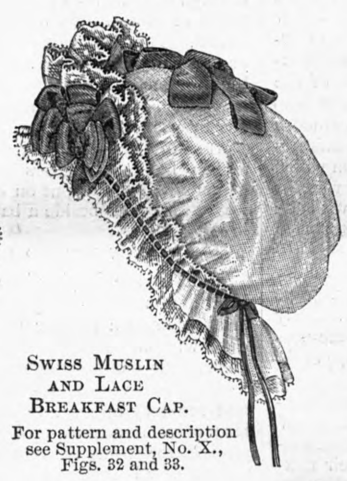
BALL-ROOM CONVERSATION.

THE conversation of a ball-room has perhaps met with more severe criticism than any means of interchanging ideas. If it is remembered that every ball-room conversation is limited, first, by the necessity for dancing, and secondly, by the necessity of "not staying too long away from mamma," it does not seem as if much ought to be expected. There is no time for depth of discussion during a "square" or between the intervals of a "round." "Sitting out," indeed, generally conduces to conversation, which sometimes is of an exceedingly interesting nature; but sitting out is generally the privilege of old friends, who need no stimulus to a quiet and agreeable talk. It must be, in the nature of things, extremely difficult to begin, carry on, and finish a conversation worth any thing with about twelve different people in one night. As soon as you have got beyond the opening sentences it is time to leave off. The first orthodox questions, as to the opera, the weather, the Park, the last "new thing," are like a prelude to a piece of music, or the first few moves in a game of chess. They are unavoidable, but useless. No one can plunge into a conversation with a stranger, or the acquaintance of a week, at once. Just as good swordsmen spend some time in feeling their adversaries' strength, so even a good talker will find it necessary to test the powers of his companion. Were it not so, the most absurd results would take place, and you might find yourself plunging into a gossiping conversation with a blue-stocking, or discussing Mill with her whose soul is in the valse. On the whole, it seems doubtful whether, except from its brevity, ball-room conversation is much worse than the conversation of other times. It lacks, indeed, time enough to become developed, and it is always being commenced de novo; but many clever things are said in a ball-room, and the foundation of many an important idea or phase of mind is laid during the music of a dance.

Flirting means so many different things to different people that it would be difficult to obtain any general assent as to the light in which it ought to be held. If by flirting is meant—in the ball-room sense—making deliberate love where nothing more than passing amusement is intended, then most people would agree that flirting is most pernicious. The girl whose sole object is to get proposals which she rejects with scornful merriment and "tip-tilted nose" has much to answer for. The man whose eyes are continually saying that which he never brings his lips to say has more. Both do harm which they can not repair. Both inflict wounds which they can not heal, but which are none the less deep because they do not bleed. Society is not so hollow that all in it is to be looked upon as false. Otherwise the honest man or woman would have no place there; and Heaven forbid that this should be the case. Deliberate falsehood, therefore—and such flirting is nothing else—is powerful for ill. Far be the day when every girl has to look upon what is said to her at a ball-room as entirely fictitious and untrustworthy, or when a man may look and say things by which next morning he may utterly refuse to abide. If flirting, however, merely means chaff, good-humor, fun, and wit—the pleasure which two people who like one another's society take in being together—a chat over a past pleasant party, a scheme for a future one—then none may wage successful war against it. Stupid among the stupids is the girl who never gets beyond cold commonplaces because she is afraid of having love made to her, and wearisome is he whose actions and words are regulated solely by the fear of being asked his intentions.

TULLE AND LACE CAP.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 34 and 35.

EMBROIDERED CRÊPE DE CHINE AND LACE CRAVAT.
For design see Supplement, No. VI., Fig. 18.



SWISS MUSLIN AND LACE BREAKFAST CAP.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 32 and 33.

MOHAMMEDANISM.

THE essential doctrine of Mohammedanism is the absolute unity and supremacy of God, as opposed to the old Arab Polytheism on the one hand, and the Christian Trinity on the other. It, however, admits of angels and genii. Gabriel and Michael are the angels of power; Azriel, angel of death; Israfeel, angel of the resurrection. Eblis, or Satan, also plays an important part in this mythology. The Koran also teaches the doctrine of Eternal Decrees, or absolute Predestination; of prophets before Mohammed, of whom he is the successor—as Adam, Noah, Moses, and Jesus; of sacred books, of which all that remain are the Pentateuch, Psalms, Gospels, and Koran; of an intermediate state after death; of the resurrection and judgment. All non-believers in Islam go into eternal fire. There are separate hells for Christians, Jews, Sabians, Magians, idolaters, and the hypocrites of all religions. The Moslem is judged by his actions. A balance is held by Gabriel, one scale hanging over heaven and another over hell, and his good deeds are placed in one and his bad ones in the other. According as his scale inclines, he goes to heaven or hell. If he goes to heaven, he finds there seventy-two houris, more beautiful than angels, awaiting him, with gardens, groves, marble palaces, and music. If women are true believers, and righteous, they will also go to heaven, but nothing is said about husbands being provided for them. Stress is laid on prayer, ablution, fasting, alms-giving, and the pilgrimage to Mecca. Wine and gambling are forbidden. There is no recognition in the Koran of human brotherhood. It is a prime duty to hate infidels and make war on them. Mohammed made it a duty for Moslems to betray and kill their own brothers when they were infidels, and he was obeyed in more cases than one. The Moslem sects are as numerous as those of Christians. The Dabistan mentions seventy-three. The two main divisions are into Sunnites and Shyites. The Turks

Fig. 1.—FIGARO FICHU.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 15 and 16.

Fig. 2.—FIGARO FICHU.—BACK.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 15 and 16.

Hosted by Google

are the most zealous of the Moslems. On Friday, which is the Sabbath of Islam, all business is suspended. Prayers are read and sermons preached in the mosques. No one is allowed to be absent. The Ramadan Fast is universally kept. Any one who breaks it twice is considered worthy of death. The fast lasts from sunrise to sunset. But the rich feast in the night, and sleep during the day. The Turks have no desire to make proselytes, but have an intolerant hatred for all outside of Islam. The kalif is the chief pontiff. The Oulema, or parliament, is composed of the imans, or religious teachers, the muftis, or doctors of law, and kadis, or ministers of justice. The priests in Turkey are subordinate to the civil magistrate, who is their diocesan, and can remove them at pleasure. The priests in daily life are like the laity, engage in the same business, and are no more austere than they.

Five times a day the muezzin proclaims the hour of prayer from the minaret in these words: "There is no god but God. Mohammed is His prophet. Come to prayer." In the morning call he adds, "Prayer is better than sleep." Immediately every Mussulman leaves his occupation, and prostrates himself on the floor or ground, wherever he may be. It is very disreputable to omit this.

Tulle, Lace, and Gros Grain Ribbon Cravat Bow.

THIS cravat bow is made of figured white tulle, and is trimmed with lace two inches and a half wide and loops and ends of pink gros grain ribbon. The ends of the cravat consist each of a straight piece four inches long and eight inches wide, which is sloped off on one side to a width of an inch and three-quarters. Edge each piece with lace all around, excepting the sloped edge, then pleat the sloped edge and sew it on a stiff lace foundation. The seam made by doing this is covered by a lace rosette and loops and ends of pink gros grain ribbon.

Fig. 8.—FRAME OF GRAY CRAPE HAT, FIG. 3, PAGE 312.

Fig. 9.—FRAME OF BLACK LACE HAT, FIG. 5, PAGE 313.

Fig. 7.—BLACK LACE BONNET.—[See Fig. 12.]

Spring Hats and Bonnets, with Frames, Figs. 1-12.

See illustrations on pages 312 and 313.

Fig. 1.—BLACK LACE BONNET. This bonnet has a soft crown lined with silk. The front diadem-shaped rim is trimmed with two pink gros grain folds and with pink crape ruffles as shown by the illustration. Peacock green feathers, a cluster of roses, and pink gros grain bows form the trimming. Strings of pink gros grain.

Fig. 2.—BLACK CRAPE HAT. The broad rolled rim is bound with réséda watered ribbon. A puffed ribbon of the same color is set underneath the rim, and on the right side is an agrafe of bronzed leaves. The remainder of the trimming consists of réséda ribbon bows and feathers of the same color. The frame of this hat is shown by Fig. 11, on this page.

Fig. 3.—GRAY CRAPE HAT. Light blue faille ribbon is wound around the crown of this hat. Bows of similar ribbon, a spray of roses, and light blue feathers trim the hat as shown by the illustration. For the frame see Fig. 8, on this page.

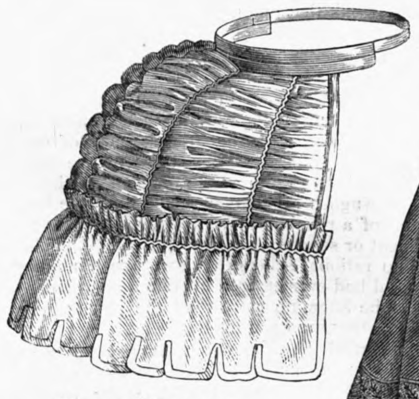
Fig. 4.—BLACK LACE BONNET. The diadem front is trimmed through the middle with a fold of sea green silk, which is edged with black velvet on both sides. On the inside of the diadem is a ruffle of sea green silk. The remainder of the trimming consists of a tulle scarf, black lace, bunches of grass, and grayish-brown foliage. Fig. 10, on this page, shows the frame.

Fig. 5.—BLACK LACE HAT. For the frame of this hat see Fig. 9, on this page. The rim is trimmed in front with rolls of pale pink faille. The remainder of the trimming consists of bows and strings of similar ribbon, black lace, and pink and black feathers.

Fig. 6.—SALMON CRAPE BONNET. This bonnet is trimmed with wide ruffles of the material and with a puff and bows of brown and

Fig. 11.—FRAME OF BLACK CRAPE HAT, FIG. 2, PAGE 312.

Fig. 12.—FRAME OF BLACK LACE BONNET, FIG. 7.



DIMITY TOURNURE.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 36 and 37.

DIAGONAL CLOTH PETTICOAT.

For pattern see description in Supplement.

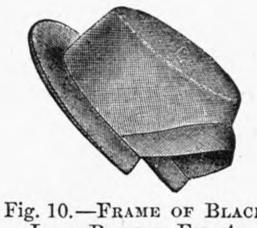


Fig. 10.—FRAME OF BLACK LACE BONNET, FIG. 4, PAGE 313.

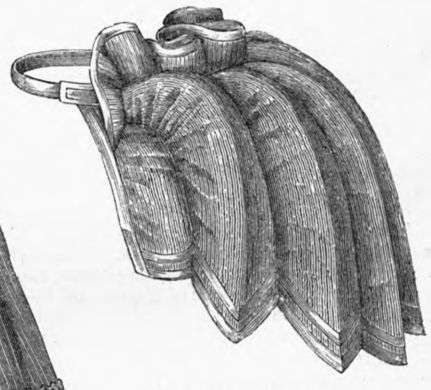
TULLE, LACE, AND GROS GRAIN RIBBON CRAVAT BOW.

SERGE PETTICOAT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 29-31.



CRINOLINE TOURNURE.

Crinoline Tournure.

THIS tournure is made of white crinoline, and is furnished with steel springs. It consists of five straight pieces, each four inches and seven-eighths wide and fifteen inches and a quarter long, which are pointed on the under end as shown by the illustration, and are furnished on the wrong side through the middle with a narrow steel spring. These pieces are joined on the sides. The two outer pieces are joined each with a piece of the requisite length and two inches and a half wide. Gather the tournure five inches and three-quarters from the bottom on the joining seams of the separate parts and on the side edges. Bind the under and side edges narrow, and join the upper edge with a box-pleated crinoline ruffle three inches and a quarter wide and a roll of wadding. The latter is furnished with strings at the ends. On the wrong side of the tournure, about four inches and six inches from the bottom, set horizontal steel springs.

Fig. 1.—BLACK SILK SUIT.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]

For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—BLACK SILK SUIT.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]

For description see Supplement.

Digitized by Google

salmon-colored faille ribbon. Strings of brown faille ribbon. Blue watered ribbon may be substituted for brown.

Fig. 7.—BLACK LACE BONNET. This bonnet is trimmed in front with wide standing ruffles of light blue gros grain. A scarf of black silk tulle, black lace, a spray of tea-roses, a vine of black beads, and black and blue feathers form the trimming. Fig. 12, page 309, shows the frame of the bonnet.

SHE AND I.

LOVE me, love, with a love like mine,
Strong as the sun at noon;
Love me, love, with a love like thine,
Pure as the midnight moon.

Talk to me, love, with words like mine,
Bold as the rushing gale;
Talk to me, love, with words like thine,
Soft as the breeze in a vale.

Look on me, love, with a look like mine,
Free as the sun's bright beam;
Look on me, love, with a look like thine,
Sweet as a smile in a dream.

Kiss me, love, with a kiss like mine,
Brave as the north wind's power;
Kiss me, love, with a kiss like thine,
Light as the dew on a flower.

Love me, love, with a love like mine,
Lasting as wind-driven wave;
Love me, love, with a love like thine,
Stronger than death and the grave.

LADY ANNA.

BY ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER III.

LADY ANNA.

THE idea of this further compromise, of this something more than compromise, of this half acknowledgment of their own weakness, came from Mr. Flick, of the firm of Norton and Flick, the solicitors who were employed in substantiating the Earl's position. When Mr. Flick mentioned it to Sir William Patterson, the great barrister, who was at that time Solicitor-General, and leading counsel on behalf of Lord Lovel, Sir William Patterson stood aghast and was dismayed. Sir William intended to make mincemeat of the Countess. It was said of him that he intended to cross-examine the Countess off her legs, right out of her claim, and almost into her grave. He certainly did believe her to be an impostor, who had not thought herself to be entitled to her name when she first assumed it.

"I should be sorry, Mr. Flick, to be driven to think that any thing of that kind could be expedient."

"It would make sure of the fortune to the family," said Mr. Flick.

"And what about our friend, the Countess?"

"Let her call herself Countess Lovel, Sir William. That will break no bones. As to the formality of her own marriage, there can be no doubt about that."

"We can prove by Grogram that she was told that another wife was living," said Sir William. Grogram was an old butler who had been in the old Earl's service for thirty years.

"I believe we can, Sir William, but— It is quite clear that we shall never get the other wife to come over and face an English jury. It is of no use blinking it. The gentleman whom we have sent over doubts her altogether. That there was a marriage is certain, but he fears that this woman is not the old Countess. There were two sisters, and it may be that this was the other sister."

Sir William was a good deal dismayed, but he recovered himself. The stakes were so high that it was quite possible that the gentleman in question might have been induced to open his eyes to the possibility of such personation by overtures from the other side. Sir William was of opinion that Mr. Flick himself should go to Sicily. He was not sure that he, Sir William, her Majesty's Solicitor-General, would not make the journey in person. He was by no means disposed to give way. "They tell me that the girl is no better than she should be," he said to Mr. Flick.

"I don't think so bad as that of her," said Mr. Flick.

"Is she a lady—or any thing like a lady?"

"I am told she is very beautiful."

"I dare say—and so was her mother before her. I never saw a handsomer woman of her age than our friend the Countess. But I could not recommend the young lord to marry an underbred, bad girl, and a bastard who claims to be his cousin, and support my proposition merely on the ground of her looks."

"Thirty-five thousand a year, Sir William!" pleaded the attorney.

"I hope we can get the thirty-five thousand a year for our client without paying so dear for them."

It had been presumed that the real Countess, the original Countess, the Italian lady whom the Earl had married in early life, would be brought over, with properly attested documentary evidence in her pocket, to prove that she was the existing Countess, and that any other Countess must be either an impostor or a deluded dupe. No doubt the old Earl had declared, when first informing Josephine Murray that she was not his wife, that his real wife had died during the few months which had intervened since his mock marriage; but it was acknowledged on all sides that the old Earl had been a villain and a liar. It was no part of the duty of the young Earl, or of those who acted for him, to defend the character of the old Earl. To wash that blackamoor white, or even to make him whity-brown, was not necessary to any body. No one was now concerned to account for his crooked courses. But if it could be shown that he had married the lady in Italy—as to which there was no doubt—and that the lady was still alive, or that she had been alive when the second marriage took place, then the Lady Anna could not inherit the property which had been freed from the grasp of the Italian mistress. But it seemed that the lady, if she lived, could not be made to come. Mr. Flick did go to Sicily, and came back renewing his advice to Sir William that Lord Lovel should be advised to marry the Lady Anna.

At this time the Countess, with her daughter, had moved their residence from Keswick up to London, and were living in very humble lodgings in a small street turning out of the New Road, near the Yorkshire Stingo. Old Thomas Thwaite had accompanied them from Cumberland, but the rooms had been taken for them by his son, Daniel Thwaite, who was at this time foreman to a somewhat celebrated tailor who carried on his business in Wigmore Street; and he, Daniel Thwaite, had a bedroom in the house in which the Countess lodged. The arrangement was not a wise one, as reports had already been spread abroad as to the partiality of the Lady Anna for the young tailor. But how should she not have been partial both to the father and to the son, feeling as she did that they were the only two men who befriended her cause and her mother's? As to the Countess herself, she, perhaps, alone of all those who interested themselves in her daughter's cause, had heard no word of these insinuations against her child. To her both Thomas and Daniel Thwaite were dear friends, to repay whom for their exertions with lavish generosity—should the means to do so ever come within her reach—was one of the dreams of her existence. But she was an ambitious woman, thinking much of her rank, thinking much even of the blood of her own ancestors, constantly urgent with her daughter in teaching her the duties and privileges of wealth and rank; for the Countess never doubted that she would at last attain success. That the Lady Anna should throw herself away upon Daniel Thwaite did not occur to her as a possibility. She had not even dreamed that Daniel Thwaite would aspire to her daughter's hand. And yet every shop-boy and every shop-girl in Keswick had been so saying for the last twelvemonth, and rumors which had hitherto been confined to Keswick and its neighborhood were now common in London; for the case was becoming one of the celebrated causes of the age, and all the world was talking of the Countess and her daughter. No momentary suspicion had crossed the mind of the Countess till after their arrival in London; and then when the suspicion did touch her, it was not love that she suspected, but rather an unbecoming familiarity, which she attributed to her child's ignorance of the great life which awaited her. "My dear," she said, one day when Daniel Thwaite had left them, "you should be less free in your manner with that young man."

"What do you mean, mamma?" said the daughter, blushing.

"You had better call him Mr. Thwaite."

"But I have called him Daniel ever since I was born."

"He always calls you Lady Anna."

"Sometimes he does, mamma."

"I never heard him call you any thing else," said the Countess, almost with indignation. "It is all very well for the old man, because he is an old man, and has done so much for us."

"So has Daniel—quite as much, mamma. They have both done every thing."

"True; they have both been warm friends; and if ever I forget them, may God forget me. I trust that we may both live to show them that they are not forgotten. But it is not fitting that there should exist between you and him the intimacy of equal positions. You are not and can not be his equal. He has been born to be a tailor, and you are the daughter and heiress of an earl."

These last words were spoken in a tone that was almost awful to the Lady Anna. She had heard so much of her father's rank and her father's wealth—rank and wealth which were always to be hers, but which had never as yet reached her, which had been a perpetual trouble to her, and a crushing weight upon her young life—that she had almost learned to hate the title and the claim. Of course it was a part of the religion of her life that her mother had been duly married to her father. It was beyond a doubt to her that such was the case. But the constant battling for denied rights, the assumption of a position which could not be attained, the use of titles which were simply ridiculous in themselves as connected with the kind of life which they were driven to lead—these things had all become odious to her. She lacked the ambition which gave her mother strength, and would gladly have become Anna Murray or Anna Lovel, with a girl's ordinary privilege of loving her lover, had such an easy life been possible to her.

In person she was very lovely—less tall and robust than her mother had been, but with a sweeter, softer face. Her hair was less dark, and her eyes were neither blue nor bold. But they were bright and soft and very eloquent, and when laden with tears would have softened the heart—almost of her father. She was as yet less powerful than her mother, both in body and mind, but probably better calculated to make a happy home for a husband and children. She was affectionate, self-denying, and feminine. Had that offer of compromise for thirty, twenty, or for ten thousand pounds been made to her, she would have accepted it willingly, caring little for her name, little even for fame, so that she might have been happy and quiet, and at liberty to think of a lover as are other girls. In her present condition how could she have any happy love? She was the Lady Anna Lovel, heir to a ducal fortune—but she lived in small, close lodgings in Wyndham Street, New Road. She did not believe in the good time coming as did her mother. Their enemy was an undoubted earl, undoubtedly owner of Lovel Grange, of which she had heard all her life. Would it not be better to take what the young lord chose to give them and to be at rest? But she did not dare to express such thoughts to her mother. Her mother would have crushed her with a look.

"I have told Mr. Thwaite," the mother said to her daughter, "what we were saying this morning."

"About his son?"

"Yes—about his son."

"Oh, mamma!"

"I was bound to do so."

"And what did he say, mamma?"

"He did not like it, and told me that he did not like it; but he admitted that it was true. He admitted that his son was no fitting intimate for the Lady Anna Lovel."

"What should we have done without him?"

"Badly, indeed; but that can not change his duty, or ours. He is helping us to struggle for that which is our own; but he would mar his generosity if he put a taint on that which he is endeavoring to restore to us."

"Put a taint, mamma!"

"Yes; a taint would rest upon your rank if you as Lady Anna Lovel were familiar with Daniel Thwaite as with an equal. His father understands it, and will speak to him."

"Mamma, Daniel will be very angry."

"Then will he be very unreasonable: but, Anna, I will not have you call him Daniel any more."

CHAPTER IV.

THE TAILOR OF KESWICK.

OLD Thomas Thwaite was at this time up in London about the business of the Countess, but had no intention of residing there. He still kept his shop in Keswick, and still made coats and trowsers for Cumberland statesmen. He was by no means in a condition to retire from business, having spent the savings of his life in the cause of the Countess and her daughter. Men had told him that, had he not struck the Earl in the yard of the Crown at Keswick, as horses were being brought out for the lord's traveling carriage, ample provision would have been made by the rich old sinner for his daughter. That might have been so, or might not, but the saying instigated the tailor to further zeal and increased generosity. To oppose an earl, even though it might be on behalf of a countess, was a joy to him; to set wrong right, and to put down cruelty, and to relieve distressed women, was the pride of his heart—especially when his efforts were made in antagonism to one of high rank. And he was a man who would certainly be thorough in his work, though his thoroughness should be ruinous to himself. He had despised the Murrays, who ought to have stuck to their distant cousin, and had exulted in his heart at thinking that the world would say how much better and truer had been the Keswick tailor than the well-born and comparatively wealthy Scotch relations. And the poets of the lakes, who had not as yet become altogether Tories, had taken him by the hand and praised him. The rights of the Countess and the wrongs of the Countess had become his life. But he still kept on a diminished business in the north, and it was now needful that he should return to Cumberland. He had heard that renewed offers of compromise were to be made—though no idea of the proposed marriage between the distant cousins had been suggested to him. He had been discussing the question of some compromise with the Countess when she spoke to him respecting his son; and had recommended that certain terms should, if possible, be effected. Let the money be divided, on condition that the marriage were allowed. There could be no difficulty in this if the young lord would accede to such an arrangement, as the marriage must be acknowledged unless an adverse party should bring home proof from Italy to the contrary. The sufficiency of the ceremony in Applethwaite Church was incontestable. Let the money be divided, and the Countess be Countess Lovel, and Lady Anna be the Lady Anna to all the world. Old Thomas Thwaite himself had seemed to think that there would be enough of triumph in such a settlement. "But the woman might afterward be bribed to come over and renew her claim," said the Countess. "Unless it be absolutely settled now, they will say when I am dead and gone that my daughter has no right to her name." Then the tailor said that he would make further inquiry how that might be. He was inclined to think that there might be a decision which should be absolute, even though that decision should be reached by compromise between the now contending parties.

Then the Countess had said her word about Daniel Thwaite the son, and Thomas Thwaite the father had heard it with ill-concealed anger. To fight against an earl on behalf of the earl's injured wife had been very sweet to him, but to be checked in his fight because he and his were unfit to associate with the child of that injured wife was very bitter. And yet he had sense to know that what the Countess said to him was true. As far as words went, he admitted the truth; but his face was more eloquent than his words, and his face showed plainly his displeasure.

"It is not of you that I am speaking," said the Countess, laying her hand upon the old man's sleeve.

"Daniel is, at any rate, fitter than I," said the tailor. "He has been educated, and I never was."

"He is as good as gold. It is not of that I speak. You know what I mean."

"I know very well what you mean, Lady Lovel."

"I have no friend like you, Mr. Thwaite—none whom I love as I do you. And next to you is your son. For myself, there is nothing that I would not do for him or you—no service, however menial, that I would not render you with my own hands. There is no limit to the gratitude which I owe you. But my girl is young, and if this burden of rank and wealth is to be hers, it is proper that she do honor to it."

"And it is not honorable that she should be seen speaking—to a tailor."

"Ah!—if you choose to take it so!"

"How should I take it? What I say is true. And what you say is true also. I will speak to Daniel." But she knew well, as he left her, that his heart was bitter against her.

The old man did speak to his son, sitting with him up in the bedroom over that which the Countess occupied. Old Thomas Thwaite was a strong man, but his son was in some respects stronger. As his father had said of him, he had been educated—or rather instructed; and instruction leads to the power of thinking. He looked deeper into things than did his father, and was governed by wider and greater motives. His father had been a radical all his life, guided thereto probably by some early training, and made steadfast in his creed by feelings which induced him to hate the pretensions of an assumed superiority. Old Thwaite could not endure to think that one man should be considered to be worthier than another because he was richer. He would admit the riches, and even the justice of the riches, having been himself, during much of his life, a rich man in his own sphere; but would deny the worthiness; and would adduce, in proof of his creed, the unworthiness of certain exalted sinners. The career of the Earl Lovel had been to him a sure proof of the baseness of English aristocracy generally. He had dreams of a republic in which a tailor might be president or senator, or something almost noble. But no rational scheme of governance among mankind had ever entered his mind, and of pure politics he knew no more than the journeyman who sat stitching upon his board.

But Daniel Thwaite was a thoughtful man who had read many books. More's Utopia and Harrington's Oceana, with many a tale written in the same spirit, had taught him to believe that a perfect form of government, or rather of policy, under which all men might be happy and satisfied, was practicable upon earth, and was to be achieved—not merely by the slow amelioration of mankind under God's fostering ordinances—but by the continued efforts of good and wise men, who, by their goodness and wisdom, should be able to make the multitude believe in them. To diminish the distances not only between the rich and the poor, but between the high and the low, was the grand political theory upon which his mind was always running. His father was ever thinking of himself and of Earl Lovel, while Daniel Thwaite was considering the injustice of the difference between ten thousand aristocrats and thirty millions of people, who were for the most part ignorant and hungry. But it was not that he also had not thoughts of himself. Gradually he had come to learn that he need not have been a tailor's foreman in Wigmore Street had not his father spent on behalf of the Countess Lovel the means by which he, the son, might already have become a master tradesman. And yet he had never begrudged it. He had been as keen as his father in the cause. It had been the romance of his life since his life had been capable of romance; but with him it had been no respect for the rank to which his father was so anxious to restore the Countess, no value which he attached to the names claimed by the mother and the daughter. He hated the countess-ship of the Countess, and the ladyship of the Lady Anna. He would fain that they should have abandoned them. They were to him odious signs of iniquitous pretensions. But he was keen enough to punish and to remedy the wickedness of the wicked Earl. He reverenced his father because he assaulted the wicked Earl and struck him to the ground. He was heart and soul in the cause of the injured wife. And then the one thing on earth that was really dear to him was the Lady Anna.

